partes of the mynde be geuen vnto the fleshe, the spirite departeth alwaye: for it canne not abyde the dominion of the fleshe. Wherefore Dauid, when he had fallen into græuous sinnes, was for that tyme destitute of the motion of the spirite of God, and therfore he cryeth: Restore vnto me the ioy of thy saluation, and establish me with thy principall spirite. Although in very dede he neuer fell away from election or predestination. And when the Apostle saith: He whiche hath not the spirite of Christ, the same is none of his. We therfore by the spirite iudgeth our coniunction with Christ, bicause by it we are coupled with hym, and by it we are regenerate. Wherefore Christ in John saith: Unlesse a man be borne agayne of water and the spirite, &c. Wherby is signified, y that by which we are chiefly regenerate, is the holy ghost: but y water doth in y sacrament of baptisme represent the same as an outward signe. Water walbeth, watreth, maketh fertile, and hath in it many other qualities, by which the nature of the spirite is declared: which spirite, when it is come vnto our mynde, the disposition, propriety, to wardnes, sence, and motions of Christ are grafted into vs: so that he which hath obteyned it, may say with Paul: I lyue, but not I nowe, but Christ liueth in me. And they which haue the spirite of Christ, are said to be his, not after the common maner, wherby all creatures are called the chyldren of God: For Christ saith in the Gospel, All things are deliuered vnto me of my father. But they are made his peculiar possession, forasmuch as now they are both called, and also are in dede his members, and are grafted into him, & are most perfectly knit vnto him, receiuing nourishment of him. Were we se, how foolishly some answer, which when they are reprovèd & admonished of their duty, say, y they are not spirituall: for they consider not y by this answer they deny the selues to be Christians: for if they be of Christ, they both haue his spirit, and also must of necessity be spiritual. They also are of an euil iudgement which take away y booke of the holy scriptures out of the handes of the lay men, bicause they thinke y they haue not the spirit. For when they so say, they say they are no christians. For if they be christians, they haue not only the spirit of Christ, but also the wordes of the holy scripture, which are the assured sayings of the spirite, and are most conuenient for them. Lastly, who seeth not, that they exceedingly are deceiued, which commaund vs continually to doubt, whether we haue the spirite of God, or no. For vndoubtedly, if we oughte not to doute whether we be Christians, we oughte not to be in doubt whether the spirite of Christ do dwell in vs or no. Ambrose vpon this place noteth, that the spirite of God departeth from vs for two maner of causes: eyther bicause of the vnderstanding of the fleshe, or els bicause of the actes therof. That is, either for false doctrine, or els for corrupt maners.

But if Christ be in you, the body in dede is dead, because of sinne.] Whereto pertaineth the first part of this chapter, wherin hath bene declared, that although in the saintes there still remayneth sinne, yet therof followeth not condemnation: for it is taken away by y law of the spirit. But fro whence this spirit is deriued into vs, hath ben set forth mainly, fro the death, which y son of God suffered for vs. Farther, it hath bene declared, what they are vnto whome so great a benefite is come: namely, they which walke according to the spirite, and not according to the fleshe. Now he entreteth into the second part, wherin he teacheth, that we by the same spirite haue obtained participation both of the death and of the resurrection of the Lord. And he exhorteth vs, according as our duty is, to mortify y dedes of the fleshe, and to addit our selues wholly vnto the spirit, by whom we haue obteyned so great benefites. And to knit together those things which are to be spoken, with those which are already spoken, the Apostle saith, But if Christ be in you. In that he thus saith, that Christ is in vs, he sheweth that it counteth it al one, for the spirite of God or of Christ to dwell in vs, and Christ himselfe to be in vs: not that he meaneth, that the holy ghost and Christ, that is the sonne of God are one & the selfe same hypostasis or person. But as Chrysostome hath taught, this is the nature of the thre persons, that wherefoeuer the one is, there also the other are together present. Wherefore forasmuch as y holy ghost is in vs, it followeth of necessity that

The spirite suffereth not the ruine of the fleshe.

By the spirite we are coupled with Christ

Effectes of the spirite.

We belong vnto Christ after a certain peculiar manner

They whiche are truly Christians, must needs be spirituall.

The wordes of the scripture are not to be prohibited to the lay men.

Christians ought not to doubt whether they haue the spirite of Christ.

The spirite departeth from vs for two causes.

Not where loeueth Christ is ac-cordinge to his diuine nature, he is there also according to his humane nature.

Of the rocke
which was Christ.

The fathers in the wildernes tempted Christ.
How it is to be vnder-
stande, Christ to dwell in vs.

A place of Augustine
expounded.

the sonne of God which is Christ together with the father is in vs. Which thing Paul hath expessedly pronounced vnto the Ephesians when he sayd: That Christ by fayth dwelleth in our hartes. And yet it followeth not, that whersoener Christ is according to his diuine nature, he is there also according to his humane nature. For his humane nature, whether we haue a regard vnto the soule or vnto the body, is finite, neither can so be poured abroade infinitely, that it shoulde possesse and fill all things, as doth his diuine nature. Wherefore we graunt that the sonne and the father are whersoener the holy ghost is: and whersoener we confesse the son of God to be, there also will we confesse Christ to be, but yet not alwaies according to his humane nature. For y<sup>e</sup> is not possible. Paul saith in his .epistle vnto the Cor. that the elders dranke of the spiritual rock which followed the, & that rocke was Christ. By which wordes are y<sup>e</sup> things to be vnderstand: first y<sup>e</sup> Christ was signified in that rocke, secondly, y<sup>e</sup> he was in very dede present wth the people when they dranke, as the holy history declareth. For it telleth, y<sup>e</sup> God promised, that he would be present with his people at the rocke Oreb. And the same God was y<sup>e</sup> sonne, which could not then be present according to flesh and humane nature, when as he had not yet put it on. And yet is he of Paul called Christe. And in the selfe same epistle, the fathers are sayd to haue tempted Christ in the desert: which can not be vnderstand according to the humane nature: for as much as it was not then extant. So when Christ is sayd to dwell in vs by sayth of the spirite, it doth not thereof follow, that either his body or his soule dwelleth in our hartes really, as I may call it, and substantially. It is inough that Christ be sayd to be in vs by his diuine presence, and that he is by his spirite, grace, and giftes present with vs. Be ther is this (as some make exclamation) to go aboute to seperate the diuine nature from the humane. For we holde that the natures in Christ are ioyned together, and inseperable. And yet that coniunction maketh not, that the humane nature extendeth it selfe so farre as doth the diuine nature. Which thing Augustine hath most manifestly testefied vnto Dardanus Although I knowe there are some which go aboute by certayne wordes of his out his y<sup>e</sup>. treatise bpo John to cauill, that he ment that Christ also according to his humane nature is still with vs, although he be not sene. For Augustine whē he interpreteth these wordes of the Lord, I go to prepare you a place, sayth, that those places and mansions are nothing els, then we our selues which beleue: which are as certayne dwelling places, vnto which the father and the sonne come, and abide in. But we must by the holy ghost be prepared, to be made mete dwelling places. Whē he thus expoundeth these wordes he demaūdeth Why then sayth Christ, that he goeth a way, if we must be prepared? For he ought rather to be present. For if he depart a way, we shall not be prepared. Afterward when he soluerth the question, he thus writeth: If I doo well vnderstande the, thou departest neyther from whence thou camest, neyther from the place whither thou goest. Thou departest in hiding thy selfe, th<sup>u</sup> comest in manifesting thy selfe. But vnles thou abide in governing vs, and we go forward winning well, how shall a place be prepared for vs? Behold (say they) by these wordes it is most manifest, that Christe hath not departed from vs, but is present, although he lye hidde. But then consider not, that these thinges are spoke of the diuine nature. For that is it which is said to haue come from heauen, and out of the bosome of the father. He came indeed, not that he departed thence from whence he came, but because he appeared vnto vs vnder humane nature. Agayne he is sayd to haue gone from hence, when he ascended according to his humane nature: not that he hath utterly departed frō vs, but for that the humane nature in which he appeared vnto vs being taken vp vnto heauen, the presence of his diuine nature lieth hidden with vs, nether can it be sene of vs. And that this is the meaning of Augustine, may be proued by two argumentes. First because he entreateth of our preparation, which belongeth vnto Christ according to his diuine nature: for it worketh and infinitueth it selfe in our hartes and mindes. Farther that place which he citeth out of the epistle vnto the Corinthians, whereas he proueth, that we are the dwelling places places of God, teacheth the selfe same thing. Paul sayth, that we are the temple of God, and the temple of the holy ghost, and that God himselfe dwelleth in vs: which undoubtedly can not be referred vnto the humane nature of Christ, but only vnto the deuine. But the better to vnderstand Augustines iudgement as touching this matter, let vs heare what he sayth in his 50. treatise vpon y<sup>e</sup> selfe same Gospel of John, where he expoundeth these wordes, The poore ye shall haue alwayes with you, but me ye shall not haue alwayes. For he spake (saith he) of the presence of his body: For according to his maiesty, according to his prouidence, according to his vnspeakeable & inuisible grace is fulfilled that which he spake, Behold I am with you eue vnto the end of the world. But according to the nature which the world tooke, according to that that he was borne of the virgen, according to that that he was apprehended of the Iewes, that he was fastened vnto the woode, that he was taken down from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen, that he was layde in the sepulcher, that he was made manifeste in the resurrection, ye shall not haue me alwayes with you. Wherefore? Bycause, according to the presence of his body he was 40. dayes conuersant with his disciples: and when he had brought them forth, they seeing him and not following him, he ascended vnto heauen. He is not here, for he is there, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father. And he is here, for he hath not departed hence touching the presence of his maiesty. According to the presence of his maiesty, we haue Christ alwayes: according to the presence of the flesh, it was rightly sayd vnto the disciples: Me ye shall not haue alwayes. For the Church had him a few dayes according to the presence of the flesh: now it holdeth him by sayth, and seeth him not with the eyes. There are also very many other places in which Augustine most manifestly declareth, that he was of this selfe same iudgment, Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> this which Paul now sayth, If Christ be in you, is not to be vnderstand of his humane nature or body, those things plainly declare which haue bene spokē of the spirite. By this place of Paul we are plainly taught how we receaue Christ in y<sup>e</sup> eucharist, & in what maner we are in it ioyned vnto him. For we haue heard, y<sup>e</sup> by y<sup>e</sup> death of Christ we haue obtayned his spirite. But in the supper of the Lord is celebrated the commemoration of the death of Christ, and of his body done vpon the crosse, and of his blood shed for vs: and this not only in wordes, but also in the symbols of the bread and wyne, which represent the body and blood of Christ. Wherefore if by faith we embrace those thinges, which we are put in mynde of, we then obtayne the spirite of Christ, and Christ himselfe is in vs, as Paul in this place testifieth. But there is no neede to require the body and flesh of Christ according to his naturall and real presence, which yet we haue sufficiently spirituallly present, when we apprehend them by sayth. Christostome out of this place gathereth very many and grauous discommodities, which men, that are destitute of the spirite of Christ, fall into: for they are holden in death and in sinne, they exercise enmities agaynst God, they can not obserue his lawe, and though they seeme to be of Christ, yet are they not. For Paul will declare, that they are not partakers of the death and of the resurrection of the Lord. For he saith:

And if Christ be in you, the body in dede is deade because of sinne, but the spirite is life because of righteousness.] The Apostle in this place as we haue before taught, declareth, that by the benefite of the spirite we are endued with the communion of the death and of the resurrection of Christ. And although all interpreters consent, that in the latter part of this sentence is entreated of the true resurrection of the bodies, yet touching the first parte all men are not of one mynde. For some thus vnderstand, that the body is dead, as if it should haue bene sayd, that the lust and prauity which cleaue vnto vs, are by the benefite of the spirite mortified, and become as it were dead. So that after these interpreters, this word Body, signifieth the naturall lyfe of men, not as it was instituted of God, but as it is now corrupted through sinne: This life (say they) ought to be deade because it is sinne.

But the spirite is life, because of righteousness.] By the spirite he here undoubtedly vnderstandeth the spirite of God: and not any part of our mynde: as it is manifest both by those thinges which shalbe spoken, and by those thinges

Do. y.

which

Augustine
declareth how Christ is with vs
and how he is absent from vs.

How we receaue Christ and are ioyned vnto him in the Eucharist.

The discom-modities
which happe vnto the
which are destitute of the spirite
of Christ.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

The antithesis is changed. The spirite of God doth not onely liue but also communicateth life vnto others which haue already bene spoken. Here Paul changeth the Antithesis: For he saith not, the spirite liueth, as he had before sayde of the body, that it is deade: but he sayth, The spirite is lyfe: Which thing is most agreeable vnto the spirite of God. For, that spirite doth not onely liue it selfe, but also communicateth life vnto others, and continually breatheth into the belcuers a new and holy life. Farther so much as Paul ment in this place highly to commend the dignity of the spirite, this abstract nowne, vita, that is, lyfe, serued better for his purpose, then the verbe viuit, that is, lyueth.

Because of righteousness, ¶ In Greke it is wrytten, δια δικαιοσυνης, and it fitteth very well. For righteousness is both an antithesis vnto sinne, and also is the life of God. For so long as a man worketh iustly, and liueth holily, he leadeth the life of God. Although the Latten interpreter hath, Propter iustificationē, that is, by reason of iustification, as if he had red in the Greke, δια δικαιοσυνης, Which reading Christome folloved, and bringeth this reason thereof, for that we haue an experience of life by reason of iustification, for by it sinne being taken away, succeeded life. For these two are so repugnant one to the other, that when the one getteth place, the other must nedes succede. The same father addeth, That the body is the at the last dead, when we are no more affected with the motions thereof, the we are moued by our karkases being now buried and hid vnder grounde. And thys he saith, is the communion with the death of Christ, because Christ dyed, to dissolue the body of sinne.

Howe we are partakers of the resurrection The spirite of God will do the selfe same thinge in vs that it hath done in Christ.

Our resurrection is now begon.

What to be vnto the body or vnto sinne signifieth.

And if his spirite which rayfed vp Christ from the dead dwell in you, he that rayfed vp Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortall bodies, because of his spirite that dwelleth in you. ¶ This declareth howe we are partakers of the resurrection: namely, when by mortification we are made like vnto his death. The reason of Paul, leneth vnto this foundation, that the spirite of God will worke the selfe same effecte in vs, that it did in Christ. For of one & the selfe same cause, are to be looked for y selfe same effectes. And God for as much as he is enery where like vnto himselfe, by the selfe same meanes bringeth forth the selfe same workes. Wherefore the consequence followeth well. And seeing, when Christ was rayfed from the dead ther was rendred vnto him a pure, eternall, and diuine life, such a life also shall one day be rendred vnto vs: which life we wayte for in the blessed resurrection when our bodies shalbe rayfed vp being perfectly renued: and now also we beginne the same, when as by new motions of the spirite we are stirred vp to good workes. Wherefore by these wordes are we admonished to mortifie the affectes of the flesh: as Paul in an other place saide, They which are of Christ, haue crucified their fleshe with all the lustes thereof. And vnto the Colossians: Mortifie, saith he, your members which are vpon the earth: and thys is, the body to be deade. Neither is it to be meruailed at, that by the name of the body, is vnderstand sine: for sinne is named of that part, whereby it had entrance into vs. For the soule (saith Ambrose) is not traduced from the parentes: but only the body. Now to dye vnto the body or vnto sinne, is nothing els, then to do nothing at the commaundement of lustes. This is all one with that which we had before in the 6. chapter, That we are now in baptisme dead with Christ, and are buried together wyth hym. And the Apostle commonly when he wryteth of mortification and newnes of life taketh argumentes of the resurrection of the Lord: by which Christ layd away mortality, and did put on eternall life: Which selfe thing shall also come to passe in our resurrection. For in it shall we lay aside all oldenes of error and of corruption. Which, although before that tyme we shall not perfectly haue, yet now also in this life we beginne to possesse in some sorte already. Wherefore Paul saith in the 2. epistle to the Corinthyans. Euen as our olde man is daily destroyed, so on the other side is our new man daily renewed. And vnto the Colossians, If ye haue risen together with Christ, seeke the thynges that are aboue. And vnto the Phillippians Paul saith, That he alwayes endeuoreth himselfe to the thinges that are before, neglecting, and setting aside those thynges which are behynde, that he might mought by any meanes attayne vnto the resurrection of the Lord, beyng already made pertaker of hys suffrynges. And thus much as touching the first interpretaciō, which Chrysostome followeth, which if we moze narrowly consider we shall see that it containeth, that which we a litle before spake, namely, that it is y proper duty of Christians, not to liue according to the fleshe, but according to the spirite. For what other thinge is this, but to mortifye y body of sinne, and to rise againe vnto a new life w Christ: as though euē now beginneth to shine forth in vs y resurrectiō which we hope shall in the last time be made perfect. The second interpretation which Augustine foloweth, is to vnderstand the body properly, that is, for this our outward substaunce. And this body (he saith) is through sinne dead, for that vppon it by reason of sinne was sentence long since geuen. And he teacheth that by Christ we haue recovered a better nature, then we lost by Adam. For he had a body not obnoxious vnto the necessity of death, howbeit mortall, for if he sinned, he shoulde die. But we by the resurrection of Christ shall receiue a body so frē from the necessity of dying, that it can not any moze dye. So according to this interpretatiō Paul declareth, that we besides the benefite of the death of Christ, haue an other benefite also of the spirite of Christ, so that we are now by him pertakers of immortality. Wherefore as touching the resurrection of the bodies, eche interpretation is agreeable. But about this particule The body is dead, they agree not: for Augustine taketh the body properly: but Chrysostome by it vnderstandeth the vice and corruption of nature. Wherefore according to this second interpretation Paul seemeth to answer vnto a priuy obiection. For against those thinges which haue hitherto bene spoken, mought some man make this obiection. This spirit whome thou so highly commendest, as though it deliuereth vs from sinne and frō death, hath yet stil leue vs in death and obnoxious vnto many aduersities, diseases, and calamities. Paul answereth that this is true only as touching the body by reason of sinne, which is still left in it. For there hence come those euils. Howbeit he willet vs to be of good cheare: for, that spirite of God which is in vs, hath now taken away condemnatiō that sinne which is remainyng in vs, should not be imputed vnto vs vnto eternal death: and will also bying to passe, that euen as Christ which was dead, was by him raised by againe from the dead, so also our bodies which are yet mortall, shall be repayred vnto true immortality. This sence is easy and plain, and very wel agreeing with those thinges which haue bene spoken: & therfore I allow it, although in y other exposition I know there is no absurditie or discōmoditie. Here are two thinges to be noted: first, that y lust which is remainyng in vs, is of Paul called sinne, and such a sinne also, that after it followeth death. Which cannot be denied, in infants that are baptised, and yet die: for if in them sinne were vicerly taken away, death could haue no place. Although in the elect, which are nowe reconciled vnto God, death and such other afflictions, are not inflicted as paines, but rather as a crosse sanctified of God: and that by a fatherly chastisement we should vnderstand how highly God is displeased with sinne, and should be moze and moze called back vnto repentance: and that death mought be in vs a way, wherby should be extinguished whatsoeuer sinne is remainyng in vs. Wherefore although by reason of sinne death be said to haue place in vs, for vnles it were, death could by no meanes be, yet followeth it not, that it is inflicted vpon the godly and elect as a payne. And although the bodye be sayde to be deade bicause of sinne, yet ought we not therfore to thinke that God retayneth hatred or anger against his, whose sins he hath forgiven. For death and aduersities which afflict the godly, ought not to be counted amongst paynes or punishments. God is wont in deede to exercise the faythfull with aduersities, as we rede of Dauid, who although he heard, that his sinne was forgiven hym, yet he both lost hys sonne, and also in his family suffred wonderfull hard chaunces. Wherefore the sacrificing priestes ought not hereof to conclude, that it is lawfull for them at their pleasures to impose paynes and satisfactions vpon them, whome they haue absolved from sinnes. For only Christ, when he died vpon the crosse, hath abundantly made satisfaction for vs all. Neither did

By Christ
we haue re-couered a better nature then we lost by by Adam.

The luste which res-mayneth in vs is sinne,
after which followeth
death.
Why God
sendeth aduersities vpon his elect.

God retay-neth not anger against those, whose he receiaeth
into fauour.
In example of Dauid.
It lieth not in the sacrificing priestes to moderate
the paines
inflicted of
God.

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

The keyes
of the church
he can not moderate
the scourges
of God.

In other end of the scourges of
God.

The spirit of Christ is the ground
of our resurrection.
The flesh
of Christ
really eaten
is not the cause of our resurrection.

In the holy supper
we are indued with the spirit of Christ.
How the flesh and bloud
of Christ,
are a helpe
vnto the resurrection.
Wherefore
the fathers sometimes attribute this thing
vnto the sacraments
A place of John in the
vi. chap.

Christ impose any paynes ether vnto the thiefe, or to the sinfull woman, or vnto the man sicke of the palsey, vnto whome he sayd, Sonne, thy sinnes are forgiven thee. Neither haue these men one word in the holy scriptures of their satisfactions. Howbeit we both may and ought to exhort as many as returne vnto Christ, and do repent, by good workes to approue themselves, to shew worthy fruites of repentance, and whome they haue before by their euil workes offended, him now to reconcile and edifie by their manners being changed. Although these men ought not vnder this pretence to claime or challenge vnto themselves their keyes, as though they could at their pleasure moderate the scourges of God: whether they are to be suffered in this life, or (as they sayne) in an other. For it lieth in Gods hand only ether to send or to release warres, diseases, hunger, persecutions, and such other like kinde of calamities. Neither hath God when he afflicteth the Saints, alwayes a regard vnto this, by a fatherly chastisement to correct their sinnes. For oftentimes it cometh to passe, that he will haue his Saintes geue a testimony of his doctrine, and make manifest vnto the worlde, how much his mighty and strong power is of efficacy in them. So was John Baptist beheaded: so were Esay, Ieremy, and all the Martyrs slayn. This matter is clearly entreated of in the booke of Iobe. Howbeit it is profitable, that the godly be oftentimes admonished of repentance, and of good workes: that God may lenesce and mitigate those scourges and calamities, which he useth to inflict vpon sinners. Wherefore this place seemeth nothing to confirme either purgatory or satisfactions. Howbeit, by these wordes we are manifestly taught, what is the ground or beginning of our resurrection: namely, the spirit of Christ which first dwelt in him, and after ward also dwelleth in vs. Wherefore they are deceived which thinke that vnto our resurrection is necessary, either transubstantiation, or the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, as though out of his flesh, which they will haue to be eaten of vs really, we shal draw eternall life, as out of a true fountaine and a certaine ground. For here they make a false argument from that which is not the cause, as the cause. Here Paul writeth, that the beginning of a new life is, that we haue the selfe same spirit which was in Christ, which is the whole and perfect cause of our resurrection. But how the spirit of Christ can haue place in the supper of the Lord, we may easely vnderstand: for there we renew the memoire of the death of Christ, of which, if by faith we take hold in the communion, we are more plentifully endued with the spirit of Christ, wherby not only the minde is quickned, but also the body is so renewed, that it is made partaker of the blessed resurrection. Whereby it is manifest how the flesh and bloud of Christ conduce to the bringing forth of the resurrection in vs. For by faith we take hold that they were deliuered for vs vnto the death: and by this faith we obtaine the spirit to be made both in minde and in body partakers of eternall life. And if the fathers at any time seeme to attribute this vnto the sacramentes, yet hereof cometh, for that they ascribe vnto the signes the thinges which are proper vnto the thinges signified. This may we perceiue by the 6. chapter of John: for there Christ promisseth life vnto them that eate his flesh and drinke his bloud. And it is not harde for any man to see, that in that place is spoken of the spirituall eatinge, whyche consisteth of sayth and the spirit: For the signes were not as yet geuen of Christ. And whereas hee sayth, The breade whiche I will geue is my fleshe, whiche I will geue for the life of the worlde, is to bee vnderstande of the fleshe of Christ fastened vpon the crosse, whiche beinge by faith comprehended of vs shal so strengthen and confirme vs, as if it were our bread and our meate. And that Christ sayd in the future tyme: I will geue, it is not to be meruailed at: for he was not yet dead. But bys death which after ward followed brought to passe, that his body of Christ was offered vnto vs, not only in wordes but also in outward signes in that last tyme, when he was at the poynt to be deliuered. Augustine in his 26. treatise vpon John defendeth this doctrine, for he sayth, To beleue, is, To eate. And he sayth mozeouer, That the old Fathers vnder the law did eate the selfe same thing that we doo: For theyr sacraments and ours were all one one: and though their signes were diuers, yet the things signified are one and the selfe same. And in his epistle vnto Marcellinus he sayth, That the sacramentes of the elders and ours were herein diuers for that they beleued in Christ to come, and we beleue in him being now already come. And Leo bishoppe of Rome in his epistle vnto them of Constantinoble, sayth, that we receauing the vertue or power of the beauey meate do passe into the flesh of Christ, which is made ours. Irenaeus oftentimes sayth, that our flesh and our bodies are nourished with the flesh and blood of Christ: which (so it be rightly vnderstand) we deny not. For euen as by naturall meates is made blood, whereby we are naturally fed, so by the flesh and blood of Christ being taken holde of by sayth, we drinke vnto vs the spirite, whereby the soule is nourished, and the body made partakers of eternall life, which we shall haue in the resurrection. Farther we doubt not but that our flesh and body doe eat the signes of this sacrament, which signes are called by the name of the things signified. And when we heare the fathers speake of the true flesh and body and blood of Christ which we eat in the Eucharist, if we looke vpon theyr natural and proper sence we shall see that they had to do agaynst those heretikes, which denyed that Christ verely tooke humane flesh: and affirmed that he seemed to be a man onely by a phantasie and certayne outward appearance. And if it were so, then as those fathers very well sayd, our sacramentes should be in vaine. For the body and bloude of Christ should be falsely signified vnto vs, if they had neuer beinge in Christ. Wherefore throughte our spirite, whereby our minde eateth, when we communicate, our body also is renewed, to be an apte instrument of the holyghost, whereby vnto it, by the promise of God is due eternall life. And euen as the vine tree being planted into the earth, when his time cometh waxeth greene, and buddeth forth, so our dead karkases being buried in the ground shall at the hour appoynted by Christ be rayled vp to glory. And if in case the absolute, whole, and necessary cause of our resurrection, should, as these men would haue it, be that eatinge of the flesh of Christ, which they sayne is in the Eucharist really and corporally receaued of vs, what should then become of the fathers of the old Testament, which could not eat it after that maner, when as Christ had not yet put on humane nature. But peradventure they wil say, that they speake not of them, but of vs only: For we can not rise agayne vnles we eat the flesh of the Lord: for Christ instituted this sacrament for vs, and not for them. But doe not these men perceaue, that in this theyr so saying, they now alter the cause of the resurrection? But by what authority, or by whose permission or commaundement they doo y, let the consider. For y which is vnto one people the cause of resurrection, how should not the same be so also vnto an other. But to graunt them this, what (in Gods name) will they say touchinge infants, which dye in theyr infancy, before they receaue the sacrament of the Eucharist? Being they confesse that they shall be rayled vp to glory, euen hereby at the least way they may vnderstand, that the corporall eating of the flesh of Christ is not so necessary vnto the resurrection: but the spirituall eating is altogether necessary, as without whiche no man can arise agayne to saluation. For Christ expessedly saith, Vnles ye eat the flesh of the sonne of man, and drinke his blood ye shall not haue life in you.

Shall also quicken your mortall bodies. ] This he therefore speaketh, for that through the spirite that dwelleth in vs, we are now made y members of Christ. But it is not a thing semely, that the hed should liue, and the members be dead. He sayth, mortall bodies: because so long as we liue here, we cary about death together with vs: but then shall God change the nature of our bodies. But so often as we heare y our bodies are called mortall, let vs call to mind, sinne: for by it are we made obnoxious vnto death. Chrysostome hath very waresly admonished vs, that we should not by reason of these wordes of Paul imagine, that the wicked, for y they want the spirite of Christ, shall not be rayled vp fro the dead. For here is not entreated of euery resurrection, but onely of the healthfull and blessed resurrection. For the life of the damned shall be euercasting misery: wher

Do. itty.

foze

Here is not spoken of euery resurrection from the dead but onely of the

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

healthfull resurrectio.

foze it is rather to be called death then lyfe. For they? wo:me shall not dye: and they? fyze shall not be quenched.

Therefore brethern we are debtors not to the flesh, to liue after the flesh: For if ye liue after the flesh ye shall dye: but if ye mortefye the deedes of the flesh by the Spirite, ye shall liue. For as many as are led by the Spirite of God, are the sonnes of God. For ye haue not receaued the spirite of bondage to feare agayne: But ye haue receaued the spirite of adoption, whereby we cry Abba father.

Wherof our bond to liue vprightly
springeth.

We are debtors, not vnto the flesh, to liue according to the flesh. ] Here he setteth forth a most swete exhortation to moue vs to liue according to the spirite and not according to the flesh. And to declare, that we are vnterly bound so to doo, he taketh a reaso from that which is iust and honest. Seing we are debtors it behoueth that we saythfully pay our debts. And this debt springeth of those benefites which God hath bestowed vpon vs, which we haue befoze made mention of: namely, for that Christ hath dyed for vs, for y he hath geuen vnto vs his spirite, whereby we are deliuered from condemnation, from the Law of sinne and of death, and whereby the righteousness of the Law is fulfilled in vs, and we are made partakers both of the death of Christ and of the blessed resurrectio. Therefore it is that we are bound not to liue any moze according to the flesh. To haue made this sentence perfect, Paul should haue added, but according to the spirite. But he suppressed thys part of the Antithesis, for that it is by the other part sufficiently vnderstand. For these are of the nature of those kindes of opposites or contraries, that the one geuing place, the other streight way succedeth. Here Chrysostome noteth, that God freele and of his owne accord geneth vnto vs all those good thynges, which he bestoweth vpon vs but we contrary wyse, whatsoeuer we doo vnto God, we do the same of dewty. For we are bound to doo it. And if y case be so, as is in very dede, where are the become wo:kes of supererogatio. For let y aduersaries answer me, whether those wo:kes be according to y flesh or according to y spirite: If according to the flesh then are they sins: but if according to y spirite we owe the of dewty. Neither doth Paul here mean, that we owe nothing vnto the fleshe: for we ought vndoubtedly to fede it, and to clothe it: and that not only as touching our selues, but also as touching our neighbours, if they haue neede. But here is not entreated of the substance of the fleshe, but only of the corruption, whereby we are drawen vnto sinne. For vnto it we in such sort owe nothing, but mortification, as Paul will straight way declare. And when he saith, that we are not debtors vnto the fleshe, he playnly declareth, how necessary good wo:kes are. And he stoppeth their mouthes which spake ill of his doctrine, as which opened a window vnto bices. For he threateneth death, and that eternall death vnto the, which liue according to the fleshe. They which draw the wo:des of the Apostle vnto the liberty of the fleshe, vnderstand not, that he teacheth that men iustified are absolved from the condemnation of the lawe, and not from the obedience ther of. For that obedience lasteth in the Saintes for euer.

Against
wo:kes of supereroga
tion.
We owe much vnto
the nature
or substance
of the flesh.
Here is not spoken of the substance
of the flesh,
but of the corruption
of nature.
The neces sary of good wo:kes.

A reason from that which is profitable &
vnp:fitable.

For if ye liue after the flesh ye shall dye, but if by the spirite ye mortefie the deedes of the fleshe, ye shall liue. ] He here, by an other reason proueth, y we ought to liue holly, which reason is taken fro that which is profitable, and vnp:fitable. Two thinges he setteth forth, namely, life, and death: neither entreateth he here of temporall thinges, but of eternall. It is true in dede, that it is not comely, that we should follow as captaines of our life the prauity and corruption of nature, which is signified by the name of fleshe: neither do the debts which we owe vnto God by reason of his benefites bestowed vpon vs, suffer vs so to do. But yet selue are moued with this comlynnes: and the nature of man is by reason of sinne to much blockish to heauenly thinges, Wherefoze it must haue the stron ger

ger spurres to picke it forwarde. And therefore Paul added this reason of lyfe and death.

If by the spirite ye mortefy the deedes of the fleshe ye shall liue.] Here of two thinges we gather: First, that there are still deedes of the fleshe in the godly. And who doubteth but that they are sinnes, especially seing they ought to be mortified: The second is, that these deedes are mortified by the spirite, for mans inuentions will nothing helpe thereunto. For whatsoever is done by vertues described of the philosophers, is sinne: which can not through Christ be forgiven them. Wherefore the true and perfect cause of mortification is to be sought for at the handes of the spirite. And to mortify is nothing els, but for a man to be violent against himselfe, and to withstand and resist wicked lustes. Here agayne also the Apostle saimeth to touch the difference betwene deadly sinne, and veniall sinne: not that all sinnes are not of their owne nature deadly: but for that through the death and spirite of Christ they are forgiven, therefore they are called veniall. Those are called deadly sinnes, which are not mortified in vs, when we geue our selues to lustes and liue without repentance, and sinne against our conscience, neither resist lustes, but follow on our trade of liuing wickedly, neither in the meane tyme regard we the spirit or death of Christ. These are those sinnes which Paul writeth, They which do such thinges shall not obtayne the kingdome of God and for which (as it is written vnto the Ephesians) The wrath of God commeth vpon the children of distrust.

What is to mortify.

For as many as are led by the spirite of God, are the sonnes of God.] By two reasons it hath bene proued that men godly & regenerate ought not to liue after the fleshe, either bicause they are now debtors so to do, or els bicause the same shall turne them to great commodity: namely, for that they shall liue for euer. Here is added the third reason, for that they are now adopted into the children of God. In which place we are taught two thinges at once: the one is, that they ought freely and of their owne accord to worke, as which are endued with the spirit, not of bondmen, but of children: the other is, that they which so leade their life, shall liue for euer: namely, for that they are the sonnes of God. For he is eternall & immortall. And that they are the children of God, he proueth thre manner of wayes: First, for that they are led by the spirite of God: Secondly, for that they call vpon him by the name of father: & lastly, for that the spirite so testifieth vnto the. Wherefore the reason may thus be knit together. As many as are the sonnes of God, liue not after the flesh, for they are led by the spirite of God, and they call God their father, and they haue the holy ghost in their hartes a witnes of the adoption whiche they haue obtained. Such ones are all we which beleue in Christ, wherefore we ought not to liue after the flesh. When they are said to be the sonnes of God, which are led by the spirite of God, thereby is signified, that the beginning of our adoption cometh only through the spirite of God: by which the faithfull are so drawen, that they are said of Paul to be led, that is, without violence and any coercion bowled. They which want the spirite, are holden with ignorance, and are tossed by the impulsion of lustes. But the spirite of God so leadeeth, that it both teacheth what is to be done, and also ministreth a will, minde, and strengthes to performe the same. It is not inough to know what we ought to do, vnles we haue also strengthes geuen vs to do it: and strengthes should be in vaine geuen vs, if there should want knowledge. These two thinges bringeth the spirite of God with it, and by that meanes leadeeth the elect with pleasure. After we are once sealed with this spirite, we haue obteyned the earnest peny of eternall life, and the adoption of the sonnes of God. And soasmuch as we are not compelled to do any thing against our wils, we enioy most excellent freedome. For we are stirred by vnto those thinges which we exceedingly desire.

We must liue by sight to that we are adopted into children. Thre manner of wayes it is shewed that we are the sonnes of God.

The beginning of our adoption is the spirite of God.

Two thinges ges the spirite of God bringeth with it.

For ye haue not receiued the spirite of bondage vnto feare: But ye haue receiued the spirite of adoption, wherby we cry Abba father.] The apostle by a certaine distinction expresseth, what that spirite is, wherby the sonnes of God

What is the spirite of feare, and what of adoption.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

are led. For he maketh one the spirite of feare, & an other the spirite of adoption: which is no other wise to be vnderstand, but that one and the selfe same spirite of God, bringeth forth two effectes, which are by a certaine order knit together. For first by the law and by the threatenings it maketh afeard those men, that are to be iustified, and breaketh and bereth them with scourges and stripes of the conscience, that utterly despairing of themselves they may flye vnto Christ: vnto whom whē they are come, and that they embrace him by faith, they are not onely iustified, but also are freely & of their owne accorde stirred vp to iust, byright, and holy workes. Wherefore Paul admonisheth the Romanes, that they are now come vnto this latter step or degree, as though he would therof inferre, that therefore they must needs cherefully and redily endeavour themselves vnto a righteous life. But bicause here seemeth to be signified a difference of the old and new Testament, it shall not be amisse to see with what spirite we are now led in the Gospell, and farther w what spirit the fathers were ledde in the law. Undoubtedly Chrysostome vpon this place writeth of that matter diuers things, wherunto I do not fully assent. For first he affirmeth that the Jewes in old tyme had not the holy ghost. But bicause he saith the Apostle in this place expessedly maketh mention of the spirite, this he saith he therefore doth, for that the law of the elders: forasmuch as it was geuen by the spirite of God, was therefore called spirituall: and bicause those men were instructed by that Law, therefore is here mention made of the spirite. And although in the 10 chapter of the first to the Corinthians, those fathers are sayd to haue eaten one and the selfe same spirituall meate, and to haue dronke one and the selfe same drinke of the spirituall rocke, yet will not Chrysostome graunt, that they were partakers of the spirite, but he sayth, that therefore those thinges were called spiritual, for that they were geuen not by humane strenghts, or the strenghts of nature, but by the power of God. And it is to be wondred at, that this father should thinke, that the people in the old tyme were excluded from the spirite of God: whē as in Exodus the 31. chapter we rede, that Bezaleel, and Aholiam were replenished with the holy ghost, and also with wisdom and vnderstanding, to make all such thinges that God had commaunded to be made in the worke of the tabernacle: and we rede that the 70. elders which were geuen to be helpers vnto Moses were in such sorte made partakers of his spirite, that they also prophesied: and that Iosua was endewed with the holy ghost: & that Gedeon had geuen vnto hym the same spirite: and that the same holpe spirite departed from Saul: which could not be vnles he had had it before. And what meaneth this, that Dauid sayth in the Psalm, Take not away thy spirite from me: Agayne, thy spirite shall leade me: Agayne, Confirm me with a principall spirite? Nether can we deny but that Elias, and Elizeus had the spirite of God, when as the one desired that he mought haue double the spirite of the other geuen vnto him. We rede also that Daniell had the spirite of the saints. But vnto these so many oracles, we will adde also a firme reason. That the fathers were iustified we doubt not: But they could not be iustified without faith in Christ: But faith can neither be had nor retained without the holy ghost. But whereas Chrysostome sayth that the Apostle therefore maketh mention of the spirite, for that they were gouerned by the Law which was geuen of the spirite, it is frivolous: for the Law can not execute his office, to bring vnto Christ men being now by it made afraid, vnlesse the power thereof be holpen by the spirite. For how many Epicures & godles men are there, which when they heare the Law, are nether brought to Christ, not yet once touched for the wicked crimes which they haue committed? And that place in the 1. chapter of the first epistle vnto the Corinthians, is not so to be vnderstand as he thinketh. For Paul sayth that the sacramentes of the elders were the selfe same with ours. For vnles it were so, the reason of Paul mought easely haue bene answered vnto. For the Corinthians mought haue thought that vpon the Jewes were therefore so many punishments indiged, for that their sacramentes were not like vnto ours: and contrariwise, that they although they sinned

It is proued that the elders wanted not the spirite of God.

The law cannot do his office vnles it be holpen by the spirite.

A place to the Corin. declared.

flinted should not be chastised, for that they sacramentes were moze perfect, which could pacify God, though he were neuer so much angry, and could dync away all aduersities, which honge ouer theyr heddes. But when as Paul sayth that they sacramentes were one and the selfe same with ours, this place of refuge he utterly taketh away from them: And that Paul had herunto a regard, it is therefore without all doubt to be thought, for that he maketh mention only of those sacramentes of the old Testament, which answered vnto our two sacramentes, omittinge all the reste, whiche were innumerable. For he affirmeth, that they were baptised as we are baptised: and sayth moreover, that they receaued one and the selfe same spirituall meate and drinke, which we at this day receiue, signifieng thereby our Eucharist, or supper of the Lord. If thou take away this cause, thou shalt finde none other cause, why he made mention of these two sacramentes only. Farther what haue we in our sacramentes, which we receaue as the chiefe and principall thing? Is it not Christ? But the Apostle testifieth, that the elders receaued hym in theyr sacramentes. For he sayth, That they dranke of the spirituall rocke whiche followed them. And that rocke was Christe. But we can by no meanes drinke Christ, vnles together therewithall also we draw in his spirite. Wherefore we ought not to thinke, that the elders had not the spirite of God: but thou wilt say peraduenture, they had rewards and beneficements, as though we haue not so also. For is it not so? Doth not Paul greatly threaten the Corinthians, if they should follow those sinners, which the elders had committed in the desert? doth he not say, that many are weake, and many fallen one slepe, for that they had after a filthy maner abused the Eucharist? And doth he not say: When we are iudged, we are corrected of the Lorde, lesse we should be condemned with this world? Moreover in the New Testament also there want not rewardes promised vnto godly men? For if we geue any thing in the name of a prophet, we shall receaue the reward of a prophet. And he which forsaketh that which is his for Christs sake, shall receaue an hundred fold euery in this world also. But Chrysostome addeth, that vnto them was promised a land flowing with milke and honey: but vnto vs is promised the kingdom of heauen. I graunt in dede that the elders had many temporall promises: but yet not in suche sort, that vnto them was no mention made of eternall life. For Christe bringeth a testimony of the resurrection out of the Law: I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, & the God of Iacob. And god sayth vnto Abraham, I am thy protector, and thy most ample reward. And Daniell sayth, That they shall rise agayne, which haue slept in the duste of the earth: some to eternall life, and some to everlastinge damnation. And Esay sayth of the dammed: Theyr fire shall not be quenched, and theyr worme shall not dye. And to omitte all other testimonies which are infinite, Christ himselfe is promised in the Law. For he himselfe sayth, that Moses wrote of him, & Paul sayth that he was the end of the Law. Farther there are many such other testimonies both in the Gospels and in the Epistles of Paul: whiche are all taken out of the old testament. Chrysostom sayth moreover, That the elders bled outward purifications. Neither doe we deny but that they were bound to a greate many moze and greater ceremonies, then we are: and yet are not we altogether without outward signes. For we also haue bread, wyne, and water as elementes of our sacramentes: but one and the selfe same Christe was common both vnto our sacramentes and vnto theyrs. For no man can denye, but that circumcision was the sacramente of regeneration, euen as is also our Baptisme. Yea also the very Schoolmen confesse, that origynall sinne was forgotten the elders in Circumcision. Wherefore sentence oughte not so lightly to haue bene geuen, that they had only outward purifications. But this is a great deale moze sozer, that he addeth, That they restrained their hands from euill works, but we restrayne both þe minde and conscience. Chrysostome semeth alwayes to be of this minde, that the law prohibited onely the outward works: and that the Gospell afterward prohibited anger, hatred, and lust of the mind:

We can not
 drinke Christ with our his spir-
 ite.

Vnto the elders was promised not onely
 temporall thinge, but also eternall
 life.

The elders were bound to moze ceremonies
 then we are.
 Circumcision the sacrament of regeneration, as is bap-
 tisme.
 Chrysostom herein ex-red for that he thought that the elders were forbidden onely the outwarde smoother.

As we are not utterly without fear. so we not the elders altogether without loue.

The elders
also were the sonnes
of God by adoption.

The spirit of adoption is not our mind. but a breathing
from God.

and considered not, that the elders had also this commaundement, Thou shalt not lust: and that the Prophets euery where required Circumcision of the heart: and that in the first commaundement are comprehended faith, hope, charity, and whatsoever pertayneth to the spirituall motions of the minde. But where as he saith, that they were impelled by feare, and we by loue, it is true in dede after a sorte: but yet not so, that they were utterly without loue, and we utterly without feare. But of this matter we wil speake more at large afterward. Wee that is most vnrue of all, that he saith, that they performed the lawe, but we farre passe those thinges which are commaunded in the lawe. For, as we haue els where proued, not euen the regenerate can so frame their workes, that they can in all pointes satisfie the lawe of God. We addeth moreover, that they could not be corrected and amended, but by stoning, mauling, burning, and other such like kinde of punishments: but we are only excommunicated, when we deserue to suffer the extreamest punishment that the Church can lay vpon vs. But he should haue remembered, that those punishments which he maketh mencion of, were ciuill punishments, which our Christian magistrates also inflict vpon malefactors. But they, saith he, had only in name the honour of adoption and of children: but we haue it in very dede. Undoubtedly it can not be denied, but that God was in the olde Testament called the father of his people. For of the he saith, that he had called his first begotten sonne out of Egypt. And Moses saith in Deuteronomy, Thou hast forsaken God which begat thee. And Malachi in his 2 chapter. There is one God and father of vs all. And Esay, I haue nourished and brought vp children, and they haue despised me. And both not Paul say, Vnto whome pertaine the testaments and adoption? He spake then of the fathers of the Israelites, of whome was Christ according to the flesh. And moreover, I said, ye were Goddes, and all the children of the highest. They also called God their father when they sayd in Esay, Thou art our father: for Abraham was ignorant of vs, and Israel hath not known vs. And so great an affection did God the father beare towards them, that he saith, Can a mother forget her child? But although she can, yet will not I forget thee. And as Chrysostome hath thus written in this place, so hath he in other places also many thinges like vnto the same, which as I sayd are warily and with iudgement to be read. Augustine entreating vpon this place saith, that here is put a difference of the olde & new Testament: of which the one is set in feare, & the other in loue. We addeth moreover, that it is without controuersie, that the spirit of adoption is the holy ghost. But the spirit of bondage he thinketh to be that, which hath the power of death, that is, Sathan. For, so many are held vnder the euill spirit, as are destitute of grace, and being not regenerate liue vnder the lawe. For they are addicted vnto temporall thinges, and obey theyr lustes: not in dede through the default of the lawe, but so, that they themselves are strangers from Christ, and from God. For they can not obserue the lawe of God. And therefore they are both wrapped in sinnes, and also tossed with continuall furies. He also signifieth that of this place there is an other interpretation, as though the spirit here should signifie our minde, which is sometimes the seruant of lustes, and sometimes liueth vnder the liberty of the sonnes of God. But this opinion (he saith) can not stand, for that the spirit of adoption is a li-cle after ward plainly sayd to be externe and accidentary, namely being breathed in vs by god. For so Paul writeth: It is the spirit, which beareth witness vnto our spirit that we are the sonnes of God. Which wordes plainly declare, that there is to be put a difference betwene that spirit, which perswadeth, and that spirit, which is perswaded. And if this be true of the spirit of adoption, the same opinion also must we haue of the spirit of bondage. Wherefore herein Augustine agreeth with Chrysostome, that they to whome he thinketh to be vnder the spirit of bondage, are quite voyde of the spirit of God. For those kinde of men he affirmeth not to be regenerate, and that they are also strangers from God, yea rather addicted vnto the spirit of Sathan: of whome we can not vnderstand Chri-

stostome

some to speake. For out of the lawe and the sacramentes bringeth he a reason, why the elders wanted the spirite. But Augustine denieth, that this came to passe thorough the default of the lawe. Wherefore his sentence is moze probable then Chrysostomes. Howbeit herein I agree not with Augustine, to thinke that by the spirite of bondage is to be vnderstand Sathan. For here (as I said) are to be vnderstand two effectes of the holy ghost. The first is, when we are touched with the knowledge of the lawe, and conscience of our sinnes, we straight way despayring of saluation, except we come vnto Christ, perceauce that we are vtterly vndone. Wherefore the selfe same spirite being our guide, we come vnto Christ, and by faith embrace him, and the promise of the mercy of God: by which meanes our sinnes are forgiven vs, and we are receaued into the adoptiō of the sonnes of God. Wherefore Pauls meaning was to declare vnto the Romanes, that they being now past that first stepp, & being regenerate in Christ haue obtayned adoption, and therefore it behoued them not only to liue holily, but also fræly and of theyr owne accorde to worke byrightly. Vnto this our interpretacion Ambrose subscribeth: for he sayth, That the apostle here teacheth the Romanes, that they are no more vnder the lawe, but do now liue vnder fayth. Wherefore I thinke with hym, that in these wordes is set forth two steppes of conuersion. And if a man demaund touching the people in the olde tyme, how they had the spirite of Christ, I thinke y may thus be answered, by deuiding y Iewes into thre partes. For some of them wer vtterly wicked & vngodly, which besides name, habitatiō, & outward Circumcision had nothing cōmon with y people of God: & these mē I graunt were vtterly boyd of y spirite of Christ, yea rather they liued vnder y spirite of Sathā. On y other side, there were some excellent & holy men, as Dauid, Ezechias, Iosias, Elias, Daniel, & many such other like, whom we can by no meanes deny, but y they had y spirite of the Gospell: although as the time required they were compelled to obserue many ceremonies and rites pertayning vnto the lawe. Agayne there were some others which were weake, which although they can not be compared with these whome we haue mencioned, yet soasmuch as they being godly beleued in the Messias to come, and were by that sayth iustified, we ought not to thinke that they were strangers from the spirite of Christ: although by reason of their imperfection, the lawe chalenged greate power ouer them, and they were with others, as those tymes required, compelled to be subiect vnto infinite ceremonies. And this is the reason why the elders are said to haue liued vnder the law, and vnder the spirite of bondage. They had not the Sacramentes of their saluation so perspicuous and cleare, as ours nowe are, neither had they the misteries of Christe so commōly reueled, as we now haue in the Gospell. Wherefore although amongs vs are many wicked mē, & a great nūber of weake ones, yet are we said to be deliuered frō y law, both because we are deliuered frō ceremonies, & for y we haue y sacraments & misteries of saluatiō obtained througħ Christ, made moze clere, & moze manifest thē theirs commōly were. Paul also calleth y elders little ones, for y they liued vnder tutoys and gouernours, and were instructed of the law, as of a scholemaister. And when they are called seruantes, we ought to vnderstand, y they wer profitable seruantes. For such seruantes beare great good will & loue vnto their maisters: and are perswaded that that which is to the honour of their maister, shal also turne to their honour. But lewd seruantes neuer refraine from vices, nether do they any thing well, vnles they be by stripes compelled. These their two titles which I haue mencioned, Paul ioyneth together in y epistle vnto the Galathians. For thus he sayth: The heyre so long as he is a little one, liueth vnder tutors and gouernours, and differeth nothing frō a seruant, whē as yet he is Lord of all. By which wordes he declareth, that the elect of God amongst the elders, were in very dede heyres, although according to the consideration of the tyme they were as little ones vnder the forme of seruantes kept vnder the scholing of the law, and elementes of this world. This thinke I is to be thought of y elders. Now will I retorne vnto Paul. He declareth that the Romanes are now iustified, so that they are no moze vnder

The spirite of adoption and the spirite of feare is the spirit of God.

Two degrees of conuersion.

Three kindes of people amongst the Iewes.

The holy men of the elders wer seruants, but yet profitable seruantes.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

the law and condemnation, but are now through faith and the spirit adopted into children. Wherefore it is mete, that they which are come to this estate, should resemble the nature of their father, that the things which are allowed of him, they also should allow: and the things that he condemneth and escheweth, they also should abhorre and detest. Although this spirit of adoption can not so long as we live here, be perfect and absolute in vs. For there is remaining in vs a perpetual strife of the flesh against the spirit. This also is to be obserued, that Paul here changed the Antithesis: for when he had made mention of the spirit of bondage, the order of speech seemed to require, that he should haue said, that they had receiued the spirit of liberty, but in steade of liberty he did put adoption, to make the thing whiche he had in hand the more notable: for it is a farre greater matter, to be adopted of God to be his sonne, then to be set at liberty. But because here is mention made of the adoption of the children of God, this place seemeth to require to speake somewhat of it also. The Lawyers, as it is had in the institutions, define adoption to be a legitimate age, imitating nature, found out for their solace or comfort, which haue no children. Farther they make a distinction betwene adoption, and arrogation. For arrogation they say is, when he which is his own man, & at liberty, is receiued in y<sup>e</sup> steade of a son: but adoption is when he which is receiued, is vnder an other mans power. Howbeit the lawes forbid, that the elder should be adopted of the yonger: for it seemeth a thing monstrous, that the sonne should exceede the father in yeares. And therefore Cicero oftentimes vehemently inuolgeth against that adoption of Clodius. Now God adopteth vnto himselfe his elect, not for that he had not an other sonne: (for he had his only begotten sonne Christ, in whom he was well pleased) but for that in al the nature of man he had as yet no children. For through Adam we were all made straungers from him. Wherefore God for this cause sent his naturall and legitimate sonne into the world, that by him he might adopt vnto himselfe many children out of our kinde. And this is not wont commonly to be in vs. For they which haue one onely sonne, seke not to get any other sonnes: yea rather they reioyce, that that their sonne shall not be compelled to parte the inheritance with his brethren. But so great was the loue of God and of Christ towards vs, that it would exalt vs to so great dignity, although vnderferued on our behalves. Nevertheless that heauenly inheritance of that condition, that when it is communicated vnto many, it is therefore diminished. Now let vs see how we attaine to his adoption. Paul seemeth to say, that it is communicated vnto vs by the spirit of Christ. For of it haue we faith, whereby we embrace Christ which died for vs, and the promises of God, and by that meanes are we adopted of God into children. This doth John excellently well declare vnto vs in the beginning of his Gospell, where he thus writeth, as many as receiued him, vnto them he gaue power to be made the sonnes of God. By these wordes we plainly see, that we then are made the sonnes of God, when we receiue Christ. And this is not done either by Circumcision, or by any other ceremonies of the law, or by good morall workes, but only by faith. And therefore John added, Vnto those which haue beleued in his name. And when it is sayde that power is geuen vnto the, to be made the sonnes of God, we must not thinke, as many Sophisters would haue vs, that we first beleue, and then afterward receiue power, to be counted in the number of the sonnes of God. For power in that place is nothing els, but a right and a prerogative: As if he should haue said, y<sup>e</sup> they whiche haue receiued the word, and beleued in his name, haue a righte and prerogative to come into the adoption of the sonnes of God. But John addeth, Which are borne, not of bloude, nor of the will of the fleshe, nor of the will of manne, but of God. First when he sayth, Not of bloud, he signifieth, that this adoption cometh not by the order of nature, that in this generation should be mingled together the seedes of man and woman. Which sentence he more plainly expresseth in the next wordes following. For he saith: Not of the will of the fleshe, nor of the will of man. For, that by the fleshe he meaneth the woman, may by two places be proued. For Adam said of his wife which was deliuered vnto him of God: This is now bone of my bones and

The spirit of adoption is not yet perfect and absolute in vs.

It is a greater matter to be adopted, then to be set at liberty. Definition of adoption. Arrogation what it differeth from adoption.

God adopted vs when as yet he had a sonne.

By the spirit & faith are we adopted into children.

A place of John declared.

Against the Sophisters.

By this word fleshe is sometimes signified the woman.

and flesh of my flesh. And Paul vnto the Ephesians saith: He which loneth his wyfe, loneth himselfe. No man at any tyme hated his own flesh. And this interpretation followeth Augustine. Although I see that this place may other wise be expounded, that when it is sayd: Not of bloud, we vnderstand, that this adoption cometh not by anye force of stocke or kindred. For the Hebrewes perswaded themselves it did. For they alwayes vnoiscetely cried, that they were the seede of Abraham. Neither attayne we vnto this adoption by the will of the flesh. For to the attaynement of it, we are not holpen by those good thinges which the fleshe vseth to conuete, by riches (I say) power, strength of the body, beauty, and such other like thinges. Neither by the will of man: namely, by those good thinges which are counted moze excellent, and are thought most comely for men, as are wisdom, prudence, and workes pertaining vnto mozeall vertues. For none of all these thinges can make vs to be the sonnes of God. But are borne (saith he) of God. All this haue we onely of the goodnes of God, and of his mere mercy. And therfore Paul saith to the Ephesians, who hath predestinate vs into the adoption of the sons of God. Wherefore the whole consideration of our adoption dependeth of his election and predestination. But of his diuine will can no reason be of vs, either vnderstanded or geue. And therof cometh it y<sup>e</sup> Christ saith in John, y<sup>e</sup> we ought to be borne by water, y<sup>e</sup> is, by the inspiration of God, & fro a boue. And Christ compareth this regeneratio<sup>n</sup> to the wind, thou hearest (saith he) the spirit, neither knowest thou fro whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth, wherfore God by Christ freely geueth vnto vs his spirit. And he vseth y<sup>e</sup> word, as an instrument, and y<sup>e</sup> is called y<sup>e</sup> seede, wherby we are regenerate. He geueth also sayth, wherby we receaue the promise of the word set forth vnto vs. And by that means we are iustified & obtayne the adoptio<sup>n</sup> of the sons of god: which yet so long as we liue here can not be perfect. Wherefore Paul a little after ward sayth, that we wayte for the adoption of the sonnes, and the redemption of the body, which we shall not attayne vnto, but in that blessed resurrection. Euen the selfe same thinges writeth Paul to the Galathians. And when (sayth he) the fullnes of time came, God sent his sonne made of a woman, and made vnder the Law, to deliuer those which are vnder the Law, that we might receaue the adoption of sonnes. And because we are sonnes, God sent the spirit of his sonne into our hartes, in whome we cry Abba father. These words declare that there was before the fulnes of time a certayn bondage vnder the Law: after ward was geuen the sonne, by whom we, which are appointed and destined to be made the sonnes of God, might moze fully receaue the spirit and adoptio<sup>n</sup>. This adoption Christ semeth as it were by a certayne sacrament to haue confirmed in his genealogy. For when as in Luke, and in Mathevv the names of his progenitozs do vary, in them is mingled adoption, so that oftentimes one and the selfe same man had one father by nature, and an other by adoption. Also in the old testamēt adoption was much vset. For both Iacob adopted vnto hym selfe his newiewes Ephraim and Manasses, to be vnto hym in steade of other sons and also that maner was of such force at that time, that vnto dead men also were children adopted. For whē one brother was dead, the brother that remayned a line of his wife begat children, and rayled by seede in Israell. Thys as a certayne shadow, figured our adoption into the sonnes of God. The common translation hath, The adoption of the sonnes of God. When as in the Greke is not red this word, of God. For there is only this word υιοθεσια, that is adoption. But this is diligently to be considered, both from whence we are by this adoption brought, and whither we are transferred. We were before the children of the deuill, of wrath, of incredulity, of distrust, of this world, of perdition, of night, and of darknes. And we are transferred hitherto, that we both are called, and are in very dede the sons of God, partakers of the diuine nature, brethren of Christ, and childre of light, and that we also sinne not (for he which is borne of God sinneth not) and that we loue our neighbors and our enemies, that we may resemble our heauenly father, who maketh his sonne to shyne vpon the good & the euill, & sendeth raine vpon the iust & the vniust. And finally that we be

Our adopti on dependeth of pre-
destination.

By what degrees we attain vnto
the adoption of sonnes.
The adoption
which we haue now is not perfect.

In the old tes-tamēt adoption much vset.
Euen vnto
the dead were children adopted.

In this adoption is to be considered from whence
and whither we are transferred.

We are not the sonnes of God as he gotten of his substance.

Christ called his Apostles brethren.

The fathers
in our olde time attained to the adoption of childre.

We are more
certaine of this adoption
then we are
of our carnal fathers.
Alexander
the greate.

Christ hath taught vs
to call God father.

What is meant by the joining together and repetition of two tongues

peacemakers: for they shall be called the sonnes of God. But our adoption is not such that we should thinke that we are borne of the substance of God. For that is proper to Iesus Christ only. For the word of God is by nature borne of the father: which thing yet the Arrians denied. For, forasmuch as they made the sonne of God a creature, they must needs say, that he was not the sonne of God by nature, but by adoption. Create undoubtedly is our dignitie: For we are so highly exalted, that we be not onely called, and are the sonnes of God, but also haue Christ to our brother: Wherefore Christ when hee was risen agayne, sayde vnto the women, Go and tell my brethren. And althoughe the elders were not quite boyde of this dignitie, yet had they it not so publicly declared. But this was no let at all, that many amongst them were weake. For we also in the Gospel haue many weake ones. For Paul saith vnto the Corinthians, that he could not speake vnto them, as vnto men spirituall, for that they were carnall, and therefore he was fayne to feede them with milke. Which selfe thing is written vnto the Hebrewes. And contrariwise they had men strong in sayth, of whome we can not doubt, but that they were in this adoption most excellent. And that so it was at that time also, the Apostle testifieth in this epistle the 9. chapter, for he sayth: Vnto whome pertayneth the adoption, and the glory, and the testament, and the giving of the Law, and the worshipping, and the promises, and vnto whome pertayne the Fathers. Here we see, that adoption pertayned vnto them also. Ambrose vpon this place teacheth, that of this adoption springeth vnto godly men greate security. And doubtles, forasmuch as this cometh vnto vs thorough the spirite, whereby we are inwardly moued, we ought to be farre more certayne, that we are the sonnes of God, then the sonnes of this world are certayne that they are the sonnes of them whome they call fathers. For oftentimes the mothers deceaue both the husbandes and the children. But the spirite of God deceaue no man. Long since flatterers went about to perswade Alexander, that he was not the sonne of king Phillip, but of Iupiter. Afterward when he saw, that there came blood out of a wound, which he had given him, he laughing sayd, that that seemed vnto him diua, that is, common blood, and not diu, that is, the blood of Gods. But we, though we suffer many things, yet loose our life for Christs sake, yet notwithstanding ought to be fully perswaded that we are the sonnes of God. For to the end we should not any thing doubt of that matter, we haue not only a testimony of the spirite, but also euen the sonne of God hath taught vs to call God father, and to inuocate him by that name. And this forme of prayers ought to call vs backe from all kinde of wickednes, and from all maner of filthy works, and also to put vs in minde, not to degenerate from the nobility of so greate a father, and that we in no case dishonour him. For it is taken to be a greate reproch vnto fathers, to haue wicked children. And forasmuch as we can not (as we haue sayd) attayne vnto this adoption, but thorough Christ, and his spirite, neither the Iewes nor the Turkes, nor men strangers from Christ, can call vpon God, as vpon their father.

By vvhome we cry, Abba father. This selfe same maner of speech the Apostle vseth vnto the Galath. For thus he writeth: Because ye are sonnes, God hath sent the spirite of his sonne, in which we cry Abba father. After this selfe same maner Christ our first begotten brother prayed vnto the father in the garden, saying: Abba father, let this cuppe passe away from me. Whether is it to be meruailed at, that the Apostle ioyned a Greke word and a Syrtian word together, whiche tongue was then commonly vset of the Iewes. For first this repetition serueth to becomency of speech. Farther, the Apostle semeth by a certayne mystery to teach, that as well the Gentiles as the Iewes should be indifferently partakers of this adoption: in both whiche tongues God should be called vpon by the name of father. In the primitive Church were kept still of the interpreters some希伯来 words, which were then in vse: which we rede sometimes in holy scriptures as Messias, Cephas, Talitha, Camy, Maranatha, Rabby, Osianna, Alleluia, and Amen.

For those words were the most perfectly knowen, especially whē as betwene the Ethnikes & the Jewes y<sup>e</sup> were converted vnto Christ was a most straight bond of loue & in a maner a perpetual familiarity. But we must not thereof gather y<sup>e</sup> in y<sup>e</sup> service of God should be vsed a strange tounge. For y<sup>e</sup> the holy ghost hath manifestly forbidden vs. Paul in this place whē he maketh mention of inuocation, declareth the worke of the holy ghost, which it straight way sheweth forth vpon the children that are adopted and now regenerate. And of so greate waight and force is this work, that the Apostle doubteth not by the testimony of the Prophet to attribute vnto it saluation. For he saith, as afterward shalbe declared, Every one which calleth vpon the name of the Lord shalbe saved. Not that our prayers can me-rite saluation: for, that is apprehended by faith only. And therefore, that we should not be deceaued, he straight way expresseth, in what maner he ascribeth saluation vnto them. For he saith, How shall they call vpon him, in whome they haue not be-lieued? Which wordes plainly teach vs, that that which is written of prayers, is to be attributed vnto faith, as vnto their roote. But because in this place is mention made of feare (for the Apostle thus writeth: Ie haue not receaued the spirite of bondage agayne vnto feare) it shall not be from the purpose briefly to see, whether Paul meaneth that we are deliuered from all kinde of feare or no; First thys is certaine, that feare is nothing els, but a certaine affect of the minde, whereby we are stricken by reason of some great and hurtfull euill which is at hand. We are not commonly moued by such dangers which are farre from vs, but by those which seeme to be euen now at hand. Neither do thinges light and of small waight make vs aserd. Wherefore feare, as a diuine speaketh of feare, hath a respect vnto sinne, vnto the wrath of God, vnto chastismentes, and scourges, and finally vnto hell fire. But there are noted two kindes of feare: of which the one is commonly called filial, that is, pertaining to a naturall childe, & the other seruite, that is, pertaining to a bondman. And that is called a seruite feare, which only by the feare of paines, and of hell fire, ether draweth vs backe from doing ill, or impelleth vs to do well. Euen so signified an Ethnikē Poet, when he wrot, Oderunt peccare mali formidine pena, that is, the wicked hate to sinne, for feare of punishment. But the filial feare is, whereby men liue vprightly, and shun wickednes, for that they desire to set forth the glozy of God, and for that they allow righteousnes euen for his owne sake. Wherefore the same Poet saith, Oderunt peccare boni virtutis amore. that is, the good hate to sinne for the loue of vertue. Of these two kindes of feare are many thinges spoken oftentimes of Augustine in many places, and especially in his 9. treatise vpon the epistle of Iohn: and it is red in the maister of the sentences in the 3. booke, and in the 36. distinction, where Augustine alledgeth two places out of the holy scriptures which seme to be repugnant one to the other. The one is out of Iohn, Perfect loue driueth forth feare. The other is taken out of the 19. Psalme, The feare of the Lord abideth for euer. To abide, and to be driuen forth, agree not together. This contrariety he thus conciliateth: and saith that they in very deepe disagree not. For euen as two pipes being blown with one, and the self same breath discord not: so (sayth he) two hartes, namely, the hart of Dauid, and the hart of Iohn being stirred with one and the selfe same spirite can not disagree the one from the other: but yet do require an indifferent and an attentiu hearer. For Iohn speaketh of the seruite feare and of perfect loue. But Dauid speaketh of the filial feare. And therefore he sayth: The feare of the Lord is chaste or cleane (for in Hebrew it is written, Iireth Iehouah Iehoudah) and abideth for euer. In this maner thinketh, he may be holpen the appareance of contradiction, which seemeth to be in these two places. And he vseth for eche feare this similitude. Let vs suppose (saith he) that there are two women: the one chaste, the other vnchaste, and an adulteresse. Ether of these women doubtles feareth her husbände. The adulteresse feareth him when he is absent, least he should retorne agayne, and when he is present, least he shoulde vnderstande of her naughty behauiour. But the chaste wyfe is asfearde of her husband when he is present, lest he should depart from her, or should not loue her so well, or shoulde by some offence be alienated from her. By thys similitude Augustine thinketh may

We must not die a strange tounge in the church.
The inuoca-
tion of the ghostly is the worke of the holy ghost.
How vnto
prayers is ascribed our saluation.

whether
the adopted
be free from all feare of
God.
Definition
of feare.

Two kindes
of feare.

Hozace.

How feare is cast out and per ablabeth for e-uer.
A simila-
tude.

A simila-
tude.

Whether
the seruile feare be profitable.

The maister of the sentences ma-
keth foure kinder of feares.

The scholemen haue added the like feare.

Peter and Judas feared diuersly A true distinction of seruile and filiall feare.
In godly men feare
is neuer separated fro
faith.
As the law is ioynd
with the Gospell, so is feare with faith.

Paul calleth vs back
from that feare which wanteth
faith.
The pro-
prietie of the giftes of the holy ghost.
How many the giftes of
the holy ghost are.

be distynalpe perceiued eche kinde of these feares. Others say mozeouer, that this seruile feare is not vtterly vnprofitable: for it prepareth a way vnto loue. For first (say they) it striketh the mind, and fereth away men from sinnes, and stirreth them vp to righteousnes thorough feare of paynes. And an vpright life by little & little passeth into an vfe, and is by custome made pleasaunt. And so at the length men beginne to referre their woorkes vnto God, and to esteeme righteousness for his owne sake. For euen as a neble, when any thing is to be solued, first entreteth in, and draweth with it the thyng that is annexed vnto it, but it selfe abideth not in that which is solued: So say they creepeth into vs a seruile feare, which is after-ward excluded, when charity and a chaste feare do once take place. But, what is to be thought of those terrores, which in our minds go before faith, we haue els where admonished: namely, that they are sinnes before the Lord, but if any vtility or com- moditie folloiw them, the same is to be attributed not vnto their nature, but vnto the goodnes of the holy ghost: for he vnto our iustification vseth those as meanes.

The maister of the sentences, in stede of the two kindes of feare, which Augustine maketh mention of, putteth fower. The first is a worldly feare, wherby men rather then they will lose riches, pleasures, and honours, fall away from Christ. And this is a feare most pernicious, & most farre from all pietie. The second is a seruile feare, which we before haue described. The third is an initiall feare, that is a feare that serueth at beginning, wherby men are so moued wth the feare of paynes, that together therewithall also they haue a regard vnto God, and are taken with a certaine loue of his righteousness and will: This feare by his sentence is mingled both with a seruile, and also a filiall feare. Last of all, he ioyneth that pure filiall feare with perfect charitie. But the scholemen which followed the maister of the sentences, that they also mought somewhat adde of their owne, haue brought forth an other feare, which they cal naturall, wherby euen by the impulsion of nature it selfe we fly from those thinges which are against the constitution of nature. Now that I haue brieuely and faithfully declared these thinges out of Augustine, out of the maister of the sentences, and out of the scholemen, I will in fewe wordes set forth what is to be thoughte touchyng them. First I confesse, that there is moze then one kinde of feare: for I knowe that Peter feared otherwyse then Iudas. For Iudas in dede so feared, that he dyspayned: but Peter so feared that he got him agayne vnto Christ, whome before by denyng he had forsaken. Wher- fore we say, that a seruile feare is, wherby we so abhorre God being angry and flye from him, that we are vtterly voyde of faith. But a filiall feare is, wherby in the myddest of terrores, we are lifted vp through faith, neither suffer we our selues to be swallowed by with feare. Wherfore in godly men feare is neuer seioyned from faith. For these two thinges are so to be knit together, that faith alwayes governeth feare: for if it should not, desperation would easely succede. For euen as the lawe ought alwayes to be ioynd with the Gospell, so also ought feare to be ener ioynd with faith. We do not so embrace the Gospell but that we alwayes thinke vpon the obedience of the commaundementes of God. And when we see how often, and how greuously we fall, we call our selues backe agayne to repentance. And contrariwise the lawe is not to be receaued without the Gospell, for if it should, we could neither obey it without Christ, nor also obtayne pardon for the offences which we haue committed against it. Wherfore Paul calleth vs not backe vtterly from all feare of God: but from that feare only which wanteth faith, and which flyeth from God, as from an enemy, and from a cruell tyranne. But that feare which hath faith to moderate it, can not be reioyned. For it is the gift of the holy ghost, as we rede in the xi. chapter of Esay. And the propriety of the giftes of the holy ghost is, that by them we remitte all our vertues and affectes to the moderation of faith, and make them to serue God truly and sincerely. And these giftes are commonly counted to be seuen. And if a man demaunde how they proue that, straight way they cite the xi. chapter of Esay. But if we examine that place by the He- bzeu

Hebrew verity, we shall finde there only five giftes: namely, the spirite of wisdom, of understanding, of counsell, of fortitude, of knowledge, and of the feare of the Lord. But these men were deceaved by the lattine translation: which followed not the Hebrew verity, but the 70. Interpreters. For they betwene the spirite of knowledge and of feare, have put the spirite of piety, εὐσεβίας, that is, pertaining to the obedience of God. Whereby it seemeth that they ment to interpretate, what φ feare of God should be, which should light upon the Πελλάς, of whome is in that place mention made. For, that feare was neither filial nor filial, but only an obedience, piety, and reuerence towards God his father. Neither have the 70. only once so interpreted the feare of God. For in the booke of Job where we rede, Fearinge God, they have turned it, εὐσεβίας, that is, Obeying God. Howbeit vndoubtedly we ought not to contract into so narrow a number, the giftes of the holy ghost, to thinke them to be only five, or seven. For besides all those which are reckoned in that chapter, the same, Esay in another place reckoneth the spirite of iudgement and of zeale: and Zachary maketh mention of the spirit of righteousness, and Paul here, of the spirite of sanctification: and Iohn, of the spirite of truth: & Paul againe in another place, of the spirite of adoption: and to the Ephesians, of the spirite of promise, and a greate many other like giftes. And this so being, let vs now see, how both in this life and in the other life feare may have place. The Saintes when they are in heauen, (so that they shal then have perfect charity, properly to speake of feare, as it is a motion stirred by reason of some greivous evil that hangeth ouer vs) shal have no feare. This doth Augustine confesse upon the 5. Psalm upon these wordes, I will worship towards thyne holy temple in thy feare. But in them can only be that εὐσεβία, ε is, obedience, reuerence, worshipping, & piety towards God: as the 70. have expounded, the spirite of the feare of the Lord. And so such a gift mought be found in Christ, who otherwise, coude neither feare sinne, nor hell fyre, nor fatherly chastismentes of God. And if a man would say that he feared death, that ought to be vnderstand of naturall feare, of which we entreate not at this present. And in this manner is Ambrose, to be taken, when in his booke of the holy ghost he affirmeth, that the giftes of the holy ghost are in the Angels. Out of which wordes the Scholemen gather that in them is the feare of God. For doubtles seeing they are in blessed state, that can no other wise be vnderstand, but after that manner that I have now spoken of. But touching the godly in this life, we must thus be perswaded, to thinke that they can not want the filial feare, so that that feare be as I have before taught in such sort vnderstand, that they do not only fye from offending of God, and are aserd of falles against his will, but also are moved with the feare of hell fyre, and of the wrath of God and of punishmentes: vnto which feare yet a quiet faith and confidence in the mercy of God are as a present comfort. For we ought not to thinke, that the threatninges in the holy scriptures are bayne, for they are profitable also vnto the godly: especially when they have not as yet obtayned perfect charity, and absolute regeneration. Christ saith vnto the Apostles: I will shewe you whome ye shall feare: namely, him which when he hath killed the body, can also send the soule into hell fyre. And Paul to the Corinthians bringeth forth examples of the Hebrewes in the olde tyme, whereby he declareth that they, for abusing the sacramentes of God, were destroyed in the desert: by which examples he ment to admonishe the Corinthians, to beware of the like vengeance. Many (saith he) are weake, and many slepe. And if we would iudge our selues, we should not vndoubtedly be iudged. But now forasmuch as we are iudged, we are corrected of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with this world. And vnto the Phillipians, With feare and with trembling worke your salvation. And vnto the Romanes, Be not ouer wise, but feare. Hereby we see that godly men liue not vpon the earth without the feare of God. And here feare hath a respect vnto many kindes of evils. For the godly are aserd of sinne, of often fallinges, of the wrath of God:

Ep. liij.

of

What manner of feare was in Christ.

The number of the giftes of the holy Ghost is great.

What manner of feare can be in those which are deade.

How Christ feared death.

The saintes so long as they live here can not want the filial feare.

Threatninges in the law are not bayne but profite the saintes also.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

In place of John declared.

of fatherly chastismentes, of scourges, which God inflicteth also vpon his, whē they sinne, and finally of hell fire, which they see they haue deserved. vnles God by his mercy, and Christ by his sacrifice which he offered vpon the Crosse should helpe and succour vs. But what meaneth it that John saith, Perfect charity casteth out feare. I know there are some which interpretate those wordes in this sence: That they which loue God truly, are not asfraid for piety sake to put themselves in al manner of dangers, neither do they shonne persecutions, but valiantly stand fast in all manner of dangers. Which selfe thing Paul in the latter to Timothee wrote in other wordes, saying, We haue not receaued the spirite of fearefulness, but of might, and of loue. Wherefore he exhorteth Timothee not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, nor of him being in bondes for the Lordes sake, but courageously to indure labors for y<sup>e</sup> Gospell sake. Although these thinges are true, yet this is not it which this place of John teacheth. For it there maketh mencion of the iudgement of the Lord: of which he willethe the Godly which loue God not to be asfraid. And he rendereth a reason, for that feare hath veracion ioyned with it. Wherefore I gladly assent vnto Augustine which saith, that John speaketh of perfect charity. Which forasmuch as it can not be had in this life, we may not loke to haue it without feare. Farther we mought in this place vnderstand that feare which is ioyned from confidence: and therefore driueth men to desperation. For they which beleue and loue God truly, vphold their feare with a liuely sayth.

The same spirite beareth witnes with our spirite, that we are the children of God. And if we be chyl dren, we are also heyres, euen the heyres of God, and fellow heyres of Christ, if so be that we suffer with hym, that we maye also be glorified wyth hym. For I count that the afflictions of thys present tyme are not worthy the glory which shall be reuealed in vs.

It is the spirite which putteth vs
in mind to call vpon God as vpon
on a father.

A simil-
tude.

Two testimonies of adoption.

The same spirite beareth witnes with our spirite, that we are the children of God. I he sheweth that by those praters wherby we call vpon God, we are made moze certayne of the adoption, whereof he befoze made mencion. For forasmuch as in our prayers we are stirred by the holy Ghost, to cal God father, we ought fully to be perswaded that it is so: for that we know, that the spirite of God can not lye. Paul in the first to the Corinthians: sayth, That no man can say the Lord Iesus, but in the holy ghost. Here he sayth that no man can in such sort pray, to call God his father, vnles the same be genen him of the spirite of God. Hereby we see that those thinges which are set forth vnto vs to be beleued, and which the lord himselfe hath taught, can not be receaued of vs, vnlesse the holy ghost do firste thoroughly moue our hartes. Chrysostome to confirme this testimony of the spirite of God, sayth, If ether any man, or Angell, or Archangell or any creature should preache vnto vs this adoption, we mought peraduenture be in doubt of it. But seing the holy ghost who is lord of all, testifieth of the same, what place can there be left of doubting? If a king or a Monarche should out of his regall seate, approue and commend any man, what one of his subiects would presume by any meanes to speake against him, or to set himselfe against his iudgement? Where the Apostle sayth, συμμαρτυρεῖ, that is, beareth witnes together, he signifyeth after a sort, that there are two testimonies of thys adoptiō, the one is our spirite, and the other the spirite of God. For it is no small or light signe of thys adoption, that we haue a quiet conscience, and that we do beleue, that we are now reconciled vnto God, and do now fele that we are refreshed and recreated with many other good gifts. Although these thinges are not sufficient for our incredulity and infirmity. For there is none of vs which hath our conscience so quiet, as we ought to haue: and which putteth so much confidence in God, as he ought to do. Wherefore seing the testimony of our spirite is weak and infirme, God would put to a confirmation of his spirite. For he it is which testifieth together with our spirit, that we are the sonnes of God. Hereby ought we

we

we to gather of how greate force are prayers, as well publique, as priuate, as well with ceremonies, as without ceremonies. For, in them is confirmed our sayth, y we are by Christ adopted into the children of God. Howbeit let every man beware, that when he calleth God father, he also truly in the hart fele that which he pronounceth in wordes: that he do it not only of custome, or of hipocrisie: or call God father with the tounge, and in y hart do an other thing, or thinke otherwise. But here may be demaunded howe that feare, whereof we haue befoze so much spoken, is not repugnant vnto thys security and confidence of our adoption: I answere that these two thinges can not agree together, if they be taken in respecte of one and the selfe same thinge. But so muche as they happen by sundry meanes and of sondry causes, they are nothing repugnant one to the other. For therfore the sayntes feare, for that they se they oftentimes fall, and liue contrary to the prescrip of the Law of God. For they vnderstand that sinnes of they owne nature deserue the wrath of God, scourges, and hell fire. When they diligently consider these thinges, into the is smittē a feare. But on the other side, when with sayth they loke vpon the promises and mercye of God, they are deliuered from that feare, and made certayne of they saluation. There is nothing to the contrary, but that diuers causes may in our mindes bring forth diuers effectes. Which thing may by a very apt similitude be declared. He which out of a high tower loketh downe vnto the ground, if he thinke that he shall stagger and fall, straighte waye, will he or nill he, he is wonderfull as a ferd, and al his body shaketh for horroz: But agayne, when he thinketh with hymselfe, that he is so closed in with a wall, that he can not fall, he plucketh vp bys spirites, and beginneth to be secure of his safety. So godly men when they consider they sinnes, they feare punishment: but when by sayth they loke vpon the mercye of God, they are secure of they saluation.

Of greates force are prayers als
well pub-
like as pri-uate.

Security and feare how they may agree together

A simili-
tude.

And if vve be childre, vve are also heires, eue the heyers of God, & fellow heires of Christ. Here y Apostle sheweth, what we get by this adoptio: namely this, to be y heires of God. Which vndoubtedly can not be a small matter. For not al they which are y childre of any man ar straightway also his heires. For only the first begotten haue that preheminence: as we se the manner is at this day in many realnes: and in y holy scriptures it is manifest, that Esau and Ismaell were not heyres. Wherefoze we are heyres, and that not of any poore man, or of smal matters: For we haue obteyned the inheritaunce of God, and we are made the fellow heyres of Christ, we haue the inheritaunce of the Father common with Christ: and we be so wholly grafted into him, and altogether knitte with hym, that by bys spirite we liue. But then shall we come vnto thys inheritaunce, when it shall be sayd vnto vs, Come ye blessed of my father, receaue the kingdome prepared for you from the beginning of the world. And we ar the fellow heires of Christ, by cause (as John sayth) when he shall appeare, we shall be like vnto hym. And Paul sayth to the Collofs. Ye are dead, your life is hidden with Christ in God, But when Christ your life shall appeare, then shall ye also appeare together with him in glory. Inheritaunce (as it is defined of the Lawiers) is a succession into the whole right of the dead person. Can this seme a small matter to any man, to be made partaker of the whole right of God? Doubtles Peter sayth, we are made partakers of the nature of God. Here Ambrose noteth, that it is not in thys matter as we se it cometh to passe commonly in the world. For the testator must first dye, befoze the successor can come vnto the inheritaunce. But God dieth not. Yea rather we which are appointed bys heyres do first die befoze that possession can be deliuered vnto vs. Christ also first died, befoze he came vnto the glory which was appoynted for hym. Farther, as touching ciuill Lawes, the heyre is counted one and the selfe same person with him that maketh him heyre. So we are by Christ so straightly knitte together with God, that we are now one with him, as Christe prayed, That they may be one, as thou and I are one. For all thinges are ours: and we are Christes, and Christ is Gods. This inheritaunce obteyne we freely by the spirite of Christ. Wherefoze the bishoppes of Rome, and they champions the Cardinalls, and

All children are not heyres.

What inheritance is.

This inheritaunce we obteyne freely.

The fathers also in the old testamente
were heires

Many false Christians also which shall not possesse
the king-
dome of God.

Crosses & aduersities
are tokens
that we shal obteyne the inheritance.

The condition of ex-
state by which we must passe vnto the e-ternall inheritance.

false Bishoppes doo wickedlye whiche haue enclosed thys inheritance of remission of sinnes, and of comminge vnto the kingdome of God vnder theyr counterfeit keyes, so that they can at theyr pleasure sell it, and ether thruste downe to hell, or send vp to heauen whome they will. Here agayne we haue somewhat to saye of Chrysostome, for he, as befoze he wrote, that the Iewes beyng vnder the Lawe were excluded from the adopyon of the sonnes of God, so here denieth that they were the heyres of God. And he citeth to confirme this sentence that place of Mathew, He shall destroy to nought the wicked. Many shall come from the East and from the West, and shall rest with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but the children of the kingdome shall be cast forth a dores: Againe, The kingdome of God shall be taken from you. By these places thinketh he it is manifest, that this inheritance pertained not vnto the Iewes. But we herein also can not assent vnto him. For God said vnto Abraham, I am thy most ample reward. And in þe parable, or rather the history of the Gospell, the poore man Lazarus was sene in the bosome of Abraham. Which what other thing was it, but that he had obtained the inheritance of God and of Christe? Paul to the Galathians sayth: An heyre so longe as he is a childe, nothinge differeth from a seruant, when as yet he is Lord of all, but is vnder tutors and gouernours, euen vnto the tyme appointed of his father.

Which wordes plainly declare, that the elders, although by reason of the law and of ceremonies, they liued after a certain seruile manner, yet were in dede heyres, although they were but children. And that estate endured vntill the comyng of Christ. But that which Chrysostome bringeth out of Mathew, is not spoken of þe good and godly Iewes, but of the wicked and noughty husbandmen, which slew the heyre. Wherefoze by such sentences we ought not to condemne all the Iewes in the olde tyme, or to exclude them from the inheritance of God: yea rather we ought to thinke that the vngodly Christians shal not be delt with one whit better then they were delt with. For there are amongst vs many hypocrites and vngodly persons, which as Paul sayth: shall not possesse þe kingdome of God. And at this day if a man should looke for the church of Smyrna, and þe church of Philadelphia, and many other churches, which were in tymes past of great fame in Asia and in Siria, he shall finde them either vtterly ouerthrowen, or els miserably intreated vnder the tyranny of the Turke, and no lesse afflicted then the Iewes are at this day, which liue captiues vnder the Christians or vnder the Turkes.

If so be that we suffer with him, that we may also be glorified wyth hym.] Euen as befoze he taught, that we are made certaine of our adoption by inuocation or prayer, wherein the holy ghost beareth witnes together with our spirite, & we are þe sons of God: so here he sheweth a testimonye, whereby we may be made more certain of attaynyng vnto this inheritance which he hath spoken of. We shal without all doubt (saith he) obtaine it. For ye shal raigne with Christ, forasmuch as ye haue already attained to suffer with him. Wherefoze tribulations & crosses are tokens and arguments, whereby we may gather that we shal be þe heyres of God.

Paul sayth vnto the Philippians, That vnto them it is geuen for Christes sake not only to beleue in him, but also to suffer for hym. This first gift which we se we haue now obtained, maketh vs certaine of the latter, & we shal at the length not be defrauded of it. For, no small or light power of God is declared in the, which valiantlye & for patiently piety sake suffer aduersities & persecutions. I knowe there are some, which interpretate these wordes otherwise, that Paul should seme to ascribe a certaine condition or estate, by which we shal passe vnto the eternall inheritance: namely, if we haue first suffered many thinges. And doubtles the Græke particel ἡ which is turned, if so be, may be drawen to either sentence. This is certaine, that Paul here maketh a certaine digression, although it be soft and hidden, to comforte these men for the afflictions which they suffered. But yet departeth he not fro that purpose which he had in hande: but with one and the selfe same labour both persecuteth that which he began, and also comforteth the. And it is all one as if he should haue said: ye shal in dede be heyres, but yet vpon this conditio, that ye must first first suffer many thinges. Christ requireth nothing at your hands, which he himselfe hath not first performed: he leadeth you no other way then that whereby he hath gone himselfe: he will not offer you to drinke of any other cup, but of y<sup>e</sup> wher of he hath himselfe drunke. Howbeit this shall be a great comfort vnto vs, for that those thinges which we shall suffer, shall not be comparable with the glory which shall be reueled in vs. Ambrose followeth this interpretation. Howbeit, I thinke that this place is so to be vnderstand, as though it were a p<sup>ro</sup>ofe of that which followeth by that which goeth before: We shall haue the eternal inheritaunce: because ye suffer together with Christ: which selfe sentence he vseth in the latter to Tim. If we dye together wyth hym, we shall raigne together with hym. Chrysostome vpon this place writeth, That this is an argument taken a maiori, that is, from the greater. God (sayth he) hath freely geuen vnto vs many thinges. For when we had done nothing, he adopted vs into children: he graunted vnto vs to call hym father: wherof followed an assured and constant sayth, that we are the sonnes of God. And how now shal he not geue the inheritaunce which is behynde? especially seying in the meane tyme we haue suffered most greuous calamities? Undoubtedly he wyll not after such and so many trauailes deny it, which hath freely and without any our helpe bestowed vpon the beleuers such most excellent giftes. And after this sort he declareth that God hath excellently well provided for men, which to the ende they should not boast of their trauaile or industry, hath geuen vnto them many thinges freely: and againe, that they should not be ashamed, that they had obteyned so many great giftes without trauaile, he would not haue the to come vnto this singular inheritaunce, without wonderfull great fortitude, suffering, contencion, vocation, and affliction. These thinges auoucheth he, and that not amisse, nor vnprofitably, so that they be of vs rightly vnderstande in such sorte, that we confound not the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the lawe with the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the Gospell. And that we should not so do, it shall not be out of the way, to make plaine, what difference there is betwene the p<sup>ro</sup>misses. They do not herein, differ as some thinke, y<sup>e</sup> the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the Gospell haue no conditions ioyned vnto the: but the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the lawe are neuer offred without conditions. For euen as it is sayd: Honour thy father and thy mother, that thou maist lyue long vpon the earth, Againe, If ye wyll, and shall hearken vnto me, ye shall eate the good thynges of the earth. Euen so in the Gospell also we rede, Forgeue and it shall be forgiven you: Geue and it shall bee geuen you. Againe, He whiche forsaketh father or mother, or wyfe, or house, or landes for my sake, shall receiue an hundred fold, and possesse eternall lyfe: and in this place, If so be we suffer together wyth hym, we shall be glorified together with hym: And vnto Timo. If we die together with hym, we shall also raigne together wyth hym. Wherfore seying that this can be no sufficient difference, we must seke an other. The conditions which are annexed vnto the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the lawe are commaundemets, which the lawe commaundeth to be fulfilled euen to y<sup>e</sup> uttermost, neither will it otherwise render the thinges p<sup>ro</sup>missid, vnles the conditions be absolutely performed. Wherfore it is manifest to him y<sup>e</sup> diligently considereth the matter, y<sup>e</sup> the conditions of the lawe may be causes of the obteynement of the rewardes whiche were p<sup>ro</sup>missid. For if they mought haue bene so fully performed and accomplished, as they were commaunded in the lawe, they mought haue bene compared euen with the rewardes, and should haue had the nature of merite. But for that they coulde not of men be performed, God of his mercy in their place substituted p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the Gospell: which although they haue conditions adioyned vnto them, yet are they offred freely. For y<sup>e</sup> thinges that are by them commaunded vnto vs, are in dede necessary, if we haue power, tyme, place, and occasion geuen vs to do them. This I speake because of infantes, and of those, which in the last tyme of their life being at the point of death, come vnto Christ. For eternall life dependeth not of those conditions, as of causes. For, as we haue now sayd, it may both of infantes and of those which in the last moment of their life are conuerted vnto Christ, be without those conditions obteyned. And because the p<sup>ro</sup>mise, if it should depend of those conditions as of lawfull causes, could not be firme, when as there is no man which can fulfill those conditions as they are commaunded, euen for that cause also may

We shall haue the inheritaunce, but we must first in this sort suffer.

What difference betwene the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the lawe & the p<sup>ro</sup>misses of the Gospell.

Each p<sup>ro</sup>missid haue conditions annexed vnto them.

The conditions of the lawe are put as causes of the obteynement of the p<sup>ro</sup>misses.

The p<sup>ro</sup>mise of the Gospell may consist without conditions.

Three things here to be considered.

The conditions of the law not put in vain.

The amplification of the gifts of God perswadereth vs to fortitude.

What it is to suffer with Christ. Two causes why Christ offered himselfe vnto the death.

Two causes also whereby perswade vs to patience in aduersities. Why God suffereth his to be so vexed.

the promise of the Gospell consist without those conditions. This also maketh herewith, that Paul saith, y they can not be compared with y thing which is promised: which can not be true in iust and lawfull causes, if they be compared with their cōditiōes. Wherefore, if thou ioyne these three things together, namely, that the rewardes of the Gospell are promised freely, that the conditions can not be made equall with them, and that the promises ought to be most firme, thou shalt both take away the consideration of merite, and also shalt easely perceave where in they differ frō the promises of y lawe. If thou wilt the demaund, whether y promises of the lawe were geuen in bayne, seing there was neuer any man found, which could perfoyme those conditions: I will answer, that nothing was here done in baine or rashly. For therefore were such impossible conditions annexed vnto it, that men should be put in minde of their infirmity, & that they thoroughly vnderstanding it, should high them vnto Christ, of whome being receaued into fauor, and hauing now obtained iustification, they may obtaine the selfe same promises. For as touching towarde them, the promises are now, of promises of the lawe made promises of the Gospell: for that they which beleued in Christ to come were exercised in the obedience of the law: which obedience although it were but only begonne, and not to the vttermost perfect, yet was it allowed of God. And therefore mought they haue the fruition of the promises offered vnto them. Chrysostome vpon this place wondreth at the wisdom of the Apostle, for that he intending to set forth the goodnes and mercy of God comprehended his severity and iustice in one word only. For he before as briefly as might be sayd, If ye lue according to the fleshe, ye shall dye. But here in reckening by the benefites, he is so diligent, that he doth not only set forth all thinges, but also illustrateth them with most excellent amplifications. Which thing Paul doth not without great cause. For these ornaments whereby are set forth the giftes of God, are of much force to perswade vs to fortitude, and to the bearing of calamities: which thinge (saith he) the Apostle chiefly in this place entended. He had before exhorted to mortification: now in persecutions he exhorteth to constancy. For it is not inough for vs to beate backe wicked affectes, vnles also we permitte our selues to be crucified to the world, the fleshe, the deuill, and to wicked men. Now how aptly and warely Paul commeth to the handling of these thinges, the gradation, which he vseth, plainly declareth. Bicause ye are adopted (saith he) ye cal God Father: and seing it is so, ye shalbe also heyes: and not that only, but also fellow heyes with Christ, with whom ye now suffer many and grieuous thinges. What it is to suffer with Christ, may thus easely be expessed, if we declare, what causes moued Christ to suffer so bitter a death vpon the crosse. And there were two causes: the first was, to be obedient (as he himselfe said) vnto his god father: the second, to vanquish and to condemne our sinne. They which when they suffer aduersities embrace these two in their hart, do suffer with Christe. Whatsoever sorowes or aduersities happen vnto them, let them reckon with themselves, y they happen vnto the by the prouidence of God: and let them beare whatsoever burthen is laid vpon the to this ende, willingly to obey God the autho: of that affliction: let them consider moreover that by these calamities the olde man is tamed, sinne is broken, and that spot thoroughly grafted and by nature rooted in vs, is dissolued. But why God suffereth those whom he hath adopted vnto himselfe to be so tossed, it is not hard to see. For first, as we haue already said, his will is that sinne should be diminished and weakened in vs. Wherefore whatsoever aduersity we suffer, the same wholly turneth vs to good, so that we loue God the father. Farther whē we are in such sort afflicted, we are driuen to call vpon God: of whom otherwise it is incredible how vnmindfull we are. Moreover by this meanes we are called backe through our most louing father from the affection of the world, and from the entisements of the flesh: from which louing father oftentimes we fall away both to our own, & also to his great dishonor. I omitte that which shoulde chiefly haue bene sayde, that the might and power of God is most of all set forth in holy men, when with an

an inuincible and chearefull minde they suffer afflictions & calamities. I could bring also a great many other causes: but these few shall for this tyme suffice. But why the world, wicked men, and the deuill, after a man is conuerted vnto Christ beginne straight wayes by all maner of most cruell meanes to rage against him, I thinke it is not so hard a matter to perceane. For men so sone as they truly and from the hart come vnto Christ, straight way beginne to make warre with impiety. Hereby are hatredes inflamed against the godly, and persecutions stirred vp against them. By two reasons the Apostle comforteth vs touching the bearing of aduersities. Of which the one is taken of the ende, after this manner. These euils of godly men shall obtayne a blessed ende, and happye departure: wherefore they are to be suffered with a cheerefull and valiant mynde. The other is, for that those thinges which we suffer, although they seeme troublesome and greuous, yet can they not in any wise be compared with the rewardes which shalbe rendred vnto vs in an other life. By this vnequall proportion it is manifest if we will speake properly, that this worde merite is not to be attributed vnto our good workes. Chrysostome vpon this place not vnprofitably noteth, that Paul, before he came to the exhortation of patience in aduersities, wonderfully amplified the honour and dignity of the sonnes of God: which he did not with so great a diligence before when he entreated of the restraining of the affectes of the fleshe. For as we haue before sayde, there are two kindes of mortification: of which the one herein consisteth, to represse the decdes of the fleshe: the other is valiantly for Christs sake to suffer perils, crosses, and all maner of tormentes when neede shall require: which two thinges if they be compared together, we shall perceane that the suffering of aduersities is as far harder matter then is the battaile with the wicked lustes of the minde. Aristotle in his Ethikes, as he with wisdom saw many other things, saith, that fortitude is to be preferred before y<sup>e</sup> vertue of temperance, which otherwise is most worthy of praise. Of this thing doubtles was not y<sup>e</sup> deuill ignorant: for when he reasoned with God touching blessed Iob, A man (said he) will for his soule geue skinne for skinne, and all that he hath. Wherefore extend forth thy hand a little vpon him, and then shalt thou see whether he will blesse thee to thy face or no. For by natural sharpenes of witte, wherein he much excelleth, he easily saw, that this of all temptations is the greatest, when the life it selfe is to be endangered, then which is nothinge more swete. The suite which they shall receaue, which valiantly shall labo<sup>r</sup> is alwayes, as Paul admonisheth vs, to be set before our eyes. For so shall we see, that when we suffer for Christs sake, we shall bring singular commoditie not vnto him, but vnto our selues. That which the Latine interpreters haue turned, Exilium, that is, I thinke, or count, is in Greke written λογίζομαι. Which word can not be referred vnto an opinio which is doubtfull and vncertaine. For y<sup>e</sup> word is chiefly used of such as make reckonings which bring they<sup>r</sup> accompts into a somme both known and sure. Wherefore the meaning is, as if he should haue sayd: This I hold for certayne, that those euils which we suffer are not to be compared with that glory which we wayte for: The afflictions in dede of the godly are not of they<sup>r</sup> owne nature so light: but Paul extenuateth them only by a comparison. Wherefore this place conteyneth an amplification of that felicity which God promisseth vnto vs: which is hereby made the more notable, for that it farre excelleth all the traayles of this life. Of which thing godly men are so perswaded, that they reioyce even in the midst of their tribulations. This selfe same comparison Paul useth in the latter to the Corinthians the 4. chap. For he sayth, That our light affliction which is in vs but for a tyme causeth vnto vs a farre most excellent, and an eternall weight of glory. In these wordes is declared wherefore eternal life passeth al the traayles of this life: namely, bycause of the waight, diuturnity and greatenes. For whatsoeuer thinges we suffer here, are called of Paul παρρησια, that is momentary or during but for a time. He addeth also λαρρον, by which wordes is shewed they<sup>r</sup> lightnes. But contrariwise vnto

Into men conuerted vnto Christ straight waye happye aduersities,

Two kindes of mortification.

The suffering of aduersities is harder then the battaile with euill affectes.

Afflictions otherwise greuous are by comparison extenuated.

By what meanes eternal life far passeth all our afflictions.

gloze is attributed both eternitie, and also a wonderfull greates waighe which exceedeth all measure.

Even now
we have the fruition of a great part of our gloze although hidden.
Gloze sig-nifieth here
our whole felicity.

Gloze fol-loweth ver-
tue.

Gloze comprehendeth two things.

Why bles-
sednes is not reuea-
led in this life.

Simili-tudes.

Difference
betwene
the seruants
of Christ &
the seruants
of the world.

Examples
of the Ethnikes.

The endes
that the Ethnikes
set before them were small and slender.
Humane
praple vn-
constant &
not true.

Examples
of the Ethnikes
set before
them were small
and slender.
Humane
praple vn-
constant &
not true.

Examples
of the Ethnikes
set before
them were small
and slender.
Humane
praple vn-
constant &
not true.

Which shall be reuealed towards vs. He saith of this gloze that be reuealed, that we should not thinke, that presently we are quite voyde of it: for we alredy possesse a greates part thereof: although it be not as yet perfect, nor manifest vnto the world. So Paul speaketh to the Colossians: Ye are dead with Christ, and your life is hidden with Christ in God: But when Christe your life shall appeare then also shall ye appeare together with hym in glorye. And this is to be noted, that Paul in this only word glory, comprehendeth our whole felicity, which we waite for, And there in he followeth the iudgement of men, which at wont to esteeme gloze as the chiefe good thing. Whereof also the philosophers thus affirm: as the shadow followeth the body, so doth gloze follow true & perfect vertue. Wherefore gloze comprehendeth two things, which are exceedingly to be desired: first, that a man be adorne with vertues: secondly, that he get the good fame of the people. But why the blessednes which we waite for, is not reuealed in this life, Chrysostome thinketh this to be the cause: for that it farre passeth the state of this life. And Paul therefore the longer tarryeth in the amplification thereof, thereby the more to stirre vpp the Romanes to the suffering of afflictions. For a souldier is exceedingly strengthened to suffer perilles, if he hope the victory shall be fructifull and profitable. And a marchant is not broken with any labours of sailing or traueling, if he hope he shall thereby haue greates gayne. Farther we ought to consider, that the lot of the citelines of this world is farre diuers from the lot of holy men, which serue Christ. For they with the greatnes of their labours go beyond those good things which they contend to attayne: but we, though we behaue our selues skoutely, and valiantly, as Paul sayth, yet are not our workes to be compared with that end, which we set before vs. The examples of the Romanes will easily teach vs to vnderstand this difference. Brutus for the preservation of the liberty of his countrey, did not sicke to slay his owne childe, in which thing hereunto also had he regard, to attayne the prayse of a good citizen. For thus writeth the Poete Virgill of hym: Vicit amor patriæ, laudumq; immensa cupido, that is, he was overcome with the loue of his countrey and vntemperate desire of prayse. Those were the endes of the Ethnikes, which were vndoubtedly very small and slender. For the liberty which they had a regard vnto, was not such as is ours, whereby we are deliuered from sinne, from Satan, from death, and from the wrath of God. They sought humane prayse, a thing doubtles vncoustant and of small force. But our end is to approue our selues vnto God, whose iudgement can not be deceiued. Torquatus also slew his owne sonne, for that in fightinge agaynst the enemy he had violated the Law of warre. Then we also, to kepe the Law of God, ought not to doubt, when nede shall require, to suffer all maner of most greuous tormentes. For the Lawes of God are not to be compared with the Lawes of warre. Camillus being banished out of his countrey, valiantly after ward restored it being oppressed of the Galles: for that he thought he could not liue with more gloze in any other place. But a Christian counterey it not so wonderfull a fact, which being hurt of any in the Church, laying aside desire to auenge, seeketh by his endemour to helpe his brother of whom he was hurt, and to adorne the Church: for out of it no man can liue holily, nor attayne vnto eternall felicity. Q. Mutius Scæuola of his owne accord thrust his right hand into the fire, for that it misse when it should haue smitten Porfena. What meruaile is it then, if a man to obteyne the Kingdome of heauen wyl offer vnto the fire, not onely one of his hands, but also his whole body to be burnt? Currius being armed at all poyntes, and mounted vpon a horse threw himselfe of his owne accord into a gulfe of the earth, that the citie of Rome might be deliuered from the perillence: for so had the oracle gotten answer, that the wrath of the Godds would cease, if that which the Romanes esteemed best, were throwen into that gulfe. We haue an oracle farre more certayne, that they are not to be feared which kill the body, but can not kill the soule. The Deians doled themselves to the death, that they legions of soldiers might be preserved, and got the victory. Our Partirs also when they do shed they blood, rather then they will be plucked away from the religion of Christ, can not boast, that they take in hand an enterprise not hard of before. M. Paulinus, when he should consecrate a temple unto Jupiter, and in the meane time was brought hym by envious persons of the death of his sonne, was not one whit abashed in mynde, neyther ceased he of from that which he had begonne, but commaunded that his sonne being dead should be caried out and buried. What mynde then ought a Christian to haue, when as he heareth the Lorde saye, Suffer the dead to bury their dead? Regulus, when as he had swoyne that he would returne vnto Carthage, although he knewe he should be put to moles greuous tormentes, yet would he not committe so foule a faut, as to violate his sayth. Wherefore we also, seing in Baptisme we haue publicly geuen our faith vnto Christ, although for keeping of it we should suffer all manner of euils, yet ought we not to violate it. Some will boast they haue contemned riches, and haue for Christes sake taken vpon them a voluntary pouertie: but these men thus boasting should call to mind Cincinnatus, who after he had behaued himself honourably and done notable actes in his Dictatorship, of his owne accord returned againe to till and plough his sower acres of ground. Let them remember that Valerius Publicola after he had excellently executed his Consulship, died so poore, that he left not wherewithall to bury himselfe, but was buried at the common charge of the cite. And Fabius so little repented him of his pouertie, that he despised the gold of Pyrrhus the king. These so great and notable actes did these men, only as I said, to get the praises of men, and to preserve that earthly publike welth. But we, if we thrust our selues into any dangers, haue God himselfe our inheritance, and our reward, and shal be fellow heires to Christ. Before vs as a price or reward, is set the kingdome of heauen, & eternal fellowship with the aungels. Wherefore it is manifest, that their notable factes farre passed & endes and rewardes which were set before them: but the reward which is set before vs infinitely excelleth our workes. I graunt in dede their factes are not to be numbred amongst true vertues: (for they were rather shadowes and images of vertues) and their workes although they were excellent, if we consider them after a ciuile manner, yet before God they were nothing els but glorious and shynynge sinnes: for they were not either by faith, or by the loue of God moued to worke, neither also directed they their workes to a iust ende. Wherefore Augustine in his 5. booke de ciuitate Dei, and 18. chapter, when he had made mention of these and of other such lyke thynges, wisely added, Eyther we perceyue these thynges to be in vs, or els we feele our selues to be voyde of the. If at any tyme we do the selfe same thynges, there is no cause why we should be puffed up for they for lesser rewards haue done the lyke. But if we know our selues to be so weak and infirme, that we dare not enterprise anye suche thynges, our myndes ought exceedingly to be moued and touched, especially seing we are found weaker then were euen the Ethnikes. Farther those comparisons declare, that God hath not a regard vnto the greatnes or heap of workes: for otherwise he should render vnto them the rewardes which he promisseth vnto vs. But this thing God chiefly regardeth, whether we are by faith ioyned together with Christ, and whether whatsoeuer we do, we direct it to the prayse and glory of his name. But the power and facultie to do excellent factes, he of his mercie when he iudgeth it oportune, abountantly ministreth vnto vs. Let vs in the meane tyme geue hym thanks, for that he hath made our lot farre better then the yns.

The Ethnikes were not endued with true vertues. Before God they were glorious sinners.

God regardeth not the greatnes or heap of workes. What God chiefly regardeth. God hath made our lot far better then the Ethnikes.

For the feruent desire of the creature wayteth for the reuelation of the sonnes of God: because the creature is subiect vnto vanitie, not of his owne wyll, but by reason of hym which hath subdued it vnder hope.

For the feruent desire, &c.] The excellency of the blessednes to come he here:

Rq. y.

by

Cap:8 A Commentarie vpon the Definition

of the chiefe
good thing.

Euery creature waiteth for the reuelati-
on of our glory.
The creatures for our sake trauaile vnto
the time of our full redemptiō.

In man are comprehens-
ed all kin-
des of thin-
ges.

We muste not thinke
that the Moone, Sunne, & Angels
do properly sight.

The aun-gels are ney-
ther subiect
vnto vanitie
nor vnto corruption.

The Ma-niches vngodly and vnaptly fained many thynges touchinge
the mourning of creatures.

Two kin-
des of men.

by confirmeth: for that it is wayted for of every creature, and that not after any comon sort, but with great anxiety & care. For so signifieth this worde, ἡμετέραν, etymology wherof hereof cometh, for that when we earnestly looke for any thing, we vse to thrust forth the head, and to looke about, to see and if we can espy it com-ming. Chrysostome sayth: that that worde signifieth a vehement wayting for. Ambrose interpretateth it a continuall and often wayting for. This reason is grounded vpon the definitiō of that which is called Summum bonum, that is, y<sup>e</sup> chiefest goodnes. For if that good thing be it (as Aristotle hath defined it) which all thinges desire, that vndoubtedly which is of all creatures earnestly wayted for, must of necessity be the chiefe-est goodnes. And the cause why of all creatures our reuelation is wayted for, is for that so long as it is deferred, euery creature is subiect vnto vanitie. This place in Debe is somewhat hard, howbeit I thinke this sence to be plaine inough. That euery creature is in a greuous estate, and vntill the time of our full redemptiō, is with troublesome labours ouerwried. For the earth is for our sake subiect vnto the curse, bringeth forth thornes & thornes, & to nourish vs oftentimes bringeth forth fruites which still decay, and is compelled for our sins to suffer destructions and ruines. The ayre is made pestilent, sometimes it is frozen wth cold, sometimes enflamed with heate, sometimes couered ouer with cloudes, and some tymes with rayne. All kinde of liuing creatures are brought forth and dye, to our helpe and comfort: the celestiaall bodies are continually moued, they go downe, they arise, they suffer Eclipses, the Moone waneth & increaseth, in the death of Christe the light of the sunne was darkened; and when Christ shall come to iudge, as the Euangelistes declare, the powers of heauen shall trauaile. Farther, all creatures are compelled to serue the wicked, and to be subiect vnto their abuses: which thing De the prophet in his 2. chap. declareth. The Israelites ascribed the good thinges of this world in which they abounded, not vnto the true God, as they should haue done, but vnto Baal, vnto him gaue they thanks, and vpon him only did they cal.
Wherefore God being angry, said: I wyll take away my corne, my wyne, and my oyle: and wyll set at liberty my wooll and my linnen, that they should not couer thy shame. By which wordes the prophet declareth, that when creatures are take away from the vngodly, they are set at liberty, that they shuld not be compelled any more to serue the wicked. Augustine in his 83. booke of Questions, and 67. Question, interpre-tateth this place somewhat otherwise. For by euery creature he vnderstandeth men, euen as it is also taken in the Gospell. For so Christ sayth: Preach the Gospell to euery creature. And this therfore seemeth most conuenient vnto man, for that in him, as in a certaine little world are comprehended all kinde of thinges. Although the same Augustine denieth not, but that these wordes may also be expounded otherwise. But here of this thing he warneth vs to beware, that we solisly thinke not, that the Sunne, Moone, and Starres, and the aungels that are on high, do sigh & grone, which thing some were not ashamed to affirme. We must confesse (saith he) that the holy Aungels doo seruice vnto vs at the commaundement of God. But so far-much as they are now in blessed state, and do beholde the face of the father, it can not be doubtles that they should for our sakes mourne and lament: vnles peraduenture they seme to be in woorser estate, then was Lazarus in the bosome of Abraham. And moreover Paul sayth, that euery creature is subiect vnto vanitie, & doth not only sigh & grone, but also shalbe deliuered fro the bondage of corruptiō: all which things can not fall vpo the nature of Angels. But, saith Augustine nothing is rashely to be pronounced: it is inough, so that we beware of the absurd and fond opinions of heretiques, which touching the groning and mourning of creatures, haue fondly and vndiscreetly set forth many thinges.
In which wordes I thinke amongst others are noted the Maniches. But now to speake somewhat of the sentence of Augustine, whereby he thought that by euery creature are to be vnderstand men: This is certaine that all mankind is to be deuided into two partes: for some men are godly, and some vngodly. The is it to be demaunded, whether of these with so feruent a desire waight for y<sup>e</sup> re-uelation of the sonnes of God. I thinke no man wil say, y<sup>e</sup> the vngodly do waite for it: for they haue no care at all, what shall happen in an other world. Wherefore

foze there remaine only the godly: who forasmuch as they are such, they are without all doubt to be called the sonnes of God. Wherefoze it followeth that only the sonnes of God be they which waite for the reuelation of the sonnes of God: and so they shalbe one and the selfe same, which both desire and also are desired. But it seemeth, that Augustine was not hereof ignorant. For he sayth, that the sonnes of God, forasmuch as they are now oppressed with sondry cares and troubles, do desire a better estate which they hope shall one day be reuealed. And this oftentimes happeneth, that they which are in a carefull and hard estate, do earnestly desire that they may once at the length attayne to a quieter condition. But if we consider those thinges which Paul straight way addeth, And not only it, but we also which haue the first fruites of the spirite. &c. We shall see that godly men and such as are endued with the spirite of God are distinguished from the multitude of other creatures. For so meaneth this particule, Not only. Although I know that there are some, which by those which are saide to haue the first fruites of the spirite, vnderstand not all Christians vniuersally, but only those, which at that tyme had great plenty of the spirite, such as were the Apostles, and Paul himselfe, & a few certaine others which were endued with the spirite of the Apostles, as if it should haue bene sayde: The reuelation of the glory of the sonnes of God is waited for, not only of all the godly: but also of vs likewise which are endued most abundantly with the spirite of Christ: so that the argument is taken of the iudgemente of the excellentest and wisest men, which is of great force ether to confirme or to amplify a thing. But the Apostle seemeth not in this place to vse that distinction. For befoze he pronounced vniuersally, that we which are of Christ haue his spirite dwelling in vs. Neither in that he maketh mention of the first fruites of the spirite, meaneth he to put a difference betwene the common sort of Christians and the Apostles: but he calleth the first fruites of the spirite, that spirite which we haue now: for that in an other life we shall haue the full fruites and plentifull profiters thereof. And Ambrose when he interpreteth that place, Not only it, but also we which haue the first fruites of the spirite, straight way addeth: When as he had already spoken of euery creature, now he speaketh of men. The argumentes also which moued Augustine to fly the common interpretation, are not so waightie and firme, that we shoulde attribute much vnto them. For in that Paul maketh thinges insensible to desire our saluation, and for that cause to grieve and traunce, he therein vseth the figure **Protopopzia*, or Anthropopatheia. They which are of this opinion are not farre out of the way to be found with heretiques, and to beleue thinges absurd of the Sunne, moone and the starres. Here we are in doubt betwene two figures: for Augustine followeth this figure, to thinke that euery creature signifyeth man. We thinke it rather to be the figure Protopopzia. The controuersy is which of these two figures is here to be vled. In mine opinion that figure is to be admitted, which best agreeth with the wordes of the Apostle, and which maketh his reason of more waight, and of more vehemency. And forasmuch as our sence bringeth to passe ether, I thinke it rather is to be admitted. First the Apostle, as we noted, sayth, Not only it, but also we which haue the first fruites of the spirite &c. Which wordes sufficiently declare, that he befoze entreated not of men but of other creatures. Farther this reason is of great force to the amplification of our redemption, which we waite for, when we see that it is wayted for of all kind of creatures. Touching the Angels only this exposition seemeth not to be so playne, for that they might seeme partakers of misery, if they should for our sake either grieve or traunce: whome yet we must beleue to be holy and in blessed estate. But their felicity is no let, but that they may be touched with some kinde of affections. Peter in his first epistle and i. chapter sayth, that they desire to looke vpon the promises of the Prophetes, which pertain vnto the Gospell. For that place is not so to be red as our interpreter hath turned it. In que desiderant Angeli prospicere, that is, vpon whome the Angels desire to looke, Ag.ij.

but

The ingodly are not carefull for the glory to come. Only the godly and the sonnes of God desire the glory to come.

An argument taken of the iudgement of the excellentest men.

The first fruites of the spirite.

Protopopzia is a fainting of persons.

That figure is rather to be vled whiche maketh the argument of more waight, and most agreeth with the wordes of the Apostle.

The angels although they be blessed are not to be spotted of all manner of affectes.

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

In quæ, in the place
rall nouns ber.

The sources
also of the saintes although they be blessed be fore many things.

How the Angels
may be sayd to be subiect vnto vanity.

What is the ende wherby the angels set before them in their go-uernments.

The ende =
not of labor of the Angels is frustrated of his secondary ende.
How the Angels at sayd to be deliuered
from corruption.
The benefite of Christ after a sort pertaineth vnto
the angels.

but in quæ, is d, that is, vpon which the Angels desire to looke. Wherefore they haue in them a desire to see these promises performed. In Zachary we rede, that they amongst the quirtle trees like a troupe of horsemen with feruent desire pray- ed for the holy city, that it might be builte againe. I will not speake how in the Gospell we reade, that they haue great ioy, when they see sinners conuerted to re- pentance. Wherefore it followeth by an argument of the contrary, y of necessity, they are grieved at the stubbernes and obstinatenes of the wicked. Touching the soules of the godly, which are now departed this life, there is no man that doub- teth, but that they are in most blessed estate. And yet we reade in the Apocalipse that they crye and pray vnto God, to auenge the blood which hath bene shed: and with great seruiftnes, desire that the skole of their body being now corrupted may at the length be restozed vnto them. Wherefore both vnto angels and vnto blec- sed soules is such a felicity to be ascribed, which excludeth not these kindes of affec- tions, which the scripture signifieth to appartaine vnto them. Which ought so much the les to be meruailed at, when as we read in the scriptures, that God him- selfe the fountaine and beginning of all felicity, is touched with repentaunce, chaungeth his sentence, and suffreth many other thinges, which seeme not to be a- greable with his diuine nature. But how those thinges are to be vnderstand, nei- ther entende we now to declare, neither doth this place here require any such thing at our hands. But it shalbe sufficiēt, briesely to say, that vpon y Angels also may lyght such an effect, as Paul here mencioneth in this place. And although we as yet can not vnderstand how this should be no let vnto their felicitie, yet is there no cause why we should deny, but that it may be so. But then at the length shall it be playne vnto vs, when we our selues shal attayne vnto the selfe same fe- licitie. In the meane tyme let vs beleue the holy Scriptures, whiche testifie that the holy aungels haue in them such affections. But how shall we vnderstand that they are subiect vnto vanitie? Casely ynough: not in dede accordyng to the sub- stance (as they say) of theyr owne nature, but as touchyng those woorkes which God hath appoynted to be done by thē. They are set ouer Cities, kyngdomes, & prouinces, as Daniell expressedly writeth: yea also they are set ouer euery priuate man. For Christ sayth, Theyr Angells alwayes see the face of my father. And the Di- sciples in the Actes of the Apostles answered of Peter when he knocked at the doore, It is his Aungell, although some interpretate this place of the messenger of Peter. And in Genesis the 48. chapter, His aungell hath deliuered me from all euill. These thinges proue that Aungels at the commaundement of God do seruice also vnto priuate men. But if we wil enquire to what end the aungels gouerne kyngdomes, prouinces, cities and euery particular man, and what they meane by their so great care and diligence, we shall finde, that theyr entent is nothyng els, but that all men should obey their God and kyng, and acknowledge, wooship and reuerēce him as their God. Which thyng not takyng place and many forsa- kyng the true wooshippyng of God and giuyng them selues to superstition and idolatry, and contaminatyng them selues with sundry wicked factes, the labour and diligence of the Angels is depriued of his end at the least way the secondary end: and so they are after a sorte subiect vnto vanitie. Whiche yet shall thē haue an ende, when they shall be discharged of their gouernmentes. But now let vs see how the Aungels at that tyme shalbe deliuered from the seruitude of corrup- tion. Although the nature, or (as they vse to speake) theyr substance be incor- ruptible and immortall, yet haue they continually to do in matters transitory and mortall: those thinges do they enermore renew and bphold, or by the comaunde- ment of God cause thē to be taken away and to be destroyed. Farther y the bene- fite of Christ pertaineth also vnto the Angels, Paul declareth vnto the Ephesians and vnto the Coloss. Vnto the Ephesians the. 1. chapter he sayth. Accordyng to the good pleasure, whiche he had purposed in hym selfe euen vnto the dispensation of the fulnes of tymes, through Christ to make new agayne all thynges both whiche are in hea- uen and whiche are in earth. And to the Colossians the. 1. chap. It hath well pleased the father, that in hym should dwell all fulnes, and by hym to reconcile all thinges to him selfe.

selfe, and to set at peace through the blood of his crosse, both the thynges in heauen, and the thynges in earth. Chrysostome interpretatyng these wordes sayth, That without Christ the Angels were offended with vs: so that these two natures namely of Angels and of men were seioyned and alienated the one from the other. For the celestiall spirites could not but hate the enemyes of theyr God. But when Christ came as a mediator, men were now agayne gathered together, so that they had one, and the selfe same head with the Angels, and were made the members of one and the selfe same body with them. Wherefore Christ is rightly sayd to be he, by whō is made αναπαλάσις, that is, our recapitulation, or renewyng. Farther it is possible, that other commodities also haue by the death of Christ come vnto the Angels, whiche yet we easely perceauē not by the Scriptures, neither entende we here to searche them out. Wherefore we say that Paul with great wayght and behemency of speech applieth sense and feeling vnto all creatures: as if they felt grief and sorrow, for that they are in such sorte obnoxious vnto the abuses of vngodly men. For the confusion of thynges in this estate is not so darke. For the godly are euery wher in euill case, and vniworthely entreated: But the vngodly abound in all maner of prosperitie, and all thynges frame vnto them as they would them selues. In this great confusion godly men ought to be of a balaunt courage, and patiently to wayte for the end of these matters. The Epycures and Atheistes, when they see all thynges done so confusedly, straight way reason, that God hath no care at all of mortal affaires, as whiche is neither moued with fauour nor with hatred, and both to no man either good or euill. But contrarywise the godly thus reckon with them selues, that for asmuch as God by his prouidence gouerneth & moderateth all thynges, it will one day come to passe, that thynges shall come to a better stay: & the world as it was instituted to the honour of God, shall after a better maner be corrected, and brought to that forme, wherby God shall be more and more illustrated. And hereof springeth an incredible consolation: that for asmuch as we see all the creatures of God subiect to so many discommodities, we also after their example confirme our selues vnto patience. Sithen the whole world is bered with so many calamities, it is mete also that we with a quyet minde beare afflictions, when they light vpon vs. And there may be foure reasons geuen, why we thinke creatures to be bered and to moerne. The first is, for that they are wearied with continuall labours, to serue our dayly vses. Hereof it oftentimes cometh to passe, that when as we (whiche thyng many tymes happeneth) greuously sinne, they suffer punishmentes together with vs: whiche is not hard to see in the flood, in Sodom, and in the plages of Egypt. Farther there is a certaine Sympathia, that is, a compassion or feeling together, betwene all creatures and man, by meanes wherof in aduersitie they sigh and moerne together with him. Last of all there is great iniury done vnto them, in that they are compelled to serue vncleane and wicked men: vnto whiche thyng Ose the Prophet had a regard (as we before declared) whē in the person of God he sayd: I will take away my wheate, my wyne, and myne oyle, & will set at libertie my wooll, & my thred, that they may not couer thy filthy nes. Ambrose in many places maketh on this vnderstanding: In his Epistle to Horatianus, entreatyng of this place of Paul, by an induction he sheweth, that euery creature mourneth, & wayteth for the reuelation of the sonnes of God. And he begynneth at the soule. The soule (saith he) cā not but be afflicted & mourne, when it seeth it selfe closed vp in the body as in a certayn vile cotage, and that not with his will, but by reason of hym which hath made it subiect. For the purpose of God was, that it should be ioyned together with the body, that by the vse of it, it might one day attayne some frutes worthy the traualing for. For Paul in the latter to the Corinthis. sayth, That we shall all be set before the iudgemēt seat of Christ, that euery mā may cary away those thynges which he hath done thorough the body whether it be good or euill. He saith also in the selfe same Epistle. That we sigh so lōg as we are in this earthy habitacle, not for that we would be cleane spoyled of it, but rather to haue it ouer clothed. And Ambrose citeth out of the Psalmes. That mā is made like vnto vanity: and that man is whole vanity. Whereunto I thinke is this added, that we mighte vnderstand that this waight of the body, & these grieues, which Dauid complayneth to come vnto the soule by reason of the

Paul with great behemency of speech applieth sense or feeling vnto creatures.

The opinion of the Atheistes touching God.

Contrary opinion of the godly.

In aduersities the godly are comforted by the example of creatures: For foure causes creatures are saide to moerne.

By a large induction is shewed that creatures mourne for our sakes.

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

body, came not by the institutio of God, but rather crept in by reason of sinne. For otherwise the body was not geuen vnto the soule as a grate or prison, (as some sayne) but as an instrument most apt to the accomplishing of most excellent acts, & most notable enterprises. Ambrose goeth on, & in his inductio sayth that the Sunne Moone and the rest of the starres are wearied with theyr continual course and the inferior creatures also for our sakes labour. But he sayth, that thys they doo, not with an vnwilling mynde, for that they vnderstand that the sonne of God for our sakes toke vpon hym the forme of a seruant, and by hys death procured theyr life and sauegard. Farther he sayth that for this cause they comfort themselves, for that one day they shall be deliuered, and theyr labors shall one day haue an end. Wherfore if I may declare my iudgement touching these matters, I somewhat doubt, first, whether the sonne and Moone and rest of the starres labor in theyr courses. Farther I thinke Ambrose spake figuratiuely that all creatures with a quiet mynde beare those their griefes, for that they know that Christ the sonne of God for our saluation hath suffered the ignominye of the crosse and death. Neither suppose I this to be without a figure, in that he sayth, that they by thys meanes comfort themselves, for that they vnderstand, that theyr labours shall one day be finished, and that they shall be repayed and renewed. Last of all he maketh mention of the Angelles, and sayth, that they are not glad in punishing of wicked men, for that they are touched with mercy, & had rather to adorne with benefices, then to afflicte with punishemēts: especially seing as Christ in Luke sayth, that the Angelles exceedingly reioyce ouer one sinner that repenteth. The same Ambrose expounding thys place sayth, that the anxietie of creatures shall so long last vntill the number of them be full, which shall be saued. And, to be subiect vnto vanity, he interpretateth, to be mortal and transitory. Wherfore vanity is in that place after hys mind that mortality, wherby all creatures in such sort labor and therefore with it are compelled continually to travail, so Salomon not without iuste cause sayde, Vanity of vanities and all things are vanity. The commentaries which are ascribed vnto Ierome seme not much to disagree from the sentence of Augustine: but that they by every creature vnderstand the whole number of the iust, euen from Adams time. Which number of saints together with our first parent they sayd earnestly wayte for the reuelation of the sonnes of God, that they also (as the epistle to the Hebrewes declarcth may be made perfect with vs. Origen mencioneth certayne thinges touching the minde, which is the chiefest parte of our soule, whiche (he sayth) sigheth, and with greate payne sorroweth, for that it is compelled continually to abase it selfe, to serue the manifold and sundry necessities of the body. But Chrysostome playnly maketh on our side: and confelleth that Paul here vseth the figure Protopopai: which figure is very much bled in the holy scriptures. For the prophetes and Psalmes sometimes commaund the floods and woods to clap with theyr hands, sometimes they bring in the hilles dauncing and the mountaines leaping for ioye: not that in very dede they ascribe motion and sence vnto thinges insensible: but to signify, that that good thinge which they commend is so great, that it ought to pertaine also to creatures vtterly without sence and feelinge. The prophetes also are wont sometimes to bring in woodes, vine trees, the earth it selfe, and other of the elementes mourning and howling, also the rouses of houses and of temples crying, the more vehemently to aggravate that euill which they describe. Neither ought it to seme straunge, if Paul follow these phrases of the Prophetes, especially seing that in both of them was one and the selfe same spirit of God. Neither is it hard to shewe, how our miseries redound also vnto creatures. For when mā was adiudged vnto the curse, the earth also was condemned, to be accursed, and to be compelled to bring forth thornes and byrns. And how it is by reason of sinne made desert, and infructifull, both the scriptures euery where teach vs, and experience (if we would consider it) would sufficiently declare vnto vs. Esay sayth in hys 24. chapter, The Sunne shall be confounded, & the Moone shall be ashamed. And in the overthrow of Babylon the same prophet

The body was not at the beginning geuen vnto man as a prison.

Ambrose speaketh figuratiuely.

How long this mourning of creatures shall last.

The prophetes and Psalmes very oftentimes attribute sence vnto thinges insensible.

phet

phet wiseth, that the Moone and Starres shall not geue light: and that the Sunne shall be covered with darkenes. Of the heauens Dauid pronounceth, From the beginninge the heauens are the workes of thyne handes: they shall perishe, but thou abidest: As a garment shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed. Moses sayth in the Lawe: I will geue an heauen of brasse, and an earth of yron. Which thing we knowe came to passe in the time of Elias, wherein the heauen was so shut vp, that for the space of thre yeares and an halfe it gaue no rayne. Wherefore that is a goodly wise saying, which Ose prophet hath on the contrary part whē he sayth, I will beare heauen, and heauen shall beare the earth, and the earth shall beare the wheate, wyne, and oyle, and they shall beare Israell. Finallye how every creature serueth the godlye, the scripture euery where declareth. The sea gaue place vnto the Israelites: the rocke poured out water, the heauen gaue a cloud and Manna: the Sonne stode still at Iosuas commaundement: at Ezechias commaundement it went backe. All which thinges are plaine to se in Christ onely, in whom all thinges are after a wonderful maner renewed: When he was bozne the heauen made ioye and shone by night: the Angelles were presente and sange: the starre lead the wise men: whē he died the Sunne was obscured, & all thinges wrapped in darknes, the stons were knockt together: the bayle was rent a sonder, & graues were opened: whē he arose the earth tribled, the Angells were present at hand, when he ascended vp into heauen, a cloud embraced him. And whē he shall retorne againe, & whole worlde shalbe shaken, & the powers of heauen shall be moued. And againe after his resurrectiō, there shall be so great an innouation of thinges, & Esay in his 30. chapter sayth: That the Moone shall shyne lyke the Sunne, and the light of the Sunne shall be seuen foldes greater, if it be compared vnto this present light. But is there any iniury done vnto creatures, when without any their fault they are so vexed by reaso of the sinnes of men? Chrysostome answereth, that they haue no iniury done vnto the. For if (saith he) they were made for my sake, there is no iniustice committed, if for my sake they suffer. Farther he addeth, That the consideratiō of right & wrong is not to be transferred vnto thinges insensible, and wantyng reason. Last of all, if for our sake they be afflicted, when our felicity shall appeare, they shall also together wyth vs be renewed. The same Chrysostome in his 22. homely vpon Genesis manifestly declareth, that it is neither vniust nor absurd, if the creature be for mans sake compelled to suffer some calamities. For if a man (saith he) peraduenture incurre the displeasure of a king, not onely he himselfe is punished, but also all his family is oppressed. Man by reason of sinne is become obnoxious vnto the curse, and vnto the wrath of God: wherefore it is no maruail, if all creatures, which are the family of man, do grieve and sorrow together wyth hym. Farther he bringeth out of the scriptures, that every creature was drowned in the flood: that in Sodome together with those most detestable men all thinges were burnt and consumed: that in Egypt by reason of the obstinacy of Pharaο all creatures were destroyed. And in his booke de reparandis lapsis ad Theodorum he declareth, That after the day of iudgement all thyngs shall be renewed for that the glory of the Lord shall be made manifest, as which shall fill and occupy all thynges. The Græke Scholies acknowledge here as we do the figure Prosopopœia, & affirme, that therfore the creature shall be deliuered from corruption, for that for our sake it was made obnoxious vnto corruption. And they declare that the adoption of the sonnes of God shalbe reuealed, for that now the sonnes of God are conuersant together with the sonnes of the deuil, neither can they easely be discerned from the. Hereunto may be added, that we are oppressed with afflictions, closed about with infirmity, and made vncleane by reason of many falles. All these thinges, although they make not voyde the adoption, which we haue thorough faith, yet they so obfuscate it, that it can not be known, but by his inward testimony of the spirit. But our glory shal be reueled whē tyme cometh, and shal not only appeare, but also be geuen vs. For we haue it now presently, but not as yet full and perfect. But then shall it be wholly made perfecte, and shal obtaine whatsoeuer is now wantyng.

Not of his owne will, but by reason of him which hath subdued it vnder hope.

All creatures serue
the godly

All creatures serue
Christ.

After the iudgement
a great in-nouation of creatures.

Vnto creatures is done no in-iury in that they are vexed for mans sake.

A simili-
tude.
All creatures are after a sorte
the family of man.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

Every creature desireth his owne sauagard. Appetite grafted by nature is not perperally boide.

Opinion of the Philosophers.

hope.] These wordes as Chrysostome noteth, attribute not vnto the creature either will or faculty of hoping, but only declare the might of God, which hath made the creatures subiect vnto vs, to be broken and slayne for our commodity. To be suboued against the will, is, agaynst the pones and redines, which is by nature planted in the. For we see, y every creature earnestly desireth to be preferred, & by al maner of meanes y it can, withstandeth his owne corruptio: howbeit it obeyeth of necessity, & to y hurt of it selfe, it serueth the necessity of men. In that it is subdued, consider the power of God: in that it resisteth, consider the appetite which is grafted into it by nature, which can not be perpetually frustrated. And hope signifieth here nothing els, but the disposition or order of God, which is such, that the creature shall one day be deliuered, and this seruitude, wherewith it is oppressed shall one day haue an end. Here againe Ambrose maketh mencion of many things touching the labours of the Sunne, of the Moone, and of the Starres. And he addeth that euen the drawing beastes also do vndoubtedly for our sakes sigh and grone: and soasmuch as every day ariseth vnto them new labour and afflictions, they earnestly desire, to be one day at the length at rest. But this can they not attaine, before our estate shall be renewed. I know y philosophers deride these thinges, which both dreame that the world hath bene from without beginning, and thinke that the orbis of heauen are moued with an equall and perpetuall course. And when they heare vs preach out of y holy scriptures y euersion of all things, they compare vs with rude & vnlearned men, which are afraid lest heauen should at the length fall. But these men geue not vnto God his due honour. For Plato sawe muche moze wittilye then these men, for in the person of God speaking vnto the starres thus he writeth. By nature in dede ye are dissoluble: although by my wyll ye abide eternall. For the wil of God is y Atlas which with his shoulders beareth by the waight of the whole heauen: which shoulders if he should at any time neuer so little with draw, streight way all things would fall, and be dissolued. And sithen the continuance of things dependeth of the mere will of God, and the holy scriptures which are his tidings byingers vnto vs, do manifestly teach, that the creature shall one day be at rest, we geue honour vnto God, which beleue that this thing shall so at the length come to passe. And so that we are vncertaine of the moment of the tyme, we alwayes wayte for this ende of thinges: howbeit in the meane tyme we consider, that the creatures are by reason of our sinnes sometymes well, and sometymes ill entreated. For euen as the East north east wynde draweth cloudes, so we with the condition of our doyngs, draw the estate of all creatures: so that they are so long tyme in good or ill case, how long we our selues are either good or euill.

Bicause the creature also shall be deliuered from the bondage of corruption, into the liberty of the glory of the sonnes of God. For we know that every creature groneth with vs also, and trauaileth in payne together vnto this present. And not onely it, but we also, which haue the first frutes of the spirite, euen we doo sighe in our selues, waityng for the adoption, euen the redemption of our body.

Here is declared what Paul meaneth by this word creature.

Because the creature also, &c.] These two sentences certainly declare, that these wordes are not to be vnderstand of me, but of the creature. For if it shalbe deliuered from the seruitude of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sonnes of God, it must of necessity be diuers fro the sonnes of God. Augustine by creature vnderstandeth y nature of men, which are yet conuersant in sinnes & in infidelitie, when as yet notwithstanding they are predestinate, & shall at the length be saued. As if Paul should thus say: Although they as yet seme strangers, yet shall they also be deliuered into the libertie of y glory of the sonnes of God. But we ought to marke, that Paul of those selfe same addeth, They grone, they sorrow, they trauaile in payne: which thinges can not be applyed vnto the wicked. For they haue no desire at al of our felicitie. And in Græke it is, συμμετέχειν, y is congemiscere. Which worde signifieth that the creature groneth to gether: But together with whom?

¶

Undoubtedly with vs: with whome it mourneth together, & after a sort travaileth. But if by this word creature we understand substances insensible and without life, how can it be said not to be subject of his owne will, but by reason of hym which hath subdued it under hope? Undoubtedly we see that all thinges are so created of God, that they haue a wonderfull desire to preserve themselves. Whether plante, liuing creatures, stones, and mettals, withstand and resist euery one for it selfe, that they be not destroyed and cease to be: howbeit they geue place vnto the vse of men, not of their owne will, that is, of a naturall power and prones (for they tend to the contrary, namely, to preserve and defend themselves) but geue place rather vnto the prouidence and commaundement of God. In that they are subdued contrary to the order of their nature, let vs acknowledge the power of God, which compelleth them to serue our bles. And whē we see that they strugle and strine to the ende they would not be destroyed and perishe, let vs call to mynde, what maner of appetite is grafted in them: for that is theyr naturall appetite, and therefore can not wholly be frustrated. And vpon this consideration was this name of hope put in, not that those thinges properly hope: but because this subiection shall at the length haue this end. Augustine understandeth this of men: which application is easy. For men haue not of their owne will and accord called vnto themselves the troubles of this life, but were by God caste into them by reason of sinne, who yet hath geuen hope, that they shall one day be deliuered out of them. But because (as we haue sayd) this exposition agreeth not, therefore may the wordes of Paul be more aptly expounded after that maner which we haue before declared. Chrysostome saith, that not only we shalbe repayed, but also that creature which lyeth vnder vs: for it also shalbe exalted vnto glory mete for our glorified body. It was for our sakes (saith he) made corruptible: and for our sakes also shall it be endued wyth immortality. And he addeth a very apt similitude. A nurse (saith he) labourerth long in nursing of an infant: but when he shall come to age and shall obtayne a kingdome or dominion, she also shalbe exalted to great honor. The creature (saith he) suffereth for thy sake: but thou for thine owne sake. It is vnder hope subdued vnto present euils: take thou heede that thou caste not away hope: otherwyse thou shalte be in worser estate then the insensible creature. In this doctrine of Paul we ought to wonder at the incredible godnes and wisdom of God, which hath knit creatures together with a most straight bond, and hath ioyned them vnto man with a wonderfull sympathia or suffering together, so that if he be in euill case, they also are in euill case, and grone: and when he shalbe restored, they also shalbe restored. This word, we know, is in Greke συνάμαρτυρον: by which word the Apostle declareth y he speaketh not of thinges vncertaine and doubtfull: but thoroughly understood and knowen. For vnles these thinges had bene commonly and publiquely receaued amongst the godly, he could not haue vsed this forme of speaking. And he thought it not inough to haue sayd, that the creature groneth, but addeth also, that it sorroweth together, & y with that kind of sorrow, which is of al sorowes y most belementest: he sayth συνωδύει: which is, to be pyned after the maner of women in trauaile.

And not only it.] This pronoun, It, is not had in the Greke. For there it is written, οὐ μόνον δὲ: but this word, It, is to be vnderstand. But what is ment when it is sayde, Not only, we haue before at large declared: namely, that thereby is ment no common or simple men, but this whole workmanship of thinges created.

Which haue the first frutes of the spirite.] By this phrase of speach he signifieth ether abouidance, or els only a certain smacke or tast before. For so may those good thinges be called, which we now haue fruition of, if they be compared vnto those good thinges, which we waite for. Wherefore from creatures, Paul passeth vnto men, which are endued with, saith and with the spirite of Christ. Those also he saith do grone, and with earnest desire waite for, that our adoption, and the redemption of our body may at length be made perfect. Wherefore it is manifest, that made.

A simile

The cons
nection and sympathia
or suffering together
of crea
tures.

that they go foolishly to worke (as Chrysostome noted) which being led by enticementes of pleasures, desire to abide here perpetually: and thinke not vpon their departing hence without great griefe. For what a great infelicity is this, that we should reioyce euen of our miserie? Ambrose commendeth the excellently appointed olde man Simeon, which with greates cherefulness prayed after this maner: Lord now lettest thou thy seruant depart in peace.

Waiting for the adoption.] What meaneth this (saith Chrysostome) that thou so often to and froo tosseth this adoption, as though we had now already gotten it, saying that thou calledst vs beleuers, the sonnes and heyres of God, and fellow heyres of Christ? But now thou seemest to make vs frustrate of it, for that thou writest, that we, although we haue the first frutes of the spirite, do yet still wayte for that adoption. He answereth vnto this and saith, that the Apostle in this place is to be vnderstand of the perfect and absolut adoption. For euen so that semeth he to signifie when he addeth.

The redemption of our body.] These wordes I take not in that sence, as though we are now redeemed in spirite, but the body remayneth, which shall afterwarde be renewed. For there is some what still in the soule which hath neede of instauration. For we feele that we haue in vs manie corrupte motions, yea euen against our willes: there are also still remayning sinnes not in all pointes healed: the body also that we haue now, is not without some inchoation or beginning of redemption: for it is now made the temple of God, and the holy ghost dwelleth therein. Paul to the Ephesians calleth vs a the of his flesh, and bone of his bones. Which could not vndoubtedly be sayd, vnles both our flesh and the body it selfe were in some parte already renewed. But sithen we wayte that somewhat should be restored both in spirite and in body, why doth Paul make mention rather of the body then of the soule? I will tell you: By cause he had a respect vnto the fountayne of euills, which are trauced from Adam thorough seede from the body. For here hence began our contamination, neither can it euer be wedded by the rootes, vnles the body be first extinguished by death, or do put on glory by the last changing which is to come. Hereto teneth the course of the Apostle, when he so often maketh mention of our body, which shall in the last time be redeemed. For vnto the Corinthians he sayth, When this corruptible shall put on vncorruption. And vnto the Philippians, He shall conforme the body of our humilitie, to the bodye of his glory. These thinges being thus declared, the place it selfe seemeth to require, to speake somewhat of the change of thinges which shall be in the end of the worlde. First, I thinke it good to declare those thinges which the Master of the sentences writeth of this matter in his 4. booke of sentences, the 48. distinction. When the lord shall come to iudge, the Sunne and Moone shall be darkened, not (saith he) that theyr light shall be taken from them, but by the presence of a more plentifuller light: For Christ shall be present the moste bright Sunne: therefore the starres of heauen shall be darkened as candells are at the rising of the Sunne. The vertues of the heauen shall be moued: which may be vnderstand of the powers or (as some speake) of the influences, whereby the celestiall bodies gouerne thinges inferior. Which shall then forsake theyr right and accustomed order. Or by those vertues we may vnderstand the Angelles, which by their continuall turning about moue the orbis of the heauens. Peradventure then they shall either cease from theyr accustomed worke, or els they shall execute it after some newe maner. After he had gathered these thinges out of Mathevv and Luke, he addeth out of Ioell, that there shall be eclipses of the Sunne and of the Moone. The Sun (saith he) shall be darkened, and the Moone shall be turned into blood, before that greates and horrible day of the Lord come. And out of the 65. Chapter of Esay, Behold I create a new heauen and a new earth. And straight waye, The moone shall shine as the Sunne: and the light of the Sunne shall be sevenfold, that is, enduring seven dayes. And out of the Apocaps, There shall be a new heauen, and a new earth. Although there be no mention made of the am. liffing ether of the light of the Sunne or of the Moone. Ierome interpretateth that place, that the light of the Sunne shall be as it was in those first seven dayes wherein the worlde was created

As touching the soule also we are not perfectly renewed. Our body and flesh is in some parte renewed. Why Paul maketh mention rather of the body: than of the soule when he entreaseth of the redemption which we waite of. Of the change of thinges in the end of the worlde.

ted. For by reason of the sinne of the first parentes, the light (sayth he) both of the Sunne & of the Moone was diminished. Which saying some of the Scholemen vnderstand not of the very substance of the light, but because both the world and men haue receaued lesse fruites of these lights after the fall, then they had before. But all these things are obscure and vncertaine. Whereunto I adde, that some of the Rabbines thinke, that these are figuratiue speeches. For there shall be no change in the starres: but they say, that vnto men being in heauines and bewaylinge the vnluckie state of theyr cases, shall come so small fruite of the light of the Sunne and Moone, that vnto them those starres may seme to be darkened, and utterly out of sight. But contrariwise, when they begin to be in more felicity, and to liue according to theyr desire, then at the last the light of the Sunne and of the Moone shall seme vnto them to be doubled, and a greate deale more brighte then it semed before. Which exposition as I deny not, so also I confesse, that at the end of the world shall be a great change of those things. Wherefore I graunt either to be true, both that in this life oftentimes happen things so dolefull, that dayes being other wise most bright, seme vnto vs moste darke, and also that when all things shall haue an end, the state of the world shall be troubled. Yea also whilst we liue here sometymes it happeneth, that those lights of heauē are remoued from their natural order: as we reade it came to passe when Josua fought, and when Christ died. Jerome in his interpretation of that place addeth, that the Sunne shall receaue the reward of his laboꝝ, namely, greate augmentations of his lighte. Zachary also testifieth, that there shall then be one perpetuall daye: For the light shall be so greate, that there shall be no difference betwene day and night. If these things be true, then may we playnly see in what state the glorious bodie of the sayntes shall be after the resurrection: of whom Christ sayth: The iust shall shine like the Sunne. They shall then haue a light tenfold greater, then the light of the Sunne which we haue now fruite of. Neither is it any meruaile (saith Chrysostome) if the creatures shall at that time be illustrated with so greate brightness. For kinges, that day that they will haue theyr sonnes to be settled in theyr kingdom, are accustomed to haue a care, not only that theyr sonnes be set out with woorthye apparell, and glorious shewe, but also that their seruantes may be decked and appareled with gorgeons and sumptuous aray. Wherefore when as Christ shall then sit with glory in his throne, and the iust which are the sonnes of God, shall come vnto the kingdom and inheritance of theyr father, God shall so worke, that all creatures shall be illustrated and decked with wonderfull ornamentes, and excellent glory. Although Esaye sayth, that it shall come to passe, that the Moone and Sunne shall shine no more, but the Lord him selfe shall be an euerlasting light. By which words he signifieth not that those starres shall perish, but only that theyr light shall not be necessary vnto the sayntes: For peradventure they shall then no more rise and goe downe as they do now. But if thou aske of him what vse they shall haue after the iudgement, he plainly confesseth that he is ignorant: for that he in this matter is destitute of scriptures. All these things in a maner haue we out of the matter of the Sentences. Now there are as I suppose foure things to be considered. First, what vse we shall haue of the creatures, when we shall be adozned with that gloꝝe: Secondlye whether theyr woꝝkes shall continue: afterward, whether the nature and substance of creatures shall be preserved, and in what sort it shall be. Last of all whether all the partes of the world, or whether some only shall be repayred and made new. As touching the first, such as haue ben diligent to serche out what commodity shall come vnto the sayntes in the other life, of the creatures renewed, haue taught vs, that whilst we are here, we are by the holpen two maner of wayes: For first the nature of the body, & the life which we presently liue, is by them nourished and sustented. Secondly also the minde is holpen, by these visibill creatures to arise vnto the contemplation of God, as Paul teacheth in the first chapter of the epistle vnto the Romanes. But when we shall be once in blessed estate, we shall no more haue any neede of such helpes of creatures. For we shall then enjoy immortality, neither shall we be any more vexed with hunger, or thirst, or colde,

I similitude.

Four things to be considered in this question.

Two maner of wayes are we holpen by creatures.

The bodely eye perfectly not to the sight of the diuine essence.

If time cease, motion also ceaseth.

The creatures shall not abide after the iudgemente vntill they shall serue
to some vse.

Of the burning fire which shall be in the last daies.

or any such discommodities. And as touching the knowledge of God, we shall see him face to face. But (say they) because the bodely eye can not perse into the diuine essence (as Augustine excellently well teacheth in his booke de Videndo Deo) therefore that the eye should not want a convenient delegation, vnto it shall then be offered a wonderfull adorning of the heauens, and beauty of thinges now renewed; that it may haue not only wherewith to delight it selfe and to reioyce, but also occasion to wonder at the power and infinite wisdom of God. These thinges in dede I confesse are probable, but they are not confirmed by the holy scriptures. Neither is it very playne, that sithen the body of Christ, and infinite bodies of the iust shall to the eyes of the blessed appeare more bright then the Sunne, what more delegation can the beholding of creatures renewed bring. Wherefore the plainnes & simplicitie of the master of the sentences liketh me very well, when he confesseth his ignorance in that which he remembereth not to haue read in the scriptures. I would to God in defining of other matters he would haue used like modesty and faith. Now touching the actions of creatures, whether they shall be perpetuall, or no, we can define nothing for certainty. The Angell in the Apocalipse sweareth by him that liueth world without ende, that there shall be no more time. Whereupon some gather, that the motion of the celestiall orbes shall then cease, for that, time is the number of motion. But this reason is not firme. For it may be, that the heauens may moue, and yet by reason of the great brightnes of the body of Christ, and of the bodies of all the blessed, and of the Sunne, and of the Moone, it can not well be observed. Wherefore motion may endure although there be no time. For time is not but by obseruing and numbering of motion. But they adde also an other reason, that therefore heauen shall cease from his motion, for that his continuall courses conduce to the continuance of generation and corruption of thinges inferiour: wherefore seeing there shall be no more generation or corruption, there shall then be no more neede of the motion of heauen. This reason in dede is probable, but not of necessity. For, that celestiall motion although it serue not vnto generation and corruption, yet may it serue vnto some other purpose which we are ignorant of. To test this seemeth to me most certain, and which ought of all men to be graunted: that those natures of thinges shall not abide in the last day, vntill they shall serue to some vse. For it is both against nature, and against common reason, to appoint any thing which is vnto any thing. But what workes God will appoint vnto these thinges, we willingly graunt our selues to be ignorant. Now let vs see touching the substance and nature of thinges, whether it shall be preserved after the day of iudgement or no. This thing Peter in his latter epistle seemeth to deny. For he saith that the heauens shall suddenly and like a thowre perishe, and that the elementes shall be with a greate heate molten away. But Augustine in his 20. booke de Ciuitate Dei the 16. and 24. chapter, saith, that Peter maketh a comparison with those heauens which perished in the tyme of the flood. Which can not be vnderstand but of the regions of the ayre, wherein are commonly engendred raines and tempestes. These heauens were after the flood put in their place againe, and restored by the word of God, and now are reserved for fire. Vnto Peter afterward addeth, that we according to the promise shall haue a new heauen, & a new earth. That promise was made in the 65. chapter of Esay, and repeated in the 21. chapter of the Apocalipse. Although it there be written of the sea, that it shall haue no more being. But Augustine in the 16. chapter which we haue now cited, doubteth whether those wordes are so to be vnderstand, as though the sea should vnto any thing cease to be, as being now with the burninges sucked and dried vp: or whether it shall remaine still, but yet renewed and changed. Augustine in the same place saith, that no man, that he can tel of, knoweth touching that burning fire, what manner of thing it shall be, or from whence it shall come: when as yet our scholmen at this day are not touching that matter ashamed to saie and imagine infinite thinges. For some say, that that fyre shall be elemental fyre, which shall shall at the commaundement of God, descend downe and burne all thinges: some saie that the beames of the Sunne shall by reuerberation be multiplied, that by them all thinges may be kindled, as we see it cometh to passe, that when the Sunne beames do strick vpon a glasse of stele, if there be put vnto it a little flare, it will kindle and be set on fire. Augustine addeth, that the elementes shall then put of those qualitties, which were before agreeable vnto our corruptible bodies: & shall put on other qualitties which may be agreeable vnto our immortall and glorified bodies: that the world being made new, may be aptly applyed vnto men made new by immortallity.

 But here I would gladly demaund of Augustine, whether he thought that the bodies of the saintes shall after the iudgement liue in this world, or no: Which thing if he affirme, he shall seeme to make with the sect called Millenarij. But if he deny and holde that which we beleue, that our bodies shall be rapt vp into heauen, what shall neede this application of the qualitties of elementes vnto our immor-tall bodies: Unless peradventure he will say, that although these thinges shall nothing conduce vnto our immortality, yet there shall be a certaine analogy and proportion betwene them being now made immortall, and our bodies glorified. For if they (as Chrysostome sayth) were for our sinnes made obnoxious vnto corruption, it is mete, that we being deliuered from death, they also be deliuered from the burthen of corruption. Neither vndoubtedly is that which is writtten in the booke of Genesis any let vnto this innouation, where God sayde vnto Nohe, That all the dayes of the earth shall be sowing and haruest, cold and heate: sommer and wynter: day and night.
 For these thinges he saith shall come to passe in the dayes of the earth. But those dayes shall be the dayes of heauen, and as Esay saith, a Sabbath of Sabaoths, Jeremy also in his 33. chapter saith: Can I make frustrate the couenant which I haue made wyth day and nyght? As though he would saye, it can not be made frustrate.
 So sayth he, shall the couenaunte whiche I haue made wyth the house of Iuda and wyth the house of Dauyd be ratified. The couenaunte whereof the Prophete now speaketh, of the sendynge of the Messias in hys appoynted tyme, is not to be drawen beyonde the tyme of the present estate. But Christ when in the Gospel he saith: Heauen and earth shall passe away, but my words shall not passe away, taketh not, passing away, for destruction: but foresheweth y there shall one day come a certaine chaunge which yet can neuer happen vnto his wordes. For they shall alwayes abide vnmoueable, and the truth of them shall neuer be peruerter. Of this interpretation David is y autho: in his 102. Psalm. The workes (saith he) of thine handes are the heauens. They shall perishe, but thou abidest: as a garment shalt thou chaunge them, and they shall be chaunged. Hereunto also agreeth Peter: for when he had said, that the heauens shall perishe and the elementes shall melt away wth heat, straight way he added, that we accordyng to the promise, shall haue a new heauen, and a new earth. And Ierome expounding the 65. chap. of Esay alledgeth in this sence a sentence of Paul, out of the latter epistle to the Cor. the 7. chapter. For he sayth:
 That the figure of this world passeth away: as though he would not say, that the nature of thynges, or the world it selfe shall perishe, but onely the figure, that is, the state and forme of this tyme. And he proueth that the innouation which we put, signifieth not corruption of nature, by a similitude taken of the degrees of our age. For when of children we are made yong men, & of yong men, me, & of me, olde men, we are not as touching y nature of man destroyed: but by those changes we are transferred fro a lower estate to that which is moze excellent. Wherefore when that last burning shall come, which the scriptures plainly teach shall come, the whole world shall be set on fire: and as gold and siluer, when they are melted in the fire, perishe not, but are made moze pure: so the world shall not by that fire be destroyed, but be renued. Of this minde also were some of the Ethiike writers, as Heraclitus Ephesius, and Empedocles Siculus, and others: which peradventure had receiued these thinges of their elders, but had corrupted them with wicked opiniōs. There haue bene also many of the Christians in the olde tyme, which thought that the creatures shall remaine after the continuing of the Lord, and that they shall serue the elect in some

A place of Genesis
 declared.

How heauen and earth shall passe away.

A similitu-
 tude.

Cap.8 A Commentarie vpon the

The opinion
of the secte
called Millenarij.
The first & second res-
urrectiō.

Some men of notable learning
were Millenarij.

A place of the Apocali-psic.

By a number certaine is signified a number vncertaine.

Sathan is said to be bound because his strengths are broken.

Why Sa-than is said to be more
bound now, then he was before the death of Christ.

steede. For they thought that when Christ shall returne, there shall then be onely the resurrection of the goodly: which also they called the first resurrection, Betwene which and the last resurrection wherein the wicked also shall be rayled vp, shall be a thousand yeaeres: and all this time Christ shall in this world raigne together with the saintes, and all this space the deuill shall be bound, as it is described in the booke of the Apoc. And they seme to haue taken an occasion of their opinion not only out of the reuelation of John, but also out of the prophets. For they when they prophesy of the kingdome of Christ, make mencion of many thinges which seme to pertaine to the kingdomes of this world and vnto pleasures and delights. And those which were in this error were of the Grecians called χιλιασαι, and of the latines Millenarij. Neither vndoubtedly were there only common or vulgare men, patrons of this sentence, but also men famous and notable in the church, & of great antiquity, as Papias, Irenaeus, Iustinus Martir, Victorinus, Lactantius, Tertullian, and a great many other famous ecclesiasticall writers, who I ioyne not with Cherintus: for he solued abroade many other errors touchynge our sauour. For vnto this opinion which these fathers were of, he added a double impiety. First, that the saintes shall so raigne together with Christ in this lyfe, that they shall aboundantly haue the fruition of all the pleasures of the body: which is nothing els, but again with lustes drunkennes, gluttony, & such other filthines to contaminate nature renewed by the resurrection. His other error was, that in that kingdome of Christ the ceremonies of the law, and sacrifices of Moses shall be put in vye againe: which errors none of the fathers whom we haue now mencioned folloved. Neither should it be any hard matter to confute that pestilent opinion by the Scriptures. But because we haue in an other place at large done y, we wil cease at this time to speak any more therof. Onely this thinge I will adde which August. in his 20. booke De ciuitate Dei. the 7. cha. writeth, If these men had sayd, that Christ in that space of a thousand yeaeres wyll bestow vpon his saintes some celestiaall good gyfts, theyr sentence should haue bene the more tollerable. In which place he signifieth, that he also was once of the same opinion: howbeit afterward weighing thinges better, he iudged that that place of the Apocalips where hence all that suspicion semed to spring is otherwise to be expounded: namely, by those thousand yeaeres, to vnderstand al y time which passeth from the ascencion of Christ vnto his last iudgement: neither ought the number of a thousand yeaeres any thing to offend vs. For it is common in the holy scriptures, by a number certaine and definite to signifie an other number vncertaine and indefinite. Which thing although it may by many other places be proued: yet here it shall be sufficient to note only two. Christ saith vnto the Apostles, he which forsaketh his house, or father, or mother, or chyl dren, or wyfe, or brethre, &c. shall receyue an hundred fold. Where by an hundred fold we vnderstand a certaine great and in a maner infinite recompence. So God promisseth in the law, That he woulde do good vnto them that serue hym vnto a thousand generations, which signifieth nothing els but vnto their posterity for a very long tyme. Wherefore Christ (as Augustine thinketh) raigneth with his saintes all this whole time, which is signified by the number of a thousand yeres. But how Sathan may be said to be in this time bound it is not so easy to declare: for euen now also y church of Christ is by him greuously vexed. But Augustine thinketh, y he is therfore bound, for y his strengths are broken, & Christ hath overcome the strong armed mā, so y he can not now in such sort rage as he woulde, & especially for y he cannot prohibite y elect & predestinate vnto eternal life fro their appointed saluatiō. Although as touching this, also before Christ ascended vp into heauē, Sathan was no lesse letted then he is now, so y he could not disturbe y elect fro eternal lyfe. But here may be answered, y they which were in y state were before Christes tyme few in number: For y deuill ranged & spoiled in a maner euery where throughout y whole world, except it wer certain of y Israelites & a few others. But now since y Gospell was spred abroad thorough out the whole world, the power and strength of Sathan is much more restrayned: which may sufficiently appeare by the ceasing of the ozacles, and by the ouer-

uer

worth of idolatry in a manner euery where. Wherefore I thinke with Augustine that thys innouation of creatures, shall not serue to that vse, that the saintes should vse the liuing with Christ in any temporall kingdom in the world. And as for the prophetes of the Propheies, which at euery where set forth touching the kingdome of Christ, and make mencion of certayne carnal thinges and belong to an earthly kingdome, they are so to be taken, that we vnderstand that by such metaphors (as the honoꝝ and maiesty of our kingdoms is thought to consist) is described the kingdome of Christ, which he now exerciseth in the Church, and whiche in the daye of iudgemente he shall with greates power shew forth. Which thing the prophetes theselues haue sufficiently signified, when they enterlaced many thinges, which farre passe al credite, and excede the course of thinges humane. For there they playnly declare, that they speake metaphorically. But to retorne to our purpose, we suppose that the world, as touching his nature and substance, shall not utterly perishe, but rather, as writeth Esay, Peter, and the booke of the Apocalipse, and Paul in thys place, shalbe renewed. And of thys renouation there are set forth two principall conditions, the one is immortality, and the other light. The Scholemen haue noted, that that light shall not be such which shall cause heate: for if it should so do, all thinges should sone be dried by and burnt. And oftentimes there is found light, which engendzeth not heate: for there are many precious stones most bright, whiche geue no heate at all. These thinges beinge thus declared, let vs consider of the other partes of the world, whether they also shalbe preserved, as plantes, precious stones, mettalls, brute beastes, and such other like thinges. The Scholemen thinke, that man which is the principallest part of the world, beinge renewed, other creatures also shalbe restored. Which saying is most true: for it is gathered out of the sayings of Paul. But as touching the partes, they thinke that only the heauen, and the elementes, & the bodies of men shall remayne. But the reason which they aledge for themselves is in my iudgement very weake: for they affirme, that those thinges onely shall haue immortality, which were after a sort made apt thereunto: as is a celestiall body: which is altogether simple, neither is changed by contrary qualitties. The elementes also, although as touching partes they are engendzed and corrupted, yet as touching the whole they alwayes abide. So say they also of man: who although he haue a transitory body, yet he hath an immortall soule: yea rather euen the body it selfe was so composed at the beginning, that it had possibility not to dye. Wherefore it shall not be absurd to ascribe vnto it also immortality. But thys reason is for two causes weake: firste, because without any authority of the word of God it taketh away renouation from many partes of the world: Secondly, for that that which it taketh as granted, is euen as doubtfull as is that which is concluded, namely, that those thinges only shall be renewed with immortality, which by theyr constitution seme apt thereunto. For siche thys immortality is the liberall and mere gift of God, it can not depend of any meane or force of nature. For, that power of God, whereby both the heauens and the elementes shalbe restored vnto immortality, can preserve also the other partes of the world. And as the elementes remayne whole, although theyr partes be engendzed and corrupted: so also doo the species or kindes of brute beastes and plantes perpetually endure, although theyr individua or peculiar parts are renewed, & do perish. If thou demanda what commodity these things shal haue if they remaine: I answer, that they shall haue the selfe same commodity, that thou canst ascribe vnto the elementes. For euen as then we shall haue no nede of the elementes, so also shall we haue no nede of brute beastes, or plantes or other partes of the world. This had ben a better reason for them, in my iudgement, if they had said that therefore they thinke, that other thinges shall not endure, for that the scripture maketh no mencion of theyr continuance & preservation. Although I see that neither thys reason also is of necessity. For although the scripture hath not

The Propheies of the Propheies touching the kingdome of Christ or metaphoricall.

The Propheies themselves declared, that they speake metaphorically.

The conditions of the renouation of the world

Not euery light maketh warm.

A reason of the Scholemen.

Immortality is the mere gift of God, neither dependeth of nature.

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the Reasons

probable on eche side.

Things
pronounced vniuersally
in the holy scriptures
admitte exception.

Neither part of this question is obstinately
to be affirmed.

We must take hede
that we let not escape
vs the thin-ges that are necessary
vnto salua-
tion.
The vse of the Sacraments
cannot be pure, where the nature
is not kno-
wen.
About what principall pointes the scriptures are occupied.
Those things which are not set forth in the holy scriptures, are not necessary
vnto saluatio.

made mencion of these creatures apart by themselves, and expressedly, yet it is sufficient, that it hath generally signified, that creatures shalbe renewed, neither euer excepted any thing. Farther, if by reasons we should contend, that the Sun (as they say) shall therefore be illustrated with greater aboundance of light, so that it is requisite that it should after a sorte receaue a reward of his labors: So mought the rest of the creatures also say, that they haue with no les labour and fidelity done seruice vnto men, then hath the Sunne. And mozeouer, there is in other creatures no lesse pzonesse and naturall desire to preserue themselves, then there is in the Sunne, Moone, heaue and earth: Wherefore if the one ought not to be frustrated of theyr desire, neither vndoubtedly ought the other to be frustrated. These things may be sayde on eche side probablye. And Paul to the Ephesians, and vnto the Colossians saith, that al things shalbe renued by Christ, both the things that are in heauen, and the things that are in earth. But neither that alio maketh an argument of necessity. For things vniuersally pronounc- ed in the holy scriptures, admitte alwayes an exception or cōtraction. All (saith Christ) as many as haue come before me, were theues and robbers. All things are lawe- full vnto me, but all things are not expedient. Here may be vnderstand the figure Synecdoche, namely, to vnderstand some partes comprehended in that whole. And when Paul sayth, that the Creature shalbe deliuered from the seruitude of corruption, it may be generally vnderstand of the whole worlde, so that it shalbe no moze compelled, to renew creatures by a new generation: yet thereof it folloiweth not, that al the creatures, as touching euery perticular kind, shalbe preserued. Wherefore I thinke it the part of a godly minde to affirme neither part obstinately. For we haue nothinge on nether side, that is thoroughly and certainly defined. Howbeit this I dare affirme, that of those creatures which haue perished, onely men shalbe raysed vp from the dead. But as touching the preseruatiō of other creatures, after the day of iudgement, except the heauen and earth, whereof the scripture hath made mencion, I suppose there is nothing to be sayd. For when we want scriptures, it is not our part to serch out thinges to curiously. It is inough if we vnderstand this, that for our sakes war brought in the corruption of things: and agayne, that whē we shall be renewed, al things y remaine shal be in better estate, then they were before. But we must so streine y strenghts of our knowlege, y we let not those things escape vs which are neces- sary vnto saluatiō: such as is y doctrine of God, of Justification, of worshipping, of god works, of the vse of the sacraments: which vse shal neuer be sincere, nor pure, vnles we thoroughly vnderstand and know the nature of them. For if we attribute vnto them either moze or lesse, then becometh, we shal perpetually erre. The Scriptures are chiefly occupied in these principall pointes, that the man of God may be made perfect and instructed to euery god worke. But let vs thinke, that those things which the Scriptures speake not of, are not necessary vnto our saluatiō. For so god is the holy ghoſt, that if they had bene necessary, he would vndoubtedly haue set them forth in the Scriptures.

For we are saued by hope. But hope which is fene, is not hope. For how can a man hope for that which he seeth? But if we hope for that we see not, we do with patience wayt for it. Likewise also y spirite helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what to pray as we ought: but y spirit it selfe maketh request for vs w sighes which cannot be expressed. But he that sercheth the harts knoweth what is the meaning of the spirite: for he maketh request for the saintes accordyng to the wyll of God.

For we are saued by hope. J Paul before said, y we waite for y adoptiō & redē- tiō of our body, neither do we only waite for it, but also seruently desire it with sigh- inges that cannot be expressed. And that this thing should not seme to be agreable with with the condition of the sonnes of God, which haue already through Christ gotten peace and reconciliation with God, now he aptly addeth, that that saluation is not yet obtained of vs in very deede, but only in hope. Which yet is not so to be vnderstand, as though we now haue no part therof: but bicause the perfection and accomplishment of those things which we haue, is still waited for of vs. Hereby we see how hope and faith are distinguished as touching those good things wherunto we are by them directed. For faith hath already apprehended remission of sinnes, & imputation of righteousness through Christ. But hope still waiteth for a perfect restitution, and full deliuey from all euils. These things we now hold by hope: Unto which hope are not repugnaunt gronings, and sighinges, yea rather they very much agree with it. For hope includeth two things: namely, the absence of the thing which is desired, and the assured wayting for the same. Wherefore, for that the good thing which we desire is deferred & is not present, we are vexed in mind, neither can we be but grieved. But soasmuch as this waityng for, that God will performe his promises, is sure and certaine, we reioyce and are glad. And therefore the scriptures euery where set forth the reioycinges and ioyes of the saintes. The absence of the thing waited for, Paul declareth by the nature of hope. For he saith, that the hope which is sene, is not hope. Which words are to be expounded by the figure Metonymia. For hope is put for the thing hoped for. And Pauls meaning is nothing els, but y hope is not touching those things which are sene. Those things he saith are sene, which are present: which we may both haue fruition of, and also delight our selues in. That which is sene (saith he) is not hope. For that hope is of that thing which is not sene. Neither bringeth he any other reason then the common sence of all men. For how can a man (saith he) hope for that which he hath? Afterward he declareth the waiting for, which we said is contained in hope.

But if we hope for that we see not, we do with patience waite for it. By these words Paul declareth y vnto hope pertaineth, that we with a balaunt and quiet minde waite for the promises of God, although they be absent and long deferred. And therefore is required hope, lest we should fall into dispayre, by reason the good thing which we hope for, is difficult and hard. Hope erecteth the minde, that it should not geue place, either to aduersities, or to differring of the thing hoped for. It behoueth also that y thing which we hope for, be not so hard or difficill, to thinke that we can by no meanes obteyne it: otherwise we should cease from hoping. For there is no wise man will labour for things impossible. Wherefore when we behold that eternall felicitie is promised vnto vs, these two things straight way come in to our minde: that it is a thing infinitely distant from our strenghts, and yet may be obtained of such as beleue. But the power of attaining vnto it dependeth, neyther of our merites, nor of our workes, but only of the mercy of God, and merite of Christ. Here herte is the certaintie of our hope to be sought for: which could be none at all, if eternall felicity should be attained vnto by our merites or workes. By this certaine and assured expectation, our mindes are in aduersities and temptations confirmed. For vnto souldiours is set forth the victory: which being a goodly thing, and very muche delightinge their mindes, causeth them to haue a regard vnto two things. First, that it is a thing hard, and to be attayned vnto by great labours and daungers: Secondly, that it is not only possible for them to attaine vnto it, but also that they are certaine therof, and so being full of good hope, they couragiously fight and obtayne y victory. Out of these proprieties which Paul in this place attributeth vnto hope, we may gather the definitio therof. Hope therefore is a faculty or power breathed into vs by the holy ghost, whereby we with a balaunt and patient minde wayte for, that the saluation which is now begun in vs, and is receiued by faith, may one day be made perfect in vs. And that hope is geuen by the holy ghost, hereby it plainly appeareth, for that it can not be gotten by any humane reason. For we wayt for those good things which farre passe our nature. That it engendzeth in vs a patient waiting for, Paul declareth in these words:

But if we hope for that we see not, we do with patience waite for it. That

Rr.iii.

we

Howe faith and hope are distinguished.

Two things
are included in hope.

Sorrow & joy follow
hope.

Hope is put for the thing hoped for.

The good thing which we hope for is hard and difficult.
Hope is not touching that thing
which is impossible.

The cer-taintie of hope should be nothing at all if fel-citie
should depend of me-
rites.

Definitio
of hope.

Hope and charity follow faith.

The order
of the production of the three vertues.
These ver-tues haue they being together &
at one and the selfe
same time.
One of these ver-
tues produ-
ceth not an other as the cause but
the holy ghost is the author of them.

What the helpe of the spirite is.

The end of good & euill
after the Christians.

The endes
which the Ethnikes
appoynted.

The euils whereunto
we are in this life obnoxious can not be tolde.

we haue eue now receiued some part of þ saluation which we hope for, hath bene befoze declared. For Paul saith, that we ar now adopted to be the sonnes of God, & are made his heires, and the fellow heires of Christ. And the epistle vnto the Hebryes teacheth, that now are begonne in vs those good thinges, which by faith we waite for: for they: faith is described to be the substance of thynges, that are hoped for. For hope hath no other foundation to leane vnto, but faith, wherof it springeth. For such is the nature of these three principall vertues, faith, hope, and charity, that the one euer followeth the other. For first, by faith we know the eter-nall good thing which is promised of God. Vnto this promise faith geueth a firme assent, and therof in our mindes springeth hope. For, for that we beleue that God is true, and will performe that which he hath promised, we patiently waite vntil the promise be rendred, although we know that in the meane tyme we must suffer thinges most hard & long enduring. But for that we see þ at the length shall be rendred vnto vs so great good thinges, we are kindled with a great desire of them:
which thing pertaineth vnto charity: this is þ order of the production of these ver-tues, & in this sort the one goeth before the other, although in very dede, they haue their being all at one time, and together. But we ought not to thinke, that sayth is the efficient cause of hope, or that of those two springeth charity. For the spirit of Christ is the only author of all these vertues: he stirreth them vp in our mindes, in such sort as we haue now declared. But how the propriety of hope is not to make ashamed, and how it hath certaintye inseperably ioyned with it, we haue before taught in the 5. chapiter, when we expounded this place: Hope maketh not ashamed, because the loue of God is powred abroad into our hartes. Now let vs see, why Paul vnto hope addeth the helpe of the holy ghost.
In my iudgement he doth it therfore, for that faith and hope embrace that good thing, which is as yet farre absent, neither can be attayned by the senses, nor com-prehended by reason. But euils, and calamities, and corrupt affectes, wherewith we are vexed, are alwayes present, and light vnder some one sence. Wherefore that their rage should not ouerwhelme the power of faith and of hope, the holy ghost is present with vs: when the godly grone, and crye, and that they are in daunger that nature should overcome hope and faith, he is reddy at hand, and re-fresheth their mindes, and bringeth so much consolation, as the waight of the affliction was, as Paul in his first chapter of the latter epistle vnto the Corinthians saith, Euen as the afflictions of Christ abound in vs, so also through Christ aboundeth our consolation. By these our infirmities, which the holy ghost helpeth, Paul vn-derstandeth the weakenes of our naturall strengthes, which of themselves are not equall vnto the grienes and aduersities wherewith the faithfull are continually vexed. But the helpe of the spirite is nothinge els, but a certayne inwarde and hidden strength, whereby our mindes are confirmed, not to geue ouer in temptations. Augustine in his 19. booke De Ciuitate Dei, the 4. chapter, excellently declareth, how Christian hope is caried vnto those good thinges which can not be sene. For if thou demand (saith he) of a man endued wyth fayth, what ende he appoynteth of hys good or euill decedes, he wyll answer, eternall lyfe, and eternall death.
These thinges can not be sene, neither be vnderstand of humaine reason: and therfore the wise men of the Ethnikes being puffed vp with pryde, would not put their hope in them. Wherefore some held, that the endes of good thinges, are the good thinges of the minde, some, the good thinges of the body, some, vertue, some, pleasure, some, both ioyned together. But God derided them, and saw how baينه their thoughtes were. For they chose rather to counte those thinges for the chiefe good thinges, which are enterlaced with many miseries and calamities, then to receaue those sincere, stand, and most firme thinges which are by the word of God set forth. For who can exactly declare, vnto how miserable and horrible calamities our body is obnoxious? It is sicke, it is wounded, it is dissolued, it is made crooked, it is tozney, it is maymed: men oftentimes become blind, oftentimes deaffe:
and as touching the minde, men are oftentimes madde, and in a phrensie, neither attaine they to the truth without mixture of many errors, which are euen most dili-

diligent searchers out thereof. How could the Ethnikes boast of vertues as the chiefe good thinges, when as they are vnto vs witnesses of our calamities? To what thing serueth temperance, which is therefore geuen, that drunkennes, gluttony, lustes, and filthy and corrupt motions of the minde should be bidden? For these thinges declare, that it hath no place but in mindes still obnoxious vnto such corruption: which corruption how much the more it is inward, so much the more miserable maketh it vs: and as a domesticall enemy rangeth abroade in the entrails of our hartes. These affectes (saith Augustine) are vices for as Paul sayth, they hynder vs from doying those thynges which we would. Farther what is the office of prudence, but to prouide, that we should not through error be deceaued in chusing of good thinges and auoyding of euill thinges? Undoubtedly if we were not wrapped with errors and darkenes, this remedy should not haue neded: but forasmuch as we nede it, it declareth, that men are not yet in happy estate, but are wrapped with great and grieuous errors, vnles prudence some way helpe. Justice also, whereby is rendred vnto euery man that which is his, is for no other cause necessary, but to restraine thefts, extorsions, and violences. Neither can it so thoroughly exercise his office amongst men, but that good and godly men oftentimes suffer many thinges filthily and vniustly. How what shall we say of fortitude? It armeth men patiently to suffer sorowes, dangers, torments, and finally death it selfe, if nede require. Amongst these so great euils those wise appointed the chiefe goodnes: which euils yet they sayd mought somtymes be in such sort encreased, that a man mought therefore kill himselfe. O blessed hyfe (crieth Augustine) which to come to an ende seketh the helpe of death. For if it be blessed, why do they breake it in sonder and flye it? But if it be miserable, why do they put in it the chiefe goodnes? So were they derided of God, for that they contemned hope which is neither sene, nor by humane reason vnderstand. And because, when they heard it preached out of the word of God, they derided it, therefore God by his heauily doctrine condemned them as foles and men worthy to be made a laughing stocke. The reason of Paul (to returne to it againe) is this: hope is of thinges absent, and of those thinges which are not sene: but by hope we are made safe. Wherefore our saluation is not yet sene, nor by humane reason vnderstand: yea rather vnto vs are offered all thinges contrary vnto our saluation, and plainly repugnant vnto it. For we are infected with corrupt affectes: we are assaulted with temptacions: we are exercised with sorowes, and veracions: so that if we should leane vnto natural reason, we should be much rather counted vnhappy, then blessed: And yet notwithstanding if we will geue credite vnto the commaundementes of God, we must valiantly hope in y<sup>e</sup> middell of these euils: For it is not free for a man to hope or not to hope: for y<sup>e</sup> commaundemēt of hope bindeth all men vniuersally. For euen as we are commaunded to worshippinge God as true and constant in his promises, so also are we commaunded to hope in him. For David sayth: Sacrifice the sacrifice of righteousness, and hope in the Lord. And Ose saith: Hope in God at all tymes. And Peter: Hope in that grace which is offered. And let no man make an excuse, that hys ill hyfe past and sinnes committed, let hym that he can not hope: for the precept of God hath not this conditiō annexed vnto it. And although it had, yet should it be taken as a condition pertaynyng vnto the law, whiche byndeth not vs that are vnder the Gospell: we must rather haue a respect vnto the promise of the Gospell, which sheweth that we shall haue felicity geuen vs for Christes sake, and that freely. For the Apostle when he had said, The stipend of sinne is death, straight way added: But grace is eternall life. Such a promise doth saith apperchē, & so deliuereth it ouer vnto hope to waite for it. Wherefore hope ought not to adde any conditiō vnto it, whē as it receiued none of faith, whatsoever y<sup>e</sup> master of y<sup>e</sup> sentēces writeth touching this matter. For I know y<sup>e</sup> he in his 3. booke teacheth, y<sup>e</sup> our hope leneth not only vnto y<sup>e</sup> mercy of God, but also vnto our merites. And therefore saith he, to hope without merites is no hope, but a presumption. This sentence is not to be receaued. For it addeth vnto hope a condition: when as sayth without any condition

The most all berines are witnesses of our calamities.

Some thought that a man mought kill himselfe by reason of the too great bur-
then of calamities.

These things
which are offred in this life
seeme to be contrary vnto
our sal-
uation.
The precept touching hope is not a thing indis-
creet.

Stines
ought not to be a let vnto hope.

The master of the Sentences con-
futed.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

tion apprehendeth that which is to be hoped for, out of the word of God. Farther when a these or any other wicked man is suddenly conuerted vnto God, hath he not hope? Undoubtedly he hath, for if he dispaired of saluation, he would not fly vnto Christ. And how can any man say, that such a hope leneth to any merites, when as he hath alwayes before liued wickedly? But as we haue before sayd, these men thinke they haue here a trimme place of refuge, if they answere, that thys hope of a man namely conuerted vnto Christ dependeth of merites, not in dede past, but to come: netwely, that he hopeth he shal obteyne the rewarde of felicity when he hath done woorkes, which he trusteth to do. But here they committe a double fault: first, by cause if he which is conuerted vnto Christ do hope that by merites he shal haue eternal life: he hath no true hope: for he resisteth the true sayth. For, it apprehendeth the chiefe felicity offered frely. Secondly, vna- wares they auouch, that y which hath not as yet his being, is the cause of y ver- tue, which in acte and very dede they confesse to be in the minde of the repentant. And if they meane, that he hopeth for felicitie when he hath liued well, but yet in such sort, that he hath no confidence, that he can by committing of sinne attaine vnto it, then speake they no other thing, then we do. But so are not woorkes the cause of hope, but light betwene it and the lasse end as certayne meanes, and first beginnings of felicity: that men, forasmuch as they hope that eternall ble- sednes shalbe genen vnto them freely shoulde also hope that God, if they liue, wyll freely also geue vnto them good woorkes. For the holy scripture teacheth farre otherwise, then do these men. For Dauid, when he sayd, If thou Lord shalt loke streightly vnto iniquities who shall be able to abide it? And when he saw, that the sinnes, wherewith our woorkes are contaminated, auocate vs from hope, added My soul hath hoped in his word. And by the word he vnderstandeth the promise: of which promise he rendzeth a cause: By cause with the Lorde is mercye, and with hym is plentyfull redemption. These are the true and proper causes of our hope: The promise of God, and his abundant mercye. The same Dauid in an other place sayth, Why art thou sad o my soule, and why dost thou trouble me: Hope in God: for I will still confesse vnto hym. Here some object, that we are not iustified by sayth on- ly: for Paul sayth that we are saued by hope. But these men ought to haue con- sidered, that the Apostle in this place entreateth not of Iustification. For tou- ching it, he before wrote, that by sayth & the spirite, we are deliuered from the lawe of sinne and of death, and adopted into sonnes and heyres, and made the fellow heyres of Christ. But here he speaketh of the perfect redemption, which is still to be wayted for. This we also confesse to be holden by hope, when yet not withstanding we haue already by sayth obteyned iustification and remission of sinnes. Farther I haue oftentimes admonished, that when the scripture semeth to attribute iustification ether vnto hope, or vnto charity or vnto our woorkes, those places are so to be vnderstanded, that iustification is there taught, not by the causes, but by the effectes. And we ought to vnderstand, that whatsoever is attributed vnto woorkes, the same is wholly done by reason of sayth which is an- nered vnto them. Wherefore as in a wall we haue a consideration vnto the fou- dation, and in the frutes of trees to the roote: so whatsoever semeth at the first sight to be ascribed vnto woorkes, is to be assigned vnto faith, as vnto the mother of all good woorkes. Which thinge Augustine hath in many places excellentlye taught. Others to proue that hope depēdeth of our woorkes, cite that which Paul before sayd, Tribulation worketh patience, patience worketh experience, and experience hope. Here (say they) it is playne that of patience springeth hope. I heare in dede the wordes of Paul, but I doo not by them acknowledge, that patience is the cause of hope. For first it is playne inough to him that will consider it, that Paul in thys connexion compareth not causes with effectes. For who will say, that tribulation is the cause of patience? For it bringeth many to desperation, and to horrible blasphemies. But those thinges which Paul knitteth together in this chapne, are instruments, by which the holy ghost bleseth to stir vp in vs these ver- tues. But graunt that there be some consideratiō of cause betwene these things:

Woorkes are not the cause of hope.

The cause of our hope.

We are sa- ued by hope but we are not iustified by it.

The consi- deration of iustification is some- tymes de- clared by the causes, and some- times by the effectes.

yet

yet should it not thereof follow, that patience is the cause of hope, but contrarie-wise that hope is the cause of patience. For no man with a quiet mind patiently suffereth any thing, vnles by that patience he hope to attayne vnto some thing.
Vndoubtedly Partirs are by hope confirmed in theyr tormentes, patiently to beare them. And the marchant, if he had not a hope to gayn, would kepe hymselfe at home, nether would he wander about the world. And the shipmaster vnles he hoped, that he could arriue at the porte, would not lose out into the depe, nether strue agaynst the windes and waues. I confesse in dede that here is somewhat encreased by patience. For when we se, that vnto vs is geuen of Christ for his sake with a quiet minde to suffer many thinges, we moze and moze haue confidence, that those thinges also which are remainyng and which we wayte for, shall one day be geuen vs. But to beleue that hope wholly dependeth of patience I can not be perswaded. For, as we haue before sayd, by hope rather we come vnto patience. And in very dede the holy ghost is the autho: and cause of these vertues: And he goeth orderly to worke, of one to produce an other. Agaynst this certainty which we sayd dependeth of the promise of God, Pighius blyth trifling reasons, that the promises are generall, nether is in them mencion made either of me or of thee, and therefore there is still remainyng a doubt, when we must descend to the application of these promises. Thys man seemeth to me to make the promises of God to hange in the ayre, when as he will haue them to be so generall, that no man can priuately be assured of hymselfe. Doubtles he which calleth vpon God, and calleth hym his God, applieth that generall God senerally vnto hymselfe. Parthan sayd vnto David, The Lord hath taken away thy sinne: which thing is likewise sayd vnto euery one that asketh. The Gospell is to that end preched to euery creature, that euery one should singularly embrace the promise, and haue remission of synnes. The apostle sayth, I baptise thee in the name of the father, and of the sonne, and of the holy ghost: and that is to be vnderstand into the remission of synnes: And euery one priuately to hymselfe receaue the Eucharist. And these thinges are certayne seales, and sealinges of the promises of God: but they should seale nothing, vnles the promises should now be applied perticulerly vnto this man, or to that man. But let vs consider the scriptures.
Abraham beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him vnto righteousnes: and he receaued circumcision the seale of the righteousnes of sayth. Vnto Circumcision seale the generall promise? So vndoubtedly: but rather the singular promise, and whiche was now applied vnto Abraham. Therefore let these men cease thus to bleare mens eyes: and let them confesse, that hope hath that certaintye of saluation whiche it hath receaued of sayth by reason of the firmitie of the promises.
And that thou mayst vnderstand, that hope is repugnant vnto doubt, count with thy selfe to what end, it was geuen of God vnto man. Vndoubtedly to no other ende, but that they shoulde haue wherewith to strue agaynst doubting.
For when we doubt of our saluation, we haue no other weapons wherby to overcome that doubtinge, but hope onely whiche springeth of a liuely sayth. Wherefore seeing it alwayes strueth agaynst doubtinge, there is no cause that anye man should ascribe vnto it doubtinge, as a perpetuall companion. Let vs looke vpon and consider the other commaundements of God, so shall that which we anouch be yet moze playne. God hath commaunded vs to worship hym only: and because he saw vs of our owne accord earnestly bent vnto idolatry, and vnto supersticio: therfore woulde he haue vs with the word of his law fight agaynst this euill. He hath commaunded also that we should not steale, nor kill, nor commit adulteries: for he saw that we by reason of our corrupt nature are prone to these euils. So also God hath commaunded vs to hope, for that he saw our vnbeleuyng hart to be infected with continual doubting. And as in beleuyng we ought not to haue a regard vnto those thinges which seme to be agaynst the promises of God (which thing Abrahams excellently well performed, when he considered not his bodye past children gettyng, nor his wife being olde and barren, but gaue the gloze vnto God) so in hoping

Patience
springeth of hope.

Hope is somewhat
encreased
by patience.

Euery faith-full man knoweth
that the promises are properly & priuately
applied vnto hymselfe.

Hope is repugnant vnto doubtinge
to what end hope was geuen
vnto men.

Why God
gaue the comaundmentes.

Why God
hath comamaunded
vs to hope.

In hoping we ought not to haue a respect vnto our weaknes.
The security of the fleshe, and the security of faith dis-
fer.

The holy ghost is mightier
then our infirmity.
As gainst the Pelagians.

How we know not what we ought to aske.

Paul was not alway
heard in his prayers.

Examples
of other saintes which prayed & were not heard.

The maner of the primi-
tiue church.

The gift of praying a right.

ping we ought not to haue a regard vnto our weaknes: for they by reason of theyr deformednes and filthines would rather feare vs away from hoping. We ought to fixe our eyes in the only promise and mercy of God. Neither also when we bidge this certainty of hope, do we open a window vnto lose lyfe, as many falsly lay to our charge. For the security of the flesh farre differeth from the commendable certainty of faith and of hope. For neyther doth it, as our aduersaries thinke, expell the feare of God out of the mindes of the godly. We haue before at large taught, that the certainty of saluation, and the holy feare of God very well agree together in the hartes of the faithfull.

Likewise also the spirite helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what to pray as we ought. But the spirite it selfe maketh request for vs with sighes, which cannot be expressed. Besides that stay of hope, wherewith our patience is upholden, Paul sayth that there is an other helpe also of the holy ghost geuen vnto vs. This is y which Christ, when he should depart out of the world, promised to his Apostles: I wyll not leaue you orphanes, but wyll send you an other comforter. If the power of the holy ghost be compared with the weakenes of our strengthes, it wil farre passe our infirmity. Therefore Paul bleth this comparison, that thereby might be increased in vs, cherefulness and confidence. Here the Pelagians are put to a great foyle. For so farre is it of, that by the strengthes of our nature, we can helpe our selues, that without the helpe of the holy ghost, we can not of our selues so much as know what thinges shal be profitable vnto vs, and what thinges, hurtful. But in what maner we know not what to aske, and how the spirite maketh request for vs with unspeakable sighes, because it is very obscure to vnderstand, first I thinke it good to declare the expositions of the fathers, and secondly to declare, what in them is the best. Chrysostome, soasmuch as at that time were greuous persecutions against the Christians, thinketh that they with prayers seruently desired of God, that they might at the length be deliuered from so great euils: and this thing not coming to passe, they conceived a great sorrow in their minde. And therefore Paul after this manner comforteth them, for that we our selues know not what to pray, or what to aske. Wherefore God, who knoweth all this right well, oftentimes geueth not vnto vs, those thinges which we aske, but those thinges which he himselfe knoweth shal be most profitable for vs. And that he should not seme to delect their mindes vnto whom he writeth, as though he iudged them rude and vnapt vnto thinges spiritual, he numbrieth himselfe also together with those which are troubled with this ignorance: neither did he that falsly, or only for consolation sake. For he himselfe in dede oftentimes prayed that he might go to Rome, and yet God heard him not. He prayed also that the pricke of the flesh might be taken fro him: that is, that his tribulations might be slaked, as Chrysostome in this place interpreteth it. And he receiued an answer of the Lord, that his grace ought to be sufficient vnto him. Moses prayed, that he might enter into the promised land: Jeremy prayed for the health of the people: Abraham prayed for pardon for the Sodomiters: Samuel prayed that Saul might be forgiven: The two Apostles prayed that the one of them might sit on the right hand of Christ, and the other on the left, in the kingdome of God. But these men could not obtaine their requestes, for they knew not what they asked. And to the declaration of this matter he saith, it is wonderfull necessary not to be ignorant of the maner of the primitive church. For at the beginning there was in Christian men an incredible force of the spirit: For some excelled in the word of vnderstanding, some in the worde of knowledge, some in the gift of tonges, some in the gift of healing. Which giftes Paul in y first to the Corinthians & in many other places reckoneth vp. And amongst those giftes also, was the gift of true praying, wherby certaine were assured of such thinges which were to be asked of God, so that they were fully certained, what should be profitable vnto saluation. Of these men some one, when the Church was gathered together, stept forth, and in the name of them all, prayed for those thinges which might be profitable, not after any common or colde maner, but being earnestly picked

pricked forward, and with many teares. Of this thing there remaineth at this day some signe or trace. For when prayers are to be made publickly in the Church, the Deacon with a loud voyce exhorteth the people to pray, sometimes for the church, sometimes for this necessity, & sometimes for the world. Wherefore Paul in this place taketh not the holy spirit for the third person in the Trinity, but for the gift, whereby any of the faithful was stirred up to pray, or for the minde of a godly man so stirred up of the spirit of God. Wherefore Chrysostome thinketh, that the spirit in this place signifieth a spirituall man. Neither thinketh he that he so prayed, as though God were to be taught, but onely that they which were present might know what to aske. The things which Chrysostome hath hitherto noted, are not very unlikely. But here arise two doubtles: the first is, for the Paul amongst the giftes of the spirit, which he in many places maketh mencion of, reckoneth not this kind of gift. But this is easily answered unto. For the gift of prayers may be comprehended in that gift which Paul calleth ἀγάπη, that is, mutuall charity. For we do not onely helpe our brethren by almes, by assistance, by guardship, and by good counsell, but also by daily and fervent prayers. Neither do I thinke that Paul hath made mencion of all the giftes of the holy ghost. For he hath omitted the spirit of feare & of fortitude, of which Esay maketh mencion. It was enough for him to reckon some, by which the forme and maner of the rest might the better be understood. Although in Zachary is mencion also made of the spirit of prayers. For thus it is written in the 12. chap. I will poure upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Ierusalem, the spirit of grace & of prayers: which place yet the Chaldee interpreter turneth, to compassion. For in Hebrew it is, Tehannonim, & in the Chaldee, Vehachamin. The other doubt is, for that this exposition of Chrysostome seemeth to draw into too narrow a compasse, the helpe of the holy ghost, namely, to those onely, which had this peculiar gift: as though those things which are here spoken, are to be understood onely of publique prayers: whereas the wordes of Paul seeme rather to pertaine uniuersally unto all men. For the faithful can not in any place lift up pure hands without the helpe of the spirit of God. Ambrose expoundeth these things more generally. But it is wonderfull how he red thus: It is the spirit which helpeth the infirmity of our prayers: neither doth he onely so rede it, but also so interpreteth it. And our prayers (saith he) are by the spirit two maner of wayes corrected: the one way is, if peradventure we aske thynges hurtfull: the other is, if we aske thynges right and profitable, but before the tyme. The spirit (saith he) commeth, and powreth hymselfe upon our prayers, to couer our unskilfulness, and unwarefulness, and by his motion causeth vs to aske those things which are profitable. Augustine in his 121. epistle unto Proba De orando Deo, at large handleth this place, and demaundeth, whether we thinke that these were so unskilfull of Christian religion, that they were ignorant of the Lordes prayer? They were not undoubtedly. How then were they ignorant what they should aske when as in it are contained, all things that are profitable and to be desired for? He maketh answer, that these men were in great persecutions, and it is very likely, that they oftentimes prayed to be deliuered, which thing might be unto them sometimes profitable, and sometimes hurtfull. Wherefore here is entreated not of all maner of things, but onely of things indifferent: which if we obfayne not, yet is there no cause why any man should be discouraged: for peradventure the things should be hurtfull unto vs, which we beleue should be profitable unto vs: and if we obtaine them, yet ought we not insolently to puffe up our minds. For although these things be geuen vs, yet do they not alwayes conduce to salvation. Those things which are contained in the Lordes prayer are necessary, neither can be amisse wished for. But such things are oftentimes geuen of God in his anger, as unto the Israelites in the desert was geuen flesh with so great wrath, that a great multitude of them perished. So at their request they had a king geuen them, not yet of good will, but in the fury of the Lord. Unto the deuill when he made request was Iob geuen to be bered of him. Christ also permitted the deuils to enter into the heard of swyne. Howbeit Paul could not at his request haue

St. J.

the

A signe of tracke of the old maner after a soite remayneth in
the church.
The holy ghost is here taken for the gift.

Whether Paul make any mencion
of the gift of prayers.

Paul hath not made mencion of all the giftes
of the holy ghost.

In the Lordes prayer are contained all thynges profitable and to be desired for.
Here is en-
treated of asking of thynges indifferent.

The things that are contained in the Lordes prayer can not be ill
wished for.

the pycke of the flesh taken from him. For neither could Christ also obtaine, that the cuppe which was now at hand, might passe away from him. And yet no man dare say, that either the deuill, or the Sugodly Israelites were more acceptable vnto God, then Christ or Paul. But what it is, the spirit to pray for vs with his speakeable signes, Augustine in the same epistle which we haue spoken of, declareth; for he saith, that we in this thyng are diseased of a certayne learned ignorance. For we know not what is profitable for vs. But on the other side the spirit insinuateth it selfe, and causeth vs to sighe for good thynges. And they are called unspeakeable signes, because it is not we our selues that speake or utter that which we aske, but it is the spirit, which stirreth vs vp to aske those thynges. Neither doth the holy ghost, that is, the diuine person, abase it selfe, as though it were lesse then the father, and prayeth, but only it causeth vs to pray. So God is sayd to tempt the Hebrues, that he myght know: that is, to make ether themselves, or others to know. Touching this matter Augustine in his sermon against Adaximianus the Arrian at large entreateth. It was sayde vnto Abraham, now I know that thou fearest the Lord: which is nothyng els, but, I haue shewed, I haue made open, and haue declared that thou fearest the Lord. And Paul to the Galathians: But now forasmuch as ye know God (and he addeth a correctiō) or rather are known of God, that is, taught and illustrated so that he may know. All these places declare, that those things which are done of godly men by the heauenly inspiration, are attributed vnto God and vnto the holy ghost. But there are two most manifest places the one to the Galathians, the other to the Romanes, which if they be compared together, make that most manifest which we affirm. For vnto the Romanes, Paul writeth: we haue not receaued the spirit of bondage agayne vnto feare, but the spirit of the adoption of children, whereby we cry Abba, father. These wordes plainly declare, that we are they which crye. And vnto the Galathians: God sent forth the spirit of his sonne into our hartes crying Abba, father. Here the spirit is said to cry, not vndoubtedly for any other cause, but for that it maketh vs to crye. Neither did the Arrians truly affirme, that Paul saith, that the holy ghost maketh intercession to the sonne. For thereof went they about wickedly to inferre that as they held that the sonne is lesse then the father, so is the holy ghost lesse then the sonne. These are the dreames of heretiques. The son prayeth & maketh intercession for vs; because he is lesse then the father as touchinge his humanity. The spirit maketh intercession: because it maketh vs to pray and to cry. And vnto the Galathians it is expessedly said, that this crying Abba father, is of the holy ghost. Wherefore the Arrians of their owne head and not of the wordes of Paul fained vnto themselves, that the holy ghost calleth vpon the sonne: not that the holy ghost stirreth vs not vp to call vpon Christ the sonne of God. But this thing only Augustine teacheth, that they by the wordes of the Apostle had no cause why they should so greatly boast if they had proued that which they intended, namely, that the sonne is lesse then the father, and the holy ghost lesse then the sonne. Origene so interpreteth these wordes, as though the holy ghost is to vs in our prayers after a sort a Schoolemaster. A Schoolemaster formeth himselfe to the capacity of his children, and nameth the letter first vnto them, that they maye imitate him in the pronounciation of the sounde of the letters: which thing otherwise they could not do of themselves: so the holy ghost insinuateth into vs as into children, what we ought to aske. Out of all these interpretations two thinges we may gather. First that here are confuted the Pelagians which thought, that we are of our owne strengthes able to fulfill the lawe of God. For if we can not so much as know, what thinges are profitable for vs, how can we performe them? And when we heare that the holy ghost maketh intercession for vs, we reiect the Arrians, which went about by these wordes to proue, that the holy ghost is a creature, and lesse then the son. For it is alwayes of necessity that he which prayeth, is lesse then he to whom he cometh to pray. The sonne indeede is sayd to be lesse then the father, because of his humanity: but the holy ghost neuer tooke vpon him any creature in one and the selfe same hypostasis hypostasis, to be made one person with it, wherefore he is therefore sayde to pray, because he maketh vs to pray. Unto all these thinges may be added one thing moze. It cometh to passe sometimes, that godly men, when they are greenously afflicted, do only sighe, neither to their knowledge do they praye vnto God. And yet the holy ghost inwardly both stirreth vp & moderateth these sighes in these men, although they be not ware nor know what is done: which sighes, the father as moued and stirred by by the holy ghost, harkeneth vnto, and vnderstandeth: and granteth the requestes of the spirite. And therefore is the spirite said to serch the hartes, because it considereth that which they themselves when they grone and sighe consider not. For we are sometimes so oppressed with the greatnes of temptacions & weaknes of the flesh, that we can not pray, but the spirite prauely stirreth vp and kindleth these groninges. And these are his prayers. This thinge we feale not, because we our selues are not they which praye: for we are only stirred by by the spirite of God. For although the flesh be oppressed with tribulations, yet the spirit is inwardly strong. Jeremy, David, and Iob, were sometimes occupied in lamentacions and complayntes, so that they after a sort complained of the iudgements of God, as though they were ether not iust, or els so much seuered: and yet notwithstanding was not the spirite extinguished in them. And therefore God imputed not vnto them the sighinges of the flesh, but heard the entent of the spirite. They are called vnspeakable sighes, for that we speake not expessedlye what the spirite asketh. But as touching this sence, the words must thus to be put in order: we are ignorant what we should pray, which yet we ought not to be ignorant of. We pray indeede, but what we aske, we know not: but God sercheth the hartes. He needeth no inquisition. Howbeit he is sayd to serch, for that, that which men desire perfectly and exactly to know, they diligently serch for it: so God because he beholdeth our most hidden thoughtes, is sayd to serch the hartes: other wise he (before we beginne to aske) knoweth what we haue neede of.

The spirit crieth because it maketh vs to crye. Against the Arrians.

Also we know that all thinges worke together to the beste to them that loue God, euen vnto them that are called of purpose. For those whome he knewe before, hee also hath predestinate to bee made like to the image of his sonne, that he might be the first born amongst many brethren. Moreover whom he hath predestinated, them also hath hee called, and whome he hath called, them also hath he iustified, and whome he hath iustified, them also hath he glorified.

Also we know that all thinges, &c.] Forasmuch as the Apostle had begonne to speake of the patient suffering of aduersities, he thought he woulde moze at large prosecute the same, and chiefly by this reason, for that aduersities helpe forward our saluation. And when he had generally declared, that we are holpen by hope and by the intercessio of the spirite, and had before taught, that all creatures grone with vs, now he pronounceth vniuersally, that all thinges worke vnto vs vnto good. He sayth not, that God prouideth that we should not be vexed with aduersities: but teacheth that the nature of them is after a sort inuerterd: as which of themselves are able to engender nothing else but our destruction, but now contrariwise they bring vnto vs commodity & saluation. But this thing do they not of theyr owne force, but by the election and predestination of God. Neither is it to be meruailed at, if we attribute vnto God so greates a force. For we see that physicians sometimes do the like. For they oftentimes expell out of the bodies of men venome or payson, by venemous medicines & hemlock, although otherwise it be present payson, yet being tempered by that art, it is so farre of from hurting, that it also expelleth payson. So afflictions in godly men fight not

The holy Ghost neuer rooke vpon him any creature in one and the selfe same hypostasis. The sighes of the godly in afflictions are hearde.

Examples of the Saintes.

Why they are called vnspeakable sighes.

Why God is sayd to serche hartes.

A simile.

Cap.8 A Commentarie vpon the

An argument taken from the contrary.
Examples.

Unto the elect sing
also are profitable.

The sentence of Paul is to be referred vnto calamities and afflictions.
Why the burthens of Christians are said to be lighte.
Paul entreateth
not here of
of pleasant-
nes but of commodity.
How aduersities pro-fite the godly.

The contrary endeuor of the Deuill.

God in lo-
uing proue-teth vs.

against them: but rather fighte againste the remnants of sinne. And by these wordes of the Apostle we may inferre of the contrary: that vnto those whiche either loue not, or hate God, all thinges turne to theyr destruction: which thyng we knowe came to passe in Judas & in others. For whē he began to hate Christ, no good occasions, or quickening wordes of the Gospell, or power to worke miracles, could any thing profite him. The Jewes also, when they were led about thorough the wilderness, and were adorned of God with excellent and manifold giftes, yet oftentimes became worse and worse. Ambrose thus kytteth together this sentence with that which went before: Although we be enfeated with great ignorance, so that ether we aske those thinges which are not to be asked, or els we out of time aske those thinges whiche are to be asked: yet oughte not that therfore to be a let vnto vs, when as by the benefite of the spirite thorough the mercy of God all thinges worke vnto vs vnto god. Howbeit this is to be noted, that the verbe, συμψα, that is, worketh together, may be taken in the singular number, and be referred vnto the spirite, namelpe, that the spirite worketh and conuerteth all thinges to god to those whiche loue God. And so this word, πᾶσι, that is, All, shalbe the accusatiue case. But the receaued sence is more playne, & it is a phrase of speach much vsed of the Attike writers, to ioyne vnto nouns newter being in y plurall number, a verbe of y third person singular. Augustine De correptione & gratia so largely taketh this sentence, y he doubted not to write that vnto holy men sinnes also are profitable. Which saying indeede although I will not deny but to be true, yet wil I not easely graunt that it agreeth with the sentence of Paul. For both those thinges whiche are already spoken and whiche shall after ward be spoken, pertaine to calamities and afflictions. But the same Augustine else where more diligently weighing this place, vnderstandeth by it the whole burthe of grieues and tribulations, which he sayth is by this meanes made the lighter, for that we loue God, for he which loueth any man from the hart, so for his sake beareth calamities, that he is nothing grieved at them. Jacob for Rachel serued 14. yeares: and that so long space, by reason of his loue, seemed but short. And this is it, that Christ sayth, that his burthe is light, and his yoke pleasant: not that those thinges whiche the Christians both do and suffer, are not hard and difficile, but bicause, by reason of the loue which they beare vnto God, all thinges be they neuer so hard shalbe pleasant vnto the. But Paul here entreateth not of that kinde of good thinge, which is light and pleasant, but to which is profitable vnto the godly vnto saluation. And if thou demaund how aduersities are profitable vnto the godly, I answer bycause God by the auocaterh his fro the delightes and pleasures of this world, and from themselves. For such are we thorough the fault of nature and naturall corruption, that we can not without some hurt of ours be diuyn vnto those thinges whiche are in very dede good. On the contrary part, the deuill labourerh as much as lieth in him by tribulations and aduersities to draw vs from God, which thing he oftentimes bringeth to passe in the vngodly: but in the elect the prouidence of God overcommeth his malicious purpose: farther by these afflictions & calamities, sin which perpetually fro our birth cleaueth fast vnto vs is dayly more & more diminished. The Apostle saith, that this cometh to passe vnto them that loue God, for that they are first loued of God. For Iohn testifieth that we prouent not the loue of God: for no man can loue him, vnles he be first loued of him. It may peradventure seme wonderfull why Paul sayd, Vnto them that loue, and not rather vnto the that beleue, especially when as at other times he attributeth iustification vnto sayth. But this is to be knowen, that in this place is not entreated of iustification. For he writeth of the suffering of aduersities. The cause whereof if thou wilt serch from the bottome then must thou go vnto grace and vnto the holy ghost. Of grace and the holy ghost streight way springeth sayth: by whiche after we haue embraced the goodnes and promises of God, without any delaye springe hope and charite. Wherefore Paul tooke that thinge which is in aduersities next

next toynd vnto sojettude. For streight way so sone as we loue God, for hys sake we patiently beare all aduersities. Wherefore he declared not the chiefe and principall cause, but the nicest. And to the ende we should not stay there he streight way adioyned the roote and fountaine of that good thing. For he saith Vnto those which are called according to purpose.] Farther he therefore maketh mencion of loue, to put a difference betwene true faith, and a fayned, counterfeite, and dead faith, which is no faith at all. For some boast of faith, which bere no loue at all vnto God: who do not only deceiue others, but also chiefly themselves. That is, true faith (which Paul describeth to the Galath.) which worketh through loue. For alwaies of true faith springeth charity. For it is not possible, y the true and chiefe good thing being certainly known, should not be beloued and earnestly desired. He that seeth not the connerion and order of these vertues, seeth nothing: for so straightly are they knit together, that euen as of true faith of necessity followeth charity, so againe on the other side he which wanteth faith, must of necessity abhorre God and hate him: so far is it of that he can loue him. But this is not to be passed ouer, y euen y most holiest men, so long as they liue here, haue a very slender loue towardes God. For oftentimes they be drawen backward by lustes of the flesh, and that is the cause why iustification can not be ascribed vnto it. For if we should leane vnto our loue, soasmuch as it is very weak, we should continually stagger. But God will haue his promise to be firme and sure. But thou wilt object, that our faith also is weake. I graunt it is so, and therefore we leane not vnto faith as it is a worke: but we haue an eye vnto the mercy of God & his promise which by faith we embrace, and so our iustification hangeth not of the worke of faith, but of his object. Howbeit in this infirmity of our loue towardes God, thys thing haue the godly which the vngodly haue not, that as sone as they haue fallen they straightway run vnto God. They are sorry, they repent, & by y meanes prefer Christ only before all thinges, so that for his sake they offer themselves to suffer all manner of thinges. But the vngodly alwayes sticke in the mire: they re turne not earnestly vnto God: but become euery day worse & worse. When Paul writeth did autem, that is, we know, he meaneth not a slight or slender knowledge, but a firme, certaine, and sound knowledge. For none that is a Christian ought to be in doubt of the last ende of his state. The state of the godly is to the better, but the state of the vngodly is to destruction. We after a sort are as players in a commedie: where in although the beginning & middle part be troublesome: yet it is with a ioyfull & pleasaunt ende concluded. But the vngodly are as players in a Tragedy, which although at the beginning it seme godly and gorgeous, yet hath it an horrible and lamentable ende. This diuersity noted Abraham in the Gospell: for vnto the riche man burning in the flames of fire, he sayd: Remember that thou in thy lyfe tyme receyuedst good thynges, but Lazarus euill. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if thinges do now go otherwise.

Which are called accordyng to purpose.] These wordes declare who they be which loue God. And he bringeth a reason why vnto them all things turne vnto good: for that it is mete and conuenient that all things do seruiue vnto the counsell, predestination, and election of God: that whomsoever he hath decreed to saue, him must all creatures, whatsoener they be, of necessity helpe. He bleth this word purpose, which at other times also in this matter he oft bleth. For in the next chapter he saith: That the election mought abyde according to the purpose of God. And vnto the Ephe. the 1. chap. Which hath predestinated vs accordyng to purpose, and grace: by the force wherof he worketh all thynges accordyng to the counsell of hys wyll. And in the latter to Tim. the first chap. Which hath called vs wyth hys holy calling, not accordyng to our works but accordyng to purpose and grace. And by these wordes he semeth to note a certain distinction of callings. For y one is outward, which is by y holy scriptures & sermons: y other inward, wherby y mind is moued by y instinct of God: which inward calling also is not of one sort. For there is one during but for a time, an other of efficacy and abiding. The Apostle whē he saith: accordyng to purpose, defineth calling.

Gal. iii.

lyng,

Loue is not the chiefe cause that maketh vs patiently to suffer aduersities, but the nicest cause. Charity distinguisheth the true faith from the false. The connerion of faith and charity. The most holiest men haue but a slender loue towardes God. Why vnto loue can not be ascribed iustification. Difference betwene the godly & the vngodly.

A testimony of Abraham.

All thinges ought to be seruisable vnto the counsell of predestination.

Two manner of callings. Here is to be understood a mighty and constant calling.

An error of Chrysostom

Whereof Chrysostom was afraid

Purpose in this place
ought to be referred vn
to God.

Predestination depē deth not of our will, but of the purpose of God

The purpose of God
noteth firm-
nes.

Whypose
saith vnto workes foresene.

God predestinateth
not onely
the end but also the meanes.
A simili-
tude.

Four things to be noted.

The good
meanes are not geuen
of God by chance but by predesti-
nation.

lyng, and contradeth it to that strong and constant impulsio: Chrysostome in this place thinketh, that this worde purpose, is not to be referred vnto God, but vnto the will and counsell of them which are called: that the Apostle should not seeme to at- tribute so much vnto the election of God. The Jewes (saith he) and Ethnikes whē they hard these things, made a stirre and demaunded, what should let but that they also might be saued. Chrysostome seemeth as often as he entreated of the election or predestina- tion of God, to haue bene somewhat afeard, lest some occasion should be geuen vn- to men to line idly and wickedly, or to lay y faulte of their wicked actes vpo God: although he sometimes goeth plainly inough to worke, & ascribeth all our good thinges whatsoeuer they be vnto the grace of God. And this place he thus goeth a- bout to extenuate, as though God in dede calleth and electeth men, but yet those on- ly, which either already haue, or hereafter shall haue a purpose and will to obey: but herein he exceedingly erreth, in that he denieth that this is the purpose of God. For the wordes which follow plainly teach, that this is wholly to be referred vnto predestination. For it followeth, Whome he foreknew, those also hath he predestinated.] And in the next chapter it is written: According to election, that the purpose of God should abide. By which wordes we see, y predestination dependeth not of our wil, but of the purpose of God. Which selfe thing is declared vnto the Ephe. where it is written, That we are predestinate accordyng to purpose, by the force whereof God woorketh all things ac- cordyng to his counsell and wyll. In which place it cannot be denied, but that he vn- derstandeth the purpose of God: and much lesse can that be denied in the first chap. vnto Tim. where it is thus written, God hath called vs wyth hys holy calling, not by our workes, but by his purpose, and by grace. Which selfe thing Paul teacheth in the first chap. vnto the Ephe. For he sayth: That we are predestinate into the adoption of the sonnes of God accordyng to his good pleasure. And Christ saith: I geue thanks vnto thee O holy father for that thou hast hidden these thynges from the wyse, and hast reue- led them to infantes, because it hath so pleased thee. And Paul bleth this word purpose, to declare a certaintie: for that the thinges which God by his prouidence hath de- creed, are stable and firme. But his minde is to proue that men ought not to afflict themselves, or to take it in ill part, if they haue tribulations layd vpon them, for that it shall turne vnto them vnto good, especially to thē that be predestinate vnto everlasting saluation. Wherefore it is very plaine both by the wordes which fol- low, & by the entent of Paul, that purpose, is in this place to be referred vnto God, & not vnto those which are called. Ambrose in dede denieth not, but that it is y pur- pose of God. Howbeit (being moued, as I thinke, with the same reaso y Chrysostom was) he saith, y God calleth & predestinateth, whō he knoweth shal beleue, & shalbe apt for him, and deuoute. But we ought not to thinke, that the election and pre- destination of God depend of workes foresene. It is in dede certaine, neither can we deny it, that those whom God hath predestinate, shall one day if age permitte, beleue, and be deuoute and apt. For God shall geue it vnto them: for he predesti- nateth also the meanes whereby we shall at the length come vnto the ende. So we also after that we haue determined to vse any pece of timber to some vse of an house, do fashion and hew it to that forme, which may best serue for the accompli- shing of the worke which we haue to do. But here are fower things diligently to be noted of vs: first, that the will of beleuing, and the purpose and counsell of li- uing holily, which shall at the length be in those which are elected, neither sprin- geth of themselves, nor also naturally is cleauing vnto them. For they are the giftes of God, and not the endowmentes of nature. Neither can any man of his owne accord attaine vnto them. For what hast thou (saith Paul) that thou hast not receaued? But if thou haue receaued it, why boastest thou as though thou haddest not receaued it? But if they be geuen of God (as vndoubtedly they are) then followeth it of necessity, that they are not done by chaunce, or rashely, but by the counsel and predestination of God. Wherefore these thinges also are pertaining vnto predesti- nation. For euen as God predestinateth his to eternall life, so also predestinateth hethem to good counsels, vnto holy workes, and vnto the right vse of the giftes of God

God. And hereof followeth that which is secondly to be noted, that our good purpose, or faith, or good workes for sene can not be the causes of predestination: for so should we neuer come to an end. For sithen those thinges (as we haue sayd) are of predestination, and not of our selues, it may againe be demaunded, why God would geue them vnto this man rather then to that man. Where if thou answerest (as many do) because God foresaith that this man will vse those good giftes well, and the other not: againe will arise as waighty a question touching the selfe same good vse. For, seing that also is a gift of God, why should it by the predestination of God more be geuen to this man, then to that? And by this meanes there shalbe no end of enquiring, vnles we will at the last sayne, that there is some good thing found in vs, which we haue not of God: which thing to affirme is not only absurd, but also impious. Thirdly of this thing we ought to be fully perswaded, that euen as good workes for sene can not be the causes of predestination, so also are they by predestination not geuen vnto men, to be causes of the chiefe good thing, that is, of the felicity whereunto we are predestinate: they are in dede meanes whereby God bringeth vs vnto eternall life, but therefore are they not causes, for that blessing is geuen freely, and we are by the mere mercy of God predestinate vnto it. Lastly, we ought to hold, that these workes are not alwayes for sene in the predestination of God. For many infants being taken away before they come to ripe age, by the predestination of God attaine vnto eternall life, who yet should neuer haue had any good workes. For God foresaw that they should dye being infants. Which thing very euidently proueth, that the foreknowledge of good workes is not to be put as the cause of predestination: for a iust and sure effect can neuer want his true cause. Augustine entreating of this place, expessedly sayth, that purpose, in this place is not to be referred vnto the elect, but vnto God. And which is more diligently to be noted, writing against the two epistles of the Pelagians, in his 2. booke to Bonifacius towarde the ende, he saith, That the Pelagians at the length confessed, that the grace of God is necessary, whereby may be holpen our good purpose: but they denied that the helpe of that grace is geuen vnto them that resist: which is farre wyde from the truth. For at the beginning every one of vs resisteth the pleasure & wyll of God: neither should we euer assent to hym when he calleth vs, vnles he should come and helpe vs wyth his grace. And he addeth, that the Pelagians in this place which we haue now in hand referred not Purpose, vnto God, but vnto those which are called. Howbeit I dare not therefore accuse Chrysostome to be a Pelagian: for he at other times (as Iohn sayd) ascribed whatsoever good thing we haue, vnto the grace of God, and plainly confesseth originall sinne, both which things the Pelagians denied. Howbeit it is manifest by the wordes of Augustine, that the Pelagians and Chrysostome agreed in the exposition of this place. Augustine in the selfe same booke confesseth, that our purpose is holpen by the grace of God. But yet not in such sort, as though it were of our selues and not geuen of God, And for confirmation of this sentence, he citeth that which is written in the latter to the Corinthians, the 8. chapter: I geue thanks vnto God, which hath geuen the same endeuour for you in the harte of Titus. These wordes sufficiently declare, that the good endeuours and purposes which we fele in our mynds are sent of God. He citeth also the 77. Psalme, I sayd, I haue now begonne, and this chaunging commeth of the right hande of the hyghest. But I do not much trust vnto this testimony: for out of Hebrew verity is had a farre other sence. By all these things it is manifest how this word, purpose, ought to be taken. And this our saying, do those wordes which follow euidently proue.

Whome he hath foreknownen, those also hath he predestinate.] Paul by this gradation teacheth, that the purpose of God is firme. For he holdeth it as certaine, that as many as are predestinate, shall also come vnto eternall glory: which is the end of predestination. I like that very well which Chrysostome sayth that here hence is excluded all violence. For the election of God bringeth no violence either vnto the predestinate, or vnto the reprobate, but that in no case taketh away the certainty of predestination. For none that is truly a Christian and

Good
workes
for sene
are not causes of pre-
destination.

Good workes are not causes of eternall felicitie.

Good workes cannot alwayes be foreseene of God in them that shalbe saued.
The fore-
knowledge
of good wor-kes cannot be the cause of predestina-
tion.

The Pelagi-
ans at the length confessed that our purpose is holpen by grace.
Whether
grace be geuen vnto the
that resist it.
The Pelagi-
ans tooke
this word,
purpose, as Chrysostome
bid.
Chrysostome
defended the suspicion of the heretike of the Pelagi-
ans.
Good ende-uours and purposes are sent vnto vs
of God.

A gradation.

Glory the end of predestina-
tion.
Violence is
excluded.
Certainty is bideth.

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

None that is godly ought to be in doubt whether he be predesti-
nate or no.
The argument of Paul concerning the certainty of predestina-
tion.

They which com-
maund vs perpetually
to doubt, do not wth th<sup>e</sup> efficacy exhort to patience.
We must not for eue-ry manner of pretence be spoiled of a necessary good thing.
Childrens
play.

The prede-stination of God cannot erre from his ende.
Of wh<sup>at</sup> it thing con-
sisteth the confidence of saluation
It is not our parte to prescribe vnto God the meanes
whereby to be led vnto
saluation.
Here is en-
treated of
the fore-
knowledge
which is
toynd with appo-bation.

in dede, godly ought to doubt whether he pertayn vnto the election of God or no: For if we be in doubt touching y<sup>e</sup> matter, how can we cal God, our father: or with what confidence can we pray? And as touching this place, Paul's argument shoul<sup>d</sup> be weake and perswade nothing, if we ought to be in doubt of our saluation. Paul admonisheth the Romanes quietly to suffer tribulations, for that they should turne vnto them vnto good. Neither was he content with an argument taken of the loue which we beare towarde God: for that was weake, for no man can put confidence in his owne worke. And therefore he goeth to predestination, for that it is firme, and can not be deceaued. And it is all one as if he had sayd: they which are predestinate of God, do not only beleue in hym, and loue hym, but also vnto them all thinges, yea though they be aduersities turne to good. We are predestinate of God, wherefore be of good comfort: these calamities will bring vnto you some commodity, and will helpe forward your saluation. In this argument if a man should doubt of the minor, or second part, and should suspect it not to be true, what profite then shall the persuation of Paul bring? It should be a weake argument and conclude nothing. This thing vndoubtedly do they which commaund vs perpetually to doubt whether we be of the number of the elect or no. But they pretend the endeour of an holy life: namely, that men should not begin to liue dissolutely and securely, & loosely. But they ought not for the retaining still of some perticular good thing, to spoile vs of this most presente and moste necessary good thing. This is childrens play, which when they will by stealth snatch away any thing from their fellow, bid him looke aside to behold some other thyng. But we, if we will deale wisely, and not suffer our selues to be deceiued, shall still retain either commodity. For first let vs not doubt of the goodnes of God towarde vs, neither let vs be vncertaine whether we be elected and predestinate. Farther beyng nowe certaine of our saluation, let vs be more & more stirred by and kindled by so great a benefit of God, lest liuing wickedly, we be found ingrate towarde him, we must not so remedy the one part, that we forgo the other which is most of all necessary. We must not to the ende the security of the flesh should not lead vs away to vices, be in doubt of the predestination of God: for it is certaine, & of Paul set forth as certaine, vnles we will say, that he when he perswadeth these thynges, doth but trifle and loose his labour. Augustine in his booke De Correp. & gratia, saith: If the predestination of God be deceaued, they which are predestinate shal perysh: but they peryshe not, therefore predestination is not deceaued. Againe, If it (sayth he) be deceaued, God is overcome of the sinne of man, so that that whiche he hath predestinate can not come to passe. But the power of God is not overcome of our sinne. Wherefore predestination is not deceaued. It is the point of vngodly men and of scoymers to say, that God is deceiued in his counsels. For so dallieth Lucianus in Timone, that when the temple of Castor and Pollux was smitten with lightening, it erred much, for that other wise it was sent of Iupiter vpon Anaxagoras. Wherefore a godly mind ought to be perswaded of two thinges: First, that the predestination of God cannot erre from his ende appointed: Secondly, that we assure our selues, that we pertayne vnto the number of the predestinate. Which thing although it cannot be comprehended by naturall knowledge, yet may it be holden by the certainty of hope and of sayth. And soasmuch as we heare out of Paul, that God himselfe worketh our saluation, we ought to permit vnto his wisdom, to vse in bringing vs to saluation what instruments please him. For it is not our part to prescribe vnto hym, whether he ought to lead vs by aduersities, or by prosperities, so that he bring vs to saluation. Farther sayng Paul hath shewed vnto vs so large and certayne a foundation of our saluation, we ought not onely to geue thanks for that so great goodnes, but also with all our endeour to labour that we be not founde ingrate towarde hym.

Whome he forknew, those also hath he predestinate. The foreknowledge wherof the Apostle here speaketh, although it betoken knowledge, yet it signifieth not a common and generall knowledge, but such a knowledge which is toynd wth fauour faunour and approbation, wherby God doth elect certaine, and count them for his. This kinde of knowledge is denied vnto the wicked: for the Lord will say vnto those folish virgins, I know you not. Which selfe thing shall also be said vnto the wicked, which haue prophesied & wrought miracles in the name of Christ: not doubtles that God knoweth not either them, or their workes: but for that he approueth them not, neither acknowledgeth them for his. Of this knowledge Christ sayth in John: I know my shepe. Christ in dede knew other men which were not his shepe, but he embraced them not with a singuler knowledge, neither sed he them. And Paul to Timothie saith: The Lord knoweth who are his. And Dauid in the Psalme: The Lord knoweth the way of the iust. For so great is the perspicuity of the mind of God, that it nedeth not for the knowledge of things, to wayte vntil they be extant in nature. For God no lesse seeth those things also which are not, then if they were now extant. Therfore Chrysostome very wel saith: That men in things present take counsell, but vnto God those things towards vs were long since approued and despised. It semeth yf foreknowledge is here no amplier nor largelier the take predestination. For Paul in descending from the generall word, to the speciall, should not haue sayd: Whome he foreknew, those also hath he predestinate: neither, whom he predestinated, those also hath he called: neither, whome he called, those also hath he iustified. For by this meanes some may be foreknown which are not predestinate, and some predestinate which are not called: and some also called which are not iustified, and last of all some iustified which shall not be glorified, which thing yet is not so. For the Apostles intent is to persuaide, that al things shall turne vnto vs to good, and that we shall without all doubt be glorified. This he proueth by y that we are called. But if, to be called, should extend farther then to be glorified, his argument should conclude nothing. And if we may of calling rightly inferre iustification and glorification, we may also of foreknowledge inferre predestination. Wherfore by this place can not be proued that sond deuise of the scholemen, which say y only the damned and reprobate are foreknown. For (say they) forasmuch as they are not predestinate, neither haue any title proper vnto them, they must nedes be left vnder the common name of foreknowledge: and God only foreknoweth their euill workes and damnation, and doth not predestinate them vnto those thynges: but of this matter we wil moze at large speake in an other place. But as Origene in this place hath noted, y Scripture in no place maketh mention, y wicked men are foreknown of God. Wherfore sithen the scripture so speaketh not, & foreknowledge in this place is not taken moze largely then predestination, let vs leaue vnto them their sond deuise, especially seing Peter in his first chap. of his first epistle, saith of Christ, that he was foreknown. Hereby it is manifest: that that word, forasmuch as it is attributed vnto Christ, pertaineth not only vnto the reprobate. For Christ is the hed of all the elect. Now the Apostle semeth to speake after the maner of men. For they first chuse vnto themselves those things which please them, and then do they appoint them to some certaine and assured endes, and beyng so determined, they prepare and adorne them, and make them mate vnto the end appointed. As if a man light vpon faire godly stones, first he chuseth them out, & appointeth them for some building, when he hath so done, he causeth them to be polished and helued of some workeman, and to be brought to some beautifull forme. But how the holy scriptures vse these words predestination and foreknowledge it is not hard to gather out of other places. In the Acts of the Apostles the 7 chap it is witten. Him when ye had receaued by the bandes of the wicked, ye crucified and slew, being deliuered by the determinate counsell and foreknowledge of God. Here the scripture ioyneth together determinate counsell and foreknowledge. And in the 4. chap. Herode and Pilate gathered themselves together to do, whatsoener thine hand and thy counsell had predestinate before to be done. Here also predestination is ioyned together with the counsell of God. And Peter in his first epistle and first chapter, Vnto the dispersed thorough Pontus, Galatia, Asia, and Bithinia, being elect according to foreknowledge. Here also foreknowledge is ioyned with electio. And in the same chapter it is witten that of Christ, whiche I before alledged, namelpe, That God seeth things to come as if they were present.

Here to foreknow, extendeth no farther then to predestinate.

Here to call, extendeth no farther then to iustifie and to glorify. I sayned deuise of the Scholemen.

This word foreknown, agreeth with Christ and therefore it pertaineth not onely to the reprobate & similitude.

Now the scripture vseth these wordes.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

For knowledge and foredeter-mination
comprehēde
not onely
men, but also thinges &
wozkes.
Predestina-
tion consis-teth not in time but fro
eternity.
The end of
predestina-
tion is, that we should be vnto like
Christ.
By what meanes we are made firmable vnto
Christ.

Wordes of the ungodly abusing
predestina-
tion.
We are not onely predestinate to blessednes
but also to an holy life.
Predestina-
tion to good wozkes
pertaineth
not to all which shal-
be saued.

We are redemed with the most precious bloud of Christ, as of a lambe immaculate, which was foreknown before the foundations of the world were layd. Neither is this to be omitted, that foreknowledge and foredetermination pertaineth not only vnto men, but also vnto thinges, and vnto wozkes. Paul in his first to the Corinthians, We speake (sayth he) wisdom amongst the perfect, which wisdom God hath predestinated to our glory. And vnto the Ephesians, We are created in Christ to good wozkes, which God hath prepared, that we should walke in them. And such good wozkes hath God prepared, by his foreknowledge and predestination. But there can be no time assigned of his predestination: for, it (as we haue sayd) was before the foundations of the world were layd, and before all eternity of time. But to what end we are predestinate the Apostle expresth in these wozdes.

To be made conformable to the image of his sonne. ] To be conformable vnto his image, is to be like vnto it. Wherefore sithen Christ is the perfect image of the father, when we are made conformable vnto him, we approach vnto the similitude of God. But in what thing consisteth this conformity vnto Christ, I thinke is thus to be vnderstand. Christ is now in gloze, and sitteth at the right hand of the father, and is happy, blessed, and immortal: vnto the selfe same felicity are we also predestinate. Farther God hath so ordeyned, that that thinge is now in this life after a sort begonne in vs, which shall afterward in an other life be accomplished. Wherefore we are also made conformable vnto Christ by good wozkes, holy maners, & innocēcy of life. Farther euē as he whilest he liued in this world, was alwayes conuersant in the crosse and in tribulations: so also must we for his sake suffer crosses and tormentes. And as these things wrought in Christ to felicity and gloze, so also shall they worke in vs. For so Paul writeth of him vnto the Philippians. For which cause also God hath exalted him, & geuen vnto him a name, which is aboue all names, that in the name of Iesus enery knee should bowe. And of vs Paul sayth in this place, Vnto them that loue God, that is, to them that are predestinate and called according to purpose, all thinges turne to good. Of this conformity vnto Christ by purenes of life it is spokē in an other place. Be not ye made like vnto this world, but be renewed in newnes of your minde. And to the end we should be made like vnto Christ, he would by incarnation be made like vnto vs. Wherefore we must endeavour our selues (as Paul sayth to the Ephesians) That in vntye of sayth, and in knowledge of the truth of God, we maye meete him into a perfect man, and into the measure of the age of the fulnes of Christ, that we alwayes wauer not like children. Farther this place teacheth, that we are not only predestinate vnto eternall life, but also vnto good wozkes in this life, namely, that we should be like vnto Christ. For Paul playnly writeth to the Ephesians, that we are created in Christ in good wozkes, which God hath prepared, that we should walke in them. Wherefore they are sorely deceaued, & out of theyr wittes, which are not ashamed to utter these blasphemous wordes, If I be predestinate, I shal be saued howsoeuer I liue: for these miserable men se not, that we are predestinate not only vnto eternall felicity, but also to behaue our selues purely and holily in this life. For predestination pertaineth both to the end, and also to those thinges by which we come vnto the end. Which thing yet I would not haue so to be vnderstand, as though without these meanes no man is predestinate vnto eternall life. For the infantcs of the godly which dye in that age, and are saued, are doubtles predestinate vnto eternall life, when as yet not withstanding by reason of age they coulde not attayne to good wozkes. But this we ought to hold, that the giftes of God are not geuen by chaunce, but vpon good & sure consideration. Wherefore sithen good wozkes are certayne giftes of the goodnes of God, they happen not without predestination. Wherefore predestination pertaineth as well to the good thinges of this life, as also to eternall life. This sayth Paul is done of God to the honoz of Christ.

That he might be the first borne amongst many brethern. ] So good is the almighty and most louing God, that hauing a sonne, and such a sonne in whome he was well pleased; yet he would adopt vnto him selfe many other sonnes out of our kind, amongst whome Christ should be the first borne. Alwayes the prerogative of the first borne was great, both before the Law, as it is manifest in the Patriarches, and also after ward vnder the law. The first borne had two parts of the inheritance, and succeeded the father in the administration of the family. God above all things loveth order: wherefore soasmuch as his will was, that the families of men should be governed orderly, he appointed a father, to be as it were a Lawfull Lord of all things pertaining to the household: Who if peradventure he should dye, or fall sick, or thorough age be weake, his will was that the government of the family should come vnto the eldest sonne. Neither ought that to moue vs, that Aristotle in his Ethikes teacheth, that brethren exercise amongst them selues a political government, and that amongst them is a certayne forme of a common welth. For he vnderstandeth these things, whilst the father yet liueth, and governeth his family himselfe. For so long brethren are amongst themselves all of like power. Or peradventure the Grecians attributed not so much vnto the first borne, as did the Hebrewes, which at this day also we see is not done in many places, wherbeit it is sufficient in one word to note, that the first borne ought to be preferred before the rest of the brethren, not to exercise tyranny agaynst them, but to govern, to admonish, to helpe, to sustayn and to succor them. All which things Christ hath so performed for his brethren that for them he suffered death, and therefore, as Paul sayth vnto the Colossians, He is the chiefe amongst all his brethren. But in that he is sayd to be our first begotten brother, that cometh by the dispensation of the nature which he took vpon him: for other wise as touching his diuine nature, he is the onely begotten. We are therefore called his brethren, because we are adopted by grace. And this by the right of Christ shall then at the length be notable and honorable, when we beinge wholly renewed shall be made partakers of his glorie. Wherefore it is our due both to geue thanks vnto God, and also exceedingly to reioyce with our selues, that we haue gotten such and so great a brother and as touching that which is remainyng, to deliuer our selues wholly vnto him to be ordered and instructed. And sithen we know, that he is set forth vnto vs as an image, whereunto we ought to conforme our selues, we ought alwayes to haue him before our eyes, as the rule, and example of our life.

VVhorne he predestineth, those also hath he called: whome he called, those also hath he iustified: whome he iustified, those also hath he glorified. In this chaine is neuer a linke of woordes or of merites. For here we see that all things are done freely, and of the mere mercy of God. For who hath geuen vnto hym first, and it shall be rendred vnto him agayne? All things are of hym, by hym, and in hym: as Paul saith. Here are we taught what are the principles of the Church, & the grounds of the people of God. The Church is a fellowship not gathered together by humane reason, but assembled by the foreknowledge, predestination & calling of God. So they haue a respect not to any successions of nature, or prerogations, or conditions of places: for they are distributed only by the judgement and good will of God. After calling, straight way followeth iustification. Betwene which, soasmuch as nothing can be set, but only faith, therefore by it we are worthily sayd to be iustified: not that it is the cause of our iustification: but for that it is an instrument, whereby we apprehend the calling exhibited vnto vs by the promises. But the proper causes of iustification are these which Paul here assigneth, namely, foreknowledge, predestination, and vocation. And herein consisteth our iustification to haue our sinnes forgiven vs, and to be reconciled vnto God. But good woordes, holy life, the renning of strengths, and the giftes of the holy ghost do after ward follow and pertaine to glorification, whereunto also pertaine those things, which we waite for to be geuen vs in an other life. Augustine noteth, not all those which by any way are called, but only those which are called according to the purpose of God and according to predestination:

The goodness of God in adopting vs.

The prerogative of the first borne.

Christ hath performed towarde vs the part of a first begotten brother. Christ according to his diuine nature is the onely begotten.

In this chapte is neuer a linke of woordes or merites. The principles of the church.

Causes of iustification

Holy life & good woordes pertaine to glorification.

with

with a calling (I say) mighty and strong, whereby they are utterly changed. Otherwise many are called, but few are chosen.

Each glorified.] He speaketh in the time past: both for that a great part of that glory is already given us: and also for that we by hope holde that which is remaining: which before God is all one as if we had already receaved it. The Greke Scholies vnto euery part adde this particle, Of purpose: after this manner. Whom he foreknew of purpose, he hath predestinate of purpose, he hath called of purpose: that no absurdity should follow. These men suspect, that God might easely seme to be an accepter of persons, vnles he predestinate and call men by the foreknowledge of works. But there was no need to be afraid of any such thing. For here is no debt spoken of. But there can be no acceptation of persons, where no debt is. Further God findeth in men no persons, but giveth to euery one such as he will. For we are all of one & the selfe same lombe, & in all partes in one and the selfe same matter corrupted and vitiated: here is no difference of persons. For that thing only is in euery man, which God himselfe predestinaterh to euery man. Moreover we haue before sufficiently declared, & this word, of Purpose, ought not to be referred vnto those which are called, but vnto God which calleth. Ambrose saith, That to call is nothing els, then to helpe one which already thinketh vpon sayth. Which sentence can not as touching those which are called be vniuersally true. For what thought Paul of & sayth of Christ, when he persecuted the Christians? And Paul himself in his 2. epistle to the Cor. saith, that we are not apt to thinke any thing of our selues, as of our selues. Wherefore we ought not to hold, that the beginnings of sayth are of our selues: as though we first beginne, and then God after ward followeth with his helpe. Ambrose in this place addeth, That God pricketh forward them, whome he knoweth shall hear him. In which place we must beware, that we hold not, that the hearing of sayth hath his beginning of our selues. Wherefore in the Actes of the Apostles it is written of the woman that sold silkes, that God opened her hart, toarken vnto those thinges which were spoken of Paul. And that this is the gift of God, David saith, when he thus prayed, Incline myne hart to thy testimonies. And Salomon in his Proverbs saith: The hart of the king is in the hand of God, and he shall moue it which way so euer pleaseth him. Which thing as it is there said of kings, so ought it to be vniuersally vnderstand of all men. For Jeremy sayth in his 24. chapter, I will geue vnto them a hart to know me: and I will be vnto them a God. And in his 31. chapter, I will geue (saith the Lord) my lawes into their hartes, and will ingraue them in their bowels. And Ezechiel in his 36. chap., I will take away from them their stony hart, and will geue vnto them a fleshy hart. And Esay saith, They shall be all taught of God. Which thing Iohn also mencioneth. Ambrose addeth moreover: As touching the rest whome God hath not foreknownen, he hath no care: for that he hath not foreknownen them to this grace. But if they beleue, they are chosen for a time, for that they seme to be good: lest righteousness should seme to be without reward, but they neuer abide till the tyme of glory come, as Iudas Iskariot, or those 72. which when they were elected, yet taking occasion of offence, departed from our sauour. By these thinges we may know that predestination is not common vnto all: and that there are many which seme to be elected, for that they are called for a time, when as yet in very deedes they pertain not vnto the elect. This gradation of the Apostle is doubtles a golden chapne, wherewith men & shalbe made blessed are drawen vp into heauen, a much more excellent chapne, then is that of Homer, wherewith Iupiter is sayned to gouern the whole worlde. This chapne shall make vs inuincible against all aduersities. For how can we but be well contented, when we see that our saluation is of God by so many most excellent meanes procured? How can we but reioyce for so great felicity?

There can be no acceptation of persons where no debt is. God putteth persons into vs, other wise we are equal in the masse of lombe.

The beginnings of sayth are not of our selues as though God helpe us when we are thinking of sayth. God opened the hart of the woman that sold silke: to geue heed to that which Paul sayde.

Predestination is not common vnto all. Many seme to be elected which yet are called but for a time. A golden chapne wherewith we are drawen into heauen.

What shall we then say of these thinges? If God be on our side who who can be agaynst vs: who spared not his owne sonne but deliuered him for vs all, howe shall he not wyth hym geue vs all thinges also?

If God be on our side, who can be agaynst vs? God is on our side, not with a wauering wil, but with a constant and firme will, as a father for his child: to defend vs fro all maner of euils. Wherefore no creature can put vs beside his felicity, which God by his predestinatio hath appointed for vs. Augustine in his 16. sermo of the wordes of the Apostle, saith, that God is on our side, who he hath foreknowen, who he hath predestinated, who he hath called, who he hath iustified, & who he hath glorified. When we yet were not, he predestinated us: when we turned backward, he called us: when we were wicked, he iustified us: when we were vnpure, he glorified us. Wherefore he which will fight agaynst vs, taketh in hand to warre agaynst God, and kicketh agaynst the prycke. Augustine moreover there admonisheth, That of these fine degrees here set forth we should consider, how many we haue already obteyned of God, and how many are behynde to be obteyned: and that we should geue thanks for them which we already haue obteyned, and as touching those which we yet want, to count God our debter: not in dede in such sort a debter, as though they are due vnto vs by our merites: but for that he hath bound hymselfe vnto vs by his promises. Chrysostome in this place sayth: Why askest thou O Paul, who can be agaynst vs? The whole world ryseth vp agaynst vs: the Deuill, tyrannes, they of our owne householde, our kinssolkes, our citizens, and the flesh. It is true (saith he) that all those thynges fight agaynst vs, but they shall not preuaile: yea rather they shall aduance our saluation. Iob was by temptations, by his wyfe, & friends, by the Chaldeans, wyndes, and fire from heauen made of more fame then he was before.

Who spared not his owne sonne, but deliuered him for vs all. Hitherto it hath bene proued, that all thinges shall turne vnto vs to good, for that we are elected, predestinated, and called of God. This kind of argument is taken of the cause. And the same is here proued by an argument taken of the signe, not vndoubtedly of euery sight signe, or onely of a probable signe, but of a necessary signe, which the Grecians call τυμπιον. He hath geuen (saith he) his sonne for vs. What things the shall he spare for our sake, which hath not spared his owne sonne? Fathers will not sticke to spend all that ever they haue, to redeme their children. But God contrariwise to redeme vs, hath deliuered his own sonne. When Abraham had led forth his sonne vnto the aulter, and would at the commaundement of God haue offered him vp, God himselfe testified, that he then at the length saw how much he esteemed him. If this by the testimony of God himselfe was an argument of great loue and of sincere charity, what oughte we to iudge of God, whiche for our sakes hath geuen his owne sonne: So God loued the world, that he gaue his only begotten sonne for it. This is that signe which Paul continually entreateth of and adorneth. For before he said: God setteth forth his loue towardes vs, in that, when we were yet enemies Christ dyed for vs. And vnto the Gal. Who hath loued me, and hath deliuered hymselfe for me. And vnto the Corinthians, I thinke my selfe to know nothyng, but onely Iesus Christ and hym crucified. Augustine in his 2. booke and 33. chap. de nuptijs & concupiscentia, diligently peryeth this which Paul sayth: That Christ was deliuered for all. Infantes (saith he) are not here exempted, wherefore Christ dyed for them also. Wherefore they are obnoxious vnto originall sin also. For otherwyse what should they haue needed any such sacrifice? The Pelagians said that they are innocents, and especially after that Christ had suffered death for them. Tea rather contrariwyse (saith Augustine) forasmuch as Christ dyed for them, that ought to be a sufficient argument that they are not innocents.

How shall he not with hym geue vs all thinges also? All things are geuen vnto vs, not to hurt vs, but to worke to our saluation. For we haue Christ a defender of vs from euill and a Saviour. For euen as God by his crosse and death hath healed the world, so shall he bring to passe, that whatsoeuer afflictions we suffer, shall be made healthfull vnto vs. These things doubtles in mans iudgement, and at the

He which fighteth agaynst vs warreth agaynst God.

An argument taken of the cause and of a signe.

God hath done contrary to the accustomed manner of men. An argument taken of an example.

The originall sinne of infantes is here proued.

All thinges are geuen to worke vnto our saluation & not to hurt vs.

I similitude.

The father hath geuen vnto vs all thinges through Christ, and he hath geuen vs also vnto Christ first sight seeme terrible: but as waspes when their sting is taken away, can only make a bussing, & can not sting: so although aduersities sometimes assaile godly men, yet they deiect the not. But forasmuch as all things y<sup>e</sup> we haue, are geuen vnto vs through Christ, vndoubtedly they conduce vnto vs for the obteynement of felicity. To this purpose sayth Paul in the first to the Cor. All thynges are yours: and ye are Christes, and Christ is Gods. And what are y<sup>e</sup> principall thinges which Christ hath brought vnto vs, are in the same epistle thus declared. He is made vnto vs of God, wysedome, ryghteousnes, holines, and redemption. And in Esay the 50. chap. are described his miracles, truth of doctrine, innocency of life, and most greuous paynes, and these are exceeding great & singuler good thinges. But when Paul in this place saith vniuersally, that all thinges are geuen vnto vs, we may not thereby vnderstand these thinges onely, but also all other thinges whatsoever they be. And seying we haue Christ the Lord of all good thinges, we ought not to doubt, but that al thinges that are his, are ours: for he is the heire of all thinges, and we are declared to be his fellow heires. And as he is geuen vnto vs of the father, so againe we are of the same father geuen vnto him. Wherefore he saith, no man can take away from hym those, which are geuen vnto him of the father. And David vnder the person of the father saith: Aske of me, and I will geue vnto thee the Gentles for thyne inheritauce. And yet is there som difference betwene those two gifts. For Christ is geuen vnto vs freely, without any our merites. But Christ hath gotten vs vnto himself not freely, but by his bloud and crosse. Neither skilleth it much, whether a man read χαρισται, that is, shall geue, or in the preter tense, ἐχαρίσατο, that is, hath geuen. For either is true. For those thinges which we shal haue in our countrey, that is, in heauen, we haue now by hope: and before God it is all one, as if we now had them in very dede. Farther the greatest parte of those thinges which Christ hath gotten for vs, are already bestowed vpon vs.

Who shall accuse agaynst the elect of God? It is God which iustificieth. Who shall condemne? It is Christ which died, and whiche rose againe, and sitteth at the right hand of the father, and maketh intercession for vs.

Who shall accuse against the elect of God? This may be red two manner of wayes: First, that there be two interrogations ioyned together in this maner: Who shall accuse agaynst the elect of God? Shall God which iustificieth? And then adde therunto this worde No: as though it is not very likely, that one and y<sup>e</sup> selfe same which iustificieth, wil also accuse. And then followeth, who shall condemne? shal Christ which hath dyed for vs, and rose againe, and sitteth at the ryght hand of God, and prayeth for vs? As though againe shoulde be answered, No. For it is not credible, that Christ which hath done so many and so great thinges for vs, can be brought to condemne vs. Otherwise it may be thus red: Who shall accuse? and so to vnderstand, No body. And a reason why, is geuen: because God iustificieth. Also, Who shall condemne? and againe vnderstand, No body. And so is added an other reason. For that Christ hath died for vs: as though it were a figure in Rhetorike called, subiectio. This second interpretation is easer and playner then the first. And this is to be noted, that these thinges are not spoken of them which worke, neither are referred vnto merites, nor ascribed vnto our worthines. For here is mencion made onely of the elect: & vnto them belong these thinges, in as much as they are elected of God, & for y<sup>e</sup> they are iustified freely. For otherwise we al haue in our selues many thinges, which may by very good right be both accused & condemned. But if any would presume to accuse vs, yet is our satisfactio at hand. Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> accusatio shoulde be in vaine. For Christ maketh intercessio: by his merite maketh he intercession: for childre now adopted maketh he intercessio. Wherefore his prayers canot be reiectes: The Apostle in few wordes comprehendeth many arguements, y<sup>e</sup> Christ died, that he rose againe, that he sitteth at the right hand of God, and that he maketh intercession

We can neuer be accused nor condemned for that we are elect. We haue in vs by nature many thinges whiche might iustly be accused. If we should be accused our satisfactio is at hand.

intercession for vs: al which things are of wonderful force to ouerthow to enterprises of our accusers. Ambrose saith, That no man can dare reuoke that foreknowledge or iudgement of God. For who can dissallow those things which God alloweth? The iudgement seate of God is the highest, he which is there defended, or arguied, can no where be condemned: vnto us we will sayne that there is some other greater than God. This alludeth to those things which are writte in Esay the 30. chapter, For there Christ speaketh of himselfe: Who shall accuse me? he is at hand which shall iustifie. Christ was accused of the Scribes and Pharisees, to be a seditious person and a blasphemour. But he is at hand (sayth he) which shall iustifie. He was also of the elders of the Israelites accused of too much severity, how that he had repudiated the Sinagoge, and deliuered his people vnto their enemies. Howbeit he made answer, that he had one which should iustifie him: namely God. And in this place is added Who shall condemne me? God is mine helper. These things although they be properly spoken of Christ, yet are they also transferred vnto his elect: For his righteousness is our righteousness. Otherwise as touching our selues we can neither be accused nor condemned. For we are the members of Christ, we haue the fruition of his innocency.

It is God which iustificieth. I Thys righteousness (as we haue oftentimes sayd) consisteth in the forgiveness and remission of sinnes. By thys meanes are we acquited at the iudgement seate of God. In thys place are confuted they: scanderers which commonly crye, that we falsly say, that this word of Iustification is taken by translation of the iudgement seate, and signifieth absolution or acquitting. For what will they answer vnto Paul, who with most manifeste wordes affirmeth the selfe same thing that we do? For he setteth iustification agaynst accusation and condemnation, which undoubtedly properly pertayne vnto the iudgement seate. The Hebrewes say Haddich, and agayne to condemne Harshia, which wordes are deriued of iustice and of impiety. All these things which Paul here bringeth tend to this end, to make vs fully assured of the singular good will of God towards vs. That which he speaketh of the death and resurrection of Christ is most manifest: but what, to sit at the right of God, signifieth, is not altogether so playne. It is a metaphoricall kind of speech taken of kinges and princes, which place on the right hande those whome they haue in greate honour and estimation. In the 110. Psalme it is written, Sit on my right hand, vntill I make thine enemies the foote stole of thy fete. Salomon minding highly to honour his mother Bersaba commaunded a throne to be put for her on his right hand. The sonnes of Zebed also requiered of Christ, that the one might sitte on his right hand, and the other on his lefte. Of this most singular hono: geuen vnto hym of the father, Christ hymselfe thus sayth: All things are deliuered vnto me of my father: and vnto me is geuen all power in heauen and in earth. And John the Euangelist sayth: Iesus knowing that all things were deliuered vnto hym. And Paul to the Ephesians sayth, He is put above all principality, power, vertue, domination, and above every name that is named, ether in this world or in the world to come. And vnto the Philippians: He hath geuen vnto him a name, which is above all names, that in the name of Iesus, every knee should bow, both of things celestiall, terrestrial, and infernall. And vnto the Colossians: Which is the beginning, the first born amongst the dead, that he might haue dominion ouer all. For that it hath pleased the father that in him should dwell all fulnes. And although the right hand of God signifieth (as we haue sayde) a singular hono: and a most highe dignity yet must we not thinke, that the body of Christ is powred so farre abroad, as is his deuitie, and the right hand of the father. For his body, as the condition of humane nature requireth, is cōteyned in a certayne and definite place, which is heauen, as Peter testifieth in the Actes of the Apostles: as the article of his ascencion certifieth vs: and as Augustine & many other fathers haue taught vs. He is sayd to make intercession for vs, that we might be the more encouraged. For they, which are in greate fauor with any man, their prayers are not easily reiected of him. Wherefore Paul maketh

Itt.

mention

Many are gummentes
whereby is proued that we can net
ther be accused nor condemned.

The things that are spoken of Christ are sometimes transferred vnto his elect.

We cannot be accused nor condē-ned in as much as we are the members of Christ.

Whereby it is manifest
that to iusti-fy is a word of pleading in iudgemente
which is contrary to accusation & condemna-
tion.

What is to sit at the right hande
of God.
A metaphor.
It signifi-
eth a singular hono: & a singular
dignity.

The body of Christ is not so farre powred abroad as is the diuine
nature.

All the persons of the Trinity take one part.

Christ is still the intercessor of our salvation in praying for us. The Arrians went about hereby to prove that the son is less than the father. Whereby is manifest the distinction of the persons. The father is the fountain of all the divine persons and graces. To pray is not here taken properly.

God is said to beseech us.

The sonne prayeth vnto the father not in respect as he is God but as he is man.

The Apostles in preaching began with more gentleness in the law and the prophets.

mention, in what greates dignitie Christe is with the father. In this place Ambrose thus writeth: He maketh vs certayne, and sure both of the father, and of the Sonne. For before he sayde: That God iustifieth vs: now he besayth of the Sonne, that he maketh intercession for vs: and a little before he wrote of the holye Ghost, that he with vnspokeable gronings prayeth for vs. The Greke Scholes adde, that Christ, when he was vpon the earth, oftentimes prayed for the safety of men. For he sayd vnto Peter: I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith should not faile. And as Iohn sayth, He prayed vnto the father, not only for them that beleued, but also for all those which should beleue, that he would sanctifie them. And beinge naped vpon the crosse, he commended vnto his father euen those which had reuiled him, and put hym to death. And here also we hear, that he by no meanes hath cast away that eare, which he had in times past to preserue vs. For now although he raigne in heauen, yet he maketh intercession vnto the father for vs. We thought it not enough to dye for vs, but that also he would by his ministry aduance our salvation. The Arrians wrested this place to thys purpose, to proue, that the sonne is lesse then the father, for y he maketh intercession vnto him: for to pray is to make supplication, pertainteth to inferiours, & not vnto equals. Ambrose maketh answer vnto the, & sayth, that the Apostle maketh him equal with the father: For he sayth, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. Wherefore by these words can not be gathered that he is lesse then the father. But here are offered vnto vs two things to be noted: first y the persons in the blessed trinity, are distinct: for if the sonne pray vnto the father, it must nedes be that y person of the father and his person, are not one & the same: for no man prayeth vnto himselfe. Farther this is to be noted, that the father is the fountaine and first beginning of all thinges, and euen of the diuine persons. Wherefore the sonne from him deriueth into vs whatsoeuer heauenly graces and graces we haue. Christostome disagreeeth not from this sentence. For he sayth, That Paul before had made the sonne of God equal with the father, when he sayd, that he sitteth at his ryght hand. But in that he is sayd to pray, that is not to be taken properly, as though he maketh supplication vnto the father but the scripture (saith he) so speaketh to shew the good wyll of the sonne towards vs. Otherwyse he hath all thyngs in his hand, and as the father geueth lyfe, so also doth the sonne geue lyfe, and as the father rayseth up the deade, so doth also the sonne rayse up the dead. Wherefore he needeth no prayers towards hym. And seying he could by hymselfe quicken the dead, redeme the damned, and iustifie the wicked, which workes are most excellent and most great, why can he not also by hymselfe without prayers bring to passe those thynges which are remayning? Moreouer he citeth out of the latter to the Cor. the 5. chapter. We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you through vs: we pray you in Christes stede to be reconciled vnto God. Behold (saith he) God is here sayd to beseech men, when as yet we ought not once to thinke that he is inferior vnto them. But sauing the authoritie of these fathers, I would iudge that the Arrians may be answered an other way. For I would say, that the sonne prayeth vnto God, not in that he is God, but in that he is man, and a creature. But the place alledged out of the epistle vnto the Cor. is not of so great force. For Paul expessedly putteth this note of similitude in, that is, as though: neither ment he any thing els, then that the Apostles with great affection procured, and as it were beseeched men to returne vnto God. Of which wordes can not be gathered, that God maketh supplication vnto men. The Apostles in the new testament delt towards men with a great deale more lenity, then did the lawe, or the Prophetes in the old testament: where all thinges in manner are thrust with threateninges, and punishmentes. And that those wordes of Paul are to be referred vnto the humanity of Christ, those thinges which were before spoken sufficientely declare. Paul had before written, that Christ died, rose agayne, and was caried vp into heauen to the right hand of God: All which thinges agree not with the diuine nature of Christ. Wherefore it is meete and conuenient, that that particle also which followeth, ought to be referred vnto y humane nature of Christ: as touching which, Christ himselfe confessed himselfe to be lesse then y father. For he sayth. The Father is greater then I am. And so long as he

he was vpon the earth, because he was a manne, he obeyed the magistrates and his parentes: for (as Luke declareth) he was subiect vnto them. And in Esay he confesseth, that he was anointed of the holy ghost: to geue vs to vnderstand, that his humane nature was not onely lesse then the father, but also lesse then the holy ghost. Farther it can not be denied, but that he is our bishoppe and priest. But the office of a bishoppe is both to offer sacrifice, and to pray for the people. Christ hath offered himselfe vpon the crosse: and when he had finished that ministry, there remained an other ministry, which he should continually exercise, namely, to make intercession for vs: vnles we will peradventure affirme, that he is no more the bishoppe of the Church. But God himselfe hath promised to the contrary, saying: Thou art a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedech. And continually by the priesthode of Christ our sinnes are forgiven vs, and we are reconciled vnto God. We haue an highe priest (as it is written vnto the Hebrues) which hath entred into the most holy place, not made wyth handes, but hath pearced into heauen it selfe. And which can suffer together with our infirmities, being tempted in all thinges like vnto vs. Wherefore we ought wyth confidence to come vnto the throne of grace: for there is offered for vs a most acceptable sacrifice. By the resurrection of Christ are overcome death and hell. In the kingdome of Christ which he most mightely exerciseth at the right hand of the father, are gouerned all thinges: and the prayers which he continually poureth out for vs, are vnto the father most gratefull and most acceptable. We reade before, that the holy ghost maketh intercession for vs: which selfe thing is here affirmed of the sonne. If these two intercessions be compared together, we shall finde that the intercession of the sonne is the cause of the intercession of the holy ghost. For he promised to goe vnto the father, and to sende vnto vs the holy ghoste. He stirreth by our mindes to pray feruentlye with sighinges and gronings. Christ maketh intercession vnto the father, because he is alwayes at hand with him. Wherefore the father is perpetually put in minde of the sacrifice by him once offered, and he smelleth the same as a swete smell, and thereby is made mercifull vnto vs. And therefore Christ is called our mediator and advocate. And his prayers are not onely acceptable vnto God, but also haue ioyned wyth them satisfaction. Wherefore seing they are both gratefull vnto God, and also iust, they can not haue any repulse. We in dede so longe as we lyue here, do mutually pray one for an other, and that by the prescript of the word of God. Whobeyt betwene our prayers and the prayers of Christ there is greate difference. For his haue (as we haue sayde) satisfaction ioyned wyth them, but we haue not oures. For there is none of vs, which can make satisfaction vnto God, either for hymselfe, or for an other man. But that the Saintes departed do make intercession for vs, we can not proue by any parte of the canonicall scripture. Wherefore we ought to haue Christ only for our mediator & advocate, neither are thinges vncertaine to be admitted for certaine. Although I can easely graunt, that the saintes in our countrey wyth most feruent desires wishe the saluation of the elect. Yet dare I not say, that they pray for them, especially seying the scripture no where teacheth any such thing. And although I should confesse this, yet should it not therof follow, that we ought to call vpon saintes departed. For we are not certaine out of the worde of God, that they can heare our prayers. Wherefore they greuously offend both against religion, and against Christ himself, which appoint vnto themselves saintes for new mediators and advocates: wher as there is but one onely mediator betwene God and men: namely, the man Christ Iesus, who now (as Paul saith) maketh intercession for vs. The same thing doth Iohn testify saying: I write vnto you that ye sinne not. And if we sinne, we haue an advocate wyth the father, euen Iesus Christ the iust. Augustine against the epistle of Parmenianus in the 4. chap. in these wordes noteth, that the Apostle excluded not himselfe from y rest. For he said not, ye haue an advocate, but, we haue. For there is none so holy but y he hath neede of Christ to be his advocate and mediator. Farther he saith not: ye haue an intercessor, but we haue an advocate Iesus Christe. Augustine

Two minis-
series of Christ as he is our high priest:

The intercession of the sonne is the cause of the intercession of the holy Ghost.

Christ our mediator & advocate.
The prayers of Christ are both grate-
full and also iust.

We are not taught by any parte of the canoni-
call scripture that the saintes
departed do
pray for vs.
Although
the saintes
do praye for vs, yet are not they to be inuoca-ted.

None so holy but that he hath neede of the intercession
of Christ.

Cap.8 A Commentarie vpon the

It is a thing intolerable that bishops should be mediators betwene God and the people. We must not pray vnto Angels.

in that place repproueth Permenianus, for that he had in some places writtten, that Bishops are mediators betwene God and the people: which thing he sayth is not to be suffred of the faithfull. The same Augustine in his 10. booke of confessions the 42. chapter thus writteth. Whome should I haue found which mought reconcile me vnto thee? Should I haue gone vnto Angels? But with what prayers? With what Sacramentes? And he addeth, That there were many which would haue bene reconciled by Angels, and were miserably deceyued for that an euill Angell oftentimes transformeth hymselfe into an Angell of lyght. And if it be not lawfull for vs to pray vnto Angels, much les is the same lawfull for vs to doo vnto dead sayntes. For here is no les perill to be deceaued, then there. These things writteth Augustine in that place, both godly and soundly: who yet in other places was not so circumspect in eschewing the errour of hys tyme.

Who shall separate vs from the loue of God: shall affliction: shall anguyshe: shall persecution: shall hunger: shall nakednes: shall danger: shall the sword: As it is writtten: For thy sake are we deliuered to the death all the day long: we are counted as sheepe for the slaughter. Neuertheles in all these things we are more then conquerors, thorough hym that loued vs. For I am perswaded, that nether death, nor lyfe, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor thinges present, nor thinges to come, nor heigth, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to seperate vs fro the loue of God which is in Christ Iesus our Lord.

When think aduersities to be tokens of Gods anger. Ambrose vnderstandeth these thinges of our loue.

Who shall separate vs from the loue of God? After that Paul had by so many reasons confirmed the exceeding great loue of God towarde vs, now by way of interrogacion he crieth out, that there is nothing which can interrupt that loue wherewith God loueth vs. Let a rule vs, whosoener wil: let come aduersities, be they neuer so great: yet all things shall worke vnto vs to god. For this is the property of one that loueth, continually to do good vnto him whom he loueth. Wherefore seeing God so loueth vs, whatsoeuer he doth, or whatsoeuer he sendeth vpon vs, we must beleue that it shall be helthfull vnto vs: neither ought any aduersities to perswade vs, but that we are continually loued of God. Wherefore this is a conclusion of all those thinges which haue bene befoze entreated of. And that which the Apostle saith, he is most fully perswaded of, I would to God we were also perswaded of the same. He reckoneth by those thinges which seme commonly to be most harde, and wherby men are oftentimes broken: and euen these things he auoucheth, hinder not the loue of God towarde vs: so far is it of, that they can plucke it away from vs. The Apostle the longer abideth in this place, for that our flesh & humane reason can hardly be perswaded of this thing. For oftentimes when we are afflicted, we cry, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me. And that with a farre other manner of affect, then Christ pronounced those wordes. We cry, Howe long wilt thou be angry? O Lord? With many such other like. For whatsoeuer aduersity happeneth, we thinke the same to be a token of Gods wrath towarde vs, wher as yet he of a singular loue suffreth vs so to be afflicted. I know that Ambrose, Augustine, and very many other take loue in this place for that loue wherewith we loue God: as though the meaning of Paul should be. Seeing God hath so loued vs, ought not we agayne on the other side most constantly to loue hym? And this sentence is neither vnapt nor impious. Howbeit I rather preferre the other, for that it seemeth to serue better to the scope of the Apostle: for hee in this place goeth about to perswade vs, that we should not be in doubt of the loue of God towarde vs. And therefore he sayth, that he foreknewe vs, predestinated, called, iustified, and glorified vs, gaue hys sonne vnto vs, & together with hym all thinges: and that Christ hym selfe maketh intercession vnto the father for vs. All these thinges pertain vnto the loue, which God beareth towarde vs. And a litle afterward the Apostle addeth:

But

But in all these things we are conquerours through hym which hath loued vs. These words most plainly serue to my sentence, wherunto also subscribeth Chrysostom. I confesse in dede, that of this good will of God towards vs is stirred by our loue towards hym: howbeit Paul seemeth to entreat of that first loue, and not of thys our loue. But they which will haue these wordes to be vnderstand of our loue towards God, somewhat do doubt, whether the elect, & they y<sup>e</sup> be in very deede iustified, may at any time lose faith, charity, and other vertues or no. But, that seemeth Paul to denye: for he sayth y<sup>e</sup> there is nothing can plucke vs away from the loue of God. For this sence is gathered out of the interrogation, which he here putteth. But whatsoeuer other mē imagine, of this thing ought we to be most certain, that holy men cannot only sinne, but also some times mosse greaouslye fall: which we se to haue happened in y<sup>e</sup> hystory of Dauid & Peter. But this is nothing prejudiciall vnto the election of God. For such falles of the predestinate can not be perpetuall, for they are restozed, and by repentance renewed. And although God at that time accordyng to they<sup>r</sup> desert do take away from them the effenes of hys spirite & of spiritual vertues, yet soasmuch as he is constant and immutable, he ceaseth not to loue them: although they so long as they lye wrapped in sinnes, haue neither any feeling of this hidden good will, nor any confidence there in. And as touching the meaning of Paul they must haue sayd, that he denieth not but that the elect may sometimes both fall and decline from loue: but that he would only shew that such is the loue of God towards his, that it ought to perswade them, neuer to suffer themselves to be pulled away from his loue. Chrysostome noteth that Paul here reckoneth not thinges light, and of small force. For he left vntouched, couetousnes of money, ambition of honours, desire of aduancement, and pleasures forbidden: which thinges are wont oftentimes to drawe euen constant men backward: but he reckoneth by thinges horrible and most greauous and which are accustomed easely to overcome nature. For in these wordes he comprehendeth those thinges which commonly happen in a life most hard and most bitter: as emprisonmentes, burninges, bondes, tearing in sonder, and such other like thinges. And he vseth an interrogation, thereby to signify a constant certaynty. And the wordes which he vseth, are not placed by chance, or at all a ventres, but with exceeding greate conning of the holy ghost. The first word is σπασμῶς, that is, afflictio, deriued of this verbe σπασσω, which signifieth to breake, or vehemently to presse. For first, thinges being well ordered are accustomed to be brused or broken: and afterward he encreaseth the euill and addeth συνωπία, that is, angustie, where thinges are brought to so narrow a streight, that a man can not tell what counsell to take, or which way to turne himselfe. Then commeth outward persecution, which spoyleth a man of his frendes. Afterward follow hunger and nakednes: for men when they are compelled to fflye out of they<sup>r</sup> countrey haue then greate want of thinges necessary. And then he addeth perill, so that they come also into danger of they<sup>r</sup> life. And, that nothing should want, at the last he addeth the sword. All those thinges sayth the Apostle haue not that force, that they are able to perswade the elect, that they are not loued of God. These discomodities of the godly Paul setteth forth in his first epistle to the Corinthians the fourth chapter. For thus he writeth: I thinke that God hath set forth vs the last Apostles, as men appoynted to death. For we are made a gasping stocke vnto the world, and to the Angelles, and so men. We are soles for Christes sake: but ye are wise through Christ we are weak: and ye strong: we are despised, and ye are honorable. Vnto this houre we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and haue no certayne dwelling places: and labour working with our handes: we are reuiled, and yet we blesse: we are persecuted, and suffer, we are euill spoken of, and we pray. And in y<sup>e</sup> latter to the Corinthians: In prisons about measure, in labours more abundantly. &c. And vnto Timothe: They which will liue godly in Christ Iesus, shall suffer persecution. And many such other like sentences are euery where to be found in y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures. Augustine de Doctrina Christiana, & Erasmus in his annotacions declare, y<sup>e</sup> this place which we are in hande with, excelleth in waight of matter, and orna-

The falles of the predestinate
are not perpetuall.

A conning placing of wordes.

Cap. 8 A Commentarie vpon the

mentes of Rhetorike: namely, in Gradation, in Antitheses, in contraries and in Repetitions. The Apostle vseth also with interrogations, and speaketh nothing in this place that is base and meane. For all thinges are greete and high, whether a man consider the thinges themselves, or the persons. He speaketh of life, death, height, deapth, God, Christ, the right hand of the father, Angells, principalities, powers. And last of all addeth, In all these thinges we are more then conquerers. This oration of Paul they thinke to be so notable and excellent, that they suppose, that neither Cicero nor Demosthenes could euer haue spokē more eloquently: not in dede that the holy ghost hath neede of these ornamentes, but for that he sometimes disdaineth not, to abase himselfe vnto these thinges, when they may serue to our commodity. Which I therefore thought good to admonish you of that yonge men might vnderstand, that these artes of speach pertaine vnto the gifts of God, and that they ought to seke to get them in time, that the holy ghost may after ward ble them, when it shall serue for the commodity of the Church.

The artes of speaking are not to be contemned of yonge men.

As it is written: For thy sake are we deliuered to the death al the day long: we are counted as shepe for the slaughter. ] Bycause reason and our flesh are hardly perswaded that we are loued of God, whē we are exercised with afflictions, therefore Paul brought a pꝛoofe out of the scriptures, to confirme this paradore. For here haue we neede of sayth, which cleaueth vnto the word of God. This testimony is taken out of the 44. Psalme, wherein are those men set forth complaining of theyꝝ tribulations of whome we can not doubt, but that they were most dere vnto God. We are (say they) counted as shepe for the slaughter, that is, vnto whome nothing is more certaine then to be slayne. For there are certayn shepe, which are kept and fed for theyꝝ wooll sake, or for skyn sake: and those haue life spared them for a time. Some are appoynted for the kitchen, and they are euery day as occasion serueth drawē vnto death. And therefore the saynts in the same Psalme complaine, that they are like vnto shepe appoynted to be eaten. They complaine, that they are otherwise dealt with, then the fathers in the olde tyme were dealt with, vnto whō God seemed to beare great fauor, whē as he enriched the, sought for the, gaue vnto the the victorie, & with excellent names and titles made them famous & honorable. We (say they) are otherwise delt with. For we are deliuered vnto the enemyes as shepe to be slayne, as vnto whom they may do what pleaseth them. It is true in dede, that God would sometimes declare his loue towardes the saintes, and confirme the verity of his doctrine, when he adorned them with such goods and riches, that euen the idolaters also mought vnderstande, that that God whome the patriarches worshipped, was both the creator of the world, and also the distributor of all good thinges: and that all thinges, which men commonly desire, are in his pleasure: which thinge when he had sufficiently declared, by aduersities also he made them so valiant, that with a stout courage, and an inuincible constancy, they testified the doctrine of God to be true. In which thing God likewise declared that he is the distributor of all the good thinges of the minde, and of heroicall vertues, and that his power is so great, that of thinges contrary also he can bring forth the selfe same effect. And that which the lattin interpreter turneth, We are mortified, should haue bene turned, we are slayne. For the Hebrew word is Hodignu: although the Greke word θανατώ signifye sometimes to mortefy. For in that sence Paul vseth it in this selfe same chapiter, when he sayd: And if by the spirit ye mortefy the deedes of the fleshe, ye shall lyue. But here (as we sayde) θανάτω signifyeth to be slayne, and to be deliuered vnto the death. But that which followeth, God bleth to his glory the aduersities and prosperities of his elect.

God of thinges contrary worketh the selfe same effectes.

All the day long. ] Signifieth, that death continually hangeth ouer them, and that they are neuer sure, but that they thinke to be euen by and by drawen vnto death. Although Chrysostome amplifieth it an other way. It is of necessity (saith he) that men dye at the least once: but sithen they are redy in mynde, euery day to dye if neede require, they haue euery day the fruite of martirdome, as if they should euery day be killed. And their cause much relieueth and comforteth them. For they are not slayne as wycked men and malefactors, but only for religion and piety sake. And therefore fore they say, For thy sake. And for that cause some thinke, that that Psalmie ought not to be vnderstand of the first captialty. For then the Jewes were not punished for Gods cause, or for religion sake, but because they were idolaters, and so wicked, that God would no longer suffer them. For they had now utterly fallen away from God: the booke of the lawe was now in a manner cleane blotted out: the temple was shut vp, the city of Ierusalem ouerflowed with the blood of the Prophetes. Wherefore this is a prophesy of the latter calamity, which happened in the time of the Machabees vnder Antiochus and the Macedonians. For then the Jewes suffered most greivous tormentes, for that they endurged themselves to defend the lawes of God. And therefore they say, For thy sake are we slayne. And in an other verse is added: And yet by reason of these things haue not we forgotten thee, or done unfaithfully against thy covenant. This is not so spoken, as though men do at any time suffer more greivous things then they haue deserved. For none of all the martyrs liued so purely and innocently, but that he was obnoxious vnto some finnes. And those finnes deserved not only the death of the body, but also (if the death of Christ had not holpen) eternall paynes. But these paynes and verations God sendeth not vpon them, as being angry: but to set forth his truth and glory. Notwithstanding in the meane tyme according to his promise, he repayeth vnto them not only eternall life, but also in this life rendereth vnto them an hundredfold. For oftentimes are most abundantly repayed those things which were for his sake lost. Sometimes also in the midst of tribulations, and euen in the very crasse and death, he giveth vnto them so much strength and consolation, that in very dede it is more then an hundredfold, if it be compared with those things which they haue lost. And because the mysteries of our faith are secret and hidden, God will haue them to be testified, not only by oracles of the scriptures, but also by the tormentes and slaughters of the elect. And therefore Christ sayd vnto the Apostles when he sent them into the whole world to preach: Ye shall be witnesses vnto me in Iewry, and in Samaria, and vnto the ends of the earth. But it is no hard matter by wordes to testify the truth. But those testimonies are most waighty, which are sealed with blood and with death. Notwithstanding this is to be knowne (as Augustine putteth vs in minde) that the paynes, and punishmentes, and death make not martyrs, but the cause: for otherwise many suffer many greivous things, which yet are not martyrs. For the same Augustine to Bonifacius, of the correction of the Donatists, and in many other places telleth, that there were in his tyme Circumcelliones, a furious kind of men, which if they could finde none that would kill them, oftentimes threw themselves downe headlong, and killed themselves. These men (sayth he) are not to be counted for Martyrs. Wherefore there seeme to be three thynges required to cause a man to be indeede a Martyr. First, that the doctrine which he defendeth be true, and agreeable with the holy scriptures. The second is, that there be aduoynd integrity and innocency of life: that he not onely by his death, but also by his lyfe and manners do edifie the church. The thirde is, that they seeke not to dye for boasting sake, or for desire of name & fame. Paul sayth to the Corinthians, If I deliuer my body to be burnt, and haue not charity, it nothing profiteth me. Wherefore no man ought to count the Anabaptists, Libertines, and other like kinde of pestilences, for martyrs. For these men in stubbornly defending their errors vnto the death, are not minded with charity, neither towards God, nor me. And forasmuch as they are haters of al that is good, they are martyrs rather of Sathā & of their errors, then of Christ. Two kinds of testimonies we haue, which very much conduce vnto the knowledge of the truth: but yet are not altogether so firme, that we ought straight way to geue place vnto them: Miracles, and the tormentes which are suffered for the defence sake of any opinion. In either of them is to be had great warines, that the doctrine which is set forth, be examined by the holy scriptures. Paul out of Dauid compareth the godly with shepe appoynted vnto the slaughter. In this similitude are two thynges to be considered. First, that they are called shepe, for Under Antiochus and the Macedonians the Jewes suffered many things for the law.

God vnto them which for his name sake are vnto rendereth in this life an hundredfold.

These testimonies are most waighty which are sealed with blood. Not the punishmentes but the cause maketh Martyrs. Three thynges required to make a martyr.

The Anabaptists & Libertines are not Martyrs.

Two kinds of testimonies profitable but yet not firme.

What thynges are to be considered in this similitude of shepe.

that they are simple, as it is mete that the flocke of Christ should be secondly, for that in theyr punishmentes they make no resistance, following the example of Christ: of whome it is written, That when he was like a sheepe led to the death, yet he opened not his mouth.

But in all these thinges we are conquerors. Eximus, that is, we are notably overcome. This particule ex in this place nothing pertayneth vnto workes of supererogation. For Paul meant nothing els, but that so much strength are geuen vs of God, that in this battayle we a greates way overcome all our enemies. The deuills practise is this, by these aduersities to wrest from vs our confidence and loue towardes God. But that is by this meanes rather entreated. For tribulation worketh patience: patience worketh experience: experience hope. And hope confoundeth not. But by what strengths we attayne vnto this victorie, Paul freight way declareth, sayeng.

Thorough him which loued vs. Before we loued him. And he hath geuen vnto vs his spirite. Though whome we obtayne this excellent victorie, otherwise of our selues we are farre vnequall for so greates a battayle. It is God, as Chrysostome wisely noteth, whome we haue to our fellow souldier in this battail and by that meanes obtayne we so notable a victorie. Neither doe we only overcome troubles whatsoever they be, but also those which persecute vs, though they seme neuer so great and mighty, which thing how it happened in the Apostles, Luke playnly describeth in the Actes. When Peter and Iohn had wrought a miracle so manifest, that it could not be denied, the high priestes and Scribes being overcome with the greatenes of the thing, knew not what counsell to take. What sayd they? Shall we do with these men? As if they should haue sayd: Here are playnly overcome all our practises: here our power is able to doe nothing: here the more we strue, the more and the manifestlier are we overcome. The same thing happened vnto Iulianus the Apostata, as it is written in the Ecclesiasticall history. He had begon by al maner of meanes to torment and bere the Christians, but his cruelty and outrageousnes was overcome with theyr patience. Which thinge one of his rulers perceauing, pryncipally admonished him to cease: lest he should both nothing at all profite, and also make himselfe a laughing stocke to al men. Thys power of God bringeth to passe, that by those selfe same thinges which are agaynst the victorie, we, to the greates admiration of all men, obtayne the notabler victorie. For who can beleue, that he which is overcome can overcome? That one flayne, burnt, torne in peces can in the battayle get the victorie? These things nature, reason, and the world vnderstand not, wherefore they are to be ascribed vnto God only: in whose hands soe much as the euentures of things are set, they depend not of certayne and appoynted instrumentes, but of the purpose and counsell of God: whereunto those thinges which seme to resist are most of all seruisable. Some seme thus to vnderstand this place: as though therefore we obtayne so notable a victorie: for that we are by the greatnes of the benefits of God pricked forward to suffer all things be they neuer so hard. And the greatnes of the giftes of God is by this meanes chiefly knowen, if it be compared with those thinges, whiche agayne on the other side we repaye. He which died for vs (sayth Ambrose) gaue his life for euill seruauntes, why should we then make it so great a matter, when we being vnprofitable seruauntes suffer death for a good Lorde? And moreouer, his death was wonderfull profitable vnto vs all: when as contrarywise our death nothing at all profiteth him. And so after this interpretacio we must not read, That we by him, which hath loued vs are more then conquerors: but, for him. Which

How the
greatnes of benefites is best known.

reding & Latine translatio followeth. But in Greke is red ἵνα reu. Which preposition ioyned with a genetive case doth not, or very rarely signify, For. Wherefore it is more apt to say, by him, or thorough him, as we expounded it at the beginning. And so doth Basilins to Amphilochia. De spiritu sancto, the 8. chap. rede it. In which place he at large declareth, what this preposition ἵνα signifieth, when it is attributed vnto Christ. It maketh him not (sayth he) lesse then the father: but maketh hym, bym, to be a mediator betwene vs and the father, as by whome is deriued into vs from the father whatsoeuer giftes or graces we haue: and by whome; hath acceſſe vnto the father whoſoeuer cometh vnto him. For the electes and ſayntes are taken of Chriſte, and being now reconciled are offered vnto God the father. And in the declaratiō of theſe thinges he alledgeth thoſe wordes which we are nowe in hand with, and interpreteth them ſo as we haue ſayd.

For I am perſwaded, that nether death, nor life. ] Chriſtoſtome thinketh y Paul hitherto hath entreated of that loue wherewith God loueth vs: but here turneth his ſpeech to our loue and obeſſance towardeſ God: as though he would ſay, that the loue of God is ſo kindled in the hartes of the godly, that no creature can plucke him away from God And he rendereth a reaſon, why Paul ſo cleued vnto Chriſt, that he could not be pulled away fro him. Bycauſe (ſayth he) he loued Chriſt himſelfe, and not thoſe giftes which Chriſt geueth. So long as the foundation of amity abideth, ſo long it alſo conſtantly endureth. And therefore are thoſe amities commended which are grounded not vpon a wayne and mutable conſideration, but vpon a firme and ſure conſideration: wherefore forasmuch as Paul ſought Chriſt himſelfe, which alwayes abideth the ſame and immutable, therefore his loue towardeſ him abode firme and conſtant: wherefore it had ben vnto him to ſal away from Chriſte more grieſe, the hell fire: and on the other ſide to cleue faſt vnto him, more pleaſater the any kingdome. Howbeit I thinke this to be moſt true, y Paul ſil continueth in y which he had begon, namely, to comend the ſingular loue of God towardeſ vs, that we might aſſuredly know y all thinges though they be neuer ſo much againſt vs, ſhall turne vnto vs to good, ſeing we are ſo entirely loued of God. But whether of theſe interpretations we follow, I thinke it ſkillet not much: for either of them is both godly, and alſo not vnaptly fitteth with the wordes and entent of Paul. Howbeit I thought it good to declare, what I thinke to be moſte agreeable. πιστοιμα (ſaith the Apoſtle) that is, I am fullye perſuaded. If thou ſeek a reaſon thereof, hee geueth a reaſon demonſtratiue, whiche is: For that God hath foreknowne vs, and predeſtinate vs. And theſe are cauſes of the loue of God towardeſ vs. This declareth he by the effect, for that the moſt louing father hath geue his ſonne for our ſakes, and together with him hath geuen vnto vs all thinges. Farther many logical & probable reaſons take of thoſe excellent benefites, which we ſeele are daily beſtowed vpon vs, perſwade vs of the ſame thinges. For thoſe benefites although oftentimes they are common alſo vnto wicked men, yet haue they the force both to cheare our hartes, and alſo to comfort vs, after that we are once perſwaded by other more firme reaſons. For argumentes probable, although of themſelues they are not able throughe to perſuade, yet being ioyned vnto reaſons firme and demonſtratiue, they make the thing more euident. Farther if we will follow examples of other moſt excellent men, we ſhall perceiue with how ſingular a loue God loued them. Let vs alſo euery one of vs loke vpon our owne priuate doings: & in the we ſhall ſee, how we haue bene oftentimes holpen and preſerued of God. And although our ſence be vtterly rude in theſe thinges (for it is ſtrange from thinges celeftial) yet it alſo in the godly is made after a ſort ſpiritual: even as contrariwiſe in the vngodly, even the very mind alſo is made carnall, wherefore al thinges which the godly vnderſtand alſo by their ſenſes, teſtifie vnto them the good will of God towardeſ them. By this meanes Dauid by contemplation conſidering all thinges which were offered vnto his ſenſes, as pledges of the loue of God, inuited and prouoketh them to praiſe God. Not that he thought that they could either heare or ſpeake, but to declare that they are of that nature, that they can ſtirre by euery attentive and godlye man, which hath the ble of them by his ſenſes, to praiſe God and to geue thanks vnto him. There are alſo certaine thinges which of the minde it ſelfe are moſt certainly & perfectly known, for that they are y firſt principles wherunto we only at the ſight of them without any farther triall geue our aſſent. And in this knowledge of the loue of God towardeſ vs, we haue for the firſt principle the holy ghoſt. He beareth witneſſe vnto vs inwardly, and in the minde, that we are the ſonnes of God.

Wherefore

Why is Paul
moſt con-
ſtantly lo-
ued Chriſt

What manner of ami-
ties are to be commended.

Reaſons of cauſes and effectes that we are loued of God.

Whereunto
to argu-
mentes probable ſerue.

The ſenſes
are made after a ſort ſpiritual in godly men.

Why Da-uid inuited thinges in-ſenſible to praiſe God.

The firſt principles of the kno-
ledge of the loue of God

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

This place
serueth to the certaintie
of saluati on.

This place
is to be taken vniuer-
sally and not particularly as though it
pertaineth
to Paul only.

The thin-ges that are spoken vnder
the person of Paul oftentimes pertaine to all men.

Whereof
springeth
our doubting touching salua-
tion.
A similitude.

Remedy against doub-
ting.
Two principal points
of things
against vs.

What we must say when we are oppressed with aduersities.

Wherefore seeing the loue of God towards vs is so many waies proued, Paul rightly saith: that he is fully perswaded. But all these reasons are such that they cleane fast vnto faith. Which faith being taken away, we shall herein haue nothing that we can vnderstand, nothing that we can know. This place serueth wonderfully to establishe the certaintie of our saluation. Neither must we harken vnto them, whiche to the ende they woulde wrestle this place from vs, vse to aunswere, that these thinges pertaine only to Paul: as though he alone, and a few other which by reuelation were made certaine of their saluation could say, that they were fully perswaded that they should neuer be plucked away fro the loue of God. Here doubt-les is not set forth an history, neither is it declared how Paul was called in y waye: neither is it writtten, how he was let downe from the wall in a basket: onely is brought in a conclusion of those reasons, whereby he would proue, that God most feruently loueth vs. Wherefore this place pertaineth not only to Paul, but also to all the faithfull. For it maketh nothing against vs, that Paul pronounced his sentence vnder the first person. For otherwise we should say, that that which is written to the Gal. I lyue, but now not I, but Christ lyueth in me, is to be vnderstande of Paul onely, and pertaineth nothing to vs: and that which he saith to the Phil. Vnto me to lyue is Christ, and to dye is gayne. And that which he writteth vnto the Corinthians, I do not thinke that I know any thyng but Christ Iesus, and hym crucified, and a great many such like sentences should be vnderstand of no other body but of Paul: all which thinges yet euery christian ought to apply vnto himselfe, that that sentence of the Poet may hereunto be very aptly framed, Hog thou sirra, the name is chaunged, but the tale is tolde of thee. And if sometimes we wauer as touching this certaintie, that is not to be attributed vnto the defaut of faith, but for that we haue not a perfect and an absolute faith. As if a man professing y Mathematics, should doubt of the principals of his arte, that ought not to be attributed vnto his art (for it is of all other artes most certaine) but rather vnto his vnskilfulnes, which hath not yet perfectly learned his arte. Wherefore if we at any time (as it happeneth in dede) be in doubt of our saluation, there is no other presenter remedy then to pray with the Apostles, Encrease our fayth. So did Peter when he saw himself at y point to be ouerwhelmed of the waues of the sea. All those thinges which are against vs, Paul in his epistle vnto the Ephe. reduceth to two principall pointes. For some co-sist in nature, and other some are brought vnto vs of aduersary spirites. We wrestle not against flesh and bloud, but against spirituall wickedneses which ar in celestiaall places. These two thinges the Apostle minglet together, to the ende he would leaue out nothing. And these thinges which he speaketh of, are of so great force, that they may seme able to alienate a man fro God. By life and death he vnderstandeth all maner of daungers, whereby we are endaugered touching life & death. All these thinges are not of so great force, y they can breake in sonder y loue of God towards vs. But whi we are in these daggers we must say as Paul admonisheth vs in this epistle, Whether we lyue, or whether we dye, we are the Lordes. For to thys end Christ dyled and rose agayne, to be Lord of the quicke and of the dead. And vnto the Phillip-pians: Now, euen as before, Christ shalbe glorified in my body, whether it be by lyfe, or by death.

Nor Angels.] Angels, as it is writtten in the epistle vnto the Hebrewes, are ministring spirites, which are sent forth to be ministers for their sakes, which shalbe heyes of saluation, which can not be vnderstand, but of god angels. For euill angels are oftentimes sent forth to punishe the vngodly, and to tempt men: although their temptation is not vnproffitable vnto the predestinate. And it is certaine, that euill angels seeke by all maner of meanes to leade vs away from God: which thing yet they shall not bying to passe: so great is the loue of God towards vs. But we can not suspect any such matter of god angels: for they as much as li-eth in them cal h me agayne to God those that go astray, and wonderfully reioyce of the repentance of sinners: although they also somtimes are sent forth to punishe.
Howbeit Chrysostome declareth that this place may by the figure Hyperbole, or by supposition be vnderstand also of good angels. For although good angels do not so in deede, yet if they should, their endeuor should be voyde. For after the same manner Paul writeth vnto the Galathians, If an angell from heauen teach you any other Gospell then thys which ye haue learned, be he accursed vnto you, And vnto the Corinthians, If I haue all faith, so that I can remoue mountaines, and haue not charity, I am nothyng. Those wordes are not so to be taken, as though true faith can in deede be without charity: but if it were possible so to be, yet it should nothing profite.

Nor principalities. ] Paraduventure he vnderstandeth the higher spirites, who haue no other charge committed vnto them, but ouer prouinces, empires and kingdomes. This ment Daniell when he wrote of the Prince of the Grecians, and of the Persians, and brought in Michaell the Prince of the people of God.

Nor powers. ] Power called in Greke δύναμις, Paul taketh for that power which is geuen of God to worke miracles, whereby are restrayned the vngodly: whereunto is opposite τὸ ἰαμα, that is, the gift of healing. For euen as by that power wicked men were chastised, so by this they that were bered, were healed. By this power Peter slew Ananias and Saphira: Paul made blinde Elymas the soxcerer, and deliuered vnto Sathan many which had greuously sinned. But here by angels he meaneth those which are sent of God to punish the wicked: as were those which destroyed Sodoma and Gomorha: And such was that Angell, which went betwixne the host of the Egyptians and the people of God, and which drowned Pharaoh with all his in the sea: and whome David saw standing on the threshold destroying the people of God, and which destroyed with fire the host of Senacharib. Although God sometimes do the selfe same thinges by euill angels. For so David writeth in the Psalme, that God inflicted plagues vpon the Egyptians by euill angels. Wherefore Paul in this place nameth the orders of the angels, by their ministeries and offices. And that the selfe same titles are assigned both vnto good angels and vnto euill, it is manifest by this epistle vnto the Ephesians in two places: For thus it is there writte. Against the principalities and powers that are gouerners of the world: And in the 2. chapter, he saith, That we once liued according to the course of this world, and after the prince that hath power in the ayre. And these ministeries of Angels shall not be perpetuall. For Paul writeth in the first vnto the Corinthians, That all principality and power shalbe blotted out, when Christ shall deliuer vp the kingdome vnto God, and vnto the father: but yet not that the very natures and substances of angels shalbe abolished: but for that these offices shall serue to no more vse, after we shall be once transferred vnto eternall felicity. And this is worthy of notinge, that in the holy scriptures are very fewe thinges mencioned of angels. For exactly and subtely to enquire touching them, serueth rather to pertayne to our curiosity, then to our saluation. But those thinges which serue to edification, are most diligently set forth in the scriptures. Which thing I would to God the Scholemen had obserued. For then had they left many intricate and vnpromisable thinges, which at this day are in vayne, and with great offence disputed of. It is profitable for vs to vnderstand that there are some angels appointed to our ministeries: for thereby we vnderstand the goodnes of God towards vs. On the other side it is profitable for vs to vnderstand, that there are some euill spirites, of whom we are continually assaulted: both that we may beware of them, and also that we may imploze the helpe of God againste them. And these thinges vndoubtedly, forasmuch as they are profitable to be knowen, the holy scripture hath not kept in silence. Ambrose expounding this place, sheweth, that we are in vayne assaulted of euill spirites. For he saith, that Simeon the soxcerer being lifted vp into the ayre slew all about: that this was openly scene, and yet did the truth of God geue place to these deceates.

Nor thinges present, nor thinges to come. ] These wordes may be vnderstand of this world, and of the world to come: of good thinges and euill, which are offered vnto vs presently: of those thinges which are promised shall happen vnto vs well or ill: as it happened in the temptation of the first parents. For then

the

the

Power and the gift of healing are opposite.

Angels haue some times inflicted punishments.

The titles of orders are assigned as well to euill Angels as to good. The ministeries of Angels shall not be perpetual.

We haue but few thinges in the holy scriptures touching Angels.

Cap. 8. A Commentarie vpon the

the fruit forbidden offered it selfe beautifull to see vnto, and swete to tast of. There was promised a likenes to God, and a new wisdom, as though then they were blynd, and had their eyes shut. The latten interpreter addeth, Fortitude: which word yet is not found in the Greke booke. Wherefore I thinke it best to omitte it, and especially seeing it hath not his Antithesis, which we see is diligently added vnto the other wordes.

Nor heighth nor depth.] Heighth signifieth whatsoever new and vnaccustomed thing happeneth from heauen: depth, signifieth whatsoever bursteth forth out of y<sup>e</sup> lower parts & regions of y<sup>e</sup> earth. And heighth may be take otherwise, for y<sup>e</sup> heighth & goodly shew of humaine reasons, which are commonly take out of philosophy. For Paul in the latter to the Cor. saith: The weapons of our warrefare are not carnall, but mighty through God to the ouerthrowing of all munitions, wherby we ouerthrow counsels, and euery heighth, that exalteth it selfe against the knowledge of God. And after this sentence, by depth we may vnderstand humblenes of minde, and hurting of the body after the precepts and doctrines of men, which in wordes haue a shew of wisdom, as it is witten vnto the Col. in the 2 chapter.

Jannes and Mambres.

Nor any creature can seporate vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ Iesus our Lord.] This part Paul addeth (as Ambrose thinketh) to declare, y<sup>e</sup> we can not be plucked away fro God by any other creature, which is brought forth of new. As though before he had reckoned by those creatures which are extant, and the after ward addeth, that neither any other creature, if it could be brought forth, shall haue so much strength to breake that loue of God wherewith he loueth vs. And he citeth Jannes and Mambres, which when before Pharaos they resisted Moses, semed by theyr sorceries, to raise vp new creatures. But I thinke that this exposition is moze simple, to saye, that Paul in this clause would finishe the induction which he had begon. For when we vse an induction, and haue gathered together many perticuler thinges, we adde at the last, that all other thinges are in the same sort: to finish by the reason, which otherwise should be vnperfect. So Paul whē by an Antithesis he had in a maner reckoned by all thinges, added to shut by the reason: And if there be any other creature besides these, yet can not it seporate vs fro the loue of God.

I simil-
tude.

The church
shall neuer fall away
from God.

Which is in Christ Iesus our Lord.] This is added, that we should not think that we are for our owne sakes loued of God. For of our selues we are odious vnto hym, seeing that we are contaminated with originall sinne, which we haue contracted fro Adam, and also by many other sinnes which we mozeouer commit. And that there was nothing which could plucke away Paul from the loue of God, Chrysostome hereby coniectureth, for that for Gods hono<sup>r</sup> sake he refused not to be cast into hel fire. And this he addeth, That it is the property of a wise mā, neuer to seke to depart fro his father, althogh he be somewhat sharply chastised of him. For he which cleueth vnto God, & is couered with his loue & beneuolēce, is lyke a square stone, which whiche way so euer it fall, falleth right. By this reasoning of Paul we may easely gather, y<sup>e</sup> the Church shal neuer utterly fall away fro God, neither shall there euer come any euils of so great might, that they can utterly ouerthrow it. Which thing Christ in other wordes promised vnto Peter saying: The gates of hell shall not preuaile agaynst it. For it is as it were a certayne moste strong rocke, whiche although it be stricken with waues and floudes, yet can not be moued out of this place. For the church pertayneth to predestination, and hath to hys protection the loue of God. Wherefore no creature is able to preuaile against it.

The

The ninth Chapter.

Speake the truth in Christ, I lye not, my conscience bering me witnes in the holy Ghost, that I haue great heauines and continuall sorrowe in my hart. For I would wish to my self to be seperate from Christ for my brethren, & are my kinsmen according to the flesh which are the Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glorye, and the covenantes, and the geuing of the lawe, and the worshippinge, and the promises. Of whom are the fathers, and of who concerning the flesh Christ came, who is God ouer all, blessed for ever. Amen.

The beginning of this chapter is after diuers maners annexed to those thinges which haue bene before spoken. For Chrysostome (as we haue declared) thinketh that Pauls meaning is, earnestly to shew, how firmly he was knit vnto the loue of God: namely, that for Gods sake he was ready with gladnes to suffer, euen to perish. But others thinke, that this new speache of the Apostle doth hereof arise, because before he said, that those whom God had chosen, could by no violence be seperated from his loue. Wherefore it might seme wonderfull, how the nation of the Hebrewes could be reiected from God, which onely nation, God before all other nations had chosen. Wherefore say they, the Apostle straight way added, that not al the Jewes did pertaine vnto the election of God: and that their fall was not against the decrees of God. But in my iudgement the Apostle seemeth in a maner to begin a new matter to entreate of. For hetherto he hath proued, that iustification commeth not of humaine wisdom, nor philosophie, nor also of our workes, nor by the obseruation of the law: but onely by the faith of Christ. But there remayned two other thinges of great weyght, which it behoued him to discusse & to make plaine. For by these two things men were exceedingly moued: so that if the Apostle had not thoroughly answered vnto them, he might seme to haue spent his labour in vayne. The one of them was, that the promise of saluation was made vnto the posteritie of Abraham, and vnto the seede of Israel. But now for as much as that kinde of men receaue not the sayth in Christ, of necessitie it followeth, either that the promise of God is vaine, or if the Jewes be saued, then may iustification be without faith in Christ. The second was, there was neuer at any time in any nation so great righteousness, so great an endeuour of pietie, so diligent an obseruation of the law, as was amongst the Jewes. And it were absurd, if we should say, that God would not embrace such kinde of righteousness, which excelled the brightness of all nations. These are two such thinges, that of them no man can doubt: namely, that the promises of God are firme, and that an upright iustice is acceptable vnto God. Vnto these thinges Paul answereth in these three chapters following. First he sayth, that the promises were made vnto the elect of God: and he addeth, that the externall people of Israel were not in very dede that people vnto whom were made the promises, as pertainyng to the whole number: which thing he proueth by testimonies of the scriptures. Wherefore though the Jewes were blinded (sayth he) it followeth not thereof, that the promises of God are vaine. Afterward he maketh a distinction of righteousness, so that one is outward, which consisteth in rites and workes: and an other inward, which consisteth in spirite and in sayth. The first righteousness (sayth he) God nothing regardeth, but the latter is it, wherein onely he is delighted, and which he continuallye embraceth: and of that were the Jewes boide. And therefore God nothing esteemed they outward righteousness. These thinges are entreated of in the ix. and x. chapters. But in the xi. least the Jewes should thinke them selues utterly reiected, Paul addeth, that of that people there remained some remnaunts, which in successe of time should be brought vnto Christ. But as touching the ix. chapter, the Apo-

A distinction
of the people of Israel.

A distinction
of righteous-
nes.

The Me-thode of the 9. chapter.

We keepeth this order. First, forasmuch as it shoulde be verie bytter vnto the Iewes to heare, that the promises of God shoulde not pertayne to their stocke, and that they them selues shoulde not be counted of the number of the elect, Paul sheweth, that he could not consider these thinges with himselfe, but with great griefe, and that he was ready to redeme this calamitie euen with his owne eter-nall destruction: by which wordes he playnly declareth, that he speaketh not these thinges agaynst his own nation of hatred towarde them. Then draweth he nere to the very matter, and confesseth that the promises of God are firme: but they pertayne not to the carnall propagation. Which thing he proueth by a most manifest example of Iacob and Esau. For they being borne of one and the selfe same parentes, yet was the one elected of God, & the other reiecte. In this place Paul bringeth in humane reason, complaining for that God dealeth not a like with all men. But the Apostle answereth, that we ought not to seeke a cause of the electio of God: which answereth for as much as it satisfieth not mans reason, there ariseth an other complaint: why should the blame then be layd on vs, that we are obstinate, and come not vnto God, when as the fault seemeth not to be ours, if God haue not chosen vs: Here Paul sayth, that the potters vessel ought not to complaine of his maker: and that God made some vessels to honour, and some to contumely. Which comparison whē we call to remembrance, we ought to consider, how great a benefite we haue obtayned, in that we are partakers of the election of God. And though God haue chosen some of the Iewes, and many more of the Ethnikes, yet is not that repugnant vnto the Oracles of the scripture: but rather by the testimonie of Osē the Prophet it is confirmed.
Neither is there any cause why the Iewes shoulde boast of their righteousness, forasmuch as it is not geue to the to beleue. Wherefore (according to the saying of Esay) They haue stumbled agaynst the stone. And that thing which vnto others was a strength and foundation, was made vnto them a fall and offence. These thinges being diligently weighed, bring great vtilitie, and doo verie well agree with our tyme. It seemed at that time a thing absurde, that among the people of Israell so few beleued: and to vs at this day it is objected, that there are verie few which truly professe the Gospel, and lyeue thereafter. At that time men suspected, that Christ was not that Messias which was promised in the law, because he should saue the Iewes: but this man chose verie few of the. Farther, they boasted of the name of the people of God. So vnto vs also at this day is objected the title of the church. And men thinke it a thing absurde, that the most parte of the world should dissent from the Gospel, and those in especiall, which seeme to passe all others in honors and wisdom of the world. Moreouer, Paul sheweth what are the principles or groundes of the church, namely, the election of God, and the worde. Hereby (saith he) ought the matter to be measured, and not by the authority or agreement of the multitude, or gorgeousnes of this world. Wherefore, this place hath a notable consolation that we should not repent vs in that we are fewe. Although we doubt not but that God for his mercy sake will daily encrease the number, that the fellowship of the elect may be full: howbeit in the meane tyme we confesse, that the church is not to be weighed either by the propagation of the flesh, or by the greatnes of the multitude, or by dignities and honours, or els by excellencies of wittes, for as touching these notes, other nations oftentimes excell it. These two thinges which Paul in this place entreateth of: namely, the consi-derence of their stocke and blood, and the assistance in rites and ceremonies the Ie-wed Iewes boasted of, euen in the times of the Prophetes. For they had perswaded themselves, that it should neuer come to passe, that either they should be ledde into captivity, or that the publike wealth of the Israelites, should euer cease to be, and to flourish. They made their vauntes, that they were the stocke of Abraham, and of the Patriarkes: but as touching ceremonies and the outward worshipping of God they so much swelled with pride, that Jeremy the prophet in this maner derided them with an elegant irony: They say (saith he) the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, They leaned also vnto the multitude: whē as yet

This treasure is profit-
table for our tymes.

What are the groundes
of the church.

In what thinges other congregations sometimes
excell the church.
The Iewes
boasted much of their kin-
red and workes of ceremonies

yet in very dede, neither fewnes nor multitude are a sufficient firme and sure argument of the church. For it is a false argument taken of the Accidens. For these things are onely accidents to the Church. But the multitude and the number, thou wilt say, will make an argument probable. I graunt that: But the iudgement of wise and better men is much more probable: But they are oftentimes in number most few. Farther graunt that the opinion of the multitude make a probable argument, yet doth it not make a true and necessary argument. Neither can we thus gather: This reason is probable or very likely, therfore it is true. For there are many things which are goodly in shew, and probable, which yet afterward if they be examined, are found most false. And contrariwise many things at the first sight seeme absurd, which yet if a man afterward diligently pease & weigh, he shall finde to be true. Experience teacheth vs, y the number of them y truly beleue is very small if it be copared with y Jewes, Turkes, heretikes, & Epicures. And Christ calleth his flocke, a little flock, & affirmeth, That many in dede are called, but few are chosen. Farthermore Paul in this place, and the Prophetes euery where testifie, that not all the Jewes shalbe saved: but only that a few remanentes shall be made safe. Wherefore the cause is neither confirmed nor confuted by reason of fewnes or multitude. Howbeit Augustine semeth somtimes to obiect vnto y Donatistes, that they being a few in number, would yet neuertheles ascribe vnto themselves only the Church, condemning the whole world besides. But if a man diligently reade ouer those disputations of Augustine he shall perceyue, that the Donatistes erred in thre things in especiall. First, bicause they beleued that the whole Church was in Afrike only, and in their multitude: but other churches dispersed throughout the whole world, they said were corrupt, bicause many had ben pertakers with them, which had betrayed the holy scripture, as though in this life there can be found any church, which utterly should want all spotte and wrinckle. Farther they iudged that the sacramentes were contaminated by the ill life of the ministers: and so for that cause they rebaptised those which fled vnto their Church. But we beleue that Christ hath his churches euery where. For there is nothing more proper vnto the Church, then to be catholike, that is, vniuersal, neither so to be bounde either vnto certayne places or persons, that it can be no other where. Wherefore the cause must be proued by the word of God & not by y iudgement of multitude or fewnes. Wherefore ther is no cause why the Anabaptists or Papists should so much glory, the one of their fewnes, and the other of their multitude. For the truth of the doctrine must be proued by true and necessary argumentes taken out of the worde of God, and not by probable argumentes.

I speake the truth in Christ, I lye not, my conscience also bearing me witnes. By these wordes are not only ouerthrowen those things, which are repugnant vnto that doctrine which we haue now set forth, but also there is declared the very fountayne of our saluation: the fountayne (I say) of iustification and grace. For it is the election of God from which do flow all good things. Wherefore the Apostle minding to speke of those things, which the hearers would not take in very good parte, thought it good by some preface to prepare theyr myndes to geue eare vnto him. For he which goeth aboute to perswade any thing vnto an other man, ought firste of all to laboꝝ to win the hearer vnto him. For we do not easely hearken vnto those, whom we suspect to hate vs. But this oration of the Apostle is so conterpeysed and tempered, y it mought neither to much displease the minds of y Hebrayes, neither yet in y meane time mought hide any thing fro the, which was nedefull for the to know: which thing y preachers of our times ought to obserue. For oftentimes we see y me offed in either part. For certain do so flatter theyr aduersaries, y they remit vnto the many things which are not to be remitted, & they kepe in silence many things, which yet to saluation are very necessary to be knowen. On y other side, some seme to be moued with so great a zeale of piety, y they thinke it not inough to teach those things which are true & necessary, vnles also they do al maner of waies eragitate & stir vp theyr aduersaries, & by that meanes it cometh to passe, that those men, whome they would

Ab. 15.

bying

The church
is not to be measured by the multitude.

Things probable are not alwayes
true but oftentimes false.

The number of them that truly beleue is small.

Fewnes
nor multitude con-firme not the cause.

Three errors of the Donatists.

It is proper vnto
the church
to be Catholike.
The cause
is proued
by the word of God, and not by few-nes nor multitude.

Election
the foun-
taine of all good things

What preachers ought to obserue.

What grief
is.

None the cause of griefe.

The griefe of sorrow
of women in trauell.

bring vnto Christ, being with such reproches and clamours so made they do not only, not embrace the truth so offered them, but also doo dayly more and more go backe from it. The chiefe sentence of the Apostle in this place is this: I haue ceaused an exceeding griefe in mind, by reason of the refection of the Iewes. Griefe (as sayth Cicero in his Tusculane questions) is a disease which bereth the mind, and it is taken by reason of the euill which seemeth to be already at hand, and to be present. For that disease which is taken for an euill, which is come, is not called griefe, but feare. If a man demand, from whence this griefe springeth. I aunswere, from loue. For when it goeth ill with them, vnto whome we would good, we beginne to be grieved. But if vnto them, whome we care not for, or who are not deare vnto vs, there happen anpe misfortune, that is not customeable grieuosome vnto vs. The Apostle wonderfullye amplifieth his sentence. For he sayth not only, lamm, that is, griefe, but also he addeth, eduma, which word signifieth not a common griefe, but y<sup>e</sup> wherewith women are payned when they are in trauell: then which griefe there is in a maner none counted more grieuous, or more bitter. And when he had sayd Great, he added also, Continuall. For there are many grieues which continuance of tyme mitigateth. But Paul sayth, that his griefe is perpetuall.

In my hart. This is not a quality during but for a tyme, as is that which springeth indeede of a vehement passion, but yet such a passion, as is short, and during but for a while. But this griefe had taken most deepe rootes in the hart of Paul. He calleth the Hebrewes his brethren, although he was oftentimes very ill handled of them. He himselfe was an Hebrew of the tribe of Benjamin, as he writeth in his epistle to the Philippians. And he calleth them brethren according to the flesh, to signifie, that in religion he dissented from them: as such which had not obtayned either iustification or adoption by the faith of Christ.

It is neuer lawfull to put Anathe ma to any ble.

I would wishe to be Anathema. He mought haue sayd, I would or could be content to be Anathema. But by a more vehement word, he would signifie the force of his wyl. To be Anathema, is a much more greater thinge, then to be plucked away or to be seperated. For these thinges may haue some end, but that which is made Anathema, it is neuer afterward lawfull to vse. And to adde a greater emphasis vnto his wordes:

What Ana
thema is.

I my selfe (saith he) would wishe. By whiche doubling of the pronounne, he would most expessedly signifie himselfe. And when he addeth, From Christ, he yet also heareth by a greater waight: for he speaketh of that Christ, whome, he affirmeth to be vnto him, life, knowledge, wisdom, iustification, and redemption, and from whome a little before he sayde, he coulde by no maner of meanes be plucked away. What thing Anathema properly is, Chrysostome vpon this place at large declareth. Anathemata (saith he) are those thinges which being consecrated vnto God, are layde apart from other thynges, and which also no man dare once either touch or vse. Wherefore by translation those men are called Anathemata, which are as persons contagious and execrable removed from the Church, and with whome no man dare afterwarde vse familiarity. Vnto either of these Anathemata, this thing is common, to be seperated and removed from men: but the consideration is farre diuers. For the first are seperated for hono<sup>r</sup> sake, but these men for horro<sup>r</sup> and hatred sake, because they are detestable. Wherefore sometymes they are called piaculares, that is, polluted. The lattines also do after the same maner vse this word Sacer, that is, holy, both in good and also in euill part. For Horace sayth Sacer intestabilis esto, that is, let not the wicked man be receaued for witness. Also Virgill, Auri sacra fames, that is, the wicked hunger of golde. The Hebrewes also vse in the same maner this word Cadosh, in the either part: so that that word signifieth sometymes to sanctifie, and sometymes to pollute: as it is written in the 2. chapter of the Prophete Haggai, and in the 21. chapter of Deut. And amonge the same Hebrewes by one and the selfe same word is signified both this worde holy, and also

Sacer, that is, ho ly, take in good and euill part.

also an harlot, as well male as female: as it is written in the 23. chapter of Deut. But Anathema in Hebrew is called Haram. But to returne to the Greke woꝛde Anathemata are by an other name called ἐπισημα, that is, dedicated vnto God. Because that they are either seperated, or els suspended, by this declaration it sufficiently appeareth, what it was that Paul wished vnto himselfe. The pꝛones of his pꝛincipall sentence, wherein he sayde, that he had conceaued so great a grieſe, that he would gladly be made Anathema foꝛ his bꝛetherne, are of two soꝛtes. The one is taken of witnesses, and the other of the cause. And the cause is, foꝛ that they were Israelites, vnto whome pertaineth the adoption, the lawe, the gloꝛy, the testaments, the pꝛomises, and foꝛ that Christ as touching the fleſhe came of their fathers. And as touching the first poynt concerning witnesses, he affirmeth, that he sayth the truth in Christ, as though he should haue to do befoꝛe him, and should cite him foꝛ a witnesse of his saying. Farther he bꝛingeth his owne conscience as a witnes: and that rightly, especially seing he entreateth of that thinge, whiche no man could knowe but Paul himselfe. Foꝛ none knoweth our affections, but we our selues onely: and therefoꝛe Paul calleth his conscience foꝛ a witnes as befoꝛe the iudgement seate of God. And because the conscience may sometimes be deceaued, soasmuch as euery man flattereth himselfe moꝛe then is meete, and maketh his affections greater then they are in very deede, therfore addeth he.

In the holy ghost. ] Foꝛ the conscience being by it directed and tempered, is neuer deceaued. Wherefoꝛe this othe of the Apostle consisteth of thꝛe notable witnesses. And he sweareth with great waight not in a light or trifling cause, but in such a cause, as bꝛingeth a greates helpe to saluation: and also vnto them vnto whome he writeth, is very profitable. And seing he so earnestly affirmeth with an othe, that he had conceaued so greates a sorrow, as he hath now expꝛessed, it most manifestly appeareth, that that ἀνάστα (that is, lacke or want of affection) of the Stoikes, agreeth not with Christians. Foꝛ certayne thinges are so framed of nature, that strength way so sone as they are offered vnto vs, we by a certayne naturall motion abhorre from them: as is death: and as also are bitter chances when they happen vnto them, which are loꝛned vnto vs either by kindred, or by countrey. Christ vndoubtedly wept foꝛ the discention of Ierusalem: and was heauy, when his time was come, that he should sone after dye. And Paul in the latter to the Corinthians sayth, that when he shall come, he shall bewaile them which haue not repented. Samuell pꝛoꝛed out teares foꝛ Saul, because God had reſected him: foꝛ whome also when he was slayne, Dauid wept with a publike sorrow. Jeremy also with many teares & ditties, bewayled the captiuitie and overthrow of his people. But these thinges (thou wilt say) happen vnto our frēds by the pꝛouidence and commaundement of God, wherefoꝛe when they so happen, holy men ought not to lament foꝛ them. Foꝛ we must chearefully obey the will of God, otherwise why do we dayly pray, Thy will be done? But thou must vnderstand, that we may do both, as our minde hath a respect vnto diuerse thinges, foꝛ when a man beholdeth the aduersities and calamities of men, and especially of those men vnto whome he is by any familiar aquaintaunce loꝛned: then is he both grieved and also woulde gladly with a greates pꝛice redeme those euilles. And contrariwise when we behold the decrees, pꝛouidence, and will of God, we do not only take them in good part, whatsoeuer thinges they be, but also we receaue them gladly and with a cherefull mynde. Wherefoꝛe in the Prophets, there are red sundꝛy kindes of speech, according as they had a respect to diuerse thinges. Sometimes they seme to desire God to turne away the calamities of sinners and seme to bewepe and lament them: and sometimes they seme to wish that they which hate God, may be punished, and perish, foꝛ our mynde like a Kameleon, which way soeuer it bendeth it selfe, putteth an affecte according to the nature of the thing which it beholdeth. Crasus when he saw his sonne slayne and his legions go to the woꝛse, Pe soldiers (sayth he) fight cheare ἀνάστα of the Stoike not agreeable with Christians.

Of what greates waight the othe of the Apostle is.

Whether it be lawfull to be grieved foꝛ the aduersities of our neyghbours.

The Prophets differ in cheꝛ kindes of speech according to the diuersity of the respect.

An example of Crasus.

fully.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

Whether it wer lawfull for Paul to wish to be made Anathema from Christ

The commentaries
ascribed vnto Jerome.

Paul was sorry for the destruction
of the he-thens and not for his
sinne.

fully, & manfully defende your Pub. welth. For this mourning is my p<sup>r</sup>ivate mourning. Whē he looked vpon his owne mischance, he could not but lamēt: but when he set befoze his eyes h<sup>e</sup> helth of h<sup>e</sup> publike welth he called back his mind to cherefulness. So did Brutus, & so did Torquatus they? otur childzē, y<sup>e</sup> the discipline of war, & publike liberty might be p<sup>r</sup>eserued. But here ariseth an other question moze difficult: how it was lawfull for Paul to wish to be seperated frō Christ. when as we ought to loue God aboue all thinges: and when as we rede in the Gospel, He which loneth his father or mother, or bretherne more then me, is not worthy of me. This thing, sayth Chrysostome, is so obscure, that Paul seemeth to speake riddles. For soasmuch as befoze he had said, that he was perswaded, that he could by no creature be plucked away from h<sup>e</sup> loue of Christ, by what meanes can he now wish to be made Anathema for his b<sup>r</sup>ethern? There haue bene some, which thought that Anathema in this place is Kimelion, that is, a deare treasure, and of greate p<sup>r</sup>ice: such as noble men vse to haue greate store of, made of gold and siluer, and fashioned with wonderfull greate conning: but this is a triflinge and childishe interpretation. For if Paul had ment so, he should not haue sayd, from Christ, but, befoze Christ. Farther what a great acte were this I pray you: For there is none which desireth not to be acceptable vnto God, and to pertaine vnto his flocke: especiallye seinge he knoweth, that he is the chiefe goodnes. Farther if Paul had bene in steade of a treasure befoze Christ, what should that haue p<sup>r</sup>ofited his b<sup>r</sup>ethern according to h<sup>e</sup> flesh? But a man peradventure wil say that he might then the better make intercession for them befoze God. But soasmuch as the prayers of the saythfull lene not vnto the merites or dignity of the that pray, but only to a true and liuely sayth, the Apostle ought not so diligently to put in these words in this place. For he prayed without intermissiō for other men, although according to those mens opinion he should not be Anathema. In dede Chrysostome reherseth this exposition, but yet he cōfesseth it to be ridiculous and foolish. The commentaries which are ascribed vnto Jerome, say, that these are to be referred vnto that time, wherein Paul persecuted the Church of Christ: as though he would say, that he could not only not be by any meanes remoued from the loue of Christ, but also that he was chiefly for that cause exceedingly b<sup>r</sup>ered, bycause in time past he had wished to be a straunger from Christ. Which interpretation when I moze diligently consider, I see, that it agreth nether with the wordes, nor with the intent of the Apostle. For this is his scope, that by reason of those thinges whereof he will afterward speake, he might perswade the Jewes of his loue towarde them: lest he should seme of hatred to say, that they are not now the people of God, but are utterly strange frō the promise. Which thing he could not haue obteyned by rehering his sinne, wherein he had persecuted the Church of God. For the Jewes inought haue sayd: Although hitherto thou hast loued vs, when thou heldest on our side, yet afterwarde when thou wentest vnto Christ, thou didst change thy minde: and because thou hast begone to hate vs, therfore doest thou now speake these euill thinges agaynst vs. But if these thinges be vnderstand of the p<sup>r</sup>esent state, wherein he wrote this epistle vnto them, and that by these wordes is signified, y<sup>e</sup> he would euen the also be Anathema from Christ for them, then can there be no doubt put of his good will towarde them. Wherefore these thinges serue nothing to the purpose of Paul if they be wrested vnto that time, wherein he was as yet an vnbeleuer. And that he was grieved for they? distruction, and not for his sinne, this playnly declareth which is afterwarde added: Not as though the vword of God hath fallen avway. For therfore he was grieved when he saw them perishe, bycause the promises of God seemed to be infringed and violated. And as he denieth, that the promises of God are infringed: so also desireth he to redeme euen with his owne distruction, that it should not be thought so to come to passe, and thereby the name of God should be euill spoken of. Whereence come those teares and disres, and not bycause he had persecuted the Church of God: which yet I doubt not but it was a greate a greate and continuall grieſe vnto him. But why he ſhould make mencion of that grieſe at this preſente, there is no reaſon doubtles as far as I can ſee. Farther, what neded he to contend about this thyng wyth an othe? For it was freſh in euerye mans memoꝛye, what an enemy he had bene in tyme paſt vnto Chriſte. For his perſecution was not done in corners, but publihelpe and in the ſight of all. But thou wilt ſaye, he therfore ſweareth, to make men beleue that he was excedyngelpe ſorry for that matter. For, that was ſecret, neyther coulde it be knowne of all men: but ſuche ſuſpicions as are obſcure are confirmed by an oth. But I thinke no man doubted, but that Paul was ſorry for the hatred which he had boꝛne againſt Chriſt, when as all men ſaw with how great a ſeruentnes he preached his Goſpell throughout the whole world. Wherefore theſe thinges were not ſo doubtfull, that they ſhould ned to be confirmed by an oth. Whereouer what great thinges ſhould he thereby ſpeake of himſelfe: or how ſhould he by this meanes commend himſelfe vnto his brethzen by ſwearing? But now let vs heare what the true Ierome iudged, as touching this matter. For, that is a counterfeited Ierome which is aſcribed vnto thoſe commentaries. But that is the true Ierome which writeth vnto Algaſia, in the 9. queſtion. For he asked his counſell touching this place of Paul. And he answereth, that it is a queſtion of great waight, and not raſhly to be paſſed ouer, eſpecially ſo far much as the Apoſtle wyth an oth confirmeth thoſe thynges which he ſpeaketh. And with great admiratiō he addeth, that it is a prudence vnhheard of, that a man ſhould for Chriſtes ſake wiſhe to be ſeperated from Chriſt. Straight way he compareth Paul with Moſes and contendeth, that either of them were endued with one and the ſelfe ſame ſpirite. For they were both paſtoꝛs of the people of God. And as Chriſt ſayth, It is the part of a good ſhepherd to geue his lyfe for his ſhepe. For to ſaye when the wolfe aſſayleth, is the parte of a hired ſeruaunt and not of a ſhepherd. Wherefore his iudgement is, that Paul deſired to dye for the ſaluation of his brethzen. For he knew that he which would ſaue his ſoule, ſhould loſe it, and he which would loſe it, ſhoulde finde it. And to this end tendeth that which is befoꝛe ſpoken, For thy ſake are we put to death all the day long, and are appointed as ſhepe to be ſlayne. Paul (ſaith he) deſired to geue his body and lyfe, that their ſpirite myght be ſaued. Farther he addeth, that it may be proued by mo places then one, that Haraḡ, that is, Anathema in the old teſtament, is taken for ſlaughter or killing. He confeſſe that in deede, the Apoſtle woulde and wiſhed to geue his life for the ſhepe committed to his charge, and for all thoſe which might be brought vnto Chriſt, that in him might be fulfilled thoſe thinges which wanted of the paſſion of Chriſt. But many thinges declare vnto vs, that there can be no mencion made of that thing in this place. For firſt, they which ſo dye teſtifying the ſayth of Chriſt for the health of their neighbours, are not Anathemata, that is, men ſeperated from Chriſt, but are moſt nighly ioyned vnto him. They are rather Anathemata, that is, ſeperated from Chriſt, which perſecute and kyll them. Farthermoze, Haraḡ, which he ſaith, ſometimes in the olde teſtament ſignifieth killing, could neuer be redeemed noꝛ be applied vnto other bleſſes. For beaſtes which after that maner were bound vnto God, were deſtroyed by ſlaughter: and thinges without life could neuer be put to publike uſe, or uſe of comyn life. But martyres which by preaching the truth dyed for the ſaluation of their brethzen, were not for that cauſe ſeperated from Chriſt, but rather paſſed from this life, as men which ſhould euermoze abyde with him. Whereouer what will be anſwere of Moſes? For he deſired to be ſlaine, vnleſſe God woulde ſpare the people, but put me out (ſaith he) of the booke which thou haſt written: that is (if we folloꝛw the comyn opynion) blot me out of the booke of the elect. For I allow not the cold ſaynted deuices of the Rabbines: among whom Sepharadi ſaith: If thou ſpareſt not the people put my name out of the booke of the lawe, that it be not red there. What moze ſound expoſition can there be deuised then this. An other of the Rabbines thinketh that to be blotted out of the booke which God had written, is nothing els, then to be read Algaſia:

Ierome

Martyrs which dye for the name of Chriſt are not made Anathemata. What Moſes deſired
of God.
Sepharadi.
The opynion
of an other Rabbine.

moned

moued from the office of a magistrate, that he should not be the head of the people, as God had commanded in the booke of the law. This exposition in dede seemeth to be somewhat more witty and more likely. Howbeit by the wordes of the holy histoꝝy it is confuted. For when Moses feruently prayed, the Lorde answered, Let me alone, I will kill all thys people at once, for their contumacy towards me, and will make thee a prince of an other people, both much greater, and also more noble. Wherefore there is no reason, why Moses shoulde desire to be putte out of authority, that he shoulde not bee the head of that people, when as God of hys owne accorde and wyllingly offred that thing vnto hym. Wherefore we must nedes confesse, that Moses desired none other thing, then that which Paul now wisheth for. Chrysostome is so much against this opinion, which Ierome defendeth to Algasia, that he sayth: That such as so thinke, are so farre from the truth, as a blindeman is from the light of the sunne. And of this his confutation this reason he bringeth. Paul (saith he) had before spoken many thynges of that straighte coniunction which he had wth God, when he sayd: that neyther tribulation, nor anguish, nor persecution, nor hunger, nor nakednes, nor daunger, nor sworde is able to separte hym from the loue of God. After that, as though he had not yet satisfied himselfe, he addeth, neyther death, nor lyfe, nor aungels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor thynges present, nor thynges to come, nor heighth, nor depth, nor any other creature. Now after the rehearsall of so many and so great thynges, what more weighty or more noble thyng could he bring, which could excell these thynges? Could this, that he would gladly suffer death, to bring hys brethren vnto Christ? But this (sayth he) is a very small matter, if it be cōpared with those thynges before spoken. For before he had wisely mencioned death: but he whiche refuseth to geue hys lyfe for the truth, and for the health of his neyghbour, separeteth hymselfe frō God by feare of death. And therefore he should haue added no new thing to that which he before had spoken. Wherefore we ought to thinke that Paul had a regard to farre greater thynges, then these men suppose he had. There is an other opinion of those, which thinke that Paul referred not these thynges vnto the time wherin he wrote them, but vnto that tyme wherin he liued a straunger from Christ. For the better declaration wherof, we ought to vnderstand, that there are certaine men, which after that they haue cast themselues hedlong into any thing, endeouour themselues by al meanes to draw others to the same, not that the place and estate wherinto they haue transferred themselues, liketh them, but that hauing many companions ioyned vnto them, they might either be the lesse reproued, or els the thing which they haue yll begon, might haue a more tollerable ende. And thus these men expounde the wordes of Paul. The Iewes mought haue suspected, that Paul for that cause desired to bring al other mē vnto Christ, for y<sup>e</sup> he himself had already geue himselfe vnto him, & not for that from the harte he counted the thing good. But not so, saith the Apostle: yea rather so deare is your saluation vnto me, that so from the hart I desire to communicate this good thing vnto you, that I would wishe my selfe to be accursed from Christ, and not to be yet called vnto him, so that ye might come vnto him: that is, I would earnestly desire, that ye might haue come to Christ before me. And this thinke they, is, to be made accursed for his brethren. And to haue some shew to proue this: Thou seest (say they) that he saith not, that he desireth now to be made accursed (for that could he not do, after he was once conuerted), but onely, he wisheth himselfe to be made accursed, that is, when he was not yet conuerted vnto Christ. But euery man may easely see, that this interpretation is wrested and troublesome, and yet if we should receiue it, Paul should not auoide it, which he seemeth most of all to eschue: For what do they not consider, that he which of lone desireth to haue bene once in times past accursed from Christ, the selfe man desireth this also, now to be made accursed? For if he should haue done that to the honour of God, how should he not do this also to the honour of God? Howbeit this interpretation among others haue the Greeke Scholies. I will not now stand any longer about the confutatio therof, for that I doubt not, but there are not many which will defend it. There are others which go about to proue this desire of Paul by the law of God.

God. Men (say they) are so framed, & every man when he is in trouble & aduersity, desireth gladly to be redeemed by some other man, yea even with the hurt of him which should redeme him. They adde moreouer, that the law of God is, that we should loue our neighbours as our selues. Wherefore, soasmuch as we our selues would gladly desire, that an other man should be damned for vs, therefore we ought also to wishe the same to others, that we our selues should be damned for them, least we would otherwise to be done vnto oure neighbours, then we would be done vnto oure selues, if we were in the like case. And farther they say, that every one of vs ought so to loue his neighbour, as Christ hath loued vs, but Christ for oure sakes did not only geue his life vpon the crosse, but also was made a curse and was after a sort forsaken of the father. For he cryed, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Wherefore they conclude, that that thing which Paul and Moses did, was dew by the Law. Here if thou demaund, who can performe this Law. They will answer, no man: but yet are not godly men for that cause condemned. For (say they) we all dayly want muche of the iuste obseruation of the Law: but our dayly falles are forgiven vs for Christs sake, and that which wanteth of our righteousness, is made good by the righteousness of the Lord, which is ascribed vnto vs through fayth. And yet ought not anye man therefore to slake his endeour to performe this kynde of commaundement. We must labor as muche as lieth in vs: if it succede not we ought to lament: and so shall it come to passe, that sinne shall not be imputed vnto vs, so that we do not betterly shake of our endeour: which thinge some men do, which so farre fall, that they hate theyr enemies and persecute them: but we ought not so to flatter our selues. For there are certayne kinds of sinnes so greauous, that they can not stand with fayth and charity. Howbeit we must confesse, that this vertue, which we se was in Moses & in Paul is a verie rare vertue. Wherefore this vertue may be called heroicall or noble. This in dede is a good interpretation, and commended of those men, vnto whome in very dede for piety and learning sake I attribute very much. But in considering it, I finde two greate doubttes. As touching the first, Augustine in his booke de Sermone domini in monte, saith, That that sentence of Christ, that we should do vnto others, that which we would should be done vnto our selues, is to be vnderstand of an vpright and iust will. For when we desire to haue any thing done vnto vs, which is vpright and iust, it is mete, that we performe the same thing vnto an other man. But if we our selues should desire any thing, that is filthy or vniust then is it not mete, that we should doo the same thing vnto our neighbour. For suppose there were an vnchaste and wicked mā, which through filthy counsell would be content his wife should play the harlote: shall he therefore wish out sinne defile an other mans wife? And if a man being in desperation in aduersities would desire, that one should kill him: shall it for that cause be Lawfull for hym to kill his neighbour. Wherefore for as much as I do not thinke & the will of & man is iust, which to be deliuered from the punishment of death, would desire to haue an other to suffer in his place, neither also can I thinke that a man is bound to desire vnto hym selfe damnation, to the end an other man should be deliuered, bycause he desireth to haue such thinges vnto him selfe. For (as I haue sayde) he desireth & against reason, and iustice. Wherefore if damnation be sometimes wished for the brethren sake, it is for some other cause to be wished for. The second doubt is concerning Christ: For although he for our sakes suffered death, yet was he not in very dede seperated from God, but that his humanity was holpen, when vpon the Crosse he suffered all extreme paynis. He was also made a curse as touching the punishment of the law, which punishment he suffered for our saluation sake and he was counted as a blasphemor, and an vngodly person, and being as it were conuicted of these crimes, he was condemned, but yet was he not by eternall damnation seperated from God. Erasmus sayth, Optarim, by the potentiall mode, which signifieth, I would haue wished, namely, if it were possible. But this exposition dissolueth not the doubt. For herein is the doubt: whether it be lawfull for the saluation of our neighbour to wishe or to desire to be made accursed

How this is to be vnderstand, that we should do vnto others that which we would should be done vnto vs.

It is not iust that a man should desire to haue an other man punished for himselfe.

Christ was not for our sakes seperated from God.

Cap. 9. A Commentarie vpon the Holy men are liberall

of theyr owne thynges.

What cause
haue Paul to this desire.

It is not absurd for a man to pre-ferre the dignity of Christ before his owne salua-
tion.

curfed from Christ. And it might seme, that although it were possible, yet a good man ought neuer to haue any such thought to enter into his harte, to desire this thing, especially seeing there can nothing be found better then God. There are others whiche thynke, that Paul when he wished these thynges, had his cogitation fixed only vpon the destruction & perdition of the Jewes and 10; y cause he was so much greued, that straight way by a certayne force of charity he would redeme them, euen with his owne condemnation. Which force soasmuch as it came from the holy ghost and from charity, could not but please God. These are not (say they) the wordes of a man conterpelling himselfe betwene God and the saluation of his neighbour, as one which as it were after a deepe deliberation would preferre the saluation of his neighbours, before Christ: but as holy men are liberall of their owne thynges, so he considering the damnation of the Jewes, for as much as he was desirous by some meanes whatsoever it were to put it away, was willing to offer for them, if it were possible, euen his owne damnation, that as it were by an exchange made, they might be deliuered. Neither offered he himselfe in such maner, as though he would be a sacrifice for them, or that he thought himselfe worthy so great honour, that if he himselfe were condemned, they should be deliuered: but because he had no greater thing to offer. But this opinion is hereby weakened, because it is not very likely, that Paul wrote not those thynges which he wrote with great deliberation and aduiseement. Wherefore he was not by violence or rashely impelled to speake these thynges, but by great and wayghty deliberation: that by what meanes so euer it were, he might redeme the saluation of his brethren. Neither know I whether such a will, which afterward nedes to be corrected by the iust rule of the loue of God, whome we ought to loue aboue all thynges, may be ascribed vnto the holy ghost or no. And soasmuch as Paul speaketh as it appeareth of a matter of vehement charity, it seemeth not probable that only a certayne first motion stirred him, whereof we may doubt whether it procede from the holyghost, and whether it agree with the perfect loue of God, if it be not amended. Now resteth to rehearse the opinion of Chrysostome, which for as much is my iudgement is of all other most playne, easy, and true, ought to be taken as agreeable vnto the wordes of the Apostle. First, saith he, the cause of this desire in Paul is to be sought for: which if we be ignorant of, then may we easily erre. As when he circumcised Timothe, when he polled his hed, when he took vpon him the bow, vnles a man know to what end he did these thynges, he might easily suspect that he was become an open Jewe. But if a man will more narrowly consider the thing, he shall easily discharge him of all maner of Jewishnes. Neither is this consideration to be had in Paul only, but also in Abraham, in Phinees, and in Elias: which men vnles thou diligently examine their causes, thou maist count for homicides. Wherefore let vs demaund of Paul: Who moued thee O Paul vnto this thing, to be made accursed from Christ? He will answere vndoubtedly, No man perswaded me so to do, but Christ himselfe I would wishe in dede that my brethren according to the flesh, should be saued: Howbeit I haue not fixed the end of my desire in them. For this haue I wished, not only for their sakes, but chiefly for Christs sake: that in this thing his grace and truth might most of all shine abroad. And it ought not to seme absurde vnto any man, if I haue preferred the dignity and honour of Christ, before mine owne saluation. But this seemeth much to be against this sentence, for that Paul made no mention of this principall end, and of this his chiefe intent. But neither did he y without a cause. For he intended warily to set forth his matter, which if he should haue openly spoken, should not so well haue serued his turne. For while he wente aboute to perswade his bretherne according to the flesh, how much he loued them, in that he said that he wished for theyr sakes to be accursed from Christe, if he had added, that he had done it for the hono; of Christ whom he worshipped, I cannot tell what might seme to be diminished of that loue, which he sayd that he bare towards his brethren. Wherefore he cunningly kept that in silence, wherein yet was the chiefe and principall principall cause of his desire. Wherewith least the prudent reader should in any wise erre, he hath so tempered his wordes which follow, that by them he may very easily gather what his meaning was. For thus he writeth: To whom pertaineth the adoption, the covenantes, the glory, the giving of the lawe, the worshipping, the promises, of whome are the fathers, of whome is Christ according to the flesh: who is God over all, blessed for ever, Amen. These wordes being well and diligently examined do declare, what Paul had a regard unto in this his so fervent desire. Let vs call to memory, that the Israelites were called of God: that they abode long in the profession of God: that they kept the lawes of God a longe tyme: that they by innumerable Prophets receaved promises of Christ to come, and of other good thynges. Forasmuch therefore as they had bene such men, and yet seemed now to be excluded, and other nations which were ignorant of God, and geuen to most filthy idolatry were placed in their steede, many began to be offended at the providence, sayth, and gouernment of God. Wherfore either they blasphemed him, or els they made exclamation openly, that this was not the Christ promised in the Law. These thynges troubled Paul exceedingly much: For he would not that in the assayes of the Gospel should be brought in a stage matter, or a matter of pastime, as though that which god had promised to one people, he would geue to another: and as though Christ was borne for the Jewes, but profited none but the Gentiles. And that Paul was by this reason chiefly moued, that manifestly declareth, which is a litle afterwarde added, Not as though the word of God hath fallen away. By which wordes he declareth, that he admonished vs of these thynges, lest any man should thinke that the promises of God were not sure. And none other intent had Moses, when he desired to be blotted out of the booke which God had written, that God should spare the people. For he geth this reason, Lest peradventure it be said, that God hath brought a people out of Egypt: but was not able to bring to passe that they should obteyne the Land, which he had promised them: and therefore would he kill them in the desert. Neither doth Paul in this place say, that he wisheth to be seperated from the loue of God. (for he would by no meanes cease of from louing of him:) only he wisheth to be excluded from the blessed communion with God, to be deuised from the fellowship of the Angelles, and of the sayntes, to be depriued of the fruition of eternall felicity. And this thing ought euery one of vs to desire, namely, to preferre the honoz of God before his owne felicity. And Paul speaketh not these thynges of the Gentiles as he doth of the Jewes: not that he would not do as much for them also, when the like danger of the honour of God shoulde happen: but because then he entreated not of the Gentiles. For they on euery side of theyr owne accord came vnto Christ, when as the Jewes most vehemently resisted him. The same Chrysostome vpon Matthew (expounding this place, It is better that one member bee cutte of, and cast away, then that the whole body should perishe) saith: That Paule considered this thing, that rather he being cut of and made accursed, God might haue glory of the greate body being saued, than that he himselfe should be saued, and a greate multitude of lewes, which were like vnto a certayne greate body should be cast into hell fire. This so greate loue of Paul farre passeth the affect of all parentes toward theyr Children. And so greate was it that Chrysostome writting touching priesthode, sayth, that he was for a iust cause feared a way from that office, because he saw himselfe to be farre distant from such kinde of loue. The same Chrysostome de providentia dei writeth, That Paul desired rather to line in hell, then to se his brethern condemned. And he addeth, that it was a greater vexation vnto Paul to se the destruction of his brethern the lewes, then if he himselfe should haue bene tormented in hell. For he desired that torment rather, then to se his brethern perishe miserably. Neither was he deceaued in this iudgment. For it came not from reason or vnderstanding, but from the impulsio[n] of the spirite of God. The Schoolemen differ not much from this interpretation of Chrysostome. For Thomas sayth, That Paule neuer wished for the seperation from God which cometh through sinne, neither could he wish for it keeping charity: but for the aduancement of the glory of God it was Lawfull

Xx.

for

Why he made no mention of the principall cause of his desire.

The end of Moses request.

Paul desired not to cease of from louing of God. Every man ought to preferre the honoz of God before his owne felicity. Why Paul wished not this thing for the Gentiles.

Cap. 9. A Commentarie vpon the

for him to wish for the separation from felicity. Yea & same Thomas addeth, That Paul sometimes desired for his brethern sake to be separated from that felicity, and to haue it deferred for a time. For vnto the Philippians he writeth, That to dye should be vnto hym gayne, howbeit it was profitable for them, that he should abide in the flesh, & he sheweth that he both desired and also hoped that God would graunt, that he might be conuersante with them for a time. So (saith Thomas) mought he also in this place for the helth of his brethern wish to be separated from God, ether for euer, or else for a time. But that these

These wordes cannot be vnderstande of a separation
for a time,

Paul wisheth
for that thing which could not be done.
The will is sometimes rauidged to things impossible.

Affinitie of the flesh is an honest occasion to make vs to loue
our neighbor.

wordes can not be vnderstand of a separation for a time, this word Anathema sufficiently declareth. For Anathema signifieth y separation from commo vse, which can neuer by any means be reuoked, or restored againe. But this Greke word anathema, may signify not only, I did wishe, but also I did pray. For the ought we to meruaile, that Paul wished for this thing, although it could not come to passe (for there is no doubt, but that he was one of the predestinate) for our will is oftentimes rauidged vnto those things which are not possible to be done. For so prayed David: Who shall geue me power to dy for thee my sonne Absolon. When yet it could not be, that he should dye for Absolon.

That are my kinsmen according to the flesh. Affinity of the flesh is oftentimes an occasion that maketh vs to loue our neighbour and that of charity. Paul saith to Tim. He which hath not a care of his own, and especially of his householde, hath denied the sayth, and is worse then an infidel: for y vnder the pretence of religion, he leadeth a worse life the infidels, who being led only by y instinct of nature, are louing towards their kinsfolks, & prouide things necessary for the. Wherefore, we ought to thinke y the coiundio of the flesh & of kinred is geuen vnto vs of God, as a picke to charity, not y we ought to haue a regard to such things as he our owne, but as adioyned vnto vs of God. For otherwise there is none which doth chose vnto himselfe parentes, brethren, or countrey. Wherefore we ought to haue a care of those which are geuen to vs of God: and not to bestow our endeuor as we list our selues without choyse: not that we ought not to loue, and to do good to all me what soeuer they be. Now onely he entreateth of degrees, and sheweth an ordinary and an accustomed way, wherehence we must begin: vnles peraduenture some occasion moze necessary draw vs an other way. Now then doth the Apostle say in the latter to the Cor. that he knew none as touching the flesh, yea neither Christ himselfe: Where, to know, is, to put confidence: for he saith, that he did no moze put confidence in any outward thing, but in Christ onely. For the false Apostles continually boasted of their Jewishe religion, of the stocke of Christ according to the flesh, of the law, of ceremonies, and other such like, as though of these things should depend the saluation of men. These things in dede are benefites of God, and those not to be contemned, but yet without Christ no man ought to put confidence in them. This meaneth Paul in that place by these wordes, to know accordyng to the flesh, yea eue the flesh of Christ without a true and sound faith nothing profiteth. For so Christ himselfe saith in Iohn. The fleshe profiteth not any thyng, it is the spirite which quickeneth. Wherefore we haue not now knowen Christ by the iudgement of the flesh, neither do we consider him accordyng to the base conditions which he had whilest he was here on earth. Paul before when he was of the Jewishe religion attributed much vnto these things: namely, that he was a Jewe of the tribe of Benjamin, a Pharisee, and that of his people should Christ be borne. Yea he then in these things did put the whole ground and stay of his saluation. But beyng afterward conuerted vnto Christ, he placed al his confidence in faith in him. Wherefore he sayth: that he now knew nothing accordyng to the flesh: namely, in that manner that he had before knowen.

The flesh of Christ without faith profiteth not.

Places made habitable by the Gods vnto
whome they were consecrated.

Which are Israelites. From a priuate condition, wherby they according to the flesh were knit vnto him, he ascendeth to a publike condition: namely, y they were Israelites, that is, the people of God, Teuolah the chosen people of God dere vnto them the stocke, the shepe, the lot, and the inheritance of the Lord. Many nations and cities had a wonderful great delight in themselves, for that they were con-

consecrated vnto certaine Gods. Athenes was commended of Minerva. Dolos the hand, of Apollo and Diana. Cicero against Verres, praiseth all Sicilia, but especially the mountaine Etna, for that it was consecrated vnto Ceres, as though it were wholly nothing els, but an house and temple of Ceres. How much more honorable was it to Israelites, for their whole nation was consecrated vnto God the creator of heauen and of earth. Hereby ought we to learne, that the giftes of God can not be so contaminated of men; but that they are perpetually to be commended. And that we should not here erre; Paul maketh an excellent distinction betwene the giftes of God, and betwene the men that are adjoined with the. The giftes of God are alwaies to be highly commended, but the men as they behaue themselves, are either to be disprayed or to be commended. Before in the 3. chap. Paul spake of the selfe same matter when he said: What is then the preferment of the Iewe. We answered, hauing a respect vnto the giftes of God. Much every manner of way: First because vnto them are committed the Wordes of God. For what if some of them haue not beleued? Hath their incredulity made void the faith of God? God forbid: But albeit after ward, when he entreateth of saluation, where he hath a respect vnto the common vices of nature, & vnto infidelity and other sinnes, he speaketh otherwise. Wherein then do we excell them? No manner of way. And to declare how much he esteemed those giftes, be they neuer so excellent, if we want faith, and be agaynst Christ, in his epistle to the Phil. when he had reckened vp all the things which he had when he was of the Iewish religion, he saith: That he counted all these things as losses and dunge. For that being seioyned from faith, they do nothing but puffe vs vp, and more and more lead vs from Christ.

[Israelites.] This is a name deriued of their father Jacob; & it is a much more excellent name, the if they had ben called Jacobites, for they receaued that name, not of y name which was geue vnto y Patriarch at his birth, but whiche he got by a victory, & by such a victory, wherin he ouercame God himselfe. Ther is set forth vnto vs no smal nobility of that man of whom they take their name, when as he is said in warring to haue ouercome euil God himselfe. For therefore was he by God called Israel, as it were a prince with God, and who had preuailed against God. And together with the name he receiued a signe or a token, or marke in his body. For after that time he began to halt. The goodly ouercome God, when they ouercome the temptations sent of him. Abraham was tempted of God, to slay his own sonne, that temptation he ouercame, and was made therby most famous. They also ouercome God, when they ouercome all aduersities, which undoubtedly happen not vnto them, without the prouidence and gouernement of God. So reade we in the holy scriptures, that Job and many other holy men did. And they so ouercome that vnto them all thinges worke to good. Finally they ouercome, when wyth a liuely and perfect faith they embrace the promises offred of God, though they be neuer so hard and difficile. So Abraham when God promised vnto him seede, ouercame sence, which resisted reason, which dissuaded; and the feblenes of his vnfruitfull body, and the age of his wife, and her perpetuall barrennes vnto that tyme. He beleued God, and wonderfully gaue vnto him his due gloze. These are those most notable victories, by which God delighteth to be ouercome, and getteth a blessing vnto those which haue so ouercome him. Their names are chaunged, so that they are called princes with God, to the ende they should not ascribe such victories vnto themselves, but vnto God. They ought rather to count, that they haue receyued them at his handes, through whose grace onely they haue obteyned them. They halt and haue a weake thigh, for that the flesh, sinne, and the remnantes of original corruption, the more we ouercome in this kinde of warring, the more weaker are they made.

To whome pertayneth the adoption. That they were the kinsmen of Paul as touching the fleshe, it came vnto them by naturall propagation. Now he turneth his speach to thinges which farre passe all nature, namely, that we should by adoption be made the sonnes of God. This they can not be by nature, but by

the

The Iewe lites were, & separated vnto
God.

We must make a distinc tion betwene
the giftes of God and be twene the m
that are adjo
ned with the.

For what if some of them haue
not beleued?

But albeit after ward, when he entreateth of saluation, where he hath a respect
vnto the common
vices of nature,

And together with the name he receiued a signe
or a token, or marke in his body.

To be called Israelites is more excellen ter then to be called Jacob bites.

Why Jacob was called Israel.

How the goodly ouercome
to ouercome
God.

An allegory of the halting of Jacob.

the singular mercy of God they obtaine by adoptiō to be made his children. Where by it is very manifest, that which I before did put you in minde of, that from the people of the Iewes is not to be taken away adoption, but that they also were the fountaines of God. But we speake not of the whole multitude confusedly, but of holy men and of the faithfull which were among that people. But thou wilt say, that they had the spirits of bondage. I graunt they had in consideration of the tyme, wherein they were holden vnder the multitude of ceremonies. But this nothing letteth their adoption, as Paul declareth to the Galatians. So long tyme (saith he) as the boye is a child, he nothing differeth from a seruant. For he lyueth vnder tutors and gouernours, and schoolmasters, until the tyme appoynted of hys father, when as yet not worthy and ynge he is made to be heire and Lord of all. And if they pertayned to adop tion, then must it needs followe, that they were endewd both with faith and with the spirite. Yea if thou wilt haue a consideration to the ancientnes of tyme, they attayned vnto this adoption before vs. God not only graunteth vnto holy men to be by adoption called the sonnes of God, but also communicateth vnto them of his nature, and geneth vnto them the holy ghost: which thing men can not do, when they adopt any man for their child. Whereouer, as Paul hath before admo nished, we ought to remember, that after adoption followeth the inheritaunce, that is, that they should be the heyres of God, and fellow heyres of Christ.

Glory.] They which write of glory do say, that it consisteth in two things: the one is, to haue an honorable opinion of a man, the other is, that that estimation be set forth by some outward signes. These two things did God most abundantly performe vnto the people of the Iewes. For he did not only beare good will towards them, but also continually many manner of wayes declared this his good will towards them. He placed amongst them the Arke of the couenant, as his habitacle: there he heard their prayers and requestes, and gaue oracles vnto them that sought them. In Deut. it is written, That there was no nation so notable, which had God so nigh vnto them as had the Israelites, when as they called vpon bys name: That glorious Thrase in Euenos, boasted that the king delighted to haue him in his sight; and that whā being overwrted with affaires he would ease his mind of that burthen and care, he would send for him, and make him sitte with hym at his table apart and alone: and hereof he so boasted, for that he counted the chitier familiarity of the king as a great glory vnto him. The Hebrewes also had glory, not only in respect of God, but also by comparison vnto other nations. For David saith in the Psalme, God hath not done so to euery nation, neither hath he manifested his iudgements vnto them.

The giving of the Law, revelatio. When God had now chosen the Jews to be his people, he would also instruct them with good laws: with laws (I say) farre passing all the laws either of Solon, or of Licurgus or of Numa, or of Minos.

The couenauntes,] διαθηκαι, that is, covenantra. This worde although sometimes it do signifie promises, yet because afterward is mention made of them, in this place it signifieth (as we haue sayde) covenantes, which God of times made with the people. And therefore the Apostle useth the plurall number. For God made a couenaunt with Abraham, with Isack, and with Jacob: and renued the same afterwarde vnder Moses, Iosua, and Iofias, and last of all hath sealed it through Christ. In these couenauntes were the Iewes long tyme comprehended, befoze that we were adopted of God. Touching the olde couenaunt there can be no doubt: and as for the new, it is playne by the histoy both of the Apostles and of the Gospell. For the Apostles came first to Christ: and by them afterwarde were called the Gentles. And of so great waight were these covenantes, that they were sealed not only with wordes, but also with outward signes: theirs, by circumcision: and ours, by baptisme.

VVorshipping.] Idolatriam, in this place signifieth the maner of worshipping of God: which unto the Jewes was so prescribed of God, that it was not law-full

The Presbiterians
were a opted of God in Scotland.

၁၇၇၅ ခုနှစ် မြို့၊ ဘာသာ၊ ဝိသေ ကောင်း ဖြစ်သော

These are not contrary, to behave, spirits of fear,
and to be the adopted children of God.
The children adopted have both the spirit and faith.

God unto his adopted children communicate of his name

wherein communications
are of glory.

God abandoned the Heedless with gloire.

1917

5

9

God often times renewed
the covenant
made with the Hebrews.

In the new covenant the Jews were before the Gentils.

full for them to adde any thing thereunto. But not in that case were the Gentils. For they in their idolatry continually deuised new rites and ceremonies.

Promises.] Of these dependeth saluation. For they which beleue the promises of God, haue both remission of sinnes, and eternall felicity. Amongst the Jewes were extant promises not only of their saluation, but also of the calling of the Gentles. But the Gentles themselves had no such promises geuen them of God. Yea rather if a man consider the oracles and answers of idols, he shall see that they had a greater care to foretell thinges to come, then they had to promise to do any thing. But the promises of God are of two sortes, some are of thinges tēporall: and some of Messias, and of eternall saluation. Here let vs note that the promise made touching Christe, was comprehended in all the other promises: in those tēporal good thinges, this one good thing was alwayes promised. There is yet also an other distinction of promises: for some are pertaining to the lawe, and some are pertaining to the Gospell. Touching which sozasmuch as we haue before abundantly spoken, now to repete the same againe it is not needfull.

Of whome are the fathers.] This prerogative is of no small waight: for it is a great matter to be borne of godly and holy parentes. For God promiset in the lawe that he would do good vnto godly and iust men, euen vnto a thousand generations. But this is not to be attributed to the dignity of the carnall seede or naturall generation. For by it men are borne the children of wrath, and obnoxious vnto originall sinne. But whatsoever good thing happeneth vnto the children of the saints, the same is wholly to be ascribed vnto the mercy of God. And that we mought vnderstand that these thinges come not of nature, we see that it oftentimes happeneth otherwise, that the children of vertuous men are wicked, and that of god parentes are borne moste wicked children. And sometimes also it happeneth that of most wicked and most vngacious men are borne notable and excellent children. For God hath not bound his grace to the elements of the world: howbeit he hath geuen a promise which can not faile. For the children of the Saintes are either saved at the length, or doubled by the society of their parents, and by their education they obtayne many excellent gifts of God, and occasions and prickings to leade a good and holy lyfe, euen as they which commonly are borne of other men. For Ismael and Esaue although at the last they became ill and wicked, yet had they of their godly parents much commodity touching the imitation of piety. They had at home examplēs of holynesse: they continually heard the word of God: they were initiated with circumcision: they were vnder the tuition of their parentes occupied in sacrifices, geuing of thanks, and infinite such godly exercises. Wherefore we can not deny, but that God after Christ came offered himselfe vnto them, as well as to the Gentles. For the Lord himselfe vouchsafed to be the minister of their Church: and the Apostles began first to preach the Gospell vnto them. For as we reade in the Actes of the Apostles, they turned not to the Gentles, before they were repulled of the Jewes. Wherefore to be borne of holy parentes and godly predecessors, is a gift of God not to be contemned. And the same, so that faith and piety be adioyned, exceedingly conduceth to saluation: but without them it heapeth by greuouser iudgement, and greater condemnation: so far is it of that it bringeth any holynesse or eternall life.

Of whome is Christ as touching the fleshe.] When he had mencioned that dignity which came vnto them of the fathers, now he addeth that also which came of posterity. The elders begat many children which were most deere vnto God, and at last Christ himselfe vouchsafed to take flesh of the nation, and that this was no small gifte may hereby be vnderstanded, for that this our Sunne which shineth in the world, neuer cometh to any place, but it maketh the same place lightsome, and warmeth it, and bringeth some fruite vnto men. How much more shall we thinke was this brought to passe amongst the Jewes by the coming of Christ? For he in the

The rites & ceremonies of the Gentils were not constant.

Amongst the Jewes were extant promises of the calling of the Gentils.

The Idols foretold thinges to come, but promised not that they would do any thing.

Two kindes of promises. The promise touching Christ was comprehended in the other promises.

It is no small matter to be borne of holy fathers.

The sanctification of the children is not trauersed of the liues of the parentes. Wherefore good thing happeneth vnto the children of the Saintes, is cometh of the mercy of God.

The grace of God is not bound to the generation of the flesh. Euill children borne of holy parentes obtayne many good thinges.

To be borne of godly parents without faith and piety increaseth damnation.

A simile.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

No nation can more aboundantly
be praised then the Iewes are now praised.
Wherein
consisteth
nobilitie.

A small taste.

True nobilite requi-
reth to haue iointed ver-
tue together
with pros-peritie of fortune.

The He-bues had theyr stocke
pure and vnmixt.

The He-bues had truly their proper lawes.

Scriptures is set forth to be the sonne of righteousness. Farther, euen as Christ by his natiuitie in the flesh, adorned with most high honour, humane nature, so must it needs be vnto the natio of the Iewes, of whome he bought to be borne, rebounded by that meanes most high glory, and most ample dignity. All these things which Paul hitherto hath reckoned, are of so great waight, that no Orator coulde more truly or more briefly haue praised any nation. For he hath omitted nothing which might seeme to nobility or ciuill felicity: but hath wonderfully and in an excellent order placed euery thing. Aristotle in his 2. booke of Rhetorikes writeth of nobilitie, that it herein consisteth, that a man haue excellent and notable elders. For although oftentimes are found men euen in our tymes also, whiche atchieue notable enterprizes, of no lesse excellency, then are these which are mentioned of the elders, yet are these auncient actes of greater admiration by reason of their antiquitie. For there is a difference betwene εὐγενεῖς and γένναϊοί. For those are called εὐγενεῖς which are borne of noble parents: but γένναϊοί, are those which retaine still the vertue of their elders, and degenerate not fro the. We see that in the families of noble men, happeneth in a maner the selfe same thing that happeneth in coorne: which is accustomed to bring forth fruite some yeares more plentifully, & some yeares more barrenly. And sometymes it chaunceth, that after a few barren yeares, follow other very fertile yeares: so the families of noble men sometymes bring forth many excellent men, as it were a plentiful harvest, sometimes as it were an vnfruitfull soile they lie barren and idle: and againe after ward they after a soyt reuiue to the vertue of their elders. And how this degenerating cometh, the same Aristotle after this maner declareth. It cometh to passe oftentimes (saith he) that the children or posterity of wise and witty men become fierce and cruell: as it is written of the posteritie of Alcibiades: contrariwise of meke, louing, and gentle parentes, are borne children colwardish, sluggish, and blockish, which thing happened in the families of Cymon and Socrates. These selfe thinges may we behold in the children of Israell. They had Patriarkes, as groundes of their stocke, being men indued with great vertues and notable excellency. Of their posteritie sprang forth oftentimes excellent men: which posteritie although sometymes it seemed to lye still without any notable issue, yet God now & the alwaies raised vp in the same, either iudges, or kings, or Prophets, or priests, which excelled in life, wisdom, and piety. Whereof the same Aristotle in his first of his Rhetorikes, writeth that the true nobilitie or felicitie of anye nation herein chiefly consisteth, that together with prosperous successe it haue vertue iointed with it: which two things God abundantly gaue vnto the Hebues. He addeth moreover, that that people is called noble, which is not mingled with the heape and confusion of other nations: for which consideration the Athenians boasted that they were αὐτοχθόνες that is, of themselves not mingled with others. But there was neuer yet nation found which had their stocke so pure and vnmixt as had the Hebues. For Abraham was the hed of their stocke: whose newew Jacob had 12. children, of whome came the twelue tribes. Farther euery tribe had their certaine families, landes, cities, and regions which they inhabited. To be short, as writeth Eusebius, de preparatione Euangelica, there was no common welth, neither of the Lacedemonians, nor of the Athenians, (which two seemed to be of all other the most excellentest) which had their stocke so certaine, or their tribes so certainly deriued fro one hed, prince, and progenitor. Farther to nobility is required, that y people liue by their owne lawes. But no nation at any time had their lawes so proper, as had the nation of the Hebues. For they had lawes geuen proper of God, which infinitely excelled the lawes of all other nations. And they liued vnder their owne lawes, so long as they obeyed the Lord. For he so long defended them from all misfortunes. But by reason of their sinnes they were sometimes led away captiue of outward nations: but these captiuities were not perpetuall. For after that they had bene punished for their wickednes, they were restored to their olde places again. Whereouer antiquitie commendeth and setteth forth the nobility of a people. But there can can nothing be found of antiquitie in the histories of the Ethnikes, but that it a long time followed after that the common wealth of the Jewes was established. Before the war of Troie whatsoever is set forth of Ethnike writers is fabulous. And that warre was then made, when Iephe was now iudge over the common wealth of the Jewes. It also not a little helpeth to nobility, to haue had many excellent me of that stocke. But there were neuer ether more, or more excellent me the there was amongst the Jewes. I will not speake of y great increase of childre, and of the increase of good children which wonderfully flourished amongst y Jewes. I know there are some which contemne this nobility deriued of Elders. For they say that oftentimes of horses are borne mules. And they cite Iphicrates, which being a notable Emperour, and hearing one contumeliously and insolently obiecting vnto him, that he was the sonne of a showmaker, thus made answer: My stocke beginneth in me: but thine endeth in thee. And he which vphaydeth vnto a man eyther fortune, or want of nobilitie, doth euen as he doth, which beteth y garments, but toucheth not the body. For euen as garments are without the body, so nobility, and fortune are without vs, and are counted amongst outward good things. Cicero although he was a man new come vp, yet despised he nobility. They which geue themselves to hunting, prepare the best dogges they can get to hunt, and not whelpes, though they come of neuer so good a kinde. And for battaile strong & warlike horses are sought for, and not the coltes of good horses.

*What profite is in pedigrees. or where: o is it good, Frende Ponticus, to be deriued from long discent of bloud?
Or what shall it auayle to thee, to reckon in a row Great numbers of thine auncesters, that lined long a goe?*

It is a thing ridiculous for a man to boast y he can geue παρανομος, that that is, senen, or a greate many coates. These reasons some vse, to extenuate the nobility of bloud. Neither are these thinges spokē amisse, or without profite especially agaynst those, which only by the vertue of theyr elders wilbe counted noble, when as they themselves otherwise line filthely, vily, and without any nobility. But if any mā haue together with vertue obtained nobility of bloud, doubtles of it he hath great commodity. For nobility is not, as it was obiected a thing vterly outward. For the proprieties, and markes, and motions of the elders are I know not how, transferred to the posterity, which although that in the next childre or childrens childre, they oftentimes shew not forth, nor appeare, yet by a certayne force they are kepte still and reuue againe in other of the posterity, so that in them the spirite and motions of the elders is reuued vnto vertue. Wherefore seeing such sparkes are still reserved in vs, they are not vterly to be counted amongst outward good things. Neither agreeth that comparisō of the mule, which they say is procreated of the horse. For that in the mule ceaseth the generatō: neither can the mule, if we consider the common course of nature line long. But they which are begotten of noble parentes, although they themselves degenerate, yet may they afterward bring forth others. And to say euē in that similitude, it not a litle adoyneth the mule, that he is begotten of the horse. For, for that cause are they more commendable then asses. But Inuenal, Cicero, and Iphicrates spake of those noble men, which when as they themselves had no part at all of theyr fathers or predecessors vertue, and good disposition, would yet notwithstanding be had in estimation for this cause only, for that they came of a noble bloud. He whiche being but obscure in birth, hath illustrated himselfe with vertues, is of far more excellency then are they which coming of greate nobility doo with vices, and with wicked actes, and with sluggishnes and cowardishnes dishonour both themselves, and theyr stocke. And how much God gaue vnto the posterity of the godly, it is manifest not only by this place, but also by that of Crobus, where he promisseth to doo good to the last euen to a thousand generations: and also by thys, that he appoynted that the kinges and

Ex. liij.

priestes

The nation of the He-brewes of greatest antiquity.

The warre of Troie as bout the time of Iephe.

Argumentes agaynst nobility.

An aunswer of Iphicrates.
A simila-
tude.

A simila-
tude.

Inuenal.

What vse
these arguments haue

The nobilitie of kin-
red is profitable.

God gaue
many thinges
vnto the posterity
of the Saintes.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

priestres should be chosen out of a certayne stocke. Thys prerogative the Ethnikes contemned not. For he which prayseth Alcibiades which some thinke was Enripides when he was crowned in the games of Olympus, sayth, he which will be happy, must come of a noble city. To which purpose I could cite a great many other testimonies, if neede so required. But what shall we say of our estate?

Whether the Gentiles be more abject then the Jewes.

Are we more abject then the Jewes? Or may we being compared with them seeme to be without nobility? For Paul thus writeth: Consider your calling, brethren:

Not many noble men, not many wise men are called. I answered that there is no cause why we should therefore be sorry for our estate. For although, if we consider the stock it self, from whence we were cut of (which we can not deny but to have bene a wilde olive tree) we be obscure, and without nobility, yet after that we are once

Unto them that are grafted into Christ is communicated all the nobilitie of Christ.

grafted into Christ, all his nobility is most truly communicated vnto vs. For we are now not only his members, but also flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones, so that all his fathers are now made our fathers, which things although they have not happened vnto vs by naturall generation, yet vnto a godly man it ought to be sufficient, that they were afterward genen vnto vs. But our aduersaries with this kind of nobility extoll the antiquity of theyr Churches. For

The antiquity of the churches of the papists.

they say, that they haue a long succession of bishoppes: and therefore they could not fall away from the true piety and worshipping of God. As though in the 11. chapter of Zacharie is not redde a prophesie agaynst a foolish pastor. And doubles if that good and godly successors should euer follow good and godly Bishoppes, they might then peradventure seeme to speake somewhat: but seeing that that order was so oftentimes interrupted, that, as the Ecclesiasticall histories mention, sometimes after sound and Catholike Bishoppes succeeded Arriases, it is manifest, that they vainly & fally boast of these things. Merely the Jewes had from Aaron vnto Christ the course of priestres without any interruption at any time. And yet Christ vehemently reprobued theyr traditions, and the idolatry by them brought in. All the prophetes which were continually raysed vp, to correct & reprobue the vices, which were growen in vs, what elders of theyr could they cite, whome they by an ordinary course had succeeded? And if this reason should be of force, neither Christ nor the Apostles could haue departed from the Scribes, and Pharisees, and Priestres of the Jewes, whose succession had bene continuall, and without interruption. Wherefore euen as these argumentes nothing then furthered the cause of these priestres: so can they not in these our dayes defend the errors of the Papistes. Christ was a priest according to the order of Melchisedech: yet had he not before his time a continuall order of priestres of that kinde. The Apostles first planted the Churches, and fell away from the high priestres of the Jewes. And Paul in the 20. of the Actes saith, That euen of the Christians should come wolves, which should invade the Church. When therefore such wolves succeeded the come of the Bishoppes and pastozs, and contaminated and corrupted the pure doctrine, were they to be obeyed, or no? Tertullian, Irenaeus, and

Many wolves which succeeded the Apostles in the church.

Augustine seme sometimes to attribute somewhat vnto this succession. For they cite it to confirme the antiquity of the holy scriptures agaynst those, which utterly denied them: and they teach by long succession they haue bene alwayes preserved in the Church. And the succession of Bishoppes is somewhat of force,

The fathers seme to attribute somewhat vnto continuall succession. Succession is somewhat of force so long as they kepe still theyr old piety.

so long as they kepe still their old piety, vertue, and religion. But if they depart from that, those things are in vayne objected. So long time are they to be harkened vnto, as they deliuer sound doctrine. For Christ admonisheth, that euen the

The Successors of the Apostles are to be harkened vnto, so long as they teach righteously.

Scribes and Pharisees are to be harkened vnto, so long as they sitte in the chaire of Moses: but yet not when they obtrude plantes which the heavenly father hath not planted. Neither ought any of vs to be accused, as though we went aboute to interrupt the successions of Bishoppes. We wish to haue them continued, but yet in such sort that thinges corrupted be amended: and that the Bishoppes themselves once at the length would geue themselves to execute the office of Bishops, that is, that by godly doctrine, and by bright life they would edify the Church.

We in no case take away the succession of vs.

Those

Those excellent giftes of the Jewes, which the Apostle hath hitherto reckened make y<sup>e</sup> question of they<sup>r</sup> refection & of the calling of the Gentiles moze difficulte. For how were they excluded, which had receaved so many and so greate benefites? And how were the Gentiles brought in, which were strictly strangers fro the common welth of Israell, alienes from God, boyde of his gloze, without Lawes, covenante, worshipping and promises? Which also as touching the fleshy pertayned neither to the Fathers, nor to Christ. But Chrysostome noteth, y<sup>e</sup> Paul only reckoneth up the giftes of God: so that the Jewes had nothing, that they should therfore waite proude, when as they got not those giftes by they<sup>r</sup> owne industry. Paul sayth not, y<sup>e</sup> they stode to the covenantes, that they observed the Lawes, or worshipped God purely: onely he setteth for testimonies of the good will of God towards them.

Of vvhom is Christ as touching the fleshy, who is God ouer al, blessed for euer. ] Here he addeth an excellent commendation of Christ, wherein he expresselye confesseth the two natures in him ioyned together in one and the self same person, so that of both natures is made Christ. His humans nature is declared by these wordes, Of the Iewes as touching the fleshy: for by the fleshy, in the Hebr<sup>e</sup> w phrase is vnderstanded the whole ma<sup>n</sup>. His diuine nature is most manifestly described in these wordes: VWho is God ouer all, blessed for euer. ] Which nature also is not obscurely signified in that which is added, As touching the fleshy. For that particle should not haue bene put vnles he had had something moze then the fleshy. This sentence the Arrians, Mahometists, and whosoener they be that hold that Christ is only a pure man impugne: in which rablement also are the Rabbines of the Hebr<sup>e</sup>wes. For euen as by a corrupt interpretation they had corrupted the law, as touching maners and life, which is manifest by that that Christ interpreted the Law, and reprobated they<sup>r</sup> fond deuises: so also had they depraied the sincere sayth of the Pettas to come, so that they thought he should be only a pure and simple man. For when Christ demaunded of the, what they thought of y<sup>e</sup> Messias: they made answer y<sup>e</sup> he should be y<sup>e</sup> son of Dauid, neither had they any deper or higher consideration touching him: wherfore Christ objected vnto the y<sup>e</sup> 110. Psalm, where Dauid calleth y<sup>e</sup> Pettas his lord, which could not haue bene agreeable to a pure & simple man bozne of his stocke: as they foolishly imagined. Ambrose expounding this place, cōfēdeth y<sup>e</sup> these wordes must nedes be applied vnto Christ, for that there is here mention made of no other person, vnto whome they may aptly be applied. If they will (sayth he) haue these thinges to be vnderstanded of Christ, let them shew some other person mentioned of Paul vnto whome they maye be referred. And if besides Christe they can finde none other, then let them leue vnto Christ the glory, which Paul attributeth vnto him. Ambrose indeede confesseth, that when the father and the sonne are ioyned together in the holy scriptures, the father is called God, and the sonne Lord: and this he sayth is done for this consideration, for that we affirme, that we worship one God only. And if we should repere the name of God, we mought peradventure seme to departe somewhat from that vniity, and therfore are those names so altered. But I see that that rule is not in the scriptures perpetually obserued. For we rede in the Psalm, as it is cited to the Hebr<sup>e</sup>wes, Therefore O God, hath thy God annoynted thee with the oyle of gladnes. Here for that he entreateth, of the father and of the sonne, he repeteth the name of God twise. He saith moreover, that this particle, Christ to be ouer all, is had also in the epistle to the Phillippians. For there it is written, That in the name of Iesu euery knee should bow, both of thinges celestiaall, terrestiaall, and infernall. Out of which place no les then out of this wherewith we are now in hand, he gathereth the diuine nature in Christ. For he should not be worshipped of all, if he were not God. For in the Apocalypse, John was prohibited of the Angell to worship him. I am thy fellow seruant (said he) take heed thou do it not. But Christ when as he oftentimes permitted himself to be worshipped, manifestly testified, that he was true God. For forasmuch

The thinges that Paul here reckoneth, are onely the giftes of God and not the vertues of the Hebr<sup>e</sup>wes. Both the natures of Christ here auouched.

The Rabbines, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Arrians are confuted.

The father is called God and the sonne Lord when in the scriptures they are ioyned together. That rule seemeth not to be perpetuall.

The worshipping prohibited vnto Christ is a testimonie of his diuinity.

much

This word
Amen, ma-keth a strong asse-
reration.

In his commentaries
vpon the first epistle
to the Corinthians.

¶ continuing of the prophecies.

¶ manner of the disposition and
of the psalms.

much as he was a most sharpe defender of the sincere and pure worshipping of God, he would neuer haue suffered himselfe to be worshipped in steede of God, vnles he had bene in very dede God. Yea (saith he) Paul would so vehemently affirm that Christ is God, that vnto his wordes he addeth, Amen. Which particle without all controuersy maketh a great affirmation. Chrysostome also seemeth to ascribe these thinges vnto the sonne. For he saith, That Paul when he had reckened vp the wonderfull greates benefites, which God hath bestowed vpon the Hebrewes which were so great, that our sauour tooke fleshe of that nation, by this exclamation, both gaue thanks, and also referred the prayse to the sonne of God: and that not without iust consideration, especially seeing that he knew, that Christ was euery where of the Iewes blasphemed, and reproched, and that most of all when they rejected and cast of his Gospell and preaching. We haue els where taught by testimonies broughte out of the scriptures, and those most certayne, that Christ is God: wherefore in this place to repete them agayne it is not needful. Iohn in his 5. chapter of his first epistle expel-ly pronounceth, that Christ is the true God, & eternall life. At this tyme it shal be sufficient to haue noted, that by this sentence of the Apostle which we are now in hand with, are ouerthrowen & confuted many heresies. The Manichees thought that Christ had not a true body, but that whatsoeuer seemed to be in him as touching an humane body was only a phantasie and an illusion of the eyes. But Paul saith, that Christ had fleshe, and that he tooke it of the nation of the Hebrewes. Which wordes of Paul make also against those which confesse, that Christ had indeede a true body: but yet say that he brought it from heauen, and tooke it not of the virgin Mary. For they trifle, that Christ traduced his body through her, no other wise then water is deriued thorough a conduitte or pipe. But Paul manifestly saith, that the fleshe of Christ was made, not thorough the Hebrewes, but of the Hebrewes. Arrius also is by these wordes confuted: who unpudently durst affirme, that Christ was only a creature, and with his blasphemous mouth durst deny the sonne of God to be God. In this route also is Nestorius, who confelleth both natures in Christ, but he seiorned the one from the other, that he held, that that communication betwene them is only by grace, and that of those two natures is not made one person. Wherefore he denied that the blessed virgine could be called Godmother, that is, the mother of God, but should only be called the mother of man: for which the diuine nature it can not stand, to be borne agayne. But he considered not that Paul here saith, that Christ is of the Iewes as touching the fleshe. We graunt indeede that the things which were vniuersally spoken of Christ, are sometimes to be vnderstanded of the one nature, and sometymes of the other: when yet notwithstanding Christ himselfe is onely one person and hypostasis. So we say, that the immortall God was borne, crucified, and died. For there is a certayne communicating of the Idiomata or proprieties, by the wonderful connerion of the two natures: which Nestorius went about to seiorne, and plucke in sunder. Howbeit I am not ignorant that Erasmus in this place imagineth two other readings, besides this receaued reading whiche we follow. One of them is, that we should thus reade, Of whome is Christ as touching the fleshe: so that there should be put a stay: and then followeth that which remaineth as an exclamation seperated, wherein Paul saith, that God which ouer all is to be prayed for euer: so that God signifyeth either the father, or els the whole Trinity. The other is to be reade after this maner, Of whome is Christ as touching the fleshe, which is ouer all, and thereto make a poynt: and then adde this as a member by it selfe, God is blessed for euer. These readings I see no cause why we should admitte. For seeing that the common and receaued reading is propiciuous and plaine, I thinke it most mete rather to follow it. For these readings put a new apostrophe or turning of speech either to God the father, or to the holy Trinity, when as there is no such neede. Farther Paul seemeth to follow the same maner that is oftentimes vsed of the Hebrew prophetes, and also in the Psalmes, that the latter part of the periode, should repete that which was spoken in the first. Which thing he doth here most plainly playnly and with much efficacy. For first he touched the diuinity of Christ, when he sayd, as touching the fleshe: for that particle should not haue bene necessary, if there had bene in Christ nothing els but his humane nature. And he addeth.

Who is ouer all.] Which thing belongeth to God only. Wherefore that which was in those clauses spoken somewhat obscurely, in the other part of the Periode he speaketh more expessedly. For he sayth.

Who is ouer all. God blessed for euer, Amen.] Neither is the reason of Ambrose lightly to be considered, that we ought not in this place to sake any other thing or any other persō, whē as here is purposely entreaty made only of y<sup>e</sup> Son. Erasmus excuseth this his deuise, that he nothinge hindreth the diuine nature, which we affirme to be in Christ: especially seing the same may be abundantly proued by other places of the scriptures. We answer, that we also know ryght well, that the diuine nature in Christ is by many other places of the scriptures sufficiently testified: but yet we thinke that this is also together with the rest to be retained: for so we see all the fathers haue done. Neither is it mete, that we should without cause decaye the armoury of the Church: which we ought rather dayly to fill and to renew. But peradventure he will say. They trust but a litle to other places, which so earnestly contend for this one: Merely we do not a litle put confidence in other places, but seing that this place is very firme and cleare, we wyl not lose it. The commentaries of Origen testify that these thynges are spoken of Christ: as though Paul in these wordes woulde refell those, which at that tyme durst not openly call Christ, God: which is meruayle to heare Origen affirme, when as he otherwise did not rightly thinke of the sonne of God. But Erasmus thinketh, that that part in those cōmentaries to the Romanes, is none of his. For he sayth, that Ruffinus or whosoeuer he were that turned Origen, amended certayne things of purpose, that the readers should not be so much offended, And Ierome agaynst Ruffinus testifieth, that Origen in hys other bookes, neuer wrote well of these thynges, touching which he had erred in hys bookes ἡπὶ ἀρχαῖς. Which if it be true, then, soasmuch as in those bookes he had a most wicked iudgement of the sonne of God, it may easely be proued, that those thynges could not be written of him in his commentaries to the Romanes. But howsoeuer it be, touching Origen (for his commentaries to the Romanes are not extant in the Greke, wherby we might any thing iudge of them) thys is certayne, that Ciprian a most auncient wyter in his 2. booke agaynst the Iewes the 5. chapter, vseth this testimony to proue the diuinity of Christ. Although when he citeth the wordes of Paul he leueth out this word, God. Which same thing Hilary did vpon the 122. Psalme. But that may seme to come thorough the negligence of the wyters, as Erasmus himselfe confesseth. Neither is this to be omitted, that that particle, Over all, maye be adioyned vnto that particle which followeth, Blessed: so that the sence is: God which is to be prayled aboue all.

But not as though the word of God hath fallen away. For not all they which are of Israell are Israelites: nether are they all children which are the seide of Abraham: but in Isaac shall thy seide be called. That is: Not they which are the children of the fleshe are the children of God: but they which are the children of the promise are counted for the seide. For thys is a word of promise. In thys same time will I come, and Sara shall haue a sonne. And not onely thys, but also Rebecka, when she had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac. For the children being not yet borne and when they had done neither good nor euill (that y<sup>e</sup> purpose of God might remaine according to election not by workes, but by him that calleth) It was sayd vnto her, The elder shall serue the younger, As it

The diuinity of Christ thys times proued by this place.

Cap. 9. A Commentarie vpon the is written, Jacob haue I loued, and Esau haue I hated.

But not as though the worde of God hath fallen away. I Those thynges which Paul had spoken in the commendation of the Iewes, seemed (as Chrysostome sayth) to haue aggrauated the question. For the Iewes were offended, for that they being adopted into the people of God, and hauing the Law geuen vnto them, and endued with promises should be reiecte, and in theyr places should be put the Gentiles, which had bene alwayes aleants from God, without adoption, without the Law, and without any promise at all of Christ. And this offence had now so much increased amongst the, that they sayd, that that Christ whome Paul preached was not the true Messias promised of God. Paul considering these thynges with him selfe, earnestly lamented that the Iewes were reiecte. But lest any man should thinke, that he so lamented, as though he thought that the promises of God were made voyde, therfore he now both deseth himselfe, and the promises. I do not (sayth he) therfore speake these thynges, or am therfore so earnestly sorry, for that I thinke that the worde of God is fallen away, for I know that his promises are constant and firme, although these men perish. I bewaile in dede theyr case: but yet not so, that I thinke that the league and covenant with God made with the children of Abraham is violated. For although the Iewes being blinded refuse the Gospell, yet the promises of God abide constant. But that which moueth me thus to bewaile my nation, is this, for that when as I know that vnto that nation were made the promises, and do se that so many of them do perish, now I perceauie that that saluatio promised pertaineth only to a few: for which thing doubtles I am exceedingly sorry.

The cause
of the griefe
of Paul.

The cause
of saluation
cometh
not of carnall procreation.

Workes and carnall propagation
are not causes
of saluation

Election is the cause of
saluation.

The promise
was made to the stocke of Abraham
indefinitely.

For not all they which are of Israel, are Israelites: neither are they all children, which are the seede of Abraham: but in Isaac shall thy seede be called. I That these thynges may the playnlier be vnderstanded, this we ought to know, that the Apostle toke this as a thing most manifestly known by the holy scriptures, that the promise touching Christ and euerlasting saluatio, was made vnto the Iewes: vnto the Iewes (I say) that is, vnto the posterity of Abraham which should be borne of his flesh: but yet that naturall procreation from Abraham was not the cause of saluation, and of receauing Christ. For if that had bene the cause, then coulde none issuing from him haue bene frustrated of the promise of God. But that some were frustrated, the Apostle declareth in Ismael and Esau: which although as touching carnall propagation they came of Abraham, yet they fell away from the promise. Wherefore the promise (as we sayd) was geuen vnto the carnall posterity of Abraham: although that earthly generatio was not the cause that the promise should be of efficacy, and take place in all. Paul remoueth away two thynges whiche he will in no wise to be the causes of the promises: namely, carnall propagation, & workes. What shall the be the cause of the promise? Merely nothing else, but the electio and purpose of God. To remoue away these two thynges, Paul vseth the oracles of God, and mentioneth the examples of Ismael and Esau. And as touching Isaac whom God preferred before Ismael, it is written in the booke of Genesis. But there are two places touching Jacob, the one is in Genesis, and the other in the prophet Malachie. There are also mozeouer promises of the calling of the Gentiles: but therof is not at this present entreated. That shall after ward be handled in his due place, where it shalbe declared, that the Iewes being repulsed, the Gentiles are substituted in theyr places: and the same shalbe confirmed by many testimonies of the scriptures. Now is entreated only of the promise made to the stock of Abraham. And the Apostle sayth, that the promise in dede was made indefinitely: but yet not to euery one that should come of that blood. Wherefore the promise must needs pertaine to the seede elected: whereunto many are annexed by the propagation of the flesh, in whome the promise taketh no effect. It is in dede offered vnto all: but it is not fulfilled in all. For euen as the common welth of the Israelites was by the mercy of

of God seioyned from other nations: so y<sup>e</sup> by y<sup>e</sup> selfe same mercy of God some of the Israelites were elected to be partakers of the promise of God, which pertained not to all men vniuersally. Hereby we may know, that many of the Iewes by reason of that promise shoulde receaue Christ, and attayne vnto saluation. For the promise of God can by no meanes faile. And for that cause the Apostle befoze so much extolled his nation, for that he saw that y<sup>e</sup> promise of God shoulde yet haue place in it. Neither is that any let, that y<sup>e</sup> greater part was at y<sup>e</sup> time blinded: for the oracles of the prophetes foretold, that that thing shoulde come to passe: who declared that the indefinite promise of God is by the hidden purpose of God contracted to a few. They which thinke, that these thinges pertaine to the Gentiles, referre the promise vnto them: as though they were truly made Israelites, and the seede of Abraham: especially seing that Paul sayth in the .3. chapter to the Galathians: I those which are of fayth, are the sonnes of Abraham: and when as also John Baptiste sayth in the Gosple, God is able of these stones to raise vp children to Abraham. We indeede deny not but that the Gentiles are transferred to the nobility of y<sup>e</sup> Hebrewes: but forasmuch as that cometh not vnto them by naturall propagation, as it did to the Israelites, they belong not to Abraham as touching the flesh, but only by spirite and faith pertaine vnto him. Wherefoze we are grafted, adopted, and planted into that stocke. All these thinges are true but Paul entreateth not of them in this place. This thing only his intent is to declare, that in Israell issueng from Abraham as touching the fleshe, there shall be hidden some seede of the election, and that some remnantes thereof shall at the last be saved. But of the Gentiles he will afterward in due place intreate. In the meane time he defendeth the promises of God, that they shoulde not seme vnconstant and vnsable, when as so few of the Iewes were saved by Christ.

For not all they which are of Israel, are Israel: neither all they which are of the seede of Abraham, are children. But in Isaac shall thy seede be called. That is, not they which are the children of the flesh are the childre of God, but they which are the children of the promise are counted for the seede. Christostome in this place demaundeth, what this Israell is, & what thing this seede is. And this he noteth: that the children of the flesh are not the children of God. Howbeit he denieth not but that they are the childre of Abraham. And he thinketh that the Apostle in this place calleth them the children of God, which are borne after the selfe same maner that Isaac was borne. But he was procreated of the promise and worde of God. For the worde & promise of God framed and formed him in the wombe of his mother. And although the mothers wombe was used to procreation, yet forasmuch as that was now dreyed up and barren, it could not be the cause of his procreation. So (saith he) the saythfull, when they are regenerated in Baptisme, are by the worde and promise of God borne againe. And if thou wilt say, that the water also is therunto adioyned, we graunt it is so in deede: yet of itselfe it is a thyng cold and barren lyke the wombe of Sara. Wherefore whatsoeuer is done in Baptisme, cometh wholly of the holy ghost and of the promise of God. It is well to be liked that Christostome attributeth not regeneration vnto the water, but referreth it rather to the holy ghost, and to the worde of God. But there are two thinges which he auoucheth, which may not so easely be graunted. First, that the scope of Paul is to contract the promises of God to the Gentiles. For here as we haue said, first is entreated of the Iewes: Secondly seing that the children of the Hebrewes were long time regenerate befoze Christ came, and had the promise of their saluation sealed with circumcision, no otherwise then we now haue by Baptisme, what neede was there to contract regeneration only to baptisme? Let vs rather vnderstand y<sup>e</sup> the promise was set forth indefinitely vnto the people of Israell which as touching y<sup>e</sup> flesh came of Abraham. Which promise was in the children of the Hebrewes sealed by circumcision: wherefoze that people was here befoze said to haue had the couenauntes and promises. And Peter in the Actes of the Apostles calleth the Hebrewes, The children of the couenauntes, for that the promises of God were (as we haue said) set forth vnto them generally, although they toke not effect in them.

Isaac borne of the promise.

Regeneration is not to be attributed vnto the water.

In what
maner many oracles in the Prophets concerning the people of Israel are to be understanded.

The generall promise is by electio contracted to some per-ticuler men

A similitu-
tude.

Election of purpose di-recteth the promises.
Election is not repugnant vnto
the promise.

From a per-ticuler proposition he ascendeth to a generall proposition.

We baptise
infantes vn-
der the faith of the indefinite promise.
Against the Anabap-tistes.

all. After this maner are to be vnderstanded many places in the Prophets, where the people of Israell is indefinitely called the people of God, although in very dede many of them were aliantes from God. Esay hath: I haue nourished and exalted children: but they haue despised me. And in Ezechiell God saith: That the children of Israell are his children. namely, by reason of this promise generally published amongst them, and confirmed by circumcision and many other ceremonies and rites. Howbeit forasmuch as many of them fell away from piety and from saluation, it was very plaine, that not all they were the children of God, or the seede of Abraham, vnto whom the promises were by election due. Wherefore when Paul saith: That not all they which are of Israell, are Israell, by Israel in the second place, he vnderstandeth that seede whereunto is adioyned election, and by children, and by the children of God, and by the children of the promise he vnderstandeth those, vnto who the perfection of y promise was by the purpose of God contracted. He bringeth the firste example of Isaack and Ismael, out of the 21. chapter of Genesis: where Abraham is commaunded to caste for the the handmayden and her sonne: as Sara had requested. For in Isaack (saith he) shall thy seede be called. That is, that promise which I haue made to thy seede, shall by electio be performed in Isaack, neither shall pertaine to thine other sonne Ismael. This place declareth, that that which was before promised generally, is by the hidden election of God contracted to certaine perticuler men. The other oracle touching this selfe same matter is extant in the 18. chap. of Genesis: In that tyme will I come, and Sara shall haue a sonne. This thing God promised, when he was entertained of Abraham vnder y oke of Mambra. Ismael was now bozne, yet God promised vnto Abraham perticularly that he should haue a sonne of Sara, in whom should be certainly performed the promise which before seemed to hang vncertaine. As if a father hauing many children, should be promised, that it should come to passe, that in his stocke he should haue a kyngdome, he should not streight way perceiue, which of those children should be exalted to that dignitie: but that appointing should consist onely in election. Paul here by sheweth that the hidden purpose of God moderateth and contracteth that which was promised generally. Not as though the election of God is repugnant vnto the promise, yea rather it performeth & accomplisheth it, but yet in these in whom it is decreed to be performed. Neither ought we to thinke, that the election of God is bound to naturall procreation. And when the Apostle maketh mencion of the children of the flesh, and of the children of the promise, by children of the flesh he vnderstandeth those, which haue in them nothing singuler or excellent, besides the generation of the flesh, which came vnto them from the holy Patriarkes. And the children of promise he calleth those, vnto whome the promise is now by election appointed. And in this example of Esau and Ismael, this is to be noted, that the Apostle from a perticuler proposition ascendeth to a generall proposition, that by such singuler factes he mought gather the order and maner of the election of God. Here are we admonished neuer to step backe fro the faith of the word of God, although these things which are in it intreated, seeme to ouerreache humane reason and iudgement, or to be made void. Doubtles there should at that time most of all haue bene great doubt, when as the promises made vnto the nation of the Iewes were now publikely extant: but on the other side there were none in the whole world which more resisted Christ, or with more cruel furioufnes repelled his Gospel, then did that nation. And yet notwithstanding the Apostle with an inuincible faith persisteth: and (as we haue now declared) comforteth himselfe touching the promise of God. After the same maner commeth it to passe, touching the children of the faith full. We haue a promise, that God is not onely our God, but also the God of our seede: which promise being indefinite, is by the hidden election of God applied vnto infantes: not in dede alwayes to all, but to some certaine, as it shall seeme good vnto the purpose of God. Which purpose being hidden from vs, and we being bounde to follow the outward worde which is commended vnto the Church, vnder that promise we baptise our infantes, euen as the Elders circumcised theirs. This saith the Anabaptistes reproue, for that wee are not any thing assured

ured either of the spirite, or of the faith, or of the election of these infants. But we nothing passe vpon that, only we haue a respect vnto the worde of God, which is offered vnto vs in the generall and indefinite promise. But the execution thereof we commit vnto God, when as we cannot iudge of his election. But let them on the other side answer vs, by what reason they baptise those that are of full age, when as it is vncertaine whether they pertaine to election or no, and whether y<sup>e</sup> thinges which they say they beleue and professe, be truly said, and whether with a sincere minde they come vnto Christ or no. Here they can answer nothing, but that they follow the confession of that faith, which they that are of full age make before the church, when they come to be baptised. But so much as by y<sup>e</sup> confession they may easely be deceiued, neither do they certainly know any thing either of their minde or of the election of God, there is no cause why they should accuse vs. For it is euery so with vs in infants, which are offered vnto the church to be baptised, as it is with them in those that are of full age.

And not only this, but also Rebecka, when she had conceaued by one, euen by our father Isaac, For the children being not yet borne, and when they had done neither good nor euill. ¶ Vnto the example which he before brought of Isaac and Ismaell, he now addeth another of Iacob and Esau: and that not without great cause: for men might haue suspected, that there had bene a diuersity in Isaac and Ismaell: for that one was the sonne of an handmayden, and the other of a free woman, when as no such thing could be pretended in Iacob and Esau. For they had one and the selfe same father, and one and the selfe same mother, they were brethren which came both out of one bely, and also twines conceaued in one and the same houre. Wherefore as touching nature or procreation of the flesh, there could be put no difference at all betwene them. Wherefore seeing that the one of them was reiecte of God, and the other elected, it is of necessity, that the same be attributed wholly vnto the will and election of God, as to a higher ground and principle, whereby are seuered those which haue one and the same nature of carnall generation. And by this second example also Paul ascendeth higher, neither remoneth he away only carnall generation from the cause of the efficacy of the promise of God, but also workes. For he sayth, that those infants were not yet brought forth to light, neither had done either good or euill: neither were they therefore separated the one from the other, that the one should be reiecte, the other elected, that the one should be loued of God, and the other hated. Of these two thinges the Hebrewes were accustomed continually to boast, as of thinges most excellent, namely, nobility of blood, & holynes of workes. The one of the Paul had now before remoued away: now also he remoueth away workes.

When they were not yet borne, neither had done any good or euill. ¶ The Apostle entendeth in this place to set forth certayne thinges, from which humane reason exceedingly abhorreth: for first he sayth, that the mere godnes and clemency of God is the ground of election. Which thing men, for that they to much delight in themselves & to much loue themselves, do not easely graunt. For they would rather appoint the groundes of their saluation in themselves, and not gladly committe the same wholly vnto God. Farther he sayth, that this liberality and mercy of God is utterly free from all lawes, so that it is bound to no man, but that it freely either reiecteth or electeth whom it will. Here also is our reason exceedingly offended: for vnto men it seemeth equity, that seeing all men are of a like estate and condition, God should also haue towards all men a like and equall inclination, for, that (they say) longeth to iustice. Wherefore they seme couertly to accuse God as an acceptor of persons. Farther by these wordes of the Apostle is condemned their error, which thought that our soules, either sinned, or liued iustly, before they were thrust into the bodies: for if it were so, then had not the Apostle sayde rightly, before they had done either good or euill. Of that opinion was Origen too rough to muche following the doctrine of Plato, Wherefore we muste holde, that our soules had no being before they were ioyned vnto the bodies. For they could Workes & propagation of the flesh are removed away in the latter example.

Two things here entreated of, from which humane reason exceedingly abhorreth.

Our soules liued nor befoze they were ioyned to the bodies.

Against the
which think that election consisteth of works a fore-
sene.

There ought not to be put in man
any thing
that is good which should moue the will of God
to elect him

God in no wise distributeth his giftes rashly.
The things which God
genueth vnto vs are not the causes of election.

Our will shoulde be excluded from being the cause of the election of God.
If this should be put to be the cause of saluation, neither should humane reason be satisfied.

not haue lined loely: and if they had done any thing, the same doubtles should haue bene either iust or vniust: and so they had done either some good or some euill. But they which thinke, that God in his election followeth workes foresene, deny, that they are by these sentences of the Apostle confuted. For in that Paul sayth, that God elected the one of these, and reiected the other before they were borne: that they say is to be referred to the singular sharpenes of the sight of God, which seeth those things which shall come to passe long time before they haue their being. But the Apostle when as he straight way addeth, that the election should abide according to purpose, semeth not to haue had a respect vnto workes foresene, but only to the singular will of God. But neither by this do they confesse themselves to be confuted. They affirme that the election of God is gouerned by foreknowledge, where by when as he foreseth, what maner one euery man shall be, so he either reiecteth or electeth euery one. The selfe same thing also affirme they of the purpose of God that it ought to be iust: and therefore ought to be moderated by the foreknowledge of workes: and that for that cause it is called purpose, because that that shall undoubtedly and immutably come to passe, which God foreseth. But if it were so as these men imagine, Paul ought then to haue sayd, that vnto workes and merites should abide their dew honor, which yet he saith not, but opposeth vnto them the election and purpose of God. And he expessedly addeth, Not of workes, and as if were euen of purpose denieth that which these men so earnestly endeuor themselves to obtrude, wherfore thus to thinke semeth to be nothing els then to swim against the streame, and manifestly to fight against the purpose of the Apostle. For Paul, to the end that nothing should want to confirme that which we say, namely that the election of God is the chief cause of our saluation, addeth.

But of him that calleth. J. Whereby we vnderstand, that our saluation wholly dependeth of him, which electeth and calleth vs. And it is verie absurde to set in man any thing so good, that can moue the will of God to elect vs: for whatsoever good thing is in man, the same wholly proceedeth from God, vnles we wil say, that there may be some thing that is good, which is not of God, which were to make of a creature a God. And if they graunt, that all good things which men either shall do, or can do, do proceede from God, then also doubtles must they nedes confesse and graunt, that God distributeth not these things rashly, or by chance, or vnadvisedly. But now if these things be distributed by the election and predestination of God, then can they not be causes of election, or of predestination. Farther the Apostle a litle afterward so referreth all things to the will of God, & he utterly excludeth our will, for he saith, I will haue mercy, on whom I will haue mercy, and will shew compassion, on whom I will shew compassion. Wherefore it is not either of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. And that we should not take it ill, for that God after this maner dealeth with vs, he vseth a similitude of the potter, which of one and the selfe same masse maketh one vessel to honoꝝ, and an other to contumely: and he addeth, That the clay yet can not complayne of his maker. For euer it is a thing dangerous and not agreeable with a godly man, to assigne that to be the cause of the election of God, which is neither put of Paul, when yet he of purpose entreateth of that matter, neither is any where extant in all the whole scriptures. For, that is to imagine vnto our selues that which semeth to be agreeable vnto our reason: and besides that, neither doubtles can this imagination in all pointes satisfy humane reason. For Augustine against the two epistles of the Pelagians in his 2. booke and 7. chapter, saith two children to be borne of vngodly parentes and strangers from Christ: both of them are cast forth and set to daunger of death. And the one of them in verbe dieth: but the other being of somewhat more stronger nature is by a Christian by chance comming by, preserved, and brought to the Church, and baptised, and is with other of the saythfull made a partaker of Christ. Merely touching the saluation of the one childe, we haue nothing that we can certainly affirme: but of the other if the childe dye, we can scarcely put any doubt. And if the matter be so, we affirme that one of them was elected, and the other reiected. Whereunto then had the election of God a regarde? Thou canst not say vnto woorkes foresene, when as those thinges which shall neuer come to passe, can not be foresene. For the prouidence of God prouideth those thinges which shall come to passe, and not those thinges which shall not be: yea rather he foreseeeth that those thinges shall not come to passe. Wherefore we see that that deuise touching woorkes foresene can not in all cases satisfy humane reason. Wherefore we must rather beleue Paul, who leadeth vs to the highest cause, namely, to the will of God: whereunto doubtles we do iniury, if we thinke that there is any cause aboue it. What shoulde we say vnto the woorkes of men, when as we all are of one & the selfe same nature, of one & the selfe same propriety, and of one and the same disposition? For, that lump of Adam, wherehence we are deriued is vitiated and corrupted, whereunto if peradventure there be added any thing that is good, the same it hath of the mere and only goodnes of God. Farther they which so teach, seeme to make Paul very blockish and dull witted, which could not see that which these men so easely vnderstand. For he of the election of God bringeth no other cause, but the purpose and will of God. And at the last also he crieth out, O the depth of the riches. &c. But these sharpe witted men doe euen easely rid themselves of this greate difficulty, euen (I say) by one poze word. Augustine being yet a priest, and newly baptised, expounding this place, although he saw that God could not haue a respect vnto our woorkes to come as causes of predestination, wherby he embaseth vs, yet he thought sayth foresene to be the cause of his loue towards vs. And of this his sentence as touching ether part he bringeth this reason: It is certayne that good woorkes are deriued into vs from the holy ghost (for thorough him God worketh all in all, and the same God giveth vnto vs the holy ghost) Wherefore good woorkes (sayth he) forasmuch as they procede from God, can not any thing moue to his electio or predestinatio. But he thought that God had a respect vnto our sayth, and electeth them, whome he foreseeeth should beleue, for that he thought that sayth is of our selues. For although we rede (sayth he) that God worketh all in all, yet we rede not, that God beleueth all in all. Wherefore he thought it is of our selues to beleue: but to woork wel, he thought to come of God. These thinges wrote he being yet rude following as it should appeare to me, the doctrine of his father Ambrose. For he vpon this selfe same place teacheth, the selfe same thing: namely, that God electeth them whome he knoweth shall afterward beleue. But Augustine when his iudgement was now thorough age & exercise more ripe and of deeper consideration, reuoked this sentence, as it is euident by his first booke of Retractions the .33. chapter, in which place he thus writeth of him selfe. These things had I not writtē, if that I had vnderstode that sayth is no lesse the gift of God, then good woorkes. And that sayth is geuen of God, he gathereth by that which is writtē to the Ephosians in the 6. chapter: Charitye and sayth from God the father, and from our Lord Iesus Christ. And in the same epistle the 2. chapter: By grace ye are made safe thorough faith, & that not of your selues: For it is the gift of God, not of woorkes, lest any man should boast. And vnto Timothe I obteyned (sayth he) mercy that I might be faithfull: but he saith not, for that I was faithfull. To this purpose mought be brought a greate many other sentences: but for this present I thought these should suffice. And as touching the woordes of Paul, no man ought to wonder, that the Apostle, when he speaketh of these thinges, ascribeth vnto God, purpose and election. For the holy scriptures euery where frame themselves to our infirmity, and speake vnto men after the maner of men. By those woordes we vnderstand the constancy and immutability of the will of God. For euen as men are wont as touching thinges whiche they haue rashly appoynted, afterward, when they haue better considered the matter, to alter them, but those thinges which they haue decreed with good consideration and deliberation they will haue to be firme and to continue, so also thinke they

All men are by nature of one and the selfe same disposition and prone to euill. This opini on maketh Paul very blockish & dull witted.

Augustine erred in this lest he was yet a priest.

Augustine reuoked his error.

Faith is no lesse the gift of God then good woorkes.

Purpose & electio, why they are ascribed vnto God.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

God put-teth a difference betweene those ¶ are bozne

Forasmuch
as predestination is a thing hidden, vnto what things we ought to haue a respect.
A simili-
tude.

Note the methode & interpretation of Chri-stosome.

of God. For that cause Paul calleth his will, purpose and electio. An oracle was geuen to Rebekka, That the elder of these two brethren should serue the yonger: for he had asked counsell of God, what the brethren shoulde together in her wombe signified. By this oracle we see, that it is God which putteth a difference betwene those which are bozne, when as otherwise by nature they are equall.
And promises made to this or that stocke, and to this or that posterity signifie nothing else, but, of that stocke or posterity shall some be elected: but who they be, it lieth not in vs to iudge. We ought rather to haue a respect vnto the effects, and whom we see to be called, to beleue, to geue themselves to good works, those to count for elect, and alwayes in this matter to haue a regard vnto the commaundementes and vnto the promises, that is, vnto the outward word of God.
But concerning the hidden counsell of God as touching every peticular man, we haue nothing reueled vnto vs. But Chrysostom seemeth to be against this. First he sayth, That there arose greate offence touching the reiectio of the Iewes, and the electio of the Gentiles: especially seeing that the Gentiles had alwayes bene vncleane: but the Iewes had moste playne promises. For it is all one (sayth he) as if the sonne of a king, vnto whome the kingdome semeth to be by inheritance due, should be reiected, and in his place should be put some vile man taken out of the common people, and but ne wly deli-uered out of prison. Which kinde of fact doubtes would cause greate offence to rise. For if any man would finde fault that the kinges sonne is therfore reiected, for that he had be-haued himselfe ill, he would say, that there ought in his place to haue bene put one better then he, and not one as wicked, and as ill as he. Wherefore seeing the Gentiles were no better then the Iewes, they ought both of them to haue bene in like sort either punished or aduanced. And that the Gentiles were as great sinners as the Iewes, & therfore were vnwor-thy of the kingdome of God, it is by that euident, which was before spoken in the first chapter, and moreover in the third, All haue sinned and want the glory of God: and it is wenderfully to be meruayled at, that God would promise that thing vnto the Iewes, which he would not performe. For, man indeede, forasmuch as he is ignorant of thinges to come, if sometimes he change his minde, may after a sort be excused: but it is not so of God: when as he most plainly seeth all thinges that shall come to passe, whatsoeuer they be. How (sayth he) doth Paul dissolue these thinges? This he now addeth, to declare, who is the true Israel, vnto whome are made the promises. And his minde is viterly, that those thinges which are here spoken of Paul, pertaine to the calling of the Gentiles: for that they are the true Israel. Farther he sayth, that the dissolution of the question herein consisteth, that the Gentiles came vnto Christ thorough sayth: but the Iewes refused sayth, & reiected the gospel, being bet only to the workes of the law. And this he sayth we must not thinke to come thorough Gods default, when as his will is that al men should be saued. Howbeit he plainly confesseth, that Paul sayth not so. For he thinketh that he dissolueth not the question, but only increaseth the difficulty: as he had done in the 5 chapter, when he entended to proue, of the right-ousnes of Christ saue vs: and that (he sayth) seemeth farre from the truth, that the righteousness of Christ should rebound vnto vs. Wherefore he should haue proued this, which yet he did not: but rather thus wrote, If we be cotaminated thorough the sinne of one man Adam, how shall we not be made cleane thorough the righteousness of one man Christ? Here (sayth he) is brought an other doubt, how the sinne of Adam could hurt vs: which doubt yet is not dissolued of Paul.
But, that he thus left these questions vndiscussed, he thinketh is for this cause done, for that Paul would euen at the first brunt stop the mouthe of the Iewes agaynst whome he then had to doe. These examples (sayth he) which he bringeth, he of purpose discusseth not: but only seeketh this, to make his owne matter more perspicuous vnto the. As it he should haue sayd: doth this (O ye Hebrues) offend you, for that ye see your selues reiected, & the Gentiles brought to the kingdome of God? do ye not see, that the seife same thing hapned in your patriarkes also, for they were reiected, vnto who pertained the inheritance. For God waiteth not for the succes, but streight way seeth this man to be good, & that man to be euill. And touching the seife same matter, when as in the time of Moses, they were all obnoxious vnto death by reaso of the idolatry which they had committed in the golden

golden calfe, yet notwithstanding some of the were punished, and other some were by the mercy of God preserved. I haue mercy (sayth God) one whome I haue mercy and I shew compassion, on whome I shew compassion. ¶ Barao was stirred vp, that in him the power of God might be declared, but why was he more then other stirred vp? What, for disobedience and obstinacy? As though others also were not as disobedient and as obstinate as he. And seeing that the promises seme to be made vnto the Israelites, and they had now so increased, that they were in number as the sand of the sea, why only shall the remnautes be saved? All these questions (sayth he) ¶ Paul moueth: but yet he dissolueth them not. For neyther is it expedient that thou shouldest to quickely dissolue thy question, when as thyne aduersarye sticketh in the same myre. For it is labor losse, that thou shouldest take all the paynes, when as thyne aduersarye shoulde take as much paynes as thy selfe. Which thing if thou shouldest attempt, thine aduersarye would triumphe, as though he had in his question put thee to the foyle. Dissolue first (saith he) O thou Hebrew, these selfe same questions which I haue put forth vnto thee out of the law. Which if thou canst not do, why then triumphest thou ouer me, as though thou haddest gotten the victory? ¶ Wherefore Chrysostomes minde is, that these things are of Paul put forth in that maner as we haue said: but he after ward dissolueth them, when he saith, that the Gentiles were therfore grafted in, for that they came through faith: and the Jewes were reiecte, for that they casting away faith, did put their confidence onely in woorkes. He addeth moreover, That God knoweth all things before they are done, and forseeth who shall be good, and who euill, and therefore we must stande to his iudgement: neither muste we enquire of him reasons of his election. But the iudgements of men are oftentimes deceaued: and therefore we see, that those oftentimes are greuously punished of God, whome other wise we thinke to be of the beste kinde of men, and those whome we abhorre as the worst kinde of men, are oftentimes crowned of him. He knoweth and seeth the hartes of all men, we consider onely outward signes, and follow the iudgement of other men. Of this thinge God hath no neede: for he seeth the causes of thinges: wherefore we must content our selues with his iudgement. These wordes of Chrysostome may not be vniuersally allowed, for they conteine many thinges whiche are straunge from the scope of Paul. First, this dissenteth, that he sayeth those thinges, which are here spoken of Paul, to the calling of the Gentiles: secondly, that he affirmeth, that God electeth those whome he knoweth shall beleue: whiche sentence we haue before at large confuted. Farther why presumeth he himselfe to assigne a cause of the election of God, which he plainly confesseth is no where put of Paul? But how it is true that God willet that all men shoulde be saved, we haue in other places declared, neither is it needefull now to repeate the same againe. This only now I say, that that proposition is not altogether so simple to be vnderstanded. Farther, this also is not true, which he taketh as a ground, when he saith, that Paul in this place dissolueth not the question which he did put forth. For Paul most plainly sayth, that the election of God is the cause of our saluation. And of the election of God he putteth none other cause, but the purpose of God, and his mere loue, and good will towards vs. Neither is he any thinge holpen by that similitude whiche he bringeth out of the fift chapter of this Epistle. For there Paul sayth, that it is not absurd to say, that we in such sort haue the fruition of the righteousness of Christ, that by it we are iustified, soasmuch as by the offence and disobedience of one man many are condemned. This (sayth he) he ought to haue proued, that we are infected by the sinne that we haue drawen from Adam, which yet he did not, but left it vndissolued. ¶ Paul rather proued, that we are partakers of that corruption, euen by this, that we die. And they die also whiche haue not sinned after the likenes of the transgression of Adam. ¶ Wherefore by death, as by the effect he sufficiently proued original sinne. For in Paul after ward sayth (when he entreateth of the calling of the Gentils, and of the reiecting of the Jewes) that the Gentils came by faith, but the Jewes sought saluation by the woorkes of the law, he putteth not that as a cause but onely as an effect of predestination. For it may straight waye be demaunded, whetherence the Gentils had they? sayth. And if they had it of God, as doubtles they had, why did God geue it vnto them? Surely for no other cause, but because he

The wordes of Chrysostome some before alleged, are examined. The things that are here spoken pertaineth not to the calling of the Gentils. We must not saie but that what he saith which he neuer saith. ¶ Paul in this little same chap. dissolueth the question which he did put forth. ¶ Paul proued that we are infected by the sinne of Adam.

That the Gentils by saying came vnto Christ, is not the cause of predestination, but the effect. ¶ God graunt not faith vnto his rascals, but of purpose.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

The Mani-ches confu-ted of Paul.

The Pelagi-
ans confu-
ted.

Origen con-
futed.

What is
the ground-
felle of earthly promises

Jacob had the possession of the first
birth, not in himself, but in his posterity.

The latter oracle is cause of the first.
A place of Malachie
declared.

From the
loue of God
cometh eter-
nall life:
and from his hatred eter-
nall destruction.

would. Wherefore let vs leue those thinges as not agreable with the wordes of the Apostle, and this rather let vs consider, how the Apostle in this place confuteth iij. errors. First, he stoppeth the mouth of the Manichies, which attributed much vnto the houre of the natiuitie: as though we should by the power of the starres iudge of the life, death and other chaunces that happen vnto men. For Paul sayth: that Jacob and Esau were borne both at one time, in whome yet we see that in theyr whole life was great diuersitie. He confuteth also the Pelagians, which taught that the will is so free, that euery one is according to his merites forerene of God: which error is also in other places confuted of Paul by most strong reasons. For to the Ephesians he saith: Which hath elected vs in him before the constitution of the world, that we should be holy. He saith not, that he elected vs, for that we were holy, but that we should be holy. And vnto Titus: He hath saued vs, not by the woorkes of righteousness which we haue done, but according to his mercy. And to Timothe: Which hath called vs by his holy calling, not according to our woorkes, but according to his purpose and grace, which is geuen vnto vs in Christ Iesus before the times of the world. By which wordes we see, that the election of God consisteth of Grace, whiche we haue had from eternally. Farther, by these wordes of Paul is also confuted Origen as we haue sayde. For Paul saith that these two had done neither good, nor euell.

The elder shall serue the younger.] This seemeth to be a temporall promise. But we haue before oftentimes admonished, that the foundation and ground felle of these earthly promises is the promise touching Christ, and touching the obteynment of saluation through him. And this maye hereby be gathered: for if we haue a respecte vnto the principallitie of the first birth, we shall not finde that Jacob attained to it. For he neuer bare dominion ouer his brother Esau so longe as he liued: yea rather when he returned out of Mesopotamia he came humblye vnto him, and desired that he mought obteyne mercy at his handes, and it vndoubtedly seemeth, that Esau was farre mightier then he. Althoughe touching the posteritie of eche it is not to be doubted, but that the promise toke place. For in the time of Dauid and of Salomon, the Iewes obtained the dominion ouer the Edumites. If these thinges be well applied to the purpose of the Apostle, then muste it needes be that that they be vnderstanded of the promise of Christ, and of eternall felicity. For this is it that Paul endeuoreth, that it shoulde not seeme to be againste the promise of God, that few of the Iewes are receaued vnto the Gospell, seeing that the greatest part of them were excluded. And when he had brought this testimony of Jacob and Esau, that the elder should serue the younger, of that oracle he bringeth this reason, that the election mought abide according to purpose. Which thinge for that it seemed hard vnto humane reason, he confirmeth by an oracle of Malachy.

As it is written: Jacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated.] This sentence of Scripture which is here cited is the reason and cause of the other sentence which he before alleadged: namely, That the elder should serue the younger: Which is hereby confirmed for that it is written: Jacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated. These wordes are written in Malachy aboute the beginning of the first chapter in which place God thus vpbayeth vnto the people their ingratitude: I haue loued you. And they are sayd thus to haue answered: Wherein hast thou loued vs? The sayth the Lord, Jacob and Esau were they not brethern? And yet haue I loued Jacob, & hated Esau. And this he hereby proueth, for that they beinge brethren, yet he preferred Jacob before Esau. And vnto Esau he gaue a waste and solitary land, & suffered not the Edumites to be deliuered from theyr captiuitie: yea rather he threatneth, that if they should enterpryse to reedifie theyr countrey being ouerthrowen, he would then destroy it. But vnto the Israelites he gaue a good & fertile land: who if peradventure they should for theyr sins be led away into captiuitie, yet he promised y he would bring the home again, & fully restore again vnto the theyr old kingdom. But these things forasmuch as they are earthly, we do not at this present meddle w. This thing onely I thinke is diligently to be weighed, y of the loue of God cometh eternall life, and from his hatred eternall destruction. Some in this place

with

with great curiosity enquire touching Ismaell and Eſau, whether they be ſaued, or whether they be condemned. And the like ſome do, touching Salomon, Origen and others ſuch like. But I omitte theſe thinges, and thinke of Eſau and Ismaell, ſo much onely as the holy ſcripture hath ſet forth vnto vs. And I thinke that there are no places extant, by which we may define any thing touching their ſaluation: The ſcripture thus ſpeaketh of Eſau, that he ſo vehemently hated his brother, that he ſought to kill him, that he ſold his birth right, that he prouoked his parentes to anger, when he had take ſtrange women for wiues: that he was a violent man, and deſpiſed the land of Chanaan promiſed vnto the fathers: and in the epiſtle to the Hebrues it is written, that he although he poured out many teares, yet found he no place of repentance. Of Ismaell alſo we reade, that he was reiected not only by the will of Sara, but alſo by the will of God. But touching both their poſterities, I deny not, but that ſome of them might be ſaued, no les then ſome of the ſtocke of Iacob might become runnagates and obſtinate. For it is ſufficient to the election and reiection of God, that ſome part of ech ſtocke be either elected or reiected. And touching this ſentence I haue Ambroſe on my ſide: who affirmeth that the moſt holy man Iob was of y ſamely of Eſau. Which ſaying yet how much it is to be regarded I know not. This thing only I dare affirme, y as many as were ſaued that came of Iſraell, thoſe were ſaued by the grace of God: and had a promiſe of their ſaluation: and on the other ſide, as many as were ſaued of the ſtocke of Eſau, thoſe alſo were ſaued by the mere grace of God, but there was no peculiar promiſe touching their ſaluation. But as many as were of that ſtocke condemned, they were condemned for their ſinnes. And the ſentence of the reiection of the poſterity of Eſau is indefinite, neither is to be vnderſtanded of euery one particularly. But it may ſeeme moze then wonderfull, that God in his election woorketh not only contrary to our iudgement, but alſo contrary to his own lawes. For not only after the maner of men the firſt borne are preferred before the reſt of the brethren, but alſo by the preſcript of the lawe of God they were holy, and obtained a double portion of the inheritance. But God therefore ſo doth, that we ſhould vnderſtand that we are ſaued only by grace, and not through any priuiledges or conditions of this life: and mozeouer to geue vs to vnderſtand that he is utterly free from all lawes. For his will is euen iuſtice it ſelfe, and the rule of all thinges that are by right and iuſt. But becauſe men can not attayne to the knowledge of of this hidden election, therefore we ought to frame our ſelues to the lawes of God, which are publiſhed abroad and ſet forth to all men. For Iſaack circumciſed his ſonne Eſau as God had commaunded him: neither was he greatly carefull whether he were elected of God, or reiected: for he was then utterly ignorant of the counſaile of God. But the mother, for that ſhe had hard the oracle gaue faith vnto it, as it became her, and had a care that the bleſſing might be diſtributed according to the will of God: And ſo by her induſtry it came to paſſe, that Iacob preuented his brother of the bleſſing. Touching which will, when the father alſo was by the ſpirite of God made moze certayne, he would by no meanes make void that which had now paſſed betwene him and Iacob. Paul might now ſeeme to haue thoroughly defended the truth of the promiſes of God, when as after the example of Ismaell and Iſaack, which were borne of diuers parentes and at diuers tymes, he with ſo great diligence byingeth in alſo an other couple of brethren, Iacob and Eſau, in whome all thinges in a manner were equall. For they were borne both of one and the ſelfe ſame parentes, and in one and the ſelfe ſame day, and as Auguſtine ſaith in his epiſtle to Sixtus, both conceived at one and the ſelfe ſame time: leaſt any man might cauell, that the father was better when he begat the one, then he was when he begat the other. And the mother which bare them both was one and the ſelfe ſame woman. And although ſhe myght in that ſpace of time whileſt ſhe was with child, alter her maners and diſpoſition, yet that could not in ſuch ſort profit the one, to be a let vnto the other. Although by the Grece it appeareth not, that they were both conceived at one and the ſelfe ſame time. How

What is to
be thought of Eſau.

What is to be thought
of their ſtocke.

Indefinite promiſes are not to be vnderſtanded of euery one particularly

God doth
thinges contrary to his lawes.

The industry of y<sup>e</sup> ho-lye ghost in Paul.

Paul most diligently red the scriptures.

The Prophets interpreters of Moses.

Paul faithfully alleageth y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures & daied no
in them.

beit this is red, That Rebecka had fellowship by one, even by our father Isaack. But Augustine followed the latine translation. Farther it is not unlikely to be true, y<sup>e</sup> they which were bozne in one and the selfe same tyme, were also begotten at one & the selfe same tyme: especially seeing that the Apostle in this place endeuoreth in this couple of twynes utterly to take away all maner of differences. In Paul also is to be considered the industry of the holy ghost: who when he had affirmed out of the holy scriptures, that of these two brethren the one was elected, the other rejected, bringeth no other reason or cause of the counsell of God, but that election should abide according to purpose. But because he saw, that this would in no case sa-tisfye humane reason, therefore he confirmed his sentence by an oracle of Malachy. who straight way at the beginning of his first chapter, thus writeth: The Lord hath loved you: And ye haue sayd, wherein hath the Lord loved vs? And the Prophet maketh answer, Jacob and Esau were they not brethren? But I haue loved Jacob and haue hated Esau. Wherefore with Malachy, to loue, is all one wyth that which Paul hath, That the Election of God should abide according to purpose.
Neither is this to be passed ouer, that the Apostle in thus ioyning together these two testimonies declareth, that he had not negligently red the scriptures. Wherefore we also must endeuor our selues to do the like, when as we shall see places of the scriptures alleadged either of the Apostles, or of other writers. Paul, when he red the Prophet Malachy and saw that God proueth his loue towardes the Iewes, by that, that he had loved Jacob and hated Esau, when yet notwithstanding they were brethren and twines, straight way turned himselfe to the history of Genesis, and there considered many thinges, which mought conduce to adorne and amplifie this matter: namelpe, that they were bozne borhe at one and the same time, and of one and the selfe same parentes: and that the oracle was geuen when they were yet in the wombe, neither had yet done either any good or any euill. And perusing these thinges he considered that that which the Prophet had spoken more briefly, mought be of him not without great profit and edification dilated: so also is it profitable for vs to do, namelpe, diligently to waigh the places of the scriptures which are sometimes cited of the Apostles.
The Prophetes were (as we haue oftentimes said) interpreters of the booke of Moses. They preached repentance, not only agranating sinnes, but also setting forth the promises of the Gospell concerning grace. Which thinges Malachy in this place did excellently wel comprehend. Farther Paul most thoroughly saw, that of the loue of God, and of that oracle which was geuen vnto the mother touching the infantes, was assigned no cause thorough woorks or merits. These thinges I say mought suffice as touching this place, but that there is yet one doubt remayning to be dissolued. For Erasmus in hys booke which he wrote de Libero Arbitrio, for that he saw that these places which we haue now made mention of, make agaynst hym, thus dissolueth them: First he sayth y<sup>e</sup> answer was made vnto Rebecka touching thinges tempoꝝall, that the elder should serue the younger, and God may at his free wil & pleasure cause, that a mā whether he will or no shall leade a poze life, and be a bond mā, whom yet he will not reiect from eternall saluatio. Farther he addeth, that these testimonies, as Paul bringeth the, are repugnāt y<sup>e</sup> one to y<sup>e</sup> other, whe yet in their places they are not so repugnant. Here doubtes is to be required in this mā not onely prudence but also piety. For it is not mete for a man to thinke, that Paul whe he layd the first foundations of Christian religion, did vnfaithfully cite the scriptures, or brought those places for testimonies, which serued litle to the purpose. Paul daied not in the holy scriptures, to make in his writings those testimonies repugnāt, which in theyꝝ owne places are not repugnante: for this were, as the blasphemous caulier, and vngodly Prophirius did, to abuse the simplicity of the vnlearned. But if at any time we can not vnderstand, how the testimonies which are cited of Paul and of other of the Apostles make to theyꝝ purpose, why doe we not rather confesse our owne infirmitie of vnderstanding and negligence, whereby it commeth

meth to passe, that we can not attayne to the exact contemplation of things diuine? But whereas he sayth that the oracle was geuen to Rebecka touching things temporall, it nothing helpeth him, for yet still the reason of Paul remaineth strong. For so much as he concludeth that a man is made either a Lord or a bondman, a rich man, or a poore man, by these testimonies he inuincibly proueth that that cometh not thorough any merites or workes of men. For thereto only had Paul a respect. But the case, that the question were moued, why by the election of God one is made a prince, an other a subiect, one is afflicted, an other fortunate: here doubtles, this is the thinge that is in controversy, whether these thinges are so ordered thorough the vertues and merites of men, or thorough the mere goodnes of God. Paul leueth no place at al to merites: yea rather he sayth, that God had decreed that these thinges should come to passe, before that they which should do them, were borne: and had appoynted that the one should be a Lord, and the other a seruant, before that they coulde ether do or thinke any thinge. Wherefore the question is generally and vniuersally put forth, and not only touching the maner of principallity or seruitude. Wherefore whether those be spirituall or temporall thinges, the scope which the Apostle entendeth is vterly one and the same: namely, that they come without any our workes or merites. If a man should alledge sentences nothing pertainyng to the purpose, euen amongst the philosophers he should be laughed to skorne: how much les then ought we to impute any such thing to Paul? But to make thee to vnderstande that those testimonies are mosse agreeyng to the matter proposed I will declare that in them are contayned not only thinges temporall, but also and that chiefly, thinges spirituall. For so much as God promised that the greater people should serue the lesser, the same, vnles we will to farre stray out of the way, we ought to thinke should therefore come to passe, for that the lesser nation should be receaued of God into fauor, and should become his people. For otherwise neither the lesse people coulde overcome the greater, nor the weaker the stronger. It is God only, which is the doer thereof, and vpholdeth that people whome he hath decreed to be his. And where the people of God are, there follow infinite spirituall benefites: namely, the word of God, the heauenly blessing, the breathyng of the holy ghost, remission of sinnes thorough Christ, and last of all eternall life. Let vs consider the hystorie it selfe as did Paul, and we shall perceau that in the blessing of Iacob the thinges which his father Isaake blesteth him withall, are chiefly spirituall: namely, that vnto him should be subiect not only his brethren, but also the Gentiles: which there is no man but seeth that it was accomplished in his seide and yet not in all his seide, but in it onely, whiche was so long time, and so carefully waited for: which doubtles was Christ, who at this day both the Iewes and Gentils worship. Those that blesse thee (saith he) let them be blessed: and those that curse thee, let them be cursed. And these thinges are agreing vnto Christ onely and vnto the elect. For whosoener shall worship him, shalbe rewarded with eternall felicitie: and whosoener is contumelious either against him, or against his members, shalbe obnoxious vnto the eternall curse and destruction. The selfe same thinges also are to be vnderstanded in the oracle of Malachy. For if the posteritie of Iacob should be in good case, and the posteritie of Esa in yll, it is not enquired, whether God promiseth thinges spirituall or temporall: but whether he would geue those thinges vnto them in consideration of theyr workes and merites, or no. But that I am sure thou shalt not finde in that whole prophete: which thinge Paul also diligently pepsed: although these thinges are also to be referred vnto spiritual matters. For how came it to passe that the pub. wealth of the Israelites was preserved, that they had a commodious land to dwell in, and that they were restozed from the captiuitie of Babilon? Doubteles by no other meanes, but for that they had God fauorable vnto them. And God, as touching those, whose God he will peculiarly be, prouideth for the not only commodities in this life, for he is the God of the whole man, and hath

Whether the question be vnderstanded touching thinges spirituall or temporall: it is all one as touching the scope of Paul.

The oracle before cited, applied to the spiritual promise.

The blessings of the fathers are to be referred to Christ and to his members.

God proueth deeth for his not onely
things earth ly, but also eternall.

The earth is by reason of sinnes
made barre.

God in dede loueth, and in dede ha-teth.

Whether God loue or hate in respect of works fore-
seene.

God findeth
deeth not in men and worthines
for which they should be elected.

no les care ouer the soule then he hath ouer the body, & that not only in this life, but also in this life to come: but let vs peruse the entent of Malachy. He reprobeth the people of ingratitude towards God: God (saith he) is your father, and Lord: Howbeit ye neither loue him, nor reuerence him, when yet he hath loued you. And that loue he proueth by a double benefite of God towards them: first, for that he loued Jacob, and preferred him before Esau, when yet notwithstanding they were brethren and twines: secondly for that he gaue vnto the one a fertile and plentyfull land to inhabite, but vnto the other he gaue an vnfruitfull and barren land: and for that he deliuered the one from theyr captiuitie: but would haue the captiuitie of the other to be perpetuall. So the loue of God is proued by the effects: but of that loue is alledged no cause. I graunt indeede, that the posterity of Esau were alwayes wicked men, and enemies vnto the people of Israell, & although by affinity they were ioyned vnto them, yet they were alwayes aduersaries and enemies vnto them. Some say also, that Mahomet came of that nation: although there are others which referre his stock to the Ismaelites. Farther the earth also is by reason of sinnes made barren. Therefore Dauid sayth, That for the sins of the people the earth is turned into a wilderness, and is made of God vnfruitfull. But neither Paul, nor the prophet describe these things as causes of the loue of God. Yea rather if we should sayne any such exposition vnto Malachy, his reprehension should somewhat be extenuated. For when he rebuydeth vnto the people ingratitude, for that God had loued them, they mought in one word haue made answer. Therefore hath he loued vs, bycause we deserued it: for he foresaw that our workes should be good: and for that cause he loued vs. Wherefore much wayght is taken away from this reprehension, if we admitte this opinion. Many trouble theyr heddes about the hatred and loue of God: and say that he neither loueth nor hateth, as we vse to do. Which thing indeede I graunt: for God loueth with out all manner of troubled affection: and loueth perpetuallly, for he is not changed: he hateth also without perturbation: and for that he is not mutable, he perpetuallly hateth those whom he hateth. They say moreover, that these things are to be considered by the effects, so that God is sayd to loue him to whome he doth good: and to hate him whome he ouerpasseth, and leueth in sinnes: and for his sinnes which he hath committed afterwarde greuously punisheth. Herein I will not contend with them: although in graunting this I also affirme wth the holy scripture, that God truly and in dede loueth and hateth: and that thereof followe those effects, which we haue now mencioned. And bycause we can not by it selfe vnderstand the force and might of the loue & hatred of God, therefore we consider them by the effects: namely, ether by his gifts, or by his punishments. But the ground of this question is, whether he loue come of our merites, or freely. The Apostle excludeth merites: other some sayne workes foreseene. Therefore it shall not be amisse to recite theyr opinions, that we may see how this is to be vnderstanded, that God either hateth or loueth. Chrysostome thinketh, that God therefore loued Jacob, because he was good: and reiected Esau, because he was euill. And if thou saye, that they, forasmuche as they were not yet borne, had done neither good nor euill, he maketh answer, that vnto God it is not needefull to waite for the euent of things. For he by the most sharpe sighte of his foreknowledge seeth before all eternitie, what things shal afterwarde come to passe: and he alone knoweth truly, who shal be worthy of his election, & who vnworthy. But here Chrysostome somewhat strayeth from the truth, when hee saith, that God findeth in men any worthinesse for which they ought to be elected. For what thing els is that: but, not onely to diminish, but also utterly to take awaye euen the grounde of grace? For if of our selues we be worthy to be elected, verely the grace of God is not geuen vnto vs freely. Howbeit he confesseth, that the Apostle speaketh not this: for if he had made answer, that Jacob was therefore elected, for that he was good, and Esau reiected for that he was euill, he saith that the Jewes mought straightway haue replied, if we be reiected for our wickednes, nes, what were the Gentiles whiche are now receaved any better then we: This thinge also woulde they utterly haue denied. For the Gentiles were infected with most greivous sinnes: howbeit he sayth, it moughte be graunted, that the Gentiles which were now called were good, for that they had receiued the faith of Chyriste: which the Jewes by all maner of meanes withstode. But Paul would not in such sorte make aunswer, but referred the whole matter to the foreknowledge of God: against which doubtles (saith he) none that hath his righte wittes will stande. For by it God foreseeth, who shalbe good, and who euill. But here againe he is far out of the waye. For Paul resoluech not the question into the foreknowledge of God, but into his will, mercy, and power. For he sayth: that it is not of hym that willeth, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that hath mercy: & that he hath mercy on whom he will: and hardeneth whome he wyll: and lastly, that the potter maye of one and the selfe same masse or lombe make one vessel to honor, and another to contumely. And to the Ephesians (he saith) that we are elected accordinge to the good pleasure of his Will. Chrysostome addeth, that when it is sayd, that the elder shall serue the younger, thereby is shewed that the right and dignity of the first birth should nothing profite hym, which came first out of the wombe, but the vertue which God foresaw before workes. Here it is a harde matter to vnderstand what manner a thinge that vertue is, whiche should goe before workes. For what doth he peradventure thinke, y these men are bozne endued w vertue? But there can no such thing be found in y scriptures: for they testifie y me are bozne y chyldren of wrath, & obnoxious vnto sinne. But as far as we can coniecture by those thinges which follow, he taketh vertue for a minde apte and prone to good thinges. But God cannot in election haue a regard vnto any such minde. For there is none that hath such a mind by nature or proper vnto himselfe, but it utterly dependeth of the grace and fauor of God. For, as it is written in the booke of Genesis, All the imagination of mans hart is euill. But because he seeth that in the wordes of the Apostle is no mencion at all made of foreknowledge, it is a world to see, where hence in Gods name he picketh it out. That which Paul saith, That the election should abide according to purpose, he thus interpretateth, That in that birth of twynes God mought declare his election according to purpose, that is, according to the foreknowledge of workes to come, which foreknowledge election followeth. But he should haue proued, that purpose signifieth onely foreknowledge. Which doubtles he can not doe: for it signifieth rather a deliberate sentence and decree of the minde. Neither doth thys any thing helpe hym, which is of some objected, that Paul when he sayth, Not of workes, excludeth workes already done, and not workes that shalbe done. As though forsooth there were any difference, whether they be done, or whether they be to be done. For when the Apostle had sayd, that we are saved by grace, he added, If of grace, then not of workes, and if of workes, then not of grace. For these haue suche an Antithesis or contrariety, the one to the other, as touchinge our election and saluation, that the one excludeth the other. Farther, when Paul had sayde, Not of workes, he added, But of him that calleth, which word euene alone oughte to haue feared awaye men, from attributing so much to merites. But Chrysostome, and such like as he is, alwayes say, that God electeth and calleth those whome he knoweth shall beleue. Wherefore Chrysostome sayth, Let no man object vnto vs the sentence of the scripture, or continuall seruitude, when as God beholdeth, I say, not the outward parts, but also the inward worthines of the minde. Wherefore he saith, We must beleue the secrecy of the election of God, for that it is incomprehensible. But althoughe we also confesse that these secrecies are incomprehensible, yet taketh he it, one waye, and we an other way: for he thinketh that that secretie is to vs incomprehensible, for that we can not attaine to the knowledge of the worthines or vnworthines of those which are reiecte, or elected. But we refer that obscurity to the order of the counsels of God, which counsels, as we beleue they are iust, and right, so also see we not the reasons & causes of that iustice: and those causes we affirme oughte not in this matter of election to be considered by thinges here, but by the high and vnspokeable wisdom of God. But Chrysostome, for that he leaneth to the worthines of the minne, whiche worthines he saith we cannot consider, but God vnderstandeth right well, setteth forth an example of Mathew: who being a publicane, and exercising a most vile & dishonest

Paul resoluech not the question into the foreknowledge of God, but into his will Mynde prone to good thinges is not in vs by nature, but dependeth of god.

Chrysostom by purpose vnderstandeth foreknowledge. What is the purpose of God. There is no difference whether a man take workes done or workes to be done. Against workes and merites.

How the secret of God is said to be incomprehensible.

Similarity of Chrysostome.

Two similitudes.

Examples
of Chrys-tome.

Confutatio
of the sentence of Chrysostom

What is the election
of grace.
If election
hange of
wozdes,
grace is not
grace.

The opiniō
of Jerome.

We must not pretend
any obscurenes in this chapter.

Here is en-
treated of the chiefe promise of our saluatiō

vn honest office, was yet not withstandinge a p̄cious stone brouned in durte oʒ myze. Which God did not onely esteeme, but also gathered vp, and polished it with grace, and a great many giftes. Here he saimeth plainely to saye, that Mathew had that woʒshines of himself: foʒ he sayth that grace was after ward geuen vnto him, and because he would the plainelier expounde himselfe, he addeth two similitudes. The first is, of cōning lapidaries, which chōse not out those p̄cious stones, which they see allowed of men ignozaunte and of the common people, but foʒ that they haue a most skilfull sight, they sometimes take those, which others reiecte. The second is of suche as tame & breake hozses: which do not straight way chōse out those coltes whiche the rusticall people iudge to be beste, but they haue certaine assured markes, which the common soʒte of men see not, wherebye they knowe, that those hozses will be couragious and good, when they are better growen. So God elected the harlot, the thiefe, and the publicane, reiecting the high p̄iestes, Scribes, & Pharisees, in whome the common people thought consisted al doctrine and holines. Oftentimes also in the church, those which were highly esteemed, and seemed to excel, when persecution came, fell awaye: when in the meane time men abiecte and vile triumphed with the gloʒy of martyrdome. Wherefoʒe take not vpon thee (saith he) of so great a woʒkeman to enquire the causes, why this man is beloued, and that man reiecte, why this man is crowned, and that man punished. Foʒ if he loued Iacob, & hated Esau, doubtles he did not that vniustly. But he requireth a noble harte, and a gratefull minde. Foʒ they which are such, although they sometimes fall into vices, yet they streight way step vp againe. And although they some longe while abide in sinnes, yet God at the length deliuereth them. But they which are of a bituate and corrupt mind, although they seeme sometimes to shine with good woʒkes, yet whatsoeuer they do, they wholly viciate it with the prauitie of theyʒ mind: and to declare this, he bzingeth also examples. Foʒ Dauid was not of purpose oʒ malice, but by the violence of the flesh, and vehemency of luste led to sinne: and therefoʒe was he soʒgeuē of God, and returned againe into the right way. But the pharisey foʒ that he semed vnto himself to abound in good woʒkes, by his boasting & hypocrisy lost al. This is y sum of y which Chrysostom hath when he expoundeth how God loued Iacob, & hated Esau. But how litle these things agreē with y woʒds of y Apostle, although it may be vnderstāded by those things which are red in this cha. yet is it most of al manifest by y which is had in y 11. chap. of this epistle, where is described the answere which was made by God to Elias, That God had lefte vnto himself ten Th. mē, which had not bowed their knees before Baal: where Paul thus saith, The remnantes according to the election of grace shalbe made safe, not of workes: otherwyse grace should not be grace. In which woʒdes is to be marked the Hebzeu phrase, According to the election of grace. Foʒ it is all one as if it had bene sayde, According to the gracious or free election. Foʒ in that tong the sonne of perdition, is nothing els but the lost sonne. But that we should vnderstand that our election consisteth freely, Paul so excludeth woʒkes, that if they should be receaued, he saith, Grace can no more be grace. And thus much touching Chrysostome. Now let vs see what Jeromes minde is touching this matter. He in his 10. question to Hedibia, beginneth doubtles in my iudgement not very soundly. Foʒ he saith, that this is a most obscure place, when as other wise in the woʒdes of the Apostle as touching the question there is no ambiguity at all. But he and other such like make the thing obscure, whilest they labour to eschew moze thē is nedeful the offence of humane reason. Foʒ Paul, if a man haue a regard to the grammaticall sence, if in any other place then mozte of all in this place obserued both in his interrogation and answere, and propitious placing of his woʒdes, whatsoeuer mought seme requisite. And should be not a litle contumelious against the holy ghost, if he would of purpose haue so obscured the doctrine concerning the p̄ncipall ground of our saluation, so that we should not be able to vnderstand it. Foʒ in this place is entreated of a matter which is of all other of most waight, namely, to what thing we ought to attribute our saluation and election: whether to our woʒkes foʒe sene

to the free mercy of God. Ierome bling this for his p[re]face, turneth himselfe afterward to reprove Origen, howbeit he leueth his name vnerpressed. For Origen labouring to iustify God, as touching the loue of Jacob, and hatred of Esau, which as yet had done neither good nor euil, sayth, y<sup>e</sup> that came to passe by reason of those things which their soules had done, befoze they came into their bodies. For of those merites it cometh, y<sup>e</sup> me in this life are of diuers estates. These things Ierome wozthely reproveth. For they pertain not to Christian piety, but to the doctrine of Plato and of Pythagoras. For they sayned sondry courses, departures & returnes of the soules. Why do we not rather (saith Ierome) confesse our own ignorance. This sentence as I commend, so also se I that it is not alwayes kept of him which spake it. For if he would haue bene content with a godly ignorance, he had not fained & imagined those questions and suppositions of Paul, which in very dede are none at all. But he would not, that the Apostle should seme to haue taught these thinges contrary to common sence. For when Paul had said, Jacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated, and afterward had added, What is there iniquity wyth God? and had made answer, God forbid & proued by testimonies of the scriptures, that God tempereth and moderateth his election according to his wil, mercy, and power, Ierome sought to bow and to wrest those thinges which Paul had most simply spoken, as if they were importunately objected vnto Paul by way of interrogation: as though when Paul had answered, God forbid, the importunate caweler should go on, and say, If God sayd vnto Moses, I wyll haue mercy on whome I wyll haue mercy, and wyll shew compassion on whome I wyll shew compassion, then shall it not now be neither of hym that wyll, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. And if he to thys ende raysed up Pharao to declare in him hys power, what could he then do wythall? And if we be as clay in the hand of the potter, why do we yet complayne? Who can resist hys wyll? Shall there be nothing remayning of free wyll? Let Paul make answer to these impudent objections: What art thou o man, which thus reasonest wyth God? Euen by thine owne malepertnes thou mayst sufficiently vnderstand, that thou art not as clay in the hand of the potter. For the clay complayneth not of hys maker: but thou (I wyll not say greuously) complaynest, but also powrest out blasphemy agaynst the creator, and callest hym vniust: and euen in thys thou declarest that thou hast free wyll, when as thou speakest what thou list, yea euen agaynst God himselfe. And if God would by his greates patience long suffer Pharao, and declare his mercy towarde others, he is not therefore to be accused of thee: the faulte is rather to be layde vpon the sinnes of men. For euen as by one and the selfe same heate of the sunne clay is made hard, and waxe made soft, so by one and the selfe same goodnes of God, some are made more obstinate, and other some returne to heaith. And therefore were the Gentles admitted into saluation, for that they receaued the fayth of Christ, and the Jewes were forsaken and reiecte, for that they resisted that fayth. Wherefore not the men themselues, but theyr wylls are electe. Wherefoze by these thinges it is euident, that Ierome also was of that mynde, that the election of God dependeth of the wyll and workes of men. And toward the end of this tenth question, he sayth, that he had red in a certaine autho[ri]ty, whose name yet he kepeth in silence, that the Apostle doth not only not dissolue the question, but also maketh it moze intricate by testimonies of the scriptures, and reproveth the curious inquisito[ri] after this maner. O man, what art thou? forsoth clay in the hand of the potter. Wherefoze kepe downe this thy malepertnes with eternall silence, and be mindfull of the infirmity which is in man. As touching y<sup>e</sup> dissolution of the question, if Ierome meane of that, wherein humane wisdom may be satisfied, we also do graunt, that the question is not dissolued: but if he speake of that kind of solution, which ought to be sufficient vnto Christian piety, and which may be had in this life, there is nothing wanting to this dissolution. Of the selfe same matter Ierome vpon Malachy, expounding the place which we are now in hand with writeth after this maner, The loue and hatred of God is either of foreknowledge, or of workes. For, those God loueth, whome he seeth to be haters of sinne: and those he hateth, whome he seeth wyll build up those thynges, which he wyll haue to be ouerthrowen. Finally he saith, that God is sayde to loue or to hate dyg[ressi]o[n]e.

Plato & Pythagoras.

Ieromes discourse vpon this place.

In interpretation of an autho[ri]ty not named.

This question can not so be dissolued to satisfie humane reason. Ierome vpon Malachy.

Jerome asgainst the Pelagians.
Jerome
praiseth Augustine.

Testimonies which Jerome
bringeth as gainst free will.

The strength of our free will is not so great, that it could moue God
to elect vs.

But, that is, after the maner of men, euen as he is sayde to be angry, to be fory, to reioyce: and therefore is he sayd to hate the wicked, that we shoulde eschew those thinges which we know he hateth. I know also that the Rabines of the Hebrewes, and especially Chismi, when they expound this place of Malachy, do runne vnto workes. But although in properties & phrases of wordes, I iudge those men worthy som what to be esteemed, yet as touching the sence of scripture and doctrine, I do not geue much credit vnto them. For they are utterly blinded: neither will they see Christ, which is the only scope of all the scriptures. But as touching Jerome, from those thinges which he wrote in those places, which we haue now alledged, I apeale vnto those which he learnedly & godly wrote against the Pelagians. For they thought y<sup>e</sup> our saluation dependeth of our workes & merites. He in the end of his third dialogue highly commendeth Augustine, neither any where els, y<sup>e</sup> I can remember of, speaketh he more worthely of him. For he calleth him a man holy, and eloquent, and excellently commendeth his booke against this heresy: and especially his booke of the baptisme of infantess to Marcellinus, and to Hilarinus. And he sayth, that he would not in that disputation procede any farther: for that either he should speake the selfe same thinges, that Augustine had before spoken, or els if he should seeke to bring other thinges, seeing Augustine had before brought better, he should but lose his labour. But in those booke, how much Augustine is against this sentence, namely, that election dependeth of workes, euery one that readeth them, may easily iudge. Farther he alleadgeth many thinges out of the scriptures, whereby is most euident and playne, that the strength of our fre will is so broken, and weakned, that our saluation can by no meanes depend of it. Ioseph (saith he) was led away into Egypt, and when being now captiue he was shut vp in prison, the Iailer committ ed all thynges to hys power and fidelity. And thereof is rendred a cause, namely, for that the Lord was wyth hym. He interpretateth vnto Pharaos his dreames: he is exalted vnto the dignity next vnto the king: he fedeth hys father & breithren. Iacob goeth downe into Egypt: encreaseth into a populous nation: hys posterity is after ward brought forth out of Egypt: and all these thinges is God sayd to haue brought to passe. Where then (sayth Jerome) is the power of fre will? And Salomon sayth, With all thy hart put thy confidence in God the Lord, but be not thou puffed vp in thine owne wisdom. In all thy wayes acknowledge him, that he may make thy wayes right. By him are directed the waies of mā. And Paul saith, not that we are sufficient to thinke any thing of our selues, as of our selues, but our sufficiency is of God. And moreouer (sayth he) darest thou still glory in free will, and abuse the benefites of God to the contumely of him that geneth thee them? and especially seeing that the selfe same vessell of election agayne writeth, We haue this treasure in vesselles made of clay, that the aboundance of our strength should be of God, and not of our selues. And agayne, he which glorieth, let him glory in the Lord. And when then Lorde sayth in the Gospel, I am the vine, and ye are the braunches: he which abideth in me, and I in him, bringeth forth much fruit, for without me ye can do nothing: Agayne, No man can come vnto me vntles my father shall draw him: by these wordes he breaketh the liberty of our will outrageous in pride. He addeth also, that this is to be marked, that he which is drawen is signified to haue bene before slowe, yea rather resisting and vnwillinge. And seeing y<sup>e</sup> the matter is so, how can the power of our will be so great, whereby God could be moued to elect vs? Andoubtedly we cannot so much as imagine any such power: when as how great so euer it be, we must always count to haue receiued it of y<sup>e</sup> grace of God. Now let vs see what Origenis mind is touching this matter. He beginneth in dede well, if he could haue continued still in the same minde. For at the beginning he sayth, That election is not of workes, but of the purpose of God, and of the good pleasure of him that calleth. And vpon the chapter next going before, when he expoundeth this place of Paul, Whome he foreknew, those he predestinated, so be made like vnto the image of his sonne, he sayth that foreknowledge can not be taken for a bare and simple knowledge: For God in his foreknowledge comprehendeth also the wicked, whome yet he predestinates not, to be made like vnto the image of his sonne. Wherefore he saith, that that knowledge signifieth an effect and loue, whereby God embraseth some, as Paul sayth to Timothe: The Lord knoweth who are his: who yet notwithstanding he knoweth also those that be aleantes from him. So it is written that

Christ

Christ knew not sinne: when yet undoubtedly he knew the nature of sinne. But he is sayd not to haue knownen it, because he allowed it not, neither at any time committed any sinne. The Iewes also which together with Moses slew the Israelites that had played the Idolaters, are sayd to haue knownen neither father nor mother, nor kinsfolkes, nor frendes, for that they were not drawn by any private affection, to spare them, or to absteyne from killing of them. Wherefore when Paul saith, whome he foreknew, those also he predestinated he thus interpretateth it, that God predestinated those whome he loued. These things being thus well set, afterward he addeth vnto them thinges cleene contrary, making some kinde of protestation, as Jerome did, of the obscurenes of the place. He also imagineth that the purpose of Paul was much like to this: namely, that he in this epistle to the Romanes, doth as a mā which wil lede about a stranger thorough a goodly large Palace of a king. For whilstt a stranger is led thorough diuers rooms, and parlours, and chambers, it oftentimes cometh to passe, that he knoweth not neither which way he came in, nor which way to get out. This similitude in dede some like very wel, but in my iudgement it is not to be liked. For, this he seemeth plainly to signifie, that God hath commended vnto vs his holy scriptures, as a Labyrinth or maze, wherein we should wader. For neither is therein this place any obscurenes, but such as is of these mens own deuising. Wherefore he sayth, that when Paul had sayd out of Malachie, Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated, he straight way objected vnto him selfe: What then shall we say, is there iniquity with God? And made answer vnto him selfe, God forbid: which answer he thinketh is to be repeted, as often as the Apostle is asked the questiō of the importunate and forward demaūder. For he imagineth, that one should thus continue in questioning with Paul, If it was sayd vnto Moses: I wil haue mercy, on whome I wil haue mercy: and wil shew compassion, on whome I wil shew compassion, therefore it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath compassion. Here he sayth must be added, God forbid. Farther if it seemed good to God to rayse by Pharaο, to declare in him his power, therefore he hath mercy on whom he will, & hardeneth whom he wil. Why then do we still complayne? For who can resist his wil? Here againe he addeth, God forbid. He for no other cause, as I suppose, thus wresteth & text, but for y he would not haue mans vnderstanding to much offended, or free will im- payred. But that this wrested expositiō yet satisfied hym not, it is manifest by y which he alledgeth out of a booke of fre will, which he saith he wrote, although y booke be not at this day extant. And in it he endeouereth to interpretate these words as if they were the wordes of Paul him selfe, and not of any other man asking a questiō: They hurt no more free will, sayth he, then that which we rede in Dauid, Vnles the Lord build the house, they labour in vaine which build it. The builder in dede doth som what, for he is carefull, and laboreth: but God remoueth away the lets, and permitteth the worke to be accomplished. So will he haue that to be vnderstanded, which is writtē vnto the Corinths. Neither he which wateth, nor he which planteth is anye thing, but God which geneth the encrease. Wherefore although we laboꝝ, yet it is God, which geueth perfection & accomplishmēt to our laboꝝ. After this maner thinketh he, may aptly be expounded this sentence: It is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. But this cauallation Augustine (of whose iudgment as touching this matter I am) in a greate many places excellently well confuteth. For so (sayth he) we may inuert the sentence the other way, and thus say: It is not of God that hath mercy, but of man that willet and runneth. But touching this matter we will speake moze at large in due place. Thus much we thought good at this present to reherse, that thou moughtest se that Origen hym selfe putteth no greate affiance in this his first interpretation: howbeit he goeth on in it, and thus repelleth that troublesome and importunate inquisitor: O man what art thou that answerest vnto God, and goest to Law with him? When as thou art as clay in the hand of the potter? Neither vouchsafeth he to make anye other answer to the troublesome inquisitor. For so he sayth, Christ when he was demaūded, by what of Digenes.

A similitude

The holy scriptures
are not like a Labyrinth or maze.

Why this place is made so troublesome
of these fathers.
Digenes wrote a booke of free
will.

Cap.9 A Commentarie vpon the

power be did those thinges, would not make answer vnto the Scribes. Whome doubtles he would haue answered, if they had asked the question with a godly minde, and with a minde desirous to learne. For so also a master, that hathe a malapert seruauit, which neglecteth to doo the thinges which he is commaunded, and troublesomely enquireth the causes of those thinges which are commaunded him, would say vnto him: What hast thou to doo to enquire touching these thinges? I will haue it so, bycause it is my pleasure so: When as other wise he would make answer, if he were asked the question of a saythfull and an obedient seruauit. Therefore God although he hid from many what he would do, yet reueled he his secretes vnto Daniell a man desirous of knowledge. So we also, if we be not rash and importunate inquisitors, may in the scriptures know the causes of the loue and hatred of God to wardes Iacob and Esau: although to the malapert and importunate inquisitors that answer which is here geuen of Paul ought to be sufficient. And in the first epistle to Timothee it is written, That, In a greete house are vessels, some of gold, some of siluer, some of clay: in this place that distinction of vessels is not discribed. Thys thing only Paul sayth, That the potter may of one and the selfe same masse make one vessel to honour, and an other to contumely. But vnto Timothee is geuen a cause of the diuersity. For thus it is written: He which shall purge himselfe from these thinges shall be a vessel to honour sanctified to God, and prepared to euery good worke. Of which wordes we may inferre to the contrary. He which purgeth not himself, nor clenseth him selfe shall be a vessel to contumely. Lo (saith he) the cause which was not geuen vnto the Romanes, is geuen vnto Timothee. Wherefore Iacob was therefore beloued, bycause he had clenfed him selfe from sinnes (for the scripture geueth testimony of hym, that he was a man simple, gentle, and obedyent to his parentes.) And Esau was therefore hated, for that he had not purged him selfe, but persenered in malice & in impiety. This exposition of Origen conteyneth many things which are not to be allowed. First for þ he persisteth not in those thinges, which he had spoken at the beginning: namelpe, that election consisteth not of woorkes, but of the purpose of God, and good pleasure of him that calleth: Secondlpe, for that he maketh darke those thinges which in the Apostle are plaine and perspicuous. Thirdly, for that in his booke of free will he declareth that he followeth not the exposition which he presently bringeth, mozeouer, for that he thinketh, that the Apostle in this place dissolueth not þ question, where he of purpose putteth it forth, and entreateth of it: but dissolueth it in the Epistle to Timothy, where he onely by the way toucheth that matter. Lastly, for that out of those wordes of the Apostle, he gathereth not a good solucion. For of that sentence of Paul, He which purgeth himselfe, shall be a cleane vessel, oughte not to be inferred, that a manne can by hys owne strengthes purge hymselfe, for that thinge doth God onely and not we our selues: Neyther is that argument of force to proue our strengthes and the libertye of our wyll, whypche is taken of a commaundemente or of an exhortacion. For God oftentimes commaundeth, and oftentimes exhorteth after this maner: If thou shalt do this or that, these, or those thinges shall happen vnto thee, to the ende we might vnderstande our infirmity, and acknowledge, from whence those things which are commaunded are to be sought for. But to be clenfed and purged in suche sorte as God geueth grace, cannot be the cause of election. Now wil I come to Ambrose, who in a maner nothinge disagreeth from these thinges: for he also will haue the purpose of God, to signifie foreknowledge. And when þ Apostle saith, That the election should abide according to purpose, he pepseth that word, should abide, and thereof gathereth, that the foreknowledge of God cannot be deceaued: neither is it possible, but þ euery thinge shall so come to passe, as God foreseeth euery thing shall come to passe: but he saith, that God loueth, and hateth, as he that foreknoweth thinges to come, and not as an acceptor of persons: but doubtles God cannot be sayd to accept persons, for that we beleue he frely loueth and hateth whome he wil, not by the foreknowledge of merites. For acceptation of persons is, when contrary to iustice distributiue we haue a respect vnto the conditions which make not a man woorthy either of þ gifte which is distributed, or of the office which is committed to his charge: as if a bishoppricke should be geuen vnto a man, bycause he is beawtifull, and of a tall stature, or for that he is a stout warrio, neglecting in the meane time other men moze woorthy and

Origen ge
ueth a cause of the loue
of God to-wardes Jacob, and of his hatred towardes Esau.
The opinit of Origen is cofuted.

What acception of persons is.

A simil-
tude.

and méte. But of this fault God cannot iustly be accused. For he findeth in vs no persons, or qualities, or conditions. For we come all equally of the corrupte Masse of Adam. Wherefore whatsoeuer afterwarde cometh either as touching giftes or woorthines, the same we haue not of our selues, but of the goodnes of God. But to returne to Ambrose, who thinketh that some are elected, for that God knoweth that they shall beleue, and others are reiecte, for that he knoweth that they wil be enemies vnto the truth. It appeareth also, that Augustine beinge yet rude, not as a then a Bishop, followed this sentence of his father: Hobbe it afterwarde when he had better examined the matter, he reuoked it. And Ambrose minde is, that the loue and hatred of God springeth of faith or infidelitie foreseene. Wherefore he addeth, Wherefore God foreknowing, that they should be endued wyth an euill wyll, counted the not in the number of the good: although Christ said vnto the 72. disciples which afterwarde fell awaye from hym, as it is written in the 6. chapter of Iohn, Reioyse and be glad for your names are written in heauen. For they are sayde to be written accordinge to a certayne present iustice, and not accordinge to foreknowledge: And God forasmuche as he is a iust iudge, iudgeth according to present iustice, and not according to foreknowledge. Wherefore that which the Lorde sayth to Moses in Exodus the 23. chapter, If any man sinne against me, I wyll blot him out of my booke, is so to be vnderstanded, that according to the righteousnes of the iudge he seemeth then to be blotted out when he sinueth: but according to the foreknowledge of God he was neuer written in the booke of life. For Iohn sayth, they wente out from vs, for that they were not of vs for if they had bene of vs, they had doubtles abiden with vs. Afterwarde Ambrose defineth the foreknowledge of God, and sayth, that it is that, whereby God hath certaintye appoynted what manner of will euery mans will shalbe, wherein he shall abide, and whereby he shall ether be condemned or crowned, wherefore there is no acceptation of persons in the foreknowledge of God. And he saith, that it is possible, that they which shall be good to the end, become sometimes euill: as it came to passe in Dauid: & contrariwise that they which shall at the last become euill: and shalbe condemned, yet notwithstandinge sometimes seeme good: as Saul, Iudas, Salomon, and Ionas, as long as Ioiada the priest liued. We see that Ambrose in this his sentence was brought to that point, that to auoyde the acceptation of persons, he referred the election of God to the foreknowledge of woorkes, least God should seeme vniust. But we haue already declared, that the equitie and iustice of God is nothing put in daunger, if we rightly vnderstande, wherein consisteth the fault of the acceptation of persons. But amongst the newe writers, Phocius, whose sentence is rehearsed amongst the Græke Scholies, by purpose, vnderstandeth (as other do) foreknowledge of woorkes: and thereof he affirmeth springeth election: when as by it is put a difference betwene men. But election cannot be vnles there be put some difference in those things which ought to be elected. But we say, that this difference is not to be considered by the thinges themselves which are elected, but by the sondrye purpose of God towarde them. For whatsoeuer good thing is founde in men, the same cometh from the méere mercye and goodnes of God. Neither can God foreknow that any thing shal come to passe, but that which he willett to be. For, forasmuche as all thinges that are haue by his will that that they be, whatsoeuer he foreknoweth shalbe, it is of necessitie y he willett the same to be. Wherefore God found no difference in men, but he himselfe putteth difference in the. The same Phocius addeth, Although there were no other reason of the election of God, but his will, yet ought we therewithal to be content: But there is another, namely, his foreknowledge of woorkes. But we haue already declared what deceiued this man: namely, for that he thinketh, y the difference, which must of necessity be in election, is alwayes taken of the thinges that are to be elected: when oftentimes they come of the méere will of him that electeth. But now we will come to Augustine, who in his questions to Simplicianus in his first booke and 2. question at large entreateth of this matter. He demaundeth in that place, why the mercye of God, which was present with Iacob, was wanting in Esaú. And he maketh answer, that it cannot be sayd, because that the one should beleue, & the other should not beleue: for that sayth it self is the gift of God: which thing others also (sayth he) do confesse: but therfore they say, the one beleued, for that he woulde receaue that

Definition of the foreknowledge of God after Ambrose.

The iustice and equities of God is not here put in any danger.

Election can not be but when there is difference of thinges. The difference of thinges to be elected, is not taken of the nature of the thinges themselves, but of the purpose of God.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

Our faith
is not an effect of our
will.

A good will is the gift
of God.

The calling of God of two sortes.

God wanteth
not a meane, whereby to bow the will of men.
It is repugnant to the will to be compelled.
God pouereth not malice in to Esau, but he gaue not vnto him
grace whereby he might be made good.
What two things are here to be held fast, although humane reason cannot make them agree

God cannot be letted,
but that he geueth his things as seemeth good
vnto hym.
How this is to be vnder-
standed,
thou hast hated none of the thynges which thou hast made.

gifte when it was offered, and yet other beleued not, for that he would not receaue it. But this aunswere is not sufficient. For then mought euery man ascribe his faith to his owne will, and thus say: Therefore haue I beleued, for that I woulde. And by that meanes he should haue, whereof he might gloze, and the grace of God and our faith should be of workes. Farther vnto the Philippias Paul writeth, that it is God which worketh in vs both to will and to performe according to his good will. Wherefore no man can haue a will to beleue, vnles God geue vnto him that will. Moreover it should then not be of God that hath mercye, but of man that willethe & runneth. And it is meruaile (sayth Augustine) if these men were demaunded, whether a good will be the gift of God, if they durst deny it: but peradventure they wil say, God in wayne hath mercye, if man will not: Which is imprudently spoken. For euery man hath a will, vpon whome God hath mercye. But if thou demaunde what maketh in vs this good will, we answer, the calling of God. But that seemeth to be against this which we reade in the Gospel, That many are called, but fewe are elected. That should not be true, if calling should haue that force to chaunge the will. Here we say that the calling of God is of two sortes: the one is common, whereby men in dede are after a sorte stirred vp, but they are not bowed. For that those thynges which are offered please them not: but the other is a conuenient, apte, and mightye calling, whereby the mindes are touched, and trulye chaunged. After this manner was Iacob called, and not Esau: therefore the one was beloued, the other hated: the one dyalwen, the other forsaken. Neither doth this any thinge further thereto say, that the willes of men are sometimes hardened: for it is not to be thoughte that God wanteth a meane, whereby to bow and chaunge them if he will. Therefore if we make God omnipotent, then can there be no obstinacy of men so greate, but that he can overcome it, not by compulsion, which is vtterly repugnant to the nature of will, but by persuation. Neither was it needeful that God when he hated Esau, should poure into him any new malice, whereby he mought be made euil: for he had that abundantly of himselfe, and by the corruption of nature. It was sufficient, if he gaue not vnto him grace, whereby he mought be made good. Therefore there are two thynges which we oughte constantly to holde fast: firste that there is no iniquitie wpyth God: secondlye, that he hath mercye on whome he wyl, and whome he wyl at his pleasure he hardeneth. Whyche two thynges althoughe humane reason can not easelye make to agree the one with the other, yet Augustine to the ende the iustice of God moughte after a sorte the easilier be vnderstanded, addeth a similitude of a creditoure, who hath two debtoures: whome, if vnto one he remitte his debte, and require his debte of the other, no no man can iustly accuse. Therefore if humane iustice had his originall of the iustice of God, it is wonderfull, that men can take this vpon the, to reprove that in God, which they confesse to be iust in men. And Iacob and Esau were obnoxious vnto the condemnation of originall sinne. Therefore God did nothinge vniustly, if he pardoned the one, and boughsed to bestow on him his fauour and grace: and by his iust iudgement punished the other. Debtors shoulde not haue a proude and rashe iudgement of the minde of their creditor, especially when he requireth of the no more then his dew. But how importunately men seeke to hinder God, that he should not at his pleasure geue the thynges that are his to whome he will, Christ declareth in the Gospel vnder the person of the good man of the house: Is it not lawfull (saith he) for me to do wyth myne owne what I wyl? Is thine eye euill? I am good. Take that which is thine owne, and go thy wayes. But it is written in the booke of wisdom the 2. chapter, Thou hast hated none of the thynges which thou hast made. Therefore seeing Esau was made of God, it semeth that he could not be hated of him. Augustine answereth, that we must make a distinction betwene nature and sinne: and so he maketh answer, that God loued Esau, as touching nature: but hated him by reason of sinne. But with this answer the minde can not be quieted, for euen by this selfe same reason, God may seme to haue hated Iacob: for he he also was no les obnoxious vnto originall sinne, then was Eſau. Vnto this obſeuation Auguſtine maketh anſwere, that God hated the ſinne of eche: but yet not after one and the ſelfe ſame maner. For he would haue ſinne to be in Iacob extinguished by ſorgeneſſes. And ſo that he had clered him of that debt, he is ſayd to loue hym. But he hated ſinne in Eſau, and would haue it puniſhed. And ſo, ſo that he left Eſau obnoxious vnto ſinnes which he would not ſorgue, he was ſayd to hate him. Finally he thus interpretateth this ſentence, Iacob haue I loued, but Eſau haue I hated, namely that he one was deliuered from ſin: but the other was left in ſinne. But how man and ſinne do either pleaſe or diſpleaſe God, he thus declareth. Firſt he ſaith, we muſt ſet befoze our eyes nature, ſecondly, ſinne, and thirdly, the puniſhment wherewith God chaſtiſeth the crime. Firſt of all he ſaith, God loueth nature, neither at any time hateth he it of himſelfe. But ſinne of his owne nature he hateth: although ſometimes when it is inflicted of him in reſpect of a puniſhment, ſo much as it is an inſtrument of the iuſtice of God, it utterly diſpleaſeth him not: ſo then by that ſinne others of the elect are kept vnder, that they ſhould not in like ſort committe ſinne. And this he declareth by an excellent ſimilitude: A Iudge (ſaith he) When a thefe is brought before him, hateth not the thiefe in reſpect that he is a mā: but the theft he condemneth. Neither doubtles hateth he the puniſhment, whereby he commaundeth hym to be baniſhed, and to be put to the workes of the mines: yea rather he inflicteth it vnto him, as good. By which ſentence of Auguſtine by the way we note, that at that tyme the Romane lawes condemned not a thefe to be hanged, but only condemned him to the mines. Wherefore ſeing ſinnes haue oftentimes the nature of a puniſhment, as we gather by the firſt chapter of this epiſtle, it is euident that God in this reſpect hateth them not. But in what ſort he willet ſinnes, all men are not of one and the ſame mynde. For ſome thinke that God onely permitte ſinne, and not properly willet it: leaſt they ſhould ſeeme to make God the author of ſinne, and ſo that cauſe vniuſt, if he would puniſhe that in man, which he himſelfe would haue to be done. But if a man diligently weigh this permiſſion, he ſhall at the length finde, that it is a certaine will of God. For if he permitte ſinne, he doth it either willingly or agaynſt his wyll: but agaynſt his wil doubtles he permitteth it not (for nothing can be done agaynſt gods wil) wherefore he willingly permitteth it. And therefore his will is that ſinne ſhould not be letted. Some to auoyde this, appoint in God a double will: the one of efficacy, the other remiſſe. And the ſigne of his will of efficacy they ſay are commaundementes, preceptes, and lawes: but of his remiſſe wil, they put counſels and exhortacions to be the ſigne. They adde alſo, that God will not ſometimes with efficacy, & ſometimes remiſſedly. And the ſigne of his not willing wth efficacy they ſay is prohibitio: but of his not willing remiſſedly they put permiſſion to be the ſigne. And after this maner they ſay that God willet not ſinne. But becauſe they ſee, that if God with efficacy willed not ſinne, it could by no meanes be committed, they ſay, that he in dede willet not ſinne, but yet remiſſedly. This is in dede a witty diſtinction: but I am ſomewhat in doubt, whether it can in ſuch ſort take place in God. But, that we ſhoulde not in vayne contend, graunt that it were ſo, yet ſo all that they auoyde not, but that God may be ſayde after a ſort to wil ſinne. For how commeth it, that he in dede willet not ſinne, but yet remiſſedly? Here they haue nothing to anſwere, but that he after a ſort willet it. For reiection is not remiſſe, vnles ſomething of the contrary be mixed with it, namely, of the wil: as water fro wher water is not made luke warme, vnles ſome cold be mingled with it. Wherefore in that they ſay, that God willet not ſinne, but yet remiſſedly, that can be by no other meanes, but that he after a ſort willet it: wherefore this permiſſion which they imagine is at the length reduced to the wil. But it is a thing ridiculous, that they ſhould be aſerued, leaſt God by this meanes ſhould ſeeme to be vniuſt: ſo the wil

Jacob was no leſſe obnoxious to originall ſinne the Eſau. God hateth the ſinnes of all men, but after a diuerſe maner, the ſinnes of the elect he wil pardon, but wil puniſhe the ſinnes of the reprobate. Now Jacob was loued & Eſau hated when as they both were in ſinne. There things to be conſidered: The nature of man, ſinne, and the puniſhment. God dieth ſinne, as it is a puniſhment.

The Romane lawes made not theſe death.

Whether god willet ſinne.

Nothing can be done agaynſt gods wil.

The opinion of theſe ſay that the wil of God in willing or not willing, is either of efficacy, or remiſſe.

We can not put in the wil of God either increaſe or diminution.

Permission
is reduced
to the will.
The will of God is the first iustice.
God when he will punish sinners
by sinnes,
withdraw-
eth his grace.

Election &
rejection depend of the will of God.
We are not
wonne but
by those things which please vs

By the spirit of God
he commeth
to passe that things in very deepe
good do
please vs.

An example
of Paul.

will of God is the first and chiefe iustice, so that whatsoever he willet, the same straight way is of necessity iust. And one and the selfe same action, as it is in vs, and commeth from vs, soasmuch as it proceedeth from a corrupt ground, is sinne: but as it commeth from God it is iust. These men seeke some way to satisfie humane reason: which yet they can not by this meanes attayne vnto. For they are compelled to graunt, that God when he will punish sinnes by sinnes, withdraweth his grace, by which say only our will may be upholden that it sinne not. Wherefore if of purpose he remoue away that by which one lye sinne is prohibited, although he doo not vniustly, how can he be sayde vnterly not to will sinne, which of necessity followeth the withdrawing of grace? Wherefore we say that God in dede willet the action, which is by nature produced, so: vnles God would, it coulde by no meanes be produced: but the deformitie, and priuation of iustice, whereby that action faileth, and straieth frō his rule, he in consideration of it lesse willet not: but so farforth onely as it is a punishment of sinne, and as we haue sayd, an instrument to declare the iustice of God. Wea also Augustine sayth, That God will not onely remoue away his grace, but also hiddenly worketh in the mindes of sinners, no les then he useth to worke in the bodyes: and inclineth their wills either to good, according to his mercy, or to euill according to his iudgement being in dede iust, but yet hidden. And this sentence he hath against Iulianus in his 5. booke, and 3. chapter. And in his booke de Gracia & libero arbitrio the 21. chapter, and he proueth it by sundry and many testimonies of the scriptures. But in that God is said not to will and to hate sinne, that is to be vnderstand as touching the law and the Scriptures, and y rule of lyfe reueled vnto vs. He is said also to hate sinne because he punisheth it, and because he willet it not for his owne sake, but as we haue sayde, in consideration of an other thing. Wherefore in that he worketh sinne, he hateth it not, and in that he hateth it, he worketh it not. In sume if we will speake properly and simply, we cannot say y God ether willet sin, or is the autho: therof. Thus much by the way: but now to retorne to August. He goeth on to declare, that both election & rejection depēd of the will of God. He saith in dede y we haue free will, but what auayleth that to these things? For who cā beleue vnles his will be moued? But it is not in our power, that we should be moued by those things which are offered: for we are not allured & takē, but by those things which please vs. But that preaching reading & cōtemplaciō vpo things diuine do please vs, it cometh by the breathing of the holy gost. And August. addeth, that as touching the masse, or lōp of al humane nature, wherof all we are brought forth, there is no difference, wherby God mought be moued to elect this mā rather then that: yea rather if setting aside the grace of Christ, we consider onely the nature of men, there can come no difference at all, but that one is more witty then an other, or contaminated with fewer wicked factes, or endewed with better artes. But if any man would say that God in election or reiection hath a respect to these things, he shall plainly speake agaynst the holy scripture: For Paul to the Corinthians thus writeth: Behold your calling brethern: for not many wise men, not many noble men, not many mighty men are called: but the foolish thinges of the world hath God elected. &c. There haue bene moreover a greate many philosophers endewed with most excellent wittes, and other men of singular grauity, as Socrates, Cato, and Scipio: who, if they be compared with others, may seme to haue bene enfect, but with a very few vices. There haue bene others endued with most excellent artes and sciences: whom God yet hath overpassed, and hath called vnto him men vnlerned, sinners and wicked men: wherefore this only remayneth, that if God haue not a respect vnto these thinges, they must say, that he hath not withstanding a consideration to the will. But neither doubtles can that be affirmed. For, as we haue sayd, it lieth not in the power of our will, to be moued with good and holy perswasions. For, what maner of will had Paul at that selfe time, when he was called? Verely he thought vpon nothing els, but how to murder the christiā, and vterly to destroy and to ouerthrow Christian religion, and yet not withstanding he was streight way conuerted vnto God, and the truth was so set forth vnto him, that streight way he embrased it, & vterly and wholly changed his minde. Wherefore there is no cause, why any man should accuse God of iniquity guity: for when he forgiveth and pardoneth, he giveth freely of that which is his owne: but when he punisheth and putteth to paines, he by most good right requireth that which is his owne. These thinges writeth August. (as we have sayd) in his booke of questions to Simplicianus, the second question. But in his epistle to Sirtus, which is the 105. in number, he sayth, that God findeth not men mete to be elected, but maketh them. Neither loved he any thing els in Iacob (saith he) but his owne free mercy. And Esau he hated, for that he woulde not have mercye on him. Whiche thinges these men, sayth he, (speaking of the Pelagians) seeking to avoyd, say, that God had a regard to the workes foresene as though forsooth Paul wanted so greete sharpenes of witte, that he woulde not see that, which these witty men saw. For the doubtles was the time for Paul so to answer, when he had objected vnto him selfe, What shall we then say? Is there iniquity with God? God forbidde. He mought streight way even with one worde after these men have solved the question: yea rather he had had no question at all to solve. We must consider, what Paul there went about, what he did, and what was his entent. His entent was to inculcate the grace of God: but they which have this scope before theyr eyes can not imagine any suche thinges. And in his Enchiridion to Laurentius the 98. chapter he writeth, that if this had bene the entent of Paul, he would in no case have sayd, Not of workes: yea he would rather have sayd, Of workes foresene, he loved Iacob by his free mercy, and hated Esau by his iust iudgment. Wherefore they which are planted in an holy calling, let them acknowledge, that vnto them is geue grace not dew vnto them: and in others, that eternally perish, let them consider what was dew vnto them. Now that I have thus briefly recited the sentences of the fathers, I thinke it good to declare my iudgement as touching this whole matter. First I vnderstand that, To love, is nothing els, but to will well to a man. And, to hate, is nothing els, but to will ill to a man, or not to will well vnto him. Wherefore God is sayd to love them, vnto whom he willet eternall saluation, that is, the chiefe felicitie: and those he hateth, vnto whom he willet it not. Nowe this so being, the controuersie is, whether God willet felicitie to the elect by workes foresene, or no: and how he willet it not to the reprobate. First we will speake of loue. Nowe loue can not be of workes foresene: for Paul sayth: Not of workes, but of him that calleth. And seeing that God findeth not good workes in men, but of his mercy deriveth them into them: how can they be the causes of his loue? And in the 11. chapter. of this epistle Paul sayth: That the remnantes shall be saved according to the election of grace. And if of grace, then not of workes. And in this place the same Apostle referreth the effects also of the promises of God only to the will, and power, & mercy of God. Therefore ought we to presume to go no farther. And in the 1. chapter to the Ephesiāns he sayth: That we are predestinated into the adoption of children according to the good pleasure of the will of God. And, if we should graunt, that men attayne to saluation by workes foresene, we could not avoyde, but that men should be sayd to be iustified by workes. For then of our workes should follow the foreknowledge of God: of foreknowledge, predestination: and of predestination, calling: and of calling, last of all iustification: we should consent also with the Pelagians, that iustification and merites take theyr beginning of our selues: and that God afterwarde addeth grace, mercy, and variety of gifts. Neither ought we to thinke that the worke of God which is eternall, hath his beginning of any thing temporal. After the selfe same manner we say, that the hatred of God dependeth not of workes foreknown. For Paul a like pronounced of ech brother, Not of workes, but of him that calleth. And if we should graunt, that the hatred of God springeth of ill workes foresene, it mought be on the contrary part inferred, (as sayth Augustine) that the loue of God also springeth of good workes foresene. And mozeouer this reason can not take place in all those that are elected, or relected. For many amongst the Jewes and Turkes perished even in theyr infancy, and are condemned, and therefore are nombred amongst those whome God hateth in whome yet he could foresee no euill workes, forasmuch as they should neuer have any: yea rather he foreknew that they should worke nothing. Neither a-

Why God is not to be accused of iniquity.

God in Iacob loved on ly his mercy. He hated Esau for that he would not have mercye on him. Paul wanted not sharpenes of wit.

What is to loue. What is to hate.

The electio or predestination of God cannot be of workes foresene.

We should be iustified by workes foresene, if we should by them be elected.

The eternal worke of God hath not his beginning of a thing temporal. The hatred of God is not of workes foresene.

mayeth

I causall confuted.

God gaue
miracles to them that vsed the ill,
but gaue
none to the
that would haue vsed
them well.

Neither election nor reprobation depende of workes fore-
sene.
The difference be-twene election and re-
probation.

Merite is not to be admitted.

Good
workes we haue of God but not liues.

God beginneth not therefore to loue vs.
for that we
loue him.

The order
betwene
loue, electio
and predestinatio.

mayleth that any thing which some say, that God saw what they would haue done if they should haue liued. For by this meanes should not the iustice of God as touching humane reason be defended: for the defence whereof yet these men take so great paynes. For straight way should come into y<sup>e</sup> mind, why these men were relected for those workes, which they neuer did, nor euer should haue done? But they should haue done them (thou wilt say) if they had liued. Graunt it were so. But a conditionall proposition affirmeth nothing. And, that God followeth not this consideratiō in his loue or hatred, Christ plainly declareth, when he saith Wo vnto the Corozaim: wo vnto the Bethsaida: for if in Tyre and Sidon had bene done the thinges which haue bene done in thee, they had long since repented in sackcloth and ashes. Again, Wo vnto the Capernaum, which art exalted up to heauen, for thou shalt be cast downe euen into hell. For if in Sodome had bene done the thinges which haue bene done in thee, those cities had yet bene remayning. These wordes playnely declare that God hath not a respect vnto that, what a man shall do. For he gaue miracles vnto them that vsed them ill: and gaue not any to such as would haue vsed the wel. Further remember that in these wordes it is not sayd, that they which had not miracles, should, if peraduenture they had had any, haue beleued of themselves, as though y<sup>e</sup> that lay in their owne nature or fre wil. For, that thing would God haue geuen vnto the. And so: as much as it is a sentence conditionall there ought not of it to be inferred a proposition categoricall or affirmatiue. As when it is sayd, If a horse should flye, he should haue winges, it followeth not thereof, that a horse hath winges, or that to flye is of the nature of the horse, or that the horse could flye if he had winges: when as vnto flying are required moe things then winges. Wherefore herein election and reprobation agree together, that neither of them dependeth of workes foreseene. Howebeit they differ two manner of wayes. Firste, for that although sinnes are not causes of reprobation, yet are they causes of eternall damnation, wherunto the reprobate are ordeined. For they are not condemned but by iuste iudgemente: neyther haue they any thing that they can iustlye complayne of the iniustice of God. But good workes are neither the beginning of the election of God, nor true causes of eternall felicity. Neither must we here harken to the scholemen, which put in them merite, (as they vse to speake) of condignity. For Paul contrariwise teacheth, that the suffrages of this tyme are not condigne, that is, worthy the glory to come which shalbe reueled in vs. The other difference is, for that the good workes where vnto we are predestinate to be by them led to felicity, are not of our selues, but of the predestination of God. But sinne is grafted in vs euen from our birth. For in iniquities are we conceaued, and in sinnes hath our mother conceaued vs. Howebeit some haue gone aboute to proue, that the loue of God dependeth of workes, by the 8. chap. of the booke of Prouerbes. For there God thus speaketh, Those that loue me, I loue. But of those wordes can not be inferred that which they seke. I graunt indeede that they are loued of God, which loue God: but yet it followeth not, that therefore God beginneth to loue them, because they loue him. Yea rather it followeth contrariwise, that they therefore loue God, because God loueth them. For so John teacheth vs: Not that we haue loued God: for he hath loued vs first. But that we may the plainlier vnderstand both that which I haue alredy spoken, and also that which shall afterward be spoken, I will declare the signification of fower wordes, which are of Paul vsed in this treatise: namely, the loue of God, election, predestination, and purpose. The loue of God is it as we haue sayd, whereby he willet vnto any man felicity. Election is, whereby he preferreth one before an other. Predestination is, whereby he directeth those whome he hath so loued and preferred before others, to the ende which he hath appoynted vnto them, namely, vnto eternall life, by apt meanes. And these are in such order ioyned together, that predestination followeth loue and election. For (as we haue sayde) whom God hath loued & hath preferred before others, those he directeth to their ende. But touching loue and election, we must other

otherwise consider of them in God, then we see commonly cometh to passe in men. For men when they see a man adozned with excellent giftes, him they elect aboue others: and then they wishe well vnto him, and to their power seeke to do hym good: but God soasmuch as in men he findeth nothyng that is good, yet of his mere mercy and singular goodnes, he loneth some, and decreeth vnto to them many good thynges, and thereof followeth eleaion. For, for this cause onely are they preferred before others, for that they are loved of God, and not for any their owne worthines. And as lone is to eleaion, so is hatred to reprobation.
 Wherefore I mislike not that which the master of the sentences citeth out of Augustine, that predestination is a preparation to glozy: and reprobation, a preparation to eternal punishmentes, so that those differences which we haue a little before mentioned be added. Nowe resteth to declare the fourth worde, namely, purpose. And that we say is nothing els, but his good pleasure, in iohannay, which signification we gather out of the epistle to the Ephesians the 1. chap. where it is thus written: which hath predestinated vs, to adope vs into children vnto himselfe thorough Iesus Christe, according to the good pleasure of his wyll: And straight way he addeth, Predestinate according to his purpose. This declareth that purpose and good pleasure are taken for one and the selfe same thing, and do pertayne vnto wil. Wherefore the purpose of God is the pleasure of his wil, and is taken as the generall worde, to define predestination and reprobation.
 For Augustine sayth, that predestination is the purpose to haue mercy: and reprobation the purpose not to haue mercy. And according to this sentence Paul sayth in this chapter: That eleaion mought abide according to purpose. But touching all these matters we will hereafter moze at large entreate.

None and election are after an other maner
 of soze in God, then they are in men.

What the purpose of God is.

Purpose is the generall worde of predestina-
 tion.
 What is predestinati-
 on after Augu- stine.

What shall we say then? Is there vnrightheousnes with God?
 God forbid. For he sayth to Moses, I will haue mercy, on whome I will haue mercy: and will haue compassion on whome I will haue compassion. Wherefore it is not of hym that wyll, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the scripture sayth vnto Pharao. For thys same purpose haue I stirred thee vp, that I myght shewe my power in thee, and that my name mought be declared thoroughout all the earth. Therefore he hath mercy on whome he wyll, and whome he wyll, he hardeneth.
 Thou wilt say then vnto me, why doth he yet complayne? for who can resist his wyll? But O man who art thou which pleas-dest agaynst God? Shall the thyng formed saye to hym that formed it, why hast thou made me thus? Hath he not the potter power to make of one and the same lombe one vessell to honour, and an other to dishonour?

V What shall we say then? Is there iniquity with God? God forbid. When fleshe and humane wisdom heareth that all thyngs are to be referred vnto the wil of God, it beginneth to stirre. For it can not abide that: and pretendeth re-uerence to the name of God, when as in very dede it abhorreth mortification, neither can abide, to subdue all whatsoeuer it hath to the power of God. Wherefore some are so agaynst all talke of predestination, that straight way as soone as any mencion is made of it they are gone. But this they can not do without great injury vnto the holy ghost: as though he would teach any thing, which should either be vnprofitable, or hurtful: But we ought to geue eare vnto Paul who with much profite reasoneth of it. And that we may do this without danger, we ought to beware of sonde imaginations, neither ought we to adde any thyng to that, which the holy scripture hath deliuered vnto vs. If we kepe our selues within these bondes, we shal runne into no danger at al. Paul did generally

They do so which abhorre from the talke of
 of predesti-
 nation.

Wherefore
springeth
the offence of humane reason.

A peruerse carefulness
of men.

Distributio
comming of iustice is one thing, & geuing com-
ming of mercy is an other thing.
Electio pertaineth not to iustice, but vnto
mercy.

God is not to be brought into an order.

rally put forth, that the hatred and loue of God depende only of his will, and not of the woorkes of men. Which sentence he now proueth as touching the part, and that by a double testimony of the scripture. But before he bringeth forth those testimonies, he objecteth vnto himselfe that which vnto humane wisdom might seeme vniust. What (sayth he) shall we say. Is there iniquity with God, if he do thus as pleaseth hym? He maketh answer, and curseth such a suspicion, saying, God forbid. But the cause why humane reason is so offended, is both predestination, and reprobation should depend of the mere will of God, commeth of this, because that men thinke that thereby iustice distributive, which requirerth, that vnto like be rendered thinges like, should thereby be empaired. And soasmuch as all men are in the stocke of Adam of like condition, they thinke it not iust, that one should be predestinated to eternall saluation, and an other reiecte to eternall destruction. Origen to defend this iustice in God thought that the soules of men haue before they come to this life woorkes ether good or euill: for which they are predestinated eyther to destruction or to felicity. Pelagius thought, that the iustice of God is to be defended by woorkes forerune: which opinion not only he, but also many others of the fathers embraced. Neither can I inough meruaile, that men were so carefull for the iustice of God: when as it can come into no danger at all. For the will of God is the first rule of iustice. But these selfe same men haue a remisse and negligent care ouer their owne iustice, which is not only endangered, but also oftentimes viola- ted and broken. Paul to answer to this error of mans imagination, proueth by the election of God is not (as these men imagine) deriued of iustice distributive, for that God is by no law bound to geue vnto any man those thynges, which he hath decreed to geue, but God of his mere mercy & liberality taketh some and adorneth them. In the parable which the Lord put forth, vnto euery one of the workemen was geuen a peny for their dayes worke: vnto those in dede which had labored all the whole day it was geuen of couenant: but vnto others which had bene but an houre in the worke it was geuen of mercy. And when those y came first were displeased, the good man of the house answered: Is it not law- full for me to do with myne owne what I wyll? Merely it was lawfull, and especia- lly seeing the same pertayned to mere mercy. But as touching iustice distri- butive, Take vp (saith he) that which is thine, and go thy wayes. Wherefore he did put a distinction betwene that distribution, which is done of iustice, and that geuyng, which procedeth of mercy. So Paul in this place teacheth, that the election of God pertayneth not (as these men imagine) vnto iustice, but vnto mercy. And thus he confirmeth by an oracle of the scripture, saying: For he sayth to Moses.

I will haue mercy on whome I will haue mercy, & will shew compassion, on whome I will haue compassion. By these wordes God teacheth, that there is no other cause of his mercy, which he sheweth towarde some, but enen his very mercy. Wherefore I somewhat meruaile how Pigghius, a manne other wise (as he him selfe thinketh) full of wit, amongst his principall reasons, wherebye he contendeth that God predestinateth by woorkes forerune, putteth this also for one: as though if it were not so, the iustice of God, whereby he distributeth his giftes, could by no meanes consist. For how saith he not, that the Apostle objecteth vnto himselfe the selfe same thinge, and dissolueth the same by no other reason, but for that God herein dealeth not with vs, by law, or by duty, but by mercy? For this doth the oracle which is here cited most plainly declare. But it is woorthy to be laughed at, to ascribe vnto Paul that which he by all meanes auoyded to speake. To go aboute to deale with God by law, is to seeke to bring God to an order: whiche thing as no man can do, so is it not mete, that any endued with reason should attempt to do it. And Paul when he saith: What shall we say then? Is there iniquity with God? by these woordes declareth, that he knewe right well, what commonly commeth into the mindes of men, when they heare this matter reasoned of. This also is to be noted that that although Paul could haue excused his doctrine, that these absurde thinges followed not of that which he had taught, yet was he moued with a seruente desire of piety to repell this blasphemie, and to aunswere, God forbid. As though he would haue said, it is no byright dealing to thinke any such thinge of God. And he addeth a reason, for that that can not be vniuste, whiche God testifieth of himselfe, and acknowledged to be his. Now God himselfe sayd vnto Moses. I will haue mercy, on whome I will haue mercy: and will shew compassion on whom I will shew compassion. In this sentence are two thinges to be noted, first, that those good thinges which God hath decreed vnto vs, depend onely of his mercy: secondly, that the cause of them is not to be sought for without the beneuolence of God: For he saith vnto Moses, that he will shew mercy to whom he will shew mercy. Now if God do prescribe these limits vnto our knowledge, they ought to be counted to much presumptuous, which will seeke to go further. I before noted that Origen, and Jerome to Hedibia thought, that these wordes, vnto this place, O man what art thou which aunswerest vn to God? are put vnder the person of the aduersary: which is farre straunge from the due order of the text. For Paul did put his owne aunswere when he answered his aduersaries, God forbid. Wherefore it is meete, that those thinges which follow be alleadged of Paul, the more vehemently to repell the obiection. For he repelleth it after a sorte with this execration, God forbid. Whiche thing is plainely declared by this particule For, whereby is geuen a reason of the sentence going before. And hereunto helpeth, that this sentence is cited oute of the scriptures. Whiche thinge Paul is not wont to attribute vnto the person of the aduersary. For he obiecteth vnto himselfe those thinges, which are affirmed of humane wisdom against the sentence of the holy Ghost: but this he refayneth vnto himselfe, by testimonye of the scriptures to confute these humane reasons, whiche seeme to be againste it: I will not speake how Origen when he sawe the absurditye of his exposition, had no great affiance in it, but placed an other in steepe thereof. But Chrysostome and Ambrose, attribute these wordes vnto Paul himselfe: althoughe they somewhat straye from the righte interpretation. For Chrysostome sayth that Paul, in this place maketh the matter more obscure, to the ende to dyue the Jewes to that point, that touching the question, for which they kept so great stirre, neither they themselves should be able to make any aunswere. For they demaunded, why they nation being reiecte, the Gentils should be taken? Paul to stop theyr mouthes, And ye (sayth he) tell me, why Ismaell being reiecte, Isaac was receaued: Why Jacob being beloued, Esau was hated. But because to these thinges mought aunswere after a sorte be made, that these men were euill, and the other good, therefore he bringeth this place out of the 33. chapter of Exodus where when God, by reason of the idolatry, which the people had committed in the calfe, had commaunded manye of them to be slayne, would yet notwithstandinge pardon the reste of the multitude. Here is lefte no such refuge at all: for the crime of them all was a like. Wherefore God said vnto Moses, I will haue mercy on whome I will haue mercy: That is, I alone can discern, why I will haue mercy on this man, and will not haue mercy on that man. This canst not thou see: Wherefore in this matter geue place to me. Neither wanteth it an Emphasis, that the Apostle in this place, by name putteth Moses. For seeing that he sawe not the cause of this thing, when yet notwithstandinge he was of all men that euer were the most familiarest with God, verely much les could others see it. Wherefore Paul by these wordes repelleth & putteth to shame the rash inquisition of men: for that God onely foreseth the merites and worthines of those whome he electeth, and whome he pardoneth. This interpretation containeth thre thinges, which in my iudgement are not very sound. First, for that it sayth y the Apostle maketh obscure the question: when as in dede he most of all maketh it plain: neither is it the part of the holy Ghost to hide the truth, whiche is so necessarye to saluation. Moreover it affirmeth that God spake these words to Moses touching those men, which were slaine for idolatry: which thing as we shall declare agreeth not with the History: Laste of all it referreth the matter to the righteousness and

The cause of gifts of God which he geueth vs, is not to be sought for without his goodness.

The interpretation of Chrysostom confuted. It is not the part of the holy ghost to make darke that question which is necessarye vnto saluation.

What tocal is with Am brose.
To haue mercy is not to fore-
know.

An history in Exodus
reherfed.

This place is not to be vnderstan-
ded of the idolaters, but of Moses.

foreknowledge of merites: when as Paul reduceth these thinges to the mercye of God onely. Ambrose will haue these thinges to be alleadged of the Apostle in this sentence: as though God should say, I will haue mercye on him, whome I foreknowe shall be conuerted, and abide by me. And I will shew compassion, on him on whom I will shew compassion: that is, I will geue mercy vnto him, whome I haue foreknowe shall after his error with an vprighte harte returne vnto mee. And this (sayth he) is to geue vnto him, vnto whome ought to be geuen: and not to geue vnto him, vnto whome ought not to be geuen: to call him, whome he knoweth will heare him: and not to call him, whome he knoweth will not heare him. And to call (sayth he) is to picke forward to receaue sayth. In this interpretacio also first this is to be disallowed, that to haue mercy should be all one with, to foreknow: for these wordes are of farre diuers significations. Wherefore to interpretate the one by the other, is to adde of his owne head, and not to geue the meaning of the Apostle. And when he sayth, that God geueth vnto whome is to be geuen: and geueth not, to whome is not to be geuen, he hath a respecte vnto the iustice of God: when as God himselfe (as Paul testifieth) referreth all thinges to his mercye. Neyther is it true that God calleth those onely, whome he knoweth shall heare him, for he daylye called the Jewes, whome he knewe shoulde be rebellious: vnlesse peraduenture he vnderstande no other callinge but that whiche is of efficacye: but that callinge commeth not hereof, for that men are prone to heare, but y it maketh them to be able to heare. But Augustine wytyng vpon this place thoughte that God hath not a respecte vnto workes to come, but vnto saythe. But the same sentence he himselfe afterward by most firme reasons reuoketh, in his second booke of Retractations the 1. chapter, and in the first booke and 23. chapter now resteth, that (as the wordes of Paul playnly declare) the election and god will of God depend only of his mercy. But that these wordes, I will haue mercy one vvhome I vvill haue mercy, should be vnderstand as Chrysostome would haue them, of the slaughtering of some, & of the pardoning of other some, it seemeth not to be agreeing with the history. For that slaughter is set forth in the 32. chapter. But before ye come to the other place which is in the 33. chapter there are many thinges set. For after that slaughter the Lord commaunded Moses, to go vp from that place: and sayd that he would not go with them, for that it was a stiffnecked people. And the people hearing this, were exceedingly sorry and wept. Agayne Moses prayed vnto the Lord, that he would go with him, and added, that he would not go, vnles the Lord would so promise him. At the length the lord being as it were overcome with these prayers maketh answer, y he would so do, for that Moses had found fauor in his sight. And Moses hearing this, added Now then shew me thy glory. Vnto whome the Lord answered, I will make all my good go before thee, and I will proclaime my name Iehouah before thee: and I will haue mercy one whome I will haue mercy: and I will shew compassion one whome I will shew compassion. Wherefore I like theyr iudgement better, which thought that this place is to be vnderstanded, not of the idolaters slayn or preserued, but of Moses only: as if God should haue sayd, that he would permitte him, to se at the least his backe partes, & that not for his merites, but only of his mercy. But whither of these wayes so euer a man take those wordes, so that he referre all thinges to the mercye of God, then right well followeth of them that which the Apostle seeth: Namely, that it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. But to speake my iudgement herein, first this is to be noted, that the Apostle followed the translation of the Seventy. For they thus haue that which is here wyrtten, Ελεος διὰ Δαὶδ: καὶ δίκτυον διὰ δὲ δίκτυον. But in Hebrew it is wyrtten, Iechannathy attra Scherachan, Ierechamthyatha, Scheracham, the first worde is Chanan which signifieth to lone, or to beare fauour. The other worde signifieth to haue mercy: but chiefly such a mercy as mothers shew vnto theyr chyldren. For this worde hath an affinity with Rechem, which signifieth a wombe, or belly, wherein mothers beare theyr chyldren. Moreouer when when he had sayd that he would make, that all his god should go before Moses, he added, that as he went he would proclaim his name Iehoua: which thing, as it is had in the next chapter, he performed. And when he had proclaimed Iehoua, he added diuers of his names, whereby are expressed the properties of the nature of God. The summe of those names he here after a sorte comprehendeth, when he sayth: I wil haue mercy on whome I will haue mercy. Neither is there any difference betwene the interpretation of the Heuety, and the Hebrye verity, but that they in the second part of eche member put the verbe in the present tense: whē as in the Hebrye one tense is in eche place put. But the sence which we bring agreeth very well with Paul. For if the properties of God, which he bestoweth toward vs, he comprehended in his mercy, thereby also is very aptly proued, that our election also dependeth of no other thing: which thing is vnto vs most profitable. For if our saluation lay in our owne handes, we should continually hinder it. But how we may iudge of this diuine will, whereby we are elected of God, Christe taught vs, when he reueled vnto vs the decrees of his father, sayinge, This is the will of the father, that he which seeth the sonne, and beleeueth in him, should haue eternall life. This sentence of God, whiche Paul citeth out of the booke of Erodus, maketh agaynst those, which hold, that the mercy of God is equally offered vnto all men. For God sayth, that he will not haue mercy vpon all men, but on those onely, on whome he will haue mercy: by whiche wordes he declareth, that he bestoweth his mercy vpon some certayne men, and not vpon all. Of this oracle the Apostle inferreth, Wherefore it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. Whereby we vnderstand that all whole is to be attributed vnto God: which doctrine humane wisdom can not abide. For straight way it thus reasoneth with it selfe: Then do we nothing: we are nothing but stockes and stones. But we teach no such doctrine we affirme in dede, that we worke, but yet not vnles we be impelled by the spirite of God, as Paul teacheth in his epistle in the 8. chapter. They which are led by the spirit of God, those (sayth he) are the children of God. And therefore the prophet Ezechiell sayth, I will make that ye shall walke in my wayes. But the maner how we do any thing being impelled and moued by God, we may very wel vnderstand, if we compare the 8. chapter of this epistle with the 4. chapter to the Galathians. For in the 8. chapter Paul thus writeth. Ye haue not receaued the spirite of bondage agayne vnto feare, but ye haue receaued the spirite of the adoption of children, by whome we crye Abba father. And to the Galathians he sayth: For that ye are children, God hath sent forth the spirit of his sonne into your hartes, crying Abba father. Seeing then that vnto the Galathians he teacheth, that the holy ghost prayeth in vs, and vnto the Romanes he sayth, that we our selues pray, we ought thereby to vnderstand, that we our selues indeede pray, but yet being driuen and impelled by the spirite of God. For we are not stockes nor stones. For they are not impelled but by violence, but we are not against our willes compelled of the spirite of God, but are perswaded, and whatsoeuer we do, we do it willingly. Stockes and stones whē they are moued, neither vnderstand they, nor haue they any will: but we when we are impelled of God, do both vnderstand, and will, and also geue assent. Although that we haue euen these things also of the spirite of God. Moreover we confesse, that many ciuill and naturall wordes whē they passe not our strenghts are subiect vnto our choyce and will: although we beleue and preache that those things also God ruleth and gouerneth, as semeth best to his most wise prouidence. But touching those things which are acceptable vnto God, and which pertain to our saluation we can not be moued, vnles we be impelled by the spirite of God. Augustine in his Encheridion to Laurentius the 32. chapter, writeth many things, which serue to the declaration of this conclusion of Paul. For he sayth, that these things make very much agaynst them, which hold, that the beginning of our saluation cometh of our selues: Which thing barely they teach, which will haue predestination to procede of god workes foreseene. For if it were so,

How the
will of God
touching
predestinati
on is reue
led vnto vs.
Against
those which hold that the mercy of God is eq ually of fered vnto
men.

We are not stockes nor stones.

How we worke bei ng impel
led of God.
A difference
betwene
things ci uile, and be twene those things which pre
taine to ete rall salua
tion.

Good works are not to be deuined, to make one part ouers, & an other Gods part.

Our will goeth not before all the giftes of God.
We pray
for the obstinate for that we know, that their conuer-
sion lieth in the handes
of God.

There is dissolued the question.

Some say that it is somewhat,
but yet a very little.

the contrary to the sentence of Paul it should be of him that willet, and of hym that runneth. Augustine in dede confesseth, that no man can beleue, hope, or loue, vnles he will: but euen this selfe same wil to beleue, to hope, and to loue, he saith commeth not but from God. For that is vayne which some say, that the will of man is not by it selfe sufficient, and therefore nedeth the mercy of God: as though a good worke ought to come and to procede both from our will, and also from grace. For if it were so, Paul mought haue sayd, that it is not of God that hath mercy, but of man that willet and runneth. For according to this sentence, neither doubtles should the grace of God be sufficient, vnles vnto it the will of man should ioine it selfe. Which thing forasmuch as no Christian either ought or can (referring piety) speake, it resteth, that Paul therefore said, That it is neither of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy, to geue vs to vnderstand, that all whole is to be attributed vnto his grace. Indede (sayth he) our will goeth before many giftes of God: for that, when we are iustified dayly is encreased grace and sondry giftes of God are geuen vnto vs: yet doth it not go before all the giftes, forasmuch as, that the will should be good, it dependeth of God. And thereof it commeth, that we pray vnto God for those men which are yet obstinate & wicked: which doubtles should be in vayne done, vnles we knew, that it lieth in the hands of God, to change their peruerse will. The same August. to Simplicianus in this 1. booke, & 2. questiō expounding thys place saith: The Apostle spake not thys, that by the helpe of God we come to that which we will, but to that purpose whereto in an other place he sayth, It is God, which worketh in vs both to wyll and performe accordinge to his good wyll: where he playnly declareth that euen the good will also is by the workinge of God made in vs. For if he had spoken this in that sence, it mought be sayd, It is not of God that hath mercy, but of man that willet and runneth. Wherefore hereunto had Paul a respect, so teach that we can in no case will, but by the mighty calling of God: forasmuch as that calling is the worker of our good will. And although God do call many, yet is he sayd to haue mercy on those whome he with efficacy calleth. Wherefore out of the wordes of the Apostle, and accordinge to the right interpretation of Augustine we gather, that all whole is to be ascribed vnto God, whatsoever is done of vs vprightly. Chrysostome here wonderfully troubleth himselfe: and although he graunt that the wordes going before, are the wordes of Paul, yet here he contendeth that there is an Antithesis, or contrary position. Which thing how farre it is from the sence of Paul, the very order of the wordes declare. For, that which is now here inferred, is not put by way of interrogation. But this particle, Wherefore, plainely declareth, that this is concluded of that oracle which was cited out of the booke of Exodus. Farther we shall a little afterwarde see, that the Apostle of those thinges which he had spoken, beginneth to commō with the aduersary touching the matters which he had put forth. For thus he afterward sayth: Thou wilt saye then vnto me, why doe we still complaine? For who can resist his wyll? This is objected against those thinges which he had before alleadged. For this is the thinge. Wherefore the aduersary complayneth, namelye, for that it is neither of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. But they which see, that it is not possible, but that these wordes are spoken vnder the person of Paul, saye, that he soluet not the question put forth, but onely maketh a kinde of reasoning, and rebuketh men. But we say, that these reasonings, and rebukinges are euen the very solution of the question. For if he be reproued whatsoever he be, that seeketh for any other cause of the election of God besides his mercy and will, then doubtles it manifestly foloweth that there can be no other cause geuen of his electiō: especially seing that the holy scriptures acknowledge none other besides this. Others to lenesse these wordes of the Apostle, it is not of him that willet nor of him that runneth, contend, that that is not to be taken plainly, but by way of comparison: for forasmuch as that which is ours, and is brought of vs, is but little, and (as they vse to speake) modicum, if it be compared w the most plentiful grace of God, therefore by very good right it may be said to be nothing, when yet in very dede it is somewhat.

And

And by this figure they seek to elude this sentence of the Apostle. But we againe demaund, whether they haue that little modicum (as they terme it) of themselves, or of God. That it is of God they cannot deny. For Paul sayth to the Corinthians: What hast thou, that thou hast not receiued? And if thou hast receaued, why boastest thou, as though thou haddest not receaued? But they say that they after a sorte receaued it of God, for man euen from his creatiō had this, at his free pleasure to vse his will: so y when grace is offered, he may receaue it if he will: & when the doore of the hart is knocked at, he may let in the Lord if he will: and when he is invited to beleue, he may geue his assent if he will. This is that petty modicum & little, whiche they affirme was put in vs euen straight way from our creation. This thing they say, God hath left free vnto vs: as though whē he had created man, and left him vnto his owne power, he would goe banquet with the Ethiopians, as Homere fableth. But the case is farre otherwise: for God perpetuallie gouerneth and moueth the thinges which he hath created: neyther at any time committeth he them to theyr owne choyce. But let vs somewhat more strongly go to worke with them. That selfe same modicum, whereby they say, that they assent, let in, and receiue, let them declare, what manner of thinge it is. Merely, forasmuche as men are endued wyth reason, they can shew nothing, but that it is a worke ether of the vnderstanding, or of the will. And as touching the vnderstanding Paul sayth, that the naturall man vnderstandeth not the thinges whiche are of the spirite of God: yea neither doubtles can be: forasmuch as vnto him they are foolishnes. Wherefore we can thinke nothing touching those thinges of our selues as of our selues: wherefore y modicum is as touching the vnderstanding taken from them: neither is it left in the power of man: But if thou wilt say that it lieth in thy will, to assent and to stay, Paul is against thee. For vnto the Phillippians he sayth, It is God whiche worketh in vs both to will and to performe: And Ezechiel the Prophet sayth, That it is God which taketh away our stony hart, and geueth vs a fleshy hart. And Christ our saviour sayth, without me ye can do nothing. Wherefore that modicum, whether it consisteth in the vnderstandinge, or in the will, is by these reasons proued to be none of oures. For if we shoulde graunte that that is of vs, which these men so often inculcate, then shoulde not boasting be excluded, for euery righteous man mought say of himselfe, I haue obtained grace, because whē it was offered I receiued it: & I haue beleued God making promise vnto me, for that I gaue mine assent: & I haue obtained Christ, because whē he came I receaued him. But Paul crieth out that our boasting is excluded, not in dede by the law of workes, but by the lawe of sayth and of grace. Neither can the aduersaries deny but that that modicum, which they labour so earnestly to establish, is some kinde of worke. But Paul so excluded not workes from iustification, that he lefte vnto them the second place vnto faith, but he utterly and vniuersally excluded the as touching the power to iustifie. For he sayd not onely, that we are iustified freely but added without workes. Wherefore whereas they say, that the sentence of Paul is not to be vnderstanded simply, but by way of comparison, it is vntue and vain. But the scriptures (saye they) in other places speake so. For it is written in the Psalm. Vnto the Lord buyld the house, they labour in vayne which buyld it. And Paul to the Corinthians sayth, Neither he which planteth is any thing, nor he which watreth, but God which geueth the increase. It is certaine (say they) that these thinges are to be expounded by way of comparison. For in very dede both he which buildeth, and which planteth, and whiche watreth, doth somewhat. But that, whatsoeuer it be, forasmuch as it is but little, if it be compared vnto the worke of God, therefore it is sayd to be nothing, and they are sayd to labour in vaine. As touching the first place we say, that David speaketh of ciuill workes, touching which we graunt, that men in them take greate paynes, and worke somewhat. Howbeit they labour in vaine, vnles God vouchsafe to fauor theyr enterprises. Let Cesar, Alexander, or Carro, take what paynes they will either in the kingdome or in the Publike wealth, and yet shall all thinges come to no purpose, vnles God geue the successe. In the other place Paul entreateth of the holpe minisrerie of the churche. Neyther will I

This modicum they say they haue receiued of God in their creation.

God departeth not fro the thinges which he hath created, but perpetuallie ruleth & gouerneth them. This fond opinion that we haue a certain modicum in vs touching these thinges is confuted.

If this modicum be graunted, our boasting is not excluded.

That modicum is some kinde of worke. Workes are vniuersally excluded fro the cause of iustification. The sentence of Paul is to be take simply, and not by way of comparison.

What is to be thought of ciuill enterprises.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

The holy
ministry is both a thing great, & also nothing.

A figure be-sed in one place, is not alwayes be-sed in another place.

Good wor-kes oftentimes go before eternal life, but can not preuent
predestina-
tion.
Predestina-
tion is the efficient
cause of good works
and not eter-
nall life.
Predestina-
tion and re-
probation
are oftentimes with our works.

Why good works in
them that are of age,
go before eternal life.

graunte this vnto the aduersaries, that the Ecclesiasticall ministration is eyther a thing small, or such as maye be called nothing. For it is a thinge honorable, and with most weighty wordes commended of the holy scriptures. Wherefore as touching the office, it is not nothing: but touching the geuinge of spirituall life, it is, (as Paul sayth) utterly nothing. For of it selfe it can not geue that spirituall life neyther perfect nor vnperfect. The minister of the church in dede setteth forth the worde of God, and the sacramentes: but cannot reach to the communicating of that heauenly life. Wherefore Paul spake truly and properly, neither needed he that figure of comparison, whiche these men imagine. Whereouer graunte that the scripture in other places bleth these kindes of speeches, shoulde it straight way follow, that therefore this sentence is so to be taken: especially seeing it hath bene by most firme argumentes proued, that it is in verie dede neither of him that willet, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. And therefore our election or predestination consisteth not of our works, but freely and of the mercy of God. But still, notwithstanding they are ouercome by reasons, they canill and say that they deny not, but that we are elected of God freely: but yet that causeth not, but that some respecte may be had to woorkes forsaie. For so they saye, that we say with Paul, That eternall life is grace: when yet notwithstanding we confesse, that God rendereth vnto euery man accoording to his woorkes. And if God can haue a respecte vnto woorkes, when yet he geueth eternall lyfe freely, what shoulde let hym, that he can not freely predestinate a man although he haue a respect also vnto woorkes forsaie? Hereunto we answer, that eternall life is indeede geuen freely: which yet followeth good woorkes, not as merites, but as necessary degrees, by which they which are of full age come vnto it. And this order the scripture it selfe putteth. But, that any our woorkes go before predestination, the scriptures in no place haue taught vs: yea rather contrariwise Paul sayth to the Ephesians, Hereunto are we predestinated, that we shoulde be botye and immaculate: And vnto Timothe he sayth, that he had obteyned mercy, that he mought be faithfull. Why then seke these men to preuent order, and especially seying that they? own simplicity serueth not? For eternall life followeth good woorkes, and is not the efficient cause of them, but predestination is the cause of good woorkes. Farther thys respect to good woorkes in predestination can not (as we haue sayde) take place in all men. For many are predestinated vnto eternall lyfe, and many are appoynted to eternall destruction, which neuer shoulde haue any woorkes at all, as it is manifest in infantes. Wherefore this is firme and vnmoueable, that as touching election and infusion of the spirite, there is nothing at all in vs whereby God shoulde be moued to bestowe these thinges vpon vs. For in predestination, vocation, and iustification there goeth before in vs nothing that is good, but good woorkes go before glorification. The reason therof is, for that we straight way dye not, so lone as we are iustified: wherefore it behoueth that that space of tyme, which is betwene, haue woorkes whereby may be declared our sayth, and righteousness which we haue by election of God obtayned. By will, Paul vnderstandeth the endenore of the mynde: and by, course or running, all holy woorkes vniuersally: which metaphore is much vbled in the holy scriptures. For Paul in an other place writeth of himselfe: I haue fought a good fight: I haue finished my course. And vnto the Corinthians: So ranne ye, that ye maye winne the price. And vnto the Galatians: Ye runne well, who letted you? Out of thys sentence two thynges we ought to gather, first that our saluation or election is not of hym that willeth, nor of hym that runneth, that is, not of our merites: but of the mercy of God onely: as God sayth in the 9 chapter of Deutonomy. Say not for my righteousness hath the Lorde brought me into thys lande. Secondly, that it is not of the willer to will, nor of the runner to runne: but these thinges he hath of God. So Paul to the Corinthians when he had sayd that he had laboured more then all others, added, But not I, but the grace of God whiche is in me. The are is not sayde to make the arke, but the carpenter which vbleth the are: so we also are the instruments ments of God both to wil & to worke: but it is God which worketh those things in us. Here they object: then are not we lordes of our owne actions, if it be God which worketh our workes in us. These men vnderstand not, that God the creator with so great wisdom worketh in all thinges, that he moueth them not, but in such manner as they ought to be moued. Wherefore seing our will is so made of God, that it can not be compelled, God dyueth it not by force to do any thing vnwillingly: but of himselfe geueth vnto it, to worke freely and of his owne accord. And therefore are we lordes of our owne actions, in as much as we do nothing by compulsion. Wherefore the Apostle hath now excluded both our endeouers, and also our workes: but yet not to that entent we should liue idely. But because here is entreated of predestination, and of the eternal election of God, therefore these things are not to be farther dilated, then the place it selfe will suffer. After that we are once regenerate, and that we haue the spirite of God, all occasions of anguishes and slouthfulnes is utterly taken away. In the interpretation of Ambrose this is to be noted, that first he confesseth, that that which is asked, oughte not to be in the will of the asker, but in the choise of the geuer. Which sentence if it might be taken playnly, maketh very much on our side: but he spake it in a farre other sense. For straight way he addeth: For whether it be mete to be geuen or no, it ought to be weighed by the iudgement of the geuer. Dauid and Saul required pardon: but God iustly iudged, which of them asked with a good mynde, and which with an euill: and his iustice may be declared in the euent. For when eche of the fell into great narrow straights touching their kingdome, Dauid declared hys worthynes: which beyng driuen out of his house by hys sonne, with a patient mynde bare that chance, neither suffred he Semey to be killed, when he cursed hym. But Saul beyng broken with aduersities, dispayred of the Lord, and sought helpe at the handes of a witche and wicked spirite. These thinges declare that the iudgement of God was not deceaued. So he thus vnderstandeth these wordes, It is not of hym that willet, nor of him that runneth, that it is not inough to will, vnles the iudgement of God confirme that will to be good. But this interpretation is manifestly repugnant with that particle, But of God that hath mercy. For, that which Paul referreth vnto the mercy of God, this man referreth to iudgement. Chrysostome although he thinketh that this clause, It is not of hym that willet, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy, to be an antithesis pronounced vnder the person of the aduersary, yet because (as I suppose) he seeth, that that agreeth not, he so laboureth to interpretate this place otherwise, that, although they are counted to be the wordes of the Apostle, yet therof (he sayth) followeth no absurdity: for the Apostle ment to teache nothing els, but that all is not of him that willet, nor of hym that runneth: for we haue nede also of the grace of God: and therefore we must not put any confidence in our workes and vertues. But we haue already before sufficiently taught, that this is an interpretation not according to the place. For they which retayne vnto themselves any thing, and remitte not all whole to God, although that seme to be but a litle and a modicum, yet is it repugnant to the holy scriptures. For, they most playnly teach, that as touching this matter, there lieth nothing in our power. And when Paul sayth, that boasting is excluded not by the lawe of workes, soasmuch as euen this modicum which these men seke to retayne, can be nothing els but a worke, they say in wordes onely, and to no purpose, that there is nothing whereof we can glory: for in very dede they leue matter to glory of. Of these things Chrysostome after ward speaketh, when he interpretateth these wordes, And if God minding to declare his wrath. &c. Wherefore it appeareth that both he and also others toke occasion of their interpretation of Origen.

We are the
instruments
of God.

The will of
man cannot be compelled.

We must not be reas'd of the doctrine of pre-
destination,
geue our selues to liue well.

For the scripture saith vnto Pharaoh, For this same purpose haue I ray-sed thee vp: to declare in thee my power, and that my name might be shewed forth throughout all the earth. Wherefore he hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. ] Augustine to Simplicianus. thus knitteth together these wordes with that which hath bene already spoken: It beho-ued,

This conclusion is diuers from the former conclusion.

It cometh of him that doth ill, to be condemned, but not of him that doth well to be saved. Why God reiecteth not in consideration of workes so fewe. There men are moze of fended.

The ende of reprobation.

The end of the workes of God is, that his most noble properties may be declared.

The workes of creatures declare their nature.

To what thinges Pharao is said to be raised vp.

ned the Apostle to proue, that it is not of man that willet, but of God that hath mercy. Therefore he bringeth scripture, which testifieth this thyng of Pharao, namely, that he was to thys ende stirred vp of God, that he mought in him shewe forth his power. Farther he noteth, that the conclusion here is diuers from the conclusion going before. For he here saith not, it is not of him that willet, nor of him that consenteth, but of God reiecting, as he before sayde: It is not of hym that willet, nor of hym that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Of this diuersity this I see to be the reason, for that euill workes deserue calamity and destruction, but good workes deserue not felicity. Wherefore it may come of the euill man to be condemned, but it can not come of hym that worketh well to be saved. And yet ought we not therefore to thynke, that God is by euill workes soe sene led, that he will not haue mercy on any man: for, that dependeth onely of hys mere wyll. For as touchyng some those whom he hath decreed to electe are no lesse corrupt in hys syght then those whome he reiecteth. But thys is worthy the noting, that there is greater controuersie touching this part the there was about y part which wēt before. For it is les displeasāt vnto me if they be said to be predestinated, and elected, then if they be sayd to be hated and reiected of the mere will of God, wout all consideration of merites, when as yet the consideration in ech is alike. Of Pharao it is written in the 9. chapter of Exodus: To this ende haue I raised thee vp, to shew forth in thee my power. This was therfore spoken, for that Pharao the moze he resisted the will of God, the moze victorious was the power of God, and the hand of God made moze notable. For he was euermoze punished with greauouser plagues, vntil he at the last was with all his host drowned in the sea. In these wordes which Paul citeth, we ought first to note the purpose or appoyntment of God. For by this kinde of speech, To this purpose haue I raised thee vp, is declared, that that reprobation came not of the wil of Pharao, but of the eternal purpose of God. Moreover therein is expessed the end, why he was made reprobate: namely, that in him the power of God mought be declared. And thys end we ought alwayes to kepe still in our mindes: for thereunto chiefly hath Paul a regard, not only in this place, but also afterward, when he declareth, why God suffereth the vessels of wrath. For he sayth, that that is therfore done, to declare y riches of his power. And to speake briefly, whatseuer God doth, hereto he hath a regard, y his most excellent & most noble proprieties may be declared. Which properties, being infinite, yet are they drawe to y principal pointes: namely, to his goodnes, & to his iustice. This self thing also we acknowledge in al creatures for they workes are nothing els but explications of they nature & disposition. Wherefore the greatest part of y knowlege of things natural is had of y effects. Wherefore soasmuch as God is a perpetuall working, or (as the philosophers speake) ὁρμίζων, that is, a continuall motion, therefore, for that he worketh continually, he neuer ceaseth to declare himselfe. And soasmuch as his workes procede not rashly, but of his appointed purpose, therefore Paul admonished vs, what are the endes, which the counsell of God hath in working. Pharao is sayd to haue bene raised vp of God to this purpose. Thys may be referred to hys first creation, that God therefore created him, and would haue him to haue hys being, that he might be an example of his most iust power. Thys stirring vp also may be vnderstanded of his kingdom, for that God exalted him to so greate an empire. We may also not vnaptly interpretate it, that God, whereas others felt and dyed amongst so many plagues, would haue him to remayne euen vnto the end which he had appoynted. And that word semeth to haue a relation to the disobedience and rebellion, whereby Pharao alwayes resisted the commaundment of God: as if it should haue bene sayd, To this end haue I raised thee vp, that thou shouldest afflicte my people, and shouldest resist me, whereby in thee might be declared my power. But how God raised vp Pharao or hardened him to resist him, all men are not of one iudgement. For some vnderstand it of permission, for that they will not that God should by any meanes seme to be the cause cause of this hardening: but I haue befoze declared, that this permission, if the nature thereof be well considered, pertayneth vnto the will. Neither do the holy scriptures mention that distinction, which these men imagine: that good woꝝkes are done, God willing the; but euil woꝝkes are done, God onely permitting the. For in the first chapter to the Hebrewes, where is entreated of going forwarde, and of good woꝝkes, it is written, These thinges shall we doo, If God shall permitte. And also in the first to the Corinthians the last chapter, the same word is red in the selfe same sence. Of which wordes and kindes of speache we gather that permission is the will of God, and that it also pertayneth to good woꝝkes. Further Augustine seemeth not fully to assent vnto that distinction: for agaynst Iulianus in his fifth booke and third chapter, and in his booke de Gratia & libero Arbitrio the 21. chapter, as we befoze haue cited it, he sayth, That God inclineth the willes of men ether to good thinges, according to his mercy, or elles to euill thinges by his indgement, being indeede secrete, but yet iust: neither worketh he any les in the myndes of all men, then he doth in theyr bodies. And this sentence the holy scriptures confirme. For Esay in the 13. chapter in the person of God, Behold (sayth he) I will rayse vp agaynst you the Medes, which shall not care for siluer, nor desire golde: with their bowes shall they shoote thorough your chyldren: and they shall haue no compassion of the fruite of the wombe: neither shall theyr eyes spare your children. Here God sayth not y he will only permit these men to rage agaynst his people, but also thzeatneth y he will rapse them vp. And in the beginning of y chap. he sayth, I haue commaunded my sanctified: In which place by, sanctified, he meaneth nothing els but apointed. And he addeth in the same place: And I will cal my strong men. And Jeremy writing of the selfe same matter in his 51. chapter, Behold (sayth he) I will rayse vp agaynst Babell a destroyeng spirite. And streight way after he sayth, I will say vnto him that bendeth his bowe, and which lifteth him selfe vp in his brigandine: ye shall not spare her yong men. Vterly destroy all her host. And agayne afterward, The Lord hath stirred vp the spirite of the kinges of the Medes: for his thought is agaynst Babell. And in the selfe same chapter he sayth, that God had at other times vsed the helpe of the kinges of Babell to destroy other nations. For thus he sayth, My hammer hast thou bene, and my instrumentes of warre. For by thee haue I ouerthrowen nations, and by thee haue I destroyed kingdomes. But that they in these woꝝkes sinned; wherevnto other wise they were stirred vp of God, hereby it is manifest, for that although they which were afflicted of them, were woꝝthely punished of God, yet these men wrought not that, to the end to please God, but onely to satisfy theyr hatreds, and to exercise theyr cruelty, and to fulfill theyr lust and ambition. Which thing Esay in his 10. chapter diligently hath expessed, Assur (sayth he) The rodde of my fury, and the staffe of my wrath in the place of these me. Vnto a dissembling nation will I send him, and vnto a people of my wrath: I will commaund him, to take away the spoyle, and to carry away the pray, and to treade that people vnder foote, as the durt of the streates. But he shall not thinke so: neither shall his hart so imagine. But in his hart is, to wede out, and to cutte downe not a few nations. For he sayth, Are not my princes like wyse kinges? These thinges playnly declare, that God not only suffereth, or (as these men say) permitte sinnes, but also giveth occasions, wherby are stirred vp the mindes of the wicked. He sendeth also inwardly vehement thoughts: which although of a good minde they may be drawen to good, yet of a corrupte minde, they are corrupted and drawen to euill: neyther is it hidde from God, who sendeth those thoughts either by him selfe, or by the Angells, or by the deuill, that it shall so come to passe. God mought paraduenture rayse vp a vehement cogitation in Pharao touching the defending of his kingdome: which cogitation if his minde had bene good, mought haue bene turned to good: but bycause his mynde was euil, neither was it changed of God, therfore that cogitation stirred him vp vniustly to rage agaynst the Hebrewes. Therfore he beinge ascard, lest they should to much encrease and in strenghts and nomber passe the Egyptians, first commaunded the infantes of the Hebrewes, cruelly to be slayne: after that beinge

Pyans sinned when they afflicted the hebrewies by the will of
God.

I note touching the rayling vp of Pharao.

ascard

Cap. 9. A Commentarie vpon the

afterd lest his dominion, which he vsurped ouer the Hebrewes, should be taken away fro him, and lest they should be by Moses set at liberty, he apertly resisted the word of God. And the more and more the commandmentes of God were set before him, the more was bent that cogitation for the keeping still of his dominion: and so he was after a sort by Antiperistasis, that is, by contrary circumstances hardened. So is it vnderstanded, that Pharao was raised vp to persist God.

The name
of Pharao.

That my name might be declared thoroughout the vvhole earth. ] When he sayth the whole earth, he comprehendeth together with the Jewes strange nations. Of the Jewes it is sayd in the 14. chapter of Exodus: The children of Israel had sene the greates hand which the Lord hath exercised agaynst the Egyptians. Moreover that victory was celebrated of Moses and Maria with a notable song. As touching strange nations, it is writtten in the booke of Iosua the second chapter, that Rahab the harlot being an ethiopian, sayd vnto her spies of the Hebrewes, We haue harde here of the mightye actes and plagues, whiche haue bene done in Egypt of your God: and we haue bene wonderfully afrayd. Ambrose writteth in this place, that the name of Pharao was not a proper name, but rather a surname of all the kinges of Egypt: for at that tyme they were all called Pharaos, as afterward they were called Ptolomei, when the Macedonians were the chiefe Lordes ouer all: as the Romane Emperors were called Cesares, or Augusti. And in very dede this is certayne, that that Pharao which was king of Egypt, when Ioseph went downe thether, was not this Pharao of whome we now entreate, whose hatred and cruelty towardes the Hebrewes is described in Exodus. But wherehence that word was deriued at the beginning, thus we may by coniecture gather. This Hebrew word Pharao amongst other thinges signifieth, to auenge, and especially in the coniugation Hiphil. Wherefore I thinke that the wise men of the Egyptians in those auncient tymes ment by that surname to signify, what maner a thing the function and power of a king is, namely, that the Prince is the minister of God: who, as Paul saith to the Romanes, beareth the sword, and is an auenger against those, which do euill. Wherefore the king of Egypt, so often as he hard that his name, mought call to memory that the auenging of sinnes and of wicked factes pertayned vnto his office: and the subiectes being terrefied by that name, mought be kepte in dew obedience: if yet it may be admitted out of the Hebrew tong to deriue the etimology of an Egyptian word. And when the Apostle addeth:

Against
those which will not haue any thing
taught touching pre-
destination.

Predestina-
tion and re-
probation
are certayn,
although they compell
none.

For the scripture sayth, ] He seemeth to admonishe vs, that these thinges ought not to be kept secret in Churches. For seing that God would haue these thinges so diligently put in writting, he would also doubtles haue them taught in Churches: which maketh very much against those, which thinke that nothing ought to be taught touching predestination. Augustine was of this minde, that predestination ought to be preached, but yet in such sort, that the myndes of the hearers should not be alienated from piety. And verely if we speake of it so much as is writtten in the holy scriptures, men shall thereby be stirred vp to haue a moderate opinion of themselves, and a noble opinion of God: and perpetually to giue him thanks for the singular benefite of his election: and in others which are reiected and perishe, to vnderstand what they had deserued, if God would haue delt with them according to his iustice. Neither had Paul to any thing els a regard, when he vsed this example of Pharao, but to teach, that God hath the same right ouer all men, which he here testifieth, that he had ouer Pharao. And hereby ought we to gather, that although predestination and reprobation do compell no man, yet can no man decline from the endes, which God hath appoynted. For touching Pharao it is manifest, that he could not be plucked away from his stiffe and hardened opinion neither by plagues, nor by wonders. We may hereby also see, that it is not of him, that willethe. For so long as men are hardened, and do abhorre from piety, vnles they be changed by God, doubtles they of themselves and by their owne strengthes are neuer able to rise agayne. The Hebrew word which is here put put, is Aamad heiech commeth of the verbe, Amad, and signifieth to stand: but in the coniugation Hiphil, it signifieth, to make to stand, or to erect, or to appoynt: although many interpretate it, to saue: as though whereas others fell and died, Pharao was preserved and abode. And this interpretation the Chaldey paraphrast foloweth, and likewise the seuentie interpreters. For thus they haue translated it: ἐνέσχευ τούτου διατηρήσας τὸν τούτου. But that which we follow serueth better to the purpose of Paul: namely, that God to this purpose made Pharao to stand against hymselfe. But which way so euer it be taken, it must be referred vnto the predestination and purpose of God. For God doth nothing rashly or by chance but doth all thinges by his certayne and appointed counsell. And euen as it is written, that he hath predestinated some certaine singular men, before they were borne (for so Esay saith in his 49. chapter) The Lord hath called me from the wombe: and from the bealy of my mother hath he bene myndfull of my name: And the lord in Iere. the first chapter saith, Before I formed thee in the wombe, I knew thee, and before thou camest out of her bealy I sanctified thee. And Paul to the Galath. which hath put me a part from my mothers wombe. So also must we thinke of the wicked: namely, that God appointeth them also vnto their end, neither dealeth he with them rashly. Of this example here alleaged the Apostle concludeth.

Wherefore he hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. Some contend that this is an obiection vnder the person of the aduersary: but the order and course of the wordes if it be diligently considered will not suffer this interpretation. For straight way after these wordes the Apostle hymselfe addeth an obiection, when he thus writeth:

Thou wilt say then vnto me, why do we yet complayne? For who can resist his will? Seeing therefore that the Apostle hymselfe distinctly and playnly sheweth the obiection, why should we preuent, and of purpose confound the order of his wordes? Any man, that is not willingly blind, and will not see, may perceauce, that this last obiection is brought agaynst those thinges which were now concluded. But in these wordes being taken in that order that they ought to be, this is worthy of noting: that the holy scripture when it entreateth of the iudgements of God useth horrible and sharpe wordes: as are these Hebrey wordes there touching Pharao, Calchah, hokib, bad, And in other places, to make to erre, to seduce, to blynde, to make fat the hart, to deliuer into a reprobate sense, and into shameful affectes, and other such like: by which wordes, soasmuch as the holy ghoists will is, to cause men with great terro, and daunting of the mynde to be aserd of the iustice and vengeance of God, they which seeke by sayned interpretations to extenuate and to lenesie them, as though God doth nothing touching these thinges but onely (as they say) suffreth and permitteth, do seme of purpose to be enemies to the counsell and decree of God. Goddes will is to shewe forth how horrible and miserable punishments; he useth to inflict not onely vpon the bodies, but also vpon the mindes of the wicked: but these men as much as lieth in them wonderfully darken these things. It is true in dede, that we reade in the booke of Exodus, that not only God hardened and aggravated the hart of Pharao, but also that Pharao hymselfe hardened his hart: but this maketh very much to the explication of the matter, so farre is it of that these thinges are repugnant the one to the other. For ech part is true, both that God hardened the hart of Pharao, and also that Pharao hymselfe hardened his hart. For Pharao had, as al other men also haue, a peruerse and corrupt nature: wherout, as out of a spring, when occasion is offered burst forth all kindes of sinnes. Wherefore when God maketh men destitute of his helpe, and leueth them in so corrupt an estate, if after ward he lay before them occasions, whereby the minde is prouoked, it can not be denied, but that he after a sort, but yet not properly, is the cause of the actions that burst forth. Wherefore when God is sayd to harden, or to deliuer vp into lustes, we do not thereby meane, that he of his owne, infilleth into men any new malice, or sinne. Some when they heare such wordes, imagine, that God doth that, which men are wont

God doth all thing by his appointed counsell, and doth nothing rashly.

As God hath fro the beginning predestinated some, so also hath he reiected some.

The sharpe wordes which God useth against the reprobate.

God inflicteth most greuous punishments not only vpon the bodies of the wicked, but also vpon their mindes.

Both God hardened Pharao, & also Pharao hardened hymselfe. Note diligently this explication. God infilleth no new malice into men.

Man is borne in iniquity and sinne.

God suffereth nothing in the world to be idle.

Man is mo-
ued of God
according to his nature.

Man is lian-tes from God in all their doinges sin.

A simili-
tude.

The wis-
dome of God direc-
teth sinnes
to a good
ende.

sometimes to do, when they fill empty vessels: as though man hath no sin, but God powzeth it from without into him, but the case is farre otherwise. For man is bozne and conceaued in iniquities: who then can be without sinne. This foundation, as firme, and founded by the holy scripturs, we ought by all maner of means to defend. Now forasmuch as man is in this estate, namely the childe of wrath, and set vnder y curse, vnles he be by a peculiar grace and help of the spirit through Christ made whole, he hath in himself aboundance of sins & wickednes. We haue also an other argument, which euen the philosophers saw: namely, that God, forasmuch as he is a simple & pure act, perpetually moueth all things neither suffereth he any thing to be idle. But forasmuch as he gouerneth all things most wisely, he moueth not things but according to y condition of y nature, which enery thing hath, if we speake of the common and vsuall gouernment of the world. He maketh the heauens to moue circle wise: for that, that motion is most aptest for them: and after the selfe same maner he moueth and impelleth other creatures, So must we confesse that man is moued of God, according to his nature: namely, to worke by reason and will, and that in such sort, that his choyce or will is not compelled: but whatsoever he doth, he doth it willingly, and of his owne accord, whether the same be good, or whether it be euill. Wherefore forasmuch as in mankinde some are deliuered, and by grace and by the spirite redeemed from the corruption of that masse, which is contaminated in Adam, and forasmuche also as other some are left in sinnes, and obnoxious vnto vice, therfore God, seeing that by his perpetuall mouing he moueth all thinges, impelleth either of these kindes of men to worke, neither suffereth he either of them to be idle. Wherefore men iustified and endued with the spirite of God, are moued rightly, and do thinges acceptable vnto God (so much as the condition of this life suffereth) by their nature, being amended by y power of grace, and of faith. But they also which are not regenerate are perpetually moued: and althoughe sometimes they morallye and ciuilly do some good thinges, yet can they do nothinge whiche maye be acceptable vnto God, yea rather whatsoever they do, they alwayes sinne. But how that sin proceedeth both of God and of them I thinke I haue sufficiently declared. Wherefore it is true, both that God hardened the harte of Pharao, and also that he himselfe hardened his owne hart. And to make this more plaine, we wil declare it by this similitude, which D. Luther also vsed. Suppose that there were a carter hauing many hoxses, which he continually whippeth forward, neither suffereth he them to stande still: they beinge diuen forward must needes moue: and as many as are whole and sound of legges and feete, do go by right: but if there be any amongst them, that hath lame and diseased fete or legges, they also goe, when they are whipped forward but yet slowly and euill sauoredly: for they halt. But that halting should not be, vnles they were diuen forward. For when the hoxses stand still the halting is not perceiued, but the beginning of haltinge, that is, the disease or lamenes of the legges, the hoxses haue in themselves, and receaued it not at the carters hande. So God forasmuche as he by his mighty working perpetually moueth, and stirreth vs vp, maketh vs to light vpon diuers occasions, whiche we (for that we are euill) can not vse well. But in this similitude this difference oughte be noted, that it lieth in the hande of God by his liberall grace and spirite to deliuer vs from sinne grafted in vs by nature, wher as it lieth not in the power of the carter, to heale the diseased fete of the hoxses. This moreouer is attributed vnto the diuine wisdom, to direct sinnes so brought forth to an good ende, and to vse those euill thinges bothe to the saluation of the elect, and also to the illustration of his power. For the declaration wherof Ambrose vseth a similitude taken of phisitions, whiche vse the punishmente of condemned men to the helpe of men. For they cut theyr bodies, they consider and search the inward parts, and leaue nothing vnsearched, that thereby they may vnderstand the beginnings and groundes of diseases, and be able afterwarde to heale others. And there are thre thinges chiefly to be weighed in these wordes of the Apostle. First he sayth, That it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth: but of God that hath hath mercy. Secondly he addeth, To this purpose haue I raised the vp: last of al, he hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he wyll he hardeneth. All these kindes of speache, are of great waighte, to call vs backe from the consideration of our merites, to the simple and mere pleasure of God. And when we heare that God hardeneth, thereby we ought to vnderstand nothing els, but the effect of the vengeance and wrath of God, whether the same be done, eyther by God himselfe immediatlye (as they vse to speake) or by the deuill, or by euil men. For al these can do nothing, but so far forth as they are permitted of God. Wherefore it is as true, that God hardeneth whome he will, to shewe forth his power, as that is true, whiche Salomon saith in the Proverbs, that he maketh the wicked man for the euill day. Chrysostome sayth, that this example of Pharaos, may very well be compared with the first. For euen as Moses could not see, why some of the people of Israel should bee slayne, when as others hauing sinned in the selfe same case, were pardoned, so now men could not see, why onely Pharaos was chosen out in whome God would show the seueritie of his iudgements. For there were many others which no les resisted God then did he. Afterward he addeth, that the Apostle mought by an example of the Iewes haue confirmed that which he intended: but he would with great prudency declare in a king barbarous and a straunger from the people of God, that which they afterward should perceave and see in theselues. Farther he sayth: that whereas it is sayd, that God hardeneth, it signifieth nothing els, but that God by his great goodnes, patience, and lenity suffred Pharaos. As touching the first, I deny not, but that this example of Pharaos is very well knit together with that former example concerning Moses: although I haue otherwise interpreted those wordes spoken vnto Moses. But, that God had in them a regarde either to worthines, or vnworthines, I utterly deny. And soasmuch as we haue before sufficiently confuted this, we shall not neede in this place to repeate the same agayne. But whether, to harden, be to vse mercy and goodnes towardes any man, we will streight waye consider. But first I thinke it not amisse to declare Origen's mind touching this matter. For it maye seme, that out of him, as out of a fountaine others haue drawen the principles of theyr error. He bringeth a similitude of a good mā of the house which hath many seruantes. Who considering theyr dispositions to be diuers, first of all studieth to know how he may commit vnto euery one an apte charge, according to the conditiō of euery one of them. And therfore those whom he seeth to be meete for husbandry, he sendeth to serue in the country: those whome he seeth apt to merchandise, he sendeth to sayres and to the market: those whiche can feede cattell, he maketh feeders of cattaille: and those whome he seeth more apte for the table, and the chamber, he keepeth stil at home. In the meane time because that he seeth, that by reason of the seruite condition which is in the, they shall haue neede sometimes of beatings to accomplish this matter, he seeketh such natures, which of theyr own accord are inclined to cruelty, that when chastisements shall be needefull, he maye haue one at hand which is much more sharper then they whiche neede to be corrected: and which for his wicked fates is worthy not so much to be amended, as to be put to death: whose destruction yet he will haue at the last to be profitable to the amende of the rest. And therefore when he sendeth him to take vengeance, he thus saith, To this purpose haue I raised the vp: and therfore he saith that Paul writeth not, to this purpose haue I made the: least the faulte should seme to be laid vpon the creator: but God would haue that malice, which Pharaos had gotten vnto himselfe to be fruitfull vnto others. And he sayth, that he hardened the harte of Pharaos, for that he would not take sodeine and full vengeance vpon him, but would rather vse greuous plagues continually increasing by litle and litle. For by this patience and goodnes of God, was Pharaos hardened. Thus much Origen vpon these wordes: with whome I cannot agree in two places especially. First, because that he vniuersally remoueth away from God this hardening, and transferreth it wholly vnto Pharaos: Secondly for that he sayth, that he was hardened by the patience and goodnes of God. Whereouer also for y he seemeth to affirme, that God chose Pharaos to show forth such examples vpon him, for that he was a man most hard, and past all amendment. For, that is farre wide from the free reprobation of God, which, as Paul saith, cometh from God without any respect of woorkes. The com

God to harden, what it signifieth.

There were others whiche no les resisted God then Pharaos.

He stirred by Pharaos (saith Origen) for that he would not straightway punish him.

Pharao is now said to haue filled the measure of his sinnes.
God in the destruction
of Pharao
prouided for the Israelites.

Wighius
maketh
God vnjust
if free will be taken away.
He denieth that God hardened Pharao.

Free will vnlesse it be healed can do nothing in things become and ce-
lestiall.

Originall
sinne which cannot be a-nnyed, is punished.

A simili-
tude.

mentaries also which are ascribed vnto Ierome, affirme the selfe same thinges: and geue a reason, why God would chuse Pharao aboue all others, in whome he would so seuerely make manifest his iudgements: namely, for that he had now filled the measure of his sinnes: which thing we reade of the Sodomites and of the Ammonites. But this is to affirme, that reprobation commeth of euill woorkes. They adde moreouer that God would by the destruction of Pharao prouide for his people of Israell, that they shoulde not be afearde of the tyrannes of thys worlde, when they saw so mighty a king for theyr sake ouerthrowne of God: & that hauing alwayes y<sup>e</sup> iustice of God befoze their eies, they mought beware of al wicked actes. Now resteth to heare what Pighius sayth: who toke vpon him stoutly to defend the opinion of Origen and of others, whome we haue now reherſed. And vnto Origen he hath in a maner added nothing but a contereſat and sophistricall shewe: so that the erroze being paynted and set out with colours mought be the more saleable. First he sayth, that no man ought to thinke, that God hardened Pharao, for by that meanes it mought seme, that liberty was taken from him, and that he was not the cause of his sinne: and that which is affirmed of him, must also be sayd touching others. In summe he can not abide that men shoulde be left voyde of free will: for he thinketh if that shoulde be granted, God shoulde be vnjuste, which punisheth men without any theyr desert. These forsooth are the reasons, by whose strength, when he laboureth to satisfy this place, he denieth, that God hardened the hart of Pharao. But as touching the first, either he dissembleth the matter, or ells he vnderstandeth it not. For it was no hard matter to se, how that hardening mought come both from God, and also from Pharao: for it dependeth of either of them, as we haue befoze at large declared. Wherefoze neyther Pharao nor any other wicked mā, when he is so dealt with, can be excused. But whereas he sayth, that from Pharao was taken away his liberty, neyther could he haue done other wise, what nede was there that Pighius shoulde so much bidge that, when as euen Paul objected vnto him selfe, the very same thing. For thus he sayth: But thou wilt saye vnto me, why doo we still complayne? For who can resist his will? Wherefoze that which semeth absurd vnto Pighius, is both sound and catholike: namely, although a free will be able to do somewhat in morall matters, yet vnles it be healed, it is able to do nothing at all in thinges holy and celeſtiall, and which may please God. For Paul sayth: That which was impossible vnto the Law, in as much as it was weakened thorough the flesh. And vnto the Hebrewes it is written of sinne agaynst the holy ghost, That it is impossible for those which haue once bene illuminated and haue tasted the gift of God, if they once fall, to be after ward reformed by repentance? What wil Pighius say here? Doth he not heare that free will is taken away? But it is to be wondzed at, how he can say, that God shoulde be vnjust, if he punish such an hardning, which he could not auoyd. For if that reason shoulde be of force, then could not God, without greate nothing of cruelty, and of iniustice punish originall sinne: which doubtles none of vs all when we are borne can auoyde. Wherefoze these reasons, seing that they are so weake, can not proue, y<sup>e</sup> God hardened not the hart of Pharao. Now, foras much as Paul and the holy scripture vseth this worde, To harden, let vs se how Pighius extenuateth it. First he sayth that God exhibiteth him selfe vnto all men an equall father: that is, gentile, louing, patient, full of lenity in suffering of sinnes: and by that louingnes many are drawen to be conuerted, and to repent, but others abuse the selfe same lenity, and are hardened. For so he sayth that by one and the selfe same heate of the Sunne, clay is made hard, and waxe made soft. And that this diuersity depēdeth of our selues, he laboureth to proue by the epistle to the Hebrewes the first chapter. For thus it is there written: For the earth which drinketh in the rayne whiche commeth ofte vpon it, and bringeth forth herbes mete for them, by whose labour it is dressed, receaueth a blessing of God: but that which bringeth forth thornes and briars is reiectēd, and obnoxious vnto the curse, whose ende is to be burned. Behold, sayth he, it is one & the selfe same shoure which bringeth bringeth fertility: but according to the diversity of the earth, the successe is far diuers. For one earth bringeth forth good fruites: and another bringeth forth thornes and briers. So, sayth he, the goodnes, patience, and lenity of God being one, is exhibited vnto all men: but by it some are conuerted, other some are thoro- row they owne default hardened: wherfore the difference (sayth he) is in them, and not in the will of God. Afterward he goeth about to expound the maner of the phrase of speech, and to shew, how God is sayd to harden. It oftentimes (sayth he) cometh to passe, that a louing and gentle master, when he seeth, that by his gentlenes and lenity, his seruantes are made worse and worse: at the last in a greate anger he crieth out: It is euen I which haue marred you: for I haue spilt you: But by these words he meaneth to signifie nothing ells, but that he had not chastised them, and so they by that lenity were made worse & worse: and he thinketh y<sup>e</sup> the like phrase of speech is had in this epistle to the Romanes: for thus Paul writeth, Dost thou contemne the riches of his goodnes, and patience, and long suffering? Dost thou not know, that the bountefullnes of God moueth thee to repentance? But thou according to thine hardnes and vnrepentant hart, heapest vp vnto thy selfe wrath in the day of wrath. Here (sayth he) thou seest, that the worke of God is distinct fro our worke. The worke of God is, by his patience, goodnes, and long suffering to bring vs to repentance. But the worke of the wicked is, to abuse that lenity, and to heape vp vnto him selfe, that is, to gather together and to lay vp for himselfe, the wrath of God. And after this maner he iudgeth that the sentences of the Prophetes are to be vnderstanded, such as are these: Why hast thou deceaued vs Lord? thou hast hardened our harte, that we shoulde not feare thee. Agayne Why in deceiuing hast thou deceiued thy people? As though the Prophetes shoulde complaine, that God had bene to gentle, and had not punished, nor chastised the people and so by that meanes they became vicious and corrupt. For so we say, that a horse is marred, vnles he be broke and tamed with the bridle: so a father is sayd to marre his children, vnles when nede requirerh he do chastise and punish them. And we are accustomed to say vnto them, which do so, why marre you the horse? Why marre you your child? And after this maner he thinketh that the prophetes complained to God. But this is absurde, and far wide from the truth, which he taketh as a thing graunted, that the goodnes of God is a like exhibited vnto all men so that the difference is only in the men, and not in God. For some embrace his goodnes when it is offered, but others reiecte it, and are hardened. For rather contrariwise in men we must put equality, and likenes as which comming of one and the selfe same masse haue like condition of free wil, and they by themselves can do nothing that is vpright. Wherefore seeing that this infirmity, or rather vnableness is a like in all men, the difference must nedes be put in grace, as in the mouing and efficient cause: for that all men are not after one & the selfe same maner drawen. For vocation is of two sortes, y<sup>e</sup> one is of efficacy, the other common. And that similitude of the clay and of the ware is bayne and trifling. For after the fall of Adam this distinction hath no place in free will. For in makinge now, are not some like ware and other some like clay. For god, as Paul saith, maketh his vessels of one & y<sup>e</sup> selfe same clay: & according to his conning geuerh to one & the selfe same clay sondry formes. Neither doth y<sup>e</sup> place to the Hebrewes make any thing to this purpose. For there the scripture exhorteth men, which oftentimes heare the word of God, to endenour themselves by holy life to be fruitful: which if they do, they shall obtain the blessing of God: but if they liue wickedly, and suffer the sede of God to be corrupted and made vnprofitable in them, they shall be obnoxious vnto the curse. For the declaration whereof he vsed an excellent similitude taken of the earth. Wherefore in that place is nothing spoken of free wil and grace, but of the word of God, & of men, which professe Christ in the church: whome God exhorterh, y<sup>e</sup> they should not be such as dure but for a time, and are only in name Christians. Wherunto also Christ had a respect in the parable of the sede cast, partly vpon good earth, and partly vpon stony ground, and partly amongst thornes, and partly in the high

The goodnes of God is equally geuen vnto all men. In the nature of men is equality. All men are not by one, and the selfe same force drawen. Against the similitude of the clay, and of the ware, a place to the Hebrewes declared.

The parable of Christ of the seeds.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

The good
earth are those which are elected.

This figure of Pigghius agreeth not
with the wordes of Paul.

Pigghius in vaine excuseth God.

He may be called an vn-
ruly father
which punisheth not his children in tyme.

A false imagination of Pigghius, &
of certayne others.

way. Wherefore the condition of the shoure of the word of God is described, & it always lighteth not vpon good men, and vpon such as are reformed by his grace & spirit of God. Wherefore we may say that good earth are those which are elected and barren earth are the reprobate. And the earth, as it hath showers from heauen, so therefore also hath it fertility & barrenes, so it is God which ministereth vnto vs both his word & also his grace of faith, whereby we do profit receiue his same word.
But whereas Pigghius saith, that it is a phrase of speech much used, that a good and gentle master will say vnto his seruantes abusing his lenity, I my selfe haue marred you: I my selfe haue spilt you: that doubtles I deny not. But he should haue proued, that Paul in this place spake in this sort. For seeing that God is otherwise vnderstanded to harden the hartes of men, this figure will not agree with the wordes of Paul. For first it is an hard inuersion of speech, if whereas Paul saith God hardeneth the hart of Pharao, we should say, vnto the hart of Pharao, God hardeneth his hart, so that he abuse the goodnes of God. Moreover if (as Pigghius thinketh) to harden, should be all one with, to do good, to haue mercy, to shew clemency, it should not then be the part of a father which governeth well and with clemency, to forgiue sinnes, to adopt into children, and to geue sondry giftes, but to chasten, and to punish. And by that meanes shall follow many ab-surditie. For when God deliuered the children of Israell into captiuitie, we must say, that he had mercy on them, because he punished them. And when he brought them home againe from captiuitie, so that he did good vnto them, we must say that he hardened them. By this meanes to send his sonne into the worlde, which was a token of incredible clemency, was to harden the worlde: and by Titus, and Vespasian, to destroy and ouerthrow Ierusalem, was to haue mercy on the Iewes. So shall the glorification of the saintes pertaine to hardening, and the punishments of hell fyre, to mercy. And forasmuch as God doth good vnto all men, rayneth vpon the iust and vpon the vniust, and maketh his sunne to arise vpon the good, and vpon the euil, if we follow Pigghius, opinion, we must say that God hardeneth them all. Further who can deny but that Pharao, was smitten of the Lord and chastised: especially when as, there are reckoned vpon so many plagues, wherewith God smote him? But euen then most of all (as Pigghius dreameth) God should haue mercy vpon him, & not haue had hardened by him: yea rather although God be sayde sometymes to haue hardened the hart of Pharao, when he tooke away those plagues, yet if a man diligently reade of the history of Exodus, he shall fynde that the selfe same was spoken when Pharao was smitten, and when the plagues were layde vpon hym. For when the lice were sent, and the sozcerers coulde not do the like: when the cattyle were slayne with the pestilence, and when euery where men were so troubled with botches, that neither the sozcerers themselues coulde escape them, it is by expresse wordes written, that the hart of Pharao was hardened. Lastly Paul saith, that vnto them that loue God, all thinges turne to good. Wherefore whether he send vpon them prosperitie, or aduersitie, he alwayes hath mercy vpon them, neither can he by any maner of meanes be sayd to harden them. For ther doth it any thing profite Pigghius, when, as though he would excuse God, he saith, that he hardeneth, when he will not punish those which deserue punishmentes. For neither by this meanes doubtles, if a man loke vpon humane reason, can God eschew the suspicion of cruelty, and of iniustice. For if that lenity be hurtfull, and God is not ignorant thereof, why then vseth he it. Should not he be counted an vniust father, which chastiseth not his children in tyme?
God indeede tollereth many thinges, and that not agaynst his will, but with his will. And if he tolerateth, and willet that which is agaynst our saluation, how shall he not seme to be agaynst our saluation? But he hath geuen vs (thou wilt say) free will. But reason will say, O God, what soener thou dost either in chastising, or in fauoring me, it is nothing, vnles thou shalt first change me, and in steed of a stony hart shalt geue me a fleshy hart. These men to no purpose imagine, that God setteth forth a certayne common grace vnto all men so that

that whosoever will may receave it, as though it were in our power either to embrace it or to reject it. For if it were so, the beginning of our saluatiō should be of our selues: and so whilst we go aboute to defend the liberty of our owne will, we spoyle God of his election and liberty. For if he equally offer his grace vnto all men, as these men imagine, then shall he predestinate no: elect none: for it shall rather lye in men, either to reject God, or to elect hym. But the scripture euery where attributeth vnto God the election of those, whome he will to be saued. And Christ sayth: Ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chosen you. It is a poynt of great arrogancy, to seke to bring God into an order, that our will should be the rule of the election of God. This thing (me thinketh) is very vntwarily spoken of these men, to affirme, that they are receaued of God, which will admitte his grace, and they are rejected, which will not admitte it. Notwithstanding yet these men by such wiles and subtilties satisfie not humane reason, which is the thing they chiefly go aboute. For if we should graunt that which these men imagine, namely, that that little, or (as they call it) that modicum, whereby we can either admitte or rejecte grace when it is offered, is in vs comming of our selues, yet sozasmuch as it is of all men confessed, that God can by his spirite so helpe that little whatsoever it be, that it shall not decline from vocatiō, no: be overcome of lustes; humane reason will still enquire, why he perfozmeth not that, especially seeing that he may do it without any his discommodity, euen onely by his becke. Verely if a father should se his sonne in danger to be stricken or to fall, is it not his duety to helpe him, and to remedy the danger: yea rather it is not onely the duty of a father so to do, but also of euery good man: and chiefly if it may be done without any losse, or dammage. But this may be without all doubt affirmed of God: for nothing can hinder him, when he defendeth any by his grace and spirite. Perther availeth this any thing which some say, that it is not mete that men should be compelled to good thinges: for we say that men desire not to be compelled, but to haue their will made good, and so changed, that it be not overcome of sinne. And that may be obtrayned without compulsion: for the Sainctes which are already in theyr countrey, namely, in heauen of their owne free and voluntary accord cleaue fast vnto God, and that perpetually, without any compulsion had at all. But they object, that if it were so, then should men haue no merites at all. For those merites they say consist in that modicum, which they say is remaying in vs, so that we vse it rightly. But here also humane reason will answer, What do these thinges helpe with so great a danger and destruction of infinite men? Farther it very much pertaineth vnto the glory of God, not to ascribe any thing vnto our merites, but to referre all whole vnto him. Thou seest now into how sondry and blinde mazes these men throw themselves, when they seke to excuse God, who hath no neede at all of any such patrone. For all the goodly ought to be no les assured, that the wil of God is iust, then they are that God is. But what (I beseech you) get these men by these their excuses? For sotheuen this, in steede of one blasphemy which they pretend to auoyde (which yet in very dede is no blasphemy at all) they vntwaires fall into many absurdities. Yea at the length they are brought to that poynt, that wil they or nil they, they holde that some good thing commeth from men, which dependeth not of God. They crye out that it is absurde, to saye that God is the cause of induration. But I wou'd gladly know of them vpon which article of h sayth this absurdity lighteth. Doubtles vpon none, if they so vnderstand the matter, as we haue before declared it: namely, that we must not thinke, that God of himselfe poureth any malice into men. But if they shal say (as doubtles they do say) that they so teach, that men should not be offended, I would know of them, what part in man is offended by this doctrine. They will answer, I know humane reason. But if they so much weigh the offending thereof, why do they not disanull in a maner al the articles of the sayth. For doth not it thynke that the

Our will is not the rule of the election of God.

It is the fathers part when he may, to deliuer his son from danger.

The saines which are in their countrey are not compelled to will that which is good.

These men acquite not God by their excuses.

God to harden taken in that sense that was before declared, is not absurd.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

If we should satisfie humane reason, we must discusse the articles of the faith.

This witty devise notwithstanding.

The Prophets praied not against the lenity of God.

How God deceiveth.

A place of the 2. chap. to the Romanes.

The differing of the punishment inueth to repentance, and hardeneth not.

creation of all things is absurde: Dost thou thinke the death of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead is absurde? Paul to the Corinthyans sayth, that the naturall man understandeth not those things which are of the spirite of God: for vnto him they are foolishnes. And what in Gods name shall we say, that may satisfy humane reason? Shall we say, that God as touching perticuler things hath not a regard to humane affayres, but that he onely vniuersally prouideth for the world? Or shall we say, that he permitteth men vnto themselves, and condemneth no mā vnto eternall paynes: For these and such like things, as they are not disagreeable from humane reason, so are they most of all repugnant vnto the holpe scriptures. Wherefore we see that this deuise, though it seeme goodly to the shew and wittye, yet doth it nothing profite these men. Now will we examine the sentences of the Prophets, wherein God seemeth sometimes to be said to be the cause of deceauing and of error. Shall we say that they prayed against the ouermuche lenity of God: and sayd after this maner, O God, why dost thou so long forgeue this people: why dost thou not chastise them, that they be not so deceaued and erre? Here doubtles I cannot inough mervayle at the so great negligence of these men, in weighing the sayings of the prophets: Merely, if a man diligently read the 60. chapter of Esay, where it is thus read, Why hast thou made vs to erre, O God, and hast turned away our hart from thy feare? We shall see, that this complaint is rather of the deceates and beguilinges of the false Prophetes, then of the lenity of God. For Esay prayed not that the people should be chastised: but rather he lamented and bewayled their captiuitie. In the 4. chapter also of Ieremy is in a manner the selfe same meaning. In deceauing (saith he) O Lord thou hast deceaued thy people. They sayd peace, peace: and behold the sword. In these wordes Ieremy complaineth, that the Jewes were deceaued by false prophets, for that he saw they calamity at hand: yet doth not the prophet pray, that that calamity might come vnto the people, but rather with greate grief threatneth it vnto them. The selfe same thing againe sheweth Ezechiell, and that more plainely in his 14. chapter. If a man, saith he, (meaning a wicked man) shall aske counsell of a Prophet, and he in his answer shall deceaue him, I saith the Lord haue deceaued that Prophet, and will destroy him. But how God maketh to erre, deceaueth, and seduceth, it is declared in the booke of the kinges. For thus the Lord sayd vnto the spirites which stode before him: who shall deceaue Achab? An euill spirite answered, I will deceaue him. Then said God, How? I will be (saith he) a lieng spirite in the mouth of all the prophets of Achab. Then answered God, Go thy wayes and thou shalt preuaile. This history declareth, that God stirreth by the deuill to lie, and that he will haue him to be of efficacy, and to preuaile. The selfe same thing also teacheth Paul to the Thessalonians: Forasmuch as they haue not (saith he) receaued the loue of the truth, God will send vpon them the spirite of error, so beleue lies. By this it is manifest that the Prophets prayed not vnto God to punish the people, as Pighius dreameth. But whereas he saith, that Paul in his second chapter to the Romanes declareth, that God by his lenitie and clemencie hardeneth men, he is exceedingly deceaued. For when Paul saith, Dost thou contemn the riches of his goodnes, long suffering, and lenitie, not knowing, that the goodnes of God leadeth thee to repentance. But thou according to thine hardenes & vnrepentaunte hart, heapest vp vnto thy selfe wrath in the day of wrath &c? To vnderstande the sence of these wordes, thou oughtest to consider, what he before spake. He inneighed against those, which whē they see and iudge what is byrighte, yet do contrary to their owne knowledge and iudgement. Therefore the Apostle saith: We know that the iudgement of God is according to the truth, against those which do such thinges. Dost thou thinke, O man, which iudgeth those which do such thinges, and dost the selfe same thinges thy selfe, that thou shalt escape the iudgement of God? Wherefore vnto such men Paul threatneth most greuous punishments: which many contemned, for that they selte them not, but saw them deferred vntill the end. Wherefore Paul demaundeth, whether by reason of that differing they contemne the goodnes of God: which he saith is geuen vnto them, to lead them to repentance. By these wordes we are admonished, not to neglect the space which is geuen vnto vs before we be condemned. Wherefore Paul admonisheth them of theyr duety. And Augustine against Iulianus in his 5. booke and 3. chapter, saith, that by this bountefulnes of God, wherby punishmentes are so differred, men are inuited to repentance: but this inuitacion is not of efficacy but in the elect onely. For, that men should be brought to repentance: is more required, then onely differring of punishmentes. For it behoueth that God inwardly moue the hartes. Wherefore Paul to Timothe, where he admonisheth the bishop, perpetually to teach the aduersaries, addeth, If peradventure God geue vnto the repentance. This is nothing which Pighius imagineth, that this goodnes of God, being set forth, men may vse it of themselves. For it cometh of God, for a man to vse it wel. Wherefore it is manifest, that that differring is in a manner an inuitacion to repentance, & not an induration, which induration had his being in men before that differring: and is not poured in of God, but is after a sorte brought forth to light. Wherefore this maketh nothing at all against vs, that Paul addeth, y men according to theyr hardenes heape vp vnto them selues wrath. For we deny not, but that y hardnes is called ours. For that we haue the groundes therof in our selues: although it do not offer it selfe, and burst forth into acte, vnles we be stirred by the motion of God. For that in God we liue, are moued, and haue our being. Wherefore Paul in that place entreated not of hardning, as it cometh from the motion of God, but as it is of vs. And when he calleth it ours, he nothing disagreeeth from vs. They vse to bring certaine places of the scriptures, which seme to be against this sentence, that we say, that God hardeneth me. For James in his first chap. saith, Let no man when he is tempted say, that he is tempted of God. For God, as he is not tempted with euils, so also tempteth he no man. But euery one when he is tempted, is entyced and drawn of his owne lust. First here we ought to vnderstand, that James entreateth not of euery kinde of temptation: for we can not deny but that that which is done by affliction, is of God. For we know that he tempted Abraham, and the fathers in the desert, not that he mought knowe what they were, but that they mought vnderstand, and haue experience of themselves. But James speaketh of that temptation whose groundes are in our selues: namely, prauity of nature, and vnbridled lustes: which although they can not be put in practise, vnles through God being the chief and principall mouer and impeller (as we haue before declared in the similitude of the carter: and so they depend of either part, both of God and of vs, yet cannot men therfore excuse their wickednesse, and lay the cause thereof vpon God. For the nature of the wicked is of his owne accord prone ynough thereunto. And this is it which James reproveth. For he will not, that men when they sinne should thinke vpon the perpetuall mouing of God, but rather of the maliciousnes and prauitie which is grafted in them, by the entisement whereof they take pleasure in theyr wicked fates. And forasmuch as God by sinnes punisheth sinnes, doubtles he would not punish them vnles he detested the. Neither are those sinnes wherby he punisheth other sinnes otherwise wrought of God, then so far forth as they are punishmentes, and do pertaine to iustice. But in what sence James ment y God tempteth not, he very wel declared in these wordes For (sayth he) God is not tempted with euilles: that is, he hath not a minde corrupted with prauitie and euill affectes. But the deuill and wicked men entise not any man vnto euill but in that they themselves are first corrupte. Wherefore James dischargeth God from this kinde of tempting: which thing we also doo. For we affirme not, that by vniustice and a corrupt mind he hardeneth any man to sinne. They cite also Paul thus writing vnto the Thessalonians, This is the wil of God, your sanctification. But both this place and such other like ought to be vnderstanded of the will of God reueled in y scriptures, & in the law: & not of y hidde & mighty will of God, which will doubtles being one, is not in him manifold, but he doth not so set forth all things, but that he yet retayneth somewhat vnto himselfe secret, to be reueled in due tyme. They object also that which Paul writeth vnto Timothe: God will haue all men to be saued. But that place is to be vnderstanded touching all states of men, and not of all men peticularly. And that sence agreeth right well with the wordes of Paul. For Paul in that place had commaunded prayers to be made

This inuitacion is not of efficacy, but in the elect only.

It is the gift of God to vse his goodnes well.

A place of James. Temptation by affliction is of God.

Why God tempted the fathers.

Some saye that God doth not tempt any man by reason of corruption, wherewith he is infected: when as he is secretly with out any such corruption.

God would punish sinnes, vnlesse he detested them.

God tempteth not any man by reason of corruption, wherewith he is infected: when as he is secretly with out any such corruption.

made for magistrates. But because the magistrates abhorred from religion, and persecuted the doctrine of Christ, least any man should therefore thinke, that that state is so farre of from saluation, that whosoener are in it can not be receaued in to grace, he added, that God will haue all men to be saued, yea euen kinges and magistrates. But if a man will expound that place of all perticular men, then must he vnderstand it of the will reueled, which others call, the will of the signe. For the reuealed will setteth forth the promises of God generally, and excepteth no man. But if thou wilt contract those words to the will of efficacy onely, then must they be vnderstanded of the vniuersality of the elect. Neither is that strange from the phrase of the holy scriptures. For so we rede, That all shall see the saluation of God, Agayne, All shall be taught of God. And hereunto had Augustine a respecte when he thus expounded such places: All as many as are saued, are saued by the will of God.

Whether
God
will rather haue mercy
then harden.

He hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. ¶ Either of these effectes proceedeth of the will of God. But whether God willet this more then that, I can not simply make answer. For on the one side this is certaine, that vnto God it is a thing most proper to haue mercy, and his nature is of such a goodnes that it communicateth it selfe to a great many. And on the other side we see, that the greatest part is forsaken, for Christ saith, Many are called, but few are elected. Wherefore we must leue the defining of this matter only to the hidden iudgement of God. The question before put forth should now sufficientely be satisfied, if mans reason could so be content. For whē it had objected vnto Paul (who affirmed that the loue and hatred of God consisteth not of works, but onely of him that calleth) that that might seeme to be vniust and against equitie, the Apostle made answer, that God is not bounden or holden by any law or duety of iustice. For here is not entreated of iustice, but of mercy. To which purpose he cited that sentence, I will haue mercy, on whom I will haue mercy. And so he concluded, that it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth. And that it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, he declared by the example of Pharao. For of him God said. To this end haue I rayfed thee up. Last of all for a farther confirmation he added that God hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. These thinges (I say) might seeme to be sufficient. But Paul saw, that mans hart yet swelleth. And therefore he stil objecteth vnto himselfe.

in deceit

Thou wilt say then vnto me: why doth he yet complaine? For who can resist his will? ¶ This word, complaine, is in Greeke μικροειν. Wherefore they are somewhat wide, which thinke that it signifieth, to search out, or to require. If that word μικροειν be taken impersonally, the sence then is: what complainte is this which I heare euery where, and of euery man, that some are iust, and other some vniust? Seeing that God hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth: As if he should haue sayd, men ought not to complaine thereof, whē as it wholly lieth in the hands of God. But it is much better, that that verbe be vnderstanded personally and haue for his nominatiue case this word God. For Paul Traight way answereth, That it is not mans part to reason with his maker. And yet the Apostle himselfe hath rendred a reason, why God made some vessels to honour, and some to contumely: namely, to declare his goodnes and his power. Seeing then that here is entreated of God, the aduersary objected: And why doth God complaine? For who resisteth his will? And that God complaineth of men for theyr ill life, the scriptures euery where testifie. Christe in the Gospell with teares complaineth, that the Jewes knew not their visitacion. And, how often saith he would I haue gathered together thy children, as a hen gathereth together her chickens vnder her winges, and thou wouldest not? And in the first chapter of Esay God thus speaketh, I haue brought vp and exalted children, and they haue despised me. And it were an infinite matter to gather together all such places. In these few wordes y<sup>e</sup> Apostle declareth, what those thinges are, wherewith humane reason is most of all troubled. And those are, first, for that God will haue men to be hardened, and made blinde:

God oftentimes complaineth of men.

secondly,

secondly, for that his will is so mighty, that it can not be overcome. For by these things it seeth, that it is constrained to necessity, from which it most of all abhorreth. Those things Paul in this place toucheth and first saith: Who resisteth his will? In which wordes he declareth that God will that, which is done in vs. And where he saith, who resisteth, he declareth the force and power of the will of God. Necessity is commonly thus defined: namely, to be that which cannot be otherwise. But necessity is not simple, or of one kinde. For there is a certaine necessity of compulsion: which cannot haue place in the will of man. For it is not possible, that the will should will any thing vnwilling. There is an other necessity comming of a certain inwarde propriety of nature: and such a necessity to sinne we affirme to be in men after the fall, if grace and the spirite be alway. For of themselves they cannot do otherwise, although it be not againste their nature, but that they may be holpen and chaunged of God. The third necessity is that, which they call of infallibleness, or of consequence, or (as the Logicians speake) of a composed sense: Which is, when our actions, are not considered as they come from our owne nature, reason, or will: but are considered together with the predestination and foreknowledge of God. And although the disquieting of humane reason as touching this necessity, is by those distinctions after a sorte allwaged, yet is there an other maze wherein it exceedingly wandreth. For it seeth, that God commaunded Pharaoh to let the people go: and therby it gathereth that he willed that thing. On the other side it heareth that God saith, I will harden the hart of Pharaoh, by which wordes it gathereth that he would not haue the people let goe. Wherefore humane sense indgeth it a thing very absurde, that God should at one, and the same time both will and not will one and the same thing. But a godly minde, to vnfold it selfe out of this perplexity, will call to memory the sentence of Esay spoken vnder the person of God: which sentence our sauour Christe also vied in the Gospell: and likewise Paul in the actes of the Apostles, when he had preached at Rome to the vnbelleuing Jewes: Heare (saith he) the word, and vnderstande it not: see a sight, and discerne it not. Make grosse the hart of the people that they vnderstande not: stoppe theyr eares, that they heare not: blind theyr eyes that they see not, lest peradventure they be conuerted, & I heale them. And Christ in the Gospell saith, that he came to iudgemente that they which see should not see. These sayings declare, that God wil haue some to be made blinde, and yet in the meane time he will haue his word to be set forth vnto them. For Christ sent his Apostles to preache throughout y whole world. And although he excepted none vnto whome he would not haue his Gospell preached, yet opened he not the harts of all men to assent vnto the truth, when they heard it. Wherefore it followeth, that the elect onely do beleue: but the wicked are hardened, and their sinne is made more greuous: when as now is taken away the excuse of ignorance. For Paul saith in the first chapter of this Epistle, that the inuisible thinges of God are seene by the creation of this world, being vnderstanded by those things which are made, his eternall power also and diuinitie: so that they are without excuse. Christ also sayth: If I had not come and spoken vnto the, they had had no sin. not y otherwise they should haue bene without sinne, but for that they shoulde not haue had so greuous sinne. For after that they had heard Christ, al excuse of ignorance was now taken away from them. Wherefore when humane reason beareth vs in hand, that to call a man and yet in the meane time will not haue him to come, is nothing els, but to seeke to mocke, and to deceaue: let vs put it to silence, and say with the Apostle, O man what art thou that contendest with God? And let vs declare that it is mere madness to seeke by Dilemmas and Silogismes to carpe God, and to obieete vnto him, that he dealeth no les absurdlie, then if a man should call his frende to a banquet, & should see many things to be therunto a let: which lets although he when he may, remoueth not, yet is he angry vnles he come: or if a man should sende his seruante any whither, whome he knoweth shalbe letted in his iorney, and although he take not away those hindrances when as he may, yet wil he punish his seruante for tarryng: or if a magistrate should commaund a man fast bound in prison to come forth, wher

What thinges most of all trouble humane reason. What is necessity. Necessitie of three kindes. Not euery necessity is of compulsion.

By what necessity we are bound to sinne

Whether God at one & the selfe same time both willet and nillet one and the selfe same thing. A place of Esay.

God wil haue some to be made blinde, vnto whome yet he wil haue them his word be set forth

A remedy against this maine reason.

Cap. 9. A Commentarie vpon the

Vocation & the law haue moe endes then one.

By the vocation of the reprobate, although without efficacy the elect are holpen.

There is no contrariety in the will of God.

The will of the antecedent, and of the consequent.

God when he pronounceth things which succede not, doth not therefore lie. Examples.

Augustine in his booke de Spiritu & litera, the 34. chapter in which place he entreateth touching this matter, sayth, That if he were asked the question touching every perticular man, why God will haue some to heare the Gospel, but not to receaue it, and other some both to haue it and to embrace it, he hath nothing to answer but only these two things, O the depth of the riches, &c. And also, Is there iniquity with God? God forbid. And if there be any (sayth he) that are not content with these answers, let them enquire of men better lerned then I am, but in the meane time let them be ware of presumptuous persons. Presumptuous persons he calleth those which saye yet notwithstanding he loseth not his bondes, These things seeme vnto them absurd for two causes. First, for that they vnderstand not to what ende the law, and vocation, and y<sup>e</sup> commaundements were geuen. For they thinke, that they were geuen to no other vse but to be perfozmed. But Paul saith, that by the law is the knowledge of sinne. Men are so proude and so blockishe, that they thinke they can straight way perfozm al things, so y<sup>e</sup> it be onely declared vnto the what they should do. Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> they mought vnderstand their impotencie & imbecilitie, it was necessary y<sup>e</sup> they should receaue y<sup>e</sup> law, & should be called, being not yet deliuered: for by y<sup>e</sup> meanes they must nedes sele & perceiue, y<sup>e</sup> knowledge alone of it self is not sufficient. An other cause why these men are troubled is, for y<sup>e</sup> they see not the other commoditie, which the elect gee hereby. For when they felt in theselues, how weake they are they are stirred vp, to thinke lowly of theselues and to imploze y<sup>e</sup> ayde of God, and moze and moze in the reprobate which are forsake to acknowledge theyr owne naturall imbecility, and to confesse that they should haue bene in the same estate, vnles besides the knowledge of the truth they had bene holpen by the spirite and grace of God. Wherefore hereby it is manifest, how profitably and wisely those things were instituted, which seemed absurd. And forasmuch as not al which heare the Gospel, are inwardly with efficacy moued of God, thereof it cometh, that Paul sayth to the Corinthyans, that it is to some the sauor of life to life, and to other some the sauor of death to death. This is a playne & simple conciliation of that contrariety which appeareth to be in the wil of God. And because that in these vocations and promises semeth to be expessed some will of God, which yet taketh not effect, certayne diuines haue not vnskillfully sayd, that there is one will of the signe, or of the antecedent: an other will of efficacy, or of the consequent. For it oftentimes happeneth, y<sup>e</sup> God either threatneth or promisseth a thing, which yet shall not come to passe. And yet doth not God therefore lye, or deceaue. For he pronounceth those things, eyther as nature was then ordered, or as though ill deserues it mought come to passe, vnlesse some change were had in the meane time. So was Ezechias told that he should dye: bycause that disese whereof he was sicke was by nature deadly. Wherefore the prophet in those threatnes pronounceth, Gods will of the signe: that is, so much as could be knowen by the force of nature. But the changing came of the will of God which is of efficacy, which they call the consequent. Ninine also for the greuous sinnes thereof was woorthy to be destroyed. Wherefore Iona shewed vnto them the antecedent will of God, which they call the will of the signe: Wherefore when God calleth Pharao or any other reprobate, by that vocation or outward promise we vnderstand the antecedent will, or the will of the signe but that other hidden will, which they call the will of efficacy, or the consequent, we vnderstand not. Wherefore God can not deny himselfe, neither doth he in these willes strue agaynst him selfe. But by his doctrine and promises being in differently and generally set forth, he stirreth vp the mindes of the ministers of the Church, chearefully to preach the word and that vnto all men: which thing doubtles they would not do, if he had made them assured of his hidden wil. For if they knew that they had to deale with men reprobate, they would vterly be discouraged, and geue ouer. And on the other side, when as we se, that no fruite succeedeth of our doctrine and preaching, herein we comfort our selues, for that we were before admonished of this, that there are many which by the purpose of God are made blinde. Augustine in his booke de Spiritu & litera, the 34. chapter in which place he entreateth touching this matter, sayth, That if he were asked the question touching every perticular man, why God will haue some to heare the Gospel, but not to receaue it, and other some both to haue it and to embrace it, he hath nothing to answer but only these two things, O the depth of the riches, &c. And also, Is there iniquity with God? God forbid. And if there be any (sayth he) that are not content with these answers, let them enquire of men better lerned then I am, but in the meane time let them be ware of presumptuous persons. Presumptuous persons he calleth those which saye eyther

eyther vnto woꝝkes foꝛeſene, oꝛ vnto ſuch like ſonde imaginations. Foꝛ theſe thinges, ſoꝛaſmuch as they are not taught in the holy ſcriptures, may well be called humane pꝛeſumptions. Ambroſe vpon this place ſayth, that the will of God can not be reſiſted, foꝛ that he is of all, the moſt mightieſt. And foꝛaſmuch as he is the father of all, theſore vnto no man he willet ill, but will haue thoſe thinges pꝛeſerued which he hath made. Wherefore it is by no meanes agreeable vnto him, to be vniuſt. In theſe woꝝdes Ambroſes meaning is, to ſhewe that this power of the will of God is tempered with ſuch a iuſtice, that it hath a reſpect vnto the woꝝthines and merites of men. Of which minde alſo is Origen. Foꝛ he ſayth, that the will of God is in dede moſt mightie, but yet the ſelfe ſame will is moſt vꝑright. Wherefore he writeth that it is in our will, to be eyther good or euill. And on whiche ſide ſo euer we incline, we can not reſiſt the will of God, but that it will eyther reward vs, or puniſhe vs, as iuſtice ſhall require. Foꝛ it lieth not in our handes vnto what maner of paynes, or vnto what maner of rewardes we ſhould be deſtined or appoynted. Wheras Origen ſayth, that it lieth in our handes eyther to be good oꝛ to be euill, it is not true. Foꝛ our ſaluatioꝛ conſiſteth wholly in regeneration, which dependeth altogether of the grace and ſpꝛite of Chꝛiſt. Foꝛ this is the nature of generation, that he which is begottē, nothing at all woꝝketh to the begetting of him ſelfe: yea neyther doubtles cā he. But he which ſayth, that it lieth in vs, to be good, doth without doubt eyther vnterly take away the benefite of Chꝛiſt, oꝛ elles wonderfully diminiſhe it. But we ſay and teach that the will of God is vꝑright, although we deny that it dependeth eyther of creatures oꝛ of merites. This obiection,

The nature
of generatio

VVhy doth he complayne? and vvho reſiſteth his vvill? The Apoſtle bringeth agaynſt the concluſion befoꝛe inferred: he hath mercy on vvhome he vvill and hardneth vvhome he vvill: and chiefly as touching the latter part of the concluſion. Foꝛ it may ſeme very abſurd, that God ſhould according to his will harden any man. Yea oftentimes in the Fathers, and euen in Auguſtine alſo, who yet in this matter is on our ſide, we reade that induration cometh by the juſt iudgmēt of God: as if they ſhould ſay, that God hardneth thoſe only, which by theyꝝ wicked aces deſerue the ſame. Wherefore induration ſemeth not to depend of hys will of God, as Paul in this place teacheth: foꝛ he ſimply pronounceth, Whome he will, he hardeneth. But to the vnderſtanding hereof we muſt cal to me- moꝛy the thinges which we befoꝛe ſad, concurre to induration. Foꝛ firſt there is grafted in vs a vice oꝛ coꝛruption wherby doubtles we are aleantes from God. And induration is nothing els (if we geue credite vnto Auguſtine, in his 4. chap- ter de Predeſtinatione & Gratia) then to reſiſt the commaundementes of God. Then followeth it, that we are left of God in this euill. Wherefore the ſame Au- guſtine ſayth in the ſelfe ſame place, that God hardneth, whom he will not make ſoft: maketh blind, whom he will not illuminate: repelleth, whom he will not call. And as touching this, the ſce of the Apoſtle is, He hath mercye on vvhome he vvill: and vvhome he vvill he hardeneth, that is, he hath not mercy. And in this woꝝke of God to haue mercy, oꝛ not to haue mercy, we do nothing at all. Foꝛ he freely diſtributeth his mercy vnto whom he wil. And whē we are thus without mer- cy left in our naturall coꝛruption, vnto vs is added the perpetuall motion, and impelling of God, which ſuffreth no creature to be ſtyle. Although neyther euen this, to be moued and impelled, is left in our power. Thirdly ſoꝛaſmuch as occa- ſions are offred, and cogitations ſent into the minde eyther of God him ſelfe, oꝛ at his commaundement and will, by Angells oꝛ the deuill, by meanes whereof that induration the moꝛe vttereth it ſelfe, and is made greater: here we may conſider the iuſtice of God. Foꝛ Achab being a moſt wicked man deſerued to be deceaued of the deuill by the miniſtery of falſe pꝛophetes. And Pharao foꝛ that he was cruell agaynſt ſtrangers and infants, deſerued ſo to be ſtirred vp, and to vtter his induration. Wherefore when God is ſaid to harden, thereby we ought to vnderſtand, that he will not haue mercy. But wicked men being ſoꝛſaken of him, ſoꝛaſmuch as being ſtirred vp by his perpetuall motion they can not be

What thinges are to be conſide-
red in indur-ation.

To harden
is not to make ſoft.

God freely
diſtributeth
his mercy vnto whom he will.
It is not in our power not to be moued & impelled.

An example
of Achab.

quiet, do exercise workes repugnāt to his wil & cōmandements. Wherfore seeing God hath mercy on whō he wil, & geueth to whō he wil, & requirerth again of whō he wil, he cānot be accused of iniustice: for he worketh not of duty. And if in case (saith Augustine in the 6. chap. of the selfe same booke) any man will importunately accuse him, as though he ought by right to bestow his mercy, let him consider what is spoken of the Apostle as it ward. O mā what art thou which makest answer vnto God? Hath not the potter power of one and the selfe same lump of clay to make one vessel to honour, and an other to contumely? In this place Paul first beateth downe the stubborne resister, for that he will not be content with thys definite sentence by hym brought. Moreouer he bringeth that similitude of the claye and of the potter: whereby he stoppeth the murmurings of men, for that the claye contendeth not with his maker: and confirmeth the sentence whereof we now entreate; namely that both election and reprobation depend of the will of God. Afterwarde he addeth the laste reason why God woulde haue some vessels appointed to honoz, and some to contumely: namely, in the one to declare his glozy and goodnes: and in the other his iustice and power. But this is worthy to be noted, that Paul in these obiections, rebukes and answers, neyther chaungeth nor calleth backe any of those thinges which he had before spoken. For he leaueth all thinges in theyr owne force. And when he had referred hatred & loue, election and reprobation vnto the will of God, though he were somewhat bregged by these obiections, yet teacheth he and deliuereth he no other thinges, then he had before taught, and deliuered: yea rather he most strongly confirmeth the selfe same. Augustine in his Encheridion to Laurentius the 9 chapter, and in his booke of 83. questions, the 68. question sayth, that there were certayne which thought that Paul in this place wanted in rendyng a reason, and therefore turned hym selfe to chidinges. But this is to do iniury vnto the holy ghoſt, who spake in Paul. He sayth also, that there were certayne heretiques which toke vpon them at their pleasure, to rase out many thinges out of the holy scriptures, as though they had bene afterward put in by men, and had not bene so wrytten at the beginning: and of that company was Marcion, Manicheus, and such like pestilices: against whom they could not, by the authoritie of the scriptures, dispute for that they admitted them not but as pleased them. They reiected a great number of places, which they called by a name vſed of them, Interpolata, that is, interlaced. Amongst other places they toke away this place which we are now in hand with. For they deuiling many thinges touching the will of God, and enquiring the causes touching the constitution of creatures, when they saw themselves repulſed and confuted by this obiurgation of the Apostle, reiected it as counterfeit and straunge. But we with a sound piety receaue all the Canonicall bookes, and embrace and reuerence these wordes of Paul. In which wordes yet this seemeth to be wonderfull, that he so putteth downe the aduersary, as though no reason could farther be geuen: whē yet notwithstanding afterward he declareth by the ende, why God would make some vessels to honour, and other some to contumely: namely, thereby to make open his goodnes and glozy, and his power and iustice. But this hereof cometh, for that the question may be taken two maner of wayes. And if it be demaunded generally why amongst all the number of mā some are reiected of God, and some elected, that cause taken of the end may be assigned which now we spake of. But if we enquire of euery particular man, why this man is a vessel of mercy to declare the goodnes of God, and that man a vessel of wrath to make open his iustice, we haue no other cause but the mere will of God, which electeth and reiecteth: where with vnles the demaunder be contente, he shall worthely heare of Paul: What art thou, O man, which contendest with God? This thing peradventure may be made playne by some similitude. If a carpenter should haue before him a great many peces of timber, being all vterly of one forme and quantity, and should be demaunded, why he putteth some below, and in the foundation, and other some on high: he would make answer, because that building must haue both a roſe and a foun-

Who they bethat haue mained the holy scriptures.

The question put forth
may be take two maner
of wayes.
A cause of the election of God may be geuen &
may not be geuen.

A simil-
tude.

a foundation. But if thou yet farther demaunde, why he maketh these peces to serue for the foundations rather then the other, when as the forme and quantity of them all is alike, he will answere nothing els, but because it so pleased hym. With which answere vnles thou be content, he will contemne thee as a foolish and importunate inquisitor. These wordes of Paul are in dede selue, but yet of great waight. For it is an argument taken of the comparison of the nature of man vnto the nature of God which are farre wide distant the one from the other.

Abraham when he questioned with God touching the destruction of the Sodomites, and was afrayd, least in questioning he should procede farther then was lawfull for a man to know, very well and religiously submitted himselfe: Being (sayth he) but dust and ashes, I wyll speake vnto my Lord. But humane reason vnles it be regenerate can not kepe this meane. And therefore though Paul now decided the question, yet is it not content. Augustine in his 68. question vpon Genesis sayth, that by these wordes men are not feared away from a modest and godly inquisition of spirituall things, but onely in them is reprobued an importunate curiosity.

An example of Abraham

Which how deeply it sticketh in the childe of Adam not yet regenerate, no man can iustly esteeme. Yea also they that are iustified can here scarce brydle themselves. Wherefore Iob in that dialogue which he had with his frendes, oftentimes sayth, that he had a wonderfull desire, to reason and to contend with God, if he mought, as touching the aduersities which he thought to himselfe he suffered vnto the help. For which corrupt desire being towards the ende of the booke reprobued of God, he professeth that he woulde do repentance in dust and ashes, for that he had so spoken. The latten translation hath, Qui respondeas deo, that is, which maketh answere vnto God. But that doth not fully expresse the Greke worde ἀνταποκρίνομαι. For that word signifieth not onely to answere, but also in answering to gaine say or by answeres to contende. Of these objections which hether to haue bene brought, Is there iniquity with God? Why doth he yet complayne? Who can resist his will? is gathered a most firme argument, that Pauls minde was, that both election and also refection depend of the mere will of God. For otherwise there was no occasion to object these thinges. For if only the worthy should be elected, and the vnworthy relected, what cause should there be of murmuring? For then should be confirmed that kinde of iustice, which humane reason most of all alloweth, neither shoulde there be any place left to these offences. Wherefore I do not a litle meruaile, that Pigghius and other such like shold vse these thinges, which Paul in this place objecteth vnto himselfe & confuteth, to confirme their opinion, as most sure argumentes. For Pigghius saith if God should harden men, Pharao should not be the cause of his sinne, when as he could not resist the will of God. And if God (saith he) should not deale according to workes foreseene, he should in his election be vnjust, and sinne agaynst iustice distributue. But these selfe same thinges Paul objecteth vnto himselfe, not to p̄tēter to satisfie the, thought he it nedeful to fly vnto p̄fond deuises of these men. Herein doubles is most of all declared the mortification of sayth, to geue all the glory vnto God, and to beleue that the thinges which otherwise shoulde seme vnjust, are of him most iustly done. By that comparison of the clay and of the potter, Paul declareth, that it is lawfull for God by most good right to do vnto men whatsoeuer he will: and that men ought patiently and humbly to obey his will. And that God can according to his right and at his pleasure, either make men to honour or els leue them in contumely, hereby he proueth, for that a potter hath the selfe same power ouer the vessels which he maketh. Yea rather God hath much more right ouer me, the hath the potter ouer p̄ clay. For man is infinitely more distant from God, then is the vessel from the potter: For the potter, forasmuch as he is a man, is taken out of the earth: and the clay, whether the potter will or no, must nedes be clay. But God if he wil can turne man into any thing, yea if it please him he can also reduce him to nothing. Wherefore that which is graunted vnto the potter, by what right can it be denied vnto God? And if men bee clay, being compared vnto the will of God,

The godly
are not feared away from a modest inquisition, but fro
an importu-
nate curiosi-
tie.
An example of Iob.

Mortifica-
tion of sayth.

God hath more right
ouer men,
then the potter hath ou-
er the clay.

By this coparison is proued that God hath not a regard to woꝝkes.

Here is not entreated of
damnation,
but of reprob-
ation.

Note the difference
betwene
damnation
and reprob-
ation.

Predestina-
tion is the originall of all promises

Why are they not content therewith? why do they so importunately murmur agaynst it? And soasmuch as Paul sayth, that the potter hath power to make vessels as he wil, thereby he sufficiently declareth, that God hath not a regard to woꝝkes. For if it were so: that power shoulde be no power, and the potter shoulde be able to do moze then God. For the potter may at his pleasure make what vessels he wil: but God must follow the merites of men, and our deedes shoulde be vnto him a rule of his election. But we manifestly see, that the Apostle labourerth chiefly to proue, that it lieth not in our power, in what sort God ought to make vs. But against these things writeth Erasmus in his booke called Hyperaspistes, that it is not to be merueled that y power is take away fro God, which he hath take away fro himself. For he would not y it shoulde be lawfull for him to do y which shoulde be repugnāt to his iustice. To this obiection we answer, that Paul plainly saith, that y potter hath this power: which power doubtles we see is not take away fro him. Wherefoze it is mete y the selfe same power be geue also vnto God. But wheras he saith, y God hath take away fro himself this power, y is not true. I grant in dede y God wil not haue y thing to be lawfull vnto him which is repugnant vnto his iustice. But here is nothing which is repugnāt vnto iustice. Yea rather this we adde, that here is not spokē of iustice, but of mercy freely to be bestowed, or not to be bestowed. For God oweth vnto no man his first mercy: & therfoze it foloweth y he may haue mercy on who he wil, & not haue mercy on who he wil not. Erasmus also thinketh it absurd, y we affirme, that y respect of merites is repugnāt vnto the liberty & power of God, as touching electio or reprobatio. For it were wicked (saith he) if a mā shoulde be condēned wout euil desert of sin. That in dede do we cōfesse: but we adde, that in this place is not entreated of damnation, but only of reprobation, as it is opposite to election, or to predestination. And with the Apostle we say, that God hath mercy on whome he will: and hath not mercy on whome he will not. And although God condemne not, or deliuer not to eternall destruction, but only those which haue bene contaminated with sinne, yet he doth not by reason of any euill desert ouershippe those, one whome he hath decreed not to haue mercy. And yet doth he not therfoze deale vninsly: for he oweth nothing to any man. But when we say, that if God shoulde haue mercy, or not haue mercy according to the merites of mē, his power shoulde be nothing at all, which Paul here in this place so much commendeth, Erasmus maketh answer, that if he haue not a respect vnto woꝝkes, his constāt and vnmoueable iustice shoulde be nothing at all. But we haue oftentimes declared, that here is not entreated of iustice distributine, whereby God in predestination and reprobation is bound to render like vnto like. For soasmuch as all are bozne being drownded in the corruption of sinne, he may as please him, haue mercede on some, and others agayne he may by the selfe same pleasure ouershippe and leue them as he found them, which is, not to haue mercy vpon thē. Erasmus also labourerth mozeouer, to proue y the power of God is after a sort contracted and made definite by his promises. For when God had swozne epyther vnto Abraham, or vnto Dauid, vnles he would breake his sayth, he was bound vtterly to perfoꝝme his promises. Wherefoze (sayth he) it is not altogether so absurd, if the power of God whereof is now entreated, be not put vtterly free from y respect of woꝝkes. But Erasmus shold haue considered that this similitude touching the promises is not hereunto rightly applied. For we neuer rede that there was any promise made to any man touching predestination. Yea rather the promises alwayes follow predestination. For it is the originall of all promises. Further Paul playnly maketh this power free from all respect of woꝝkes, when he compareth it with the power of the potter. For he in making of his vessels considereth no merite at al of the clay. Mozeouer he befoze in most expresse woꝝdes sayd, Not of woꝝkes, but of him that calleth.

Doth the thing formed say to him that formed it, vwhy hast thou made me thus? These woꝝdes are red in Esay and in Jeremy. For Jeremy in his 18. chap. thus thus writeth: Arise and go downe into the house of the potter, and there shall I make thee to heare my wordes. Wherefore I went downe to the potters house, and behold he wrought a worke one the whele; and the vessell that he made of clay was broken in the hand of the potter. So he returned, and made it an other vessell, as seemed good to the potter to make it. Then the word of the Lord came vnto me, sayeng. O house of Israel can not I do with you as this potter, sayth the lord? Behold as the clay is in the potters hand, so are you in mine hand, o house of Israel. In these wordes of the Prophet, Paul to this thing chiefly had a regard, that men are so in the hand of God, as clay is in the hand of the potter: and that the potter may of the clay make vessels, as vnto him seemeth good. These things I say the Apostle transferred to his purpose. Ierome vpon this place sayth, that the prophet was therefore first sent vnto the potter, for that we vse more stedfastly to kepe in mind those things which we se with our eyes. But where as that first vessell which was made of the potter was broken, that he sayth happened by the working of the prouidence of God, that the vniuersall hand of the artificer should by his error figure a parable: which the Lord him self interpreting sayth: If the potter haue this power, that he can of one & the selfsame clay make new again that which was broke can not I bring to passe the selfsame thing in you, which as much as is in you seme to haue perished? And to signifie that in men is free will, he sayth, that he speaketh vnto thys or that kingdom both euill things, and also good things: to the entent men should be brought to repentance, and that those euils might not come to passe which were foretold: And straight way lest we should attribute to much vnto free will, he sayth, neyther by and by followeth it that all whole whiche cometh to passe is of man, but of his grace whiche freely geueth all thinges. And a little after ward. Where then (sayth he) is the power of free will without the grace of God? and the iudgment of a mans owne will? When as it is a greatesse offence agaynst God for a man to follo we his owne imaginations, and to doo the will of his wicked hart. These thinges writeth Ierome in that place excellently well touching free will, the prauity of mans hart, and the grace of God. And as may be gathered out of the epistle which he made before that chapter, he had at that time finished that notable worke agaynst the Pelagians. Further no man ought to be offended, for that Ieremy seemeth to entreate of the affliction and prosperitie of thinges temporall, when as Paul heare entreateth of thinges spirituall. For as I haue in other places taught, the benefites of thinges temporall: and the promises which pertain vnto the, are to be called backe vnto Christ. Wherefore in them, as often as we read them in the prophets, we ought first to consider our reconciliation with God thorough Christ, for whose sake he geueth vnto his all kind of good thinges. We ought alwayes to set before our eyes sinne, both that sinne which we committe, and also that wherein we are borne. Wherefore it is no meruayle, if Paul who had the perfect vnderstanding of the Lawe and of the Prophets, so ioyned together these thinges. But I wonder that Erasmus should say, that the wordes of Ieremy therefore serue to Pauls purpose, for that neyther Paul also in this place entreateth of eternall saluation. And this he thinketh is hereby manifest, for that the Iewes were not in very dede excluded from it. For the Apostle him selfe was a Iew: and many remnauntes also of that people are euen at this day continually conuerted. Wherefore he thinketh that mention is made of the reiectio of the Iewes, as touching thinges outward, for that theyr common welth was destroyed, and likewise theyr temple, and priesthode, & whatsoever thinges serued to the glory of the nation being now dispersed into sondry places, & being in seruitude vnder other nations, & the Romanes and other nations which were before idolaters succeeded in theyr places. These thinges are neyther likely to be true, neither agree they with the sence and order of the wordes of Paul. For if here be entreated onely of thinges externe and temporall, what needed Paul to haue desired to redeme them with his saluation? Why wished he to be Anathema from Christ for his brethren according to the flesh? Why in the beginning of the 10. chapter writeth he thus, Brethren the ready will of my hart, and the prayer which I make vnto God for Israel is vnto saluation? For in these wordes he declareth, that he reasoneth not touching thinges temporall.

Why the Prophet was sent vnto the potter.

In the prophets we must ioyne
thinges spi-
rituall with thinges tem-
porall.

Paul here
entreateth
not of thinges tempo-rall, but of eternall sal-
uation.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

pozall, but touching eternall saluation. For the question was asked how the truth of the promises of God could consist, when as so many Iewes repelled the Gospel, and abode in theyr incredulity. And in the 11. chapter it is added, that God gaue vnto them the spirite of pricking: eyes y they should not se, and eares y they should not vnderstand euen vnto this present day. Wherefore those things which are here spoken ought by no meanes to be wrested vnto the outward shew and pompe of the publike welth of the Iewes. But there is an other doubt which Pigghius labourerth to picke out of this chapter of Jeremy: namely, that the power of God, which is shadowed in the power of the potter, dependeth of the respect of woorkes. For the prophet (sayth he) addeth in the person of God, If I shall speake of a nation or kingdome to plucke it vp, and to roote it out, and to destroy it, and they shall repent them, I also will repent me of the affliction, which I spake to bring vpon them. And if I shall speake to build and plant, and they shall turne away from my righteousness, I also wil repēt me of that good which I thought to do for the. Behold saith Pigghius, God saith y y woorkes of y potter shalbe such according as me shal make theselues, wherefore although Paul here dissolue not y questiō, yet is y solutiō gathered out of this place of y Prophet. Thus farre Pigghius: but y order of y wordes of the Prophet is farre otherwise to be considered. For whē God had firste declared that men are in his hand, as clay is in the hand of the potter, and therefore it lay in him to do with them what he would, soasmuch as this sentence mought diminish the preaching of the Prophets (for straightway so soone as they should promise any god, or threaten any euill, the hearers mought say. If we be in the handes of God, as clay is in the hand of the potter, what can we do: or what remedy can we get against the will of God: For God will vndoubtedly do that whiche he hath decreed) the holy Ghost thought it good to remedy this incōuenience. Wherefore he teacheth that God in these threatninges and promises doth not alwayes reueale his hidde and vnchaungeable will, whereby he hath most firmly decreed what he will do: but onely his will, which they call the antecedent will, or the will of the signe, that is of admonition: for that theyr presente estate requireth that. But Paul in this place and the Prophet, in the beginning of the chapter entreate of that will and power of God, whereby he by most good righte both maketh, and maketh new all thinges as pleaseh him. Farther Pigghius thinketh that the solution of this questiō is had in the 27. chapter of Ecclesiasticus: where it is thus wyitten. The furnace trieth the vessels of the potter: and so doth tēptacion the iust men. Whereof he gathereth, that they which constantly and valiantly abide in temptacions, thereby get, to be vessels to honoz: but they which abide not, but are broken, are made vessels to dishonoz. But this man in his reasoning considereth not, that if he will needes prosecute this metaphoze, he shalbe compelled to confesse that as well vessels to honoz which serue for the table, as also pottes, and vinals, which we vse to vile ministeries, must needes abide the assay of the fier. For euen the most vilest vessels, if they be broken, should now be no vessels, yea neither doubtles not apte for any vile ministry. Wherefore his arguing is here in vaine, and he gathereth more of the metaphoze, then he oughte. For this was onely the meaning of the wise man, that by temptation men are tried what maner of ones they are: and not that they by that triall attaine to their condition or estate: but that condition which they before had then at the length they make manifest, and bying to light. Touchinge the place to Timothe, where it is wyitten, that in a great house are many kinds of vessels, we haue entreated, and haue declared Origens minde therein, from whome this man hath borrowed whatsoever he hath said. The Prophet Esay also hath certayne woordes which serue somewhat to the declaration of these woordes of Paul. For in his. 4. chapter he thus wyiteth, Wo be vnto him that striueth with his maker, the possheard with the possheardes of the earth. Doth the clay say vnto him that fashioned it, what dost thou? Thy woorkes hath no handes: that is, thou hast so vnskillfully and rudely made thy woorkes, as if thou haddest no handes. The meaning of this place is very large, for it repproueth all those which accuse the woorkes of God, of what kinde so euer they

God doth
not alwayes
make open his whole
will.

A place of Ecclesiasticus.

By patience in temptati ons we are not predestinatēd.

they be: and therefore Paul aptly transferred that sentence to his purpose: thereby to beate downe those which complaine of the power of God, and take it in ill part, that God hath mercy on whome he will, and hath not mercy on whom he will not. Although there are many which thinke, that Paul cited not these testimonies of the Prophets, but rather alluded vnto them. And so thinke they that he in an other place, when he writeth, do ye not know that a little leuen sowreth the whole dow, alluded vnto those wordes of Christ, wherein he commaunded the Apostles to beware of the leuen of the Scribes and Pharisees. But hereabout I will not contend, for whether he alluded to the sentences of these Prophets, or whether he cited them, as touching the matter it is all one. Neither ought it to seeme strange, if Paul when he useth the testimony of the scriptures, do not expresse the same: for althoughe he be wont sometimes to adde, As it is written, yet obserueth he not that manner alwayes. For towardes the end of the .ii. chapter he simply and without any citation thus writeth: Who hath known the minde of the Lord? or who was his counseller? And that clause we reade with the selfe same number of wordes in Esay. But it is certaine that Paul in this whole discourse retaineth the meaning of eche place: both of Jeremy, that we are as clay in the hand of the potter, which maketh, and maketh againe whatsoever he will: and also of Esay, that it is not lawfull for the clay to contend with his maker, or to reprove him for his worke. And to this place serueth very well that which is reade in Ecclesiasticus the .33. chapter (if that booke be read) And men come out of the earth, whereout Adam was created. But the Lord by his manifold knowledge hath denuded them, & hath altered their conditions. Some of them hath he blessed and exalted: and some of them hath he sanctified, and appropriated vnto himselfe: and some of them hath he cursed and brought lowe, and hath put them out of theyr estate as clay is in the hand of the potter to forme and order it. Wherefore Paul when he thus writeth, deliuereth not thinges new, and vnheard of, but already created, and set forth in the scriptures: whome if teachers would follow, they should not neede to flie to the respect of merites: especially seeing that the scriptures, when they entreat of election or reprobation, acknowledge not that doctrine. Ambrose expounding these wordes, first saith, that the Apostle did put forth this out of Esay as his own. And he confesseth that it is in the power of the maker to make what creature he will. But he addeth: Forasmuch as we are all of one and the selfe same Masse in substance, and all sinners, God hath mercy vpon one, & not without iustice dispiseth an other. For in the potter is only a wil: but in God is a wil with iustice, for God knoweth vpon whome he ought to haue mercy. Thus much Ambrose. In which wordes, where as he saith, that iustice is ioyned with the will of God, when he hath mercy or reiecteth, we will not deny that, so that it be rightly vnderstanded. For we know that in God is utterly no iniustice: for he doth iniurie vnto no man. But herein we agree not, for that these men thinke, that the consideration of the iustice of God is to be sought for of the workes and merites of men: for we iudge that it is to be sought for onely of the wisdom of God himselfe: Wherefore we muste define nothing but so much as is reuealed vnto vs by God in the holy scriptures. Those commentaries which are ascribed vnto Jerome haue noted two things: first that this answer of Paul is after a sorte spoken by way of supposition, as if he should thus say vnto the aduersary. Although it were so, as thou imaginest, that God hath mercy vpon whome he wil, and whom he will he hardeneth, yet oughtest thou not doubtles to take that in such ill part, that thou shouldest seeke to strue with God, and as it were in iudgement to call him to a triall. This interpretation taketh as granted, that those wordes, He hath mercy vpon whome he will, and whom he will he hardeneth, are spoken vnder the person of the aduersaries. But the verie course of the wordes will not suffer that, for the Apostle straight way vnto those wordes addeth an obiection, saying, Thou wilt say then vnto me: why doth he yet complain? And who can resist his will? Neither ought we at our pleasure to alter the order of the wordes. Moreover when as Paul saith, that the potter hath power of one and the selfe same lombe to make one vessell to honor, and an other to dishonor, they thinke that this similitude is to be applied to the Israelites and to the Egyptians. And therefore they where Paul useth scripture he doth

not alwayes
cite it.

Paul followeth the meaning both of Jeremy
& of Esay.

The will of God is al-
wayes ioyned with iustice.
The consideration of iustice in election is not to be sought for in our
workes.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

affirme, that those two nations seemed to come both out of one and the selfe same lump, for that they were both polluted with one and the selfe same kinde of sinne, namely, with idolatry. For as Ezechiel testifieth, the Jewes also worshipped the idols of Egypt: howbeit though eche had a like sinne, yet notwithstanding God notably deliuered the Jewes, but threwe the Egyptians into destruction. But there

The things that are spoken of the Apostle vniuersally, are to be vnderstanded generally.

Here is entreated of that electio which was before the foundation of the world were layd. In election the will of God is not tyrannicall.

God taketh away nothing from those, vpon whome he hath not mercy.

The reprobate are oftentimes adorned with great gifts.

God is called a Lion.

God is called a beare.

God is called a fire.

is no neede to vnderstand those things which are spoken of the Apostle generally, of certaine perticuler kinde of men. Neither in this place is entreated of afflictions or punishments sent of God, wherein a man may easily finde out the consideration of merites: but of that first election, which God had before the foundations of the world were layd. Neither is that very currant, which Methodius Martyr writeth in his booke de resurrectione as it is cited in the Greeke Scholies. For he expoundeth these things of God, who hath power in the last day to raise vp the bodies of the dead being of one & the selfe same lump of the elementes, one part to the honoꝝ of blessednes, & an other part to y<sup>e</sup> dishonoꝝ of dānatio. For, that last condēnatio & adiudging to gloꝝy are much distant frō electio & pꝛedestinatio, wherof Paul now entreateth. Howbeit this in y<sup>e</sup> meane time is worthy to be noted, y<sup>e</sup> we, whē we attribute vnto God such a power in the election of men, as hath the potter in making of vessels, do in no case teach, that such a power and will of God is tyrannicall, or strange from iustice. For soasmuch as vnto no man is done iniury, and this kinde of anthozity by most good right belōgeth vnto God, it must nedes be that both election and reprobation are iust, although the reason of that iustice depend not of the woꝝkes either of them that are to be elected, or of them that are to be reiected. And to make this thing moꝝe playne, we ought to know, that God when he ouerhuppeth any man and hath not mercy vpon him, taketh yet nothing away from hym. For so the potter taketh away nothing from the honour or dignity of the clay, when of it he maketh vessels to a contumelious vse. Yea rather oftentimes we see, that the reprobate are adorned of God with excellent giftes: although he bestowe not vpon them that mercy which bringeth saluation. Wherefoꝝe seeing that God taketh away nothing from them, they haue no cause why they should accuse God of iniustice, if they be of him ouerhopped. Thus much touching the interpretation of the wordes of Paul. Nowe it shall not bee from the purpose, as I suppose to see, what Chrysostome bringeth vpon this place. For he perceauing, that by this similitude he was exceedingly bꝛged, and seeing that of it followeth, that neither election, nor reiectio depende of the merites of woꝝkes, with great cunning wente aboute to extenuate the strengthe of this similitude. Similitudes (saith he) are not so to be receaued, that they should be of force as touching all partes: for other wise should followe many absurdities. For God is sometymes in the scriptures compared with a Lion: out of which similitude yet this thing onely thou oughtest to gather, that in God is vnmeasurable strength, and inuincible fortitude: which thinges by most good right are agreeable with God. But if thou wilt go farther, and transference vpon God the cruelty and fiercenes of Lions: no man will suffer that. God is sayd also to be like vnto a beare: which is to be referred vnto the strengthes of auenging, and yet oughtest thou not therefore to attribute vnto God the deformednes of that beast, and his vnreasonable wrath. God is also called a fire: for that he can consume and purge all thinges: and yet must thou not therefore say, that he wythout vnderstanding, and sence, and will consumeth all thinges. But Chrysostome needed not to haue taken so great paynes in setting foꝝth that rule of similitudes. For it is of all mē confessed, that similitudes are not in all partes of force: neither do we transfer vnto God all thinges which are agreeable vnto the potter, and vnto the clay. For we do not imagine vnto God either handes or a whele to woꝝke withal: neither do we spoyle men of sence, vnderstanding and wil, that they should be utterly like clay. Wherefoꝝe we confesse that which Chrysostome sayth, that similitudes oftentimes halte, and that in weighing of them is to be added in a deepe consideration. But Chrysostome thinketh, that this is onely the scope of Paul, to repress man, that he should not repine agaynst God: for so the clay resisteth not the potter. And this scope in dede we also admit mitte: but in the meane tyme we adde an other, namely, that God may by his owne right haue mercy vpon whome he wil, and not haue mercy on whome he wil not: which liberty is also attributed vnto the potter in vsing of the clay: which thing if thou take away from the scope of Paul, then shal not that complaint be remedied, which was objected vnto him. For, he which made the objections erred two manner of wayes: first for that he repined agaynst God: secondly for that he seemed to go aboute falsely to accuse God of iniustice. The part Paul answereth vnto in this similitude: for as touching the repining, he thus sayth: Shall the thing formed say vnto him that formed it, why hast thou made me after this sort? But as touching iniustice, he sufficiently dischargeth God of that crime, when he sayth, that God doth nothyng agaynst his owne ryght, for the potter hath power to make vessels as pleaseth him. And if this similitude touch not ech part, then is not their mouth stopped which thus contend with God. For if they once heare, that God is not in very dede like the potter, and that he can not by right do what he will, they will cry out, that that similitude nothing pertayneth vnto them: for we must thinke otherwise touching God, then we do touching the potter. But Chrysostome not a whit dessembled, what it was that he so much feared in this matter: namely, this, least free will should perish. Do not thinke (saith he) that here is any thing spoken agaynst free will. For the Apostle rather ment in this similitude to commend obedience towards God: that we shoulde wyth the selfe same facility obey him, as the clay followeth the hand of the potter. But Paul in this place spake not so much as one word touching this obedience. Farther it followeth not, that free will should perishe although God in election haue not a respect vnto the workes and merites of men. For although it be not in our power, to be either elected or reiected, yet maye there bee many other thinges free vnto vs. Wherefore it is a false kinde of reasoning called a secundum quid ad simpliciter, to say thus, When in this thing are not free, Ergo, in other thinges they haue no liberty. It must nedes be without all controuersy, that both Chrysostome and all the godly do confesse, that it lieth not in any mans power, to be conceaued without originall sinne: but shall we take vpon vs thereof to conclude, that there is no other liberty besides left in vs? Farther, who hath this in his owne power, to be regenerated and grafted into Christ? For we must count to haue receaued that of the grace and fauor of God. And yet notwithstanding after that we haue once obtayned regeneration, there follow infinite thinges which are left free vnto vs. Wherefore this sence of Paul whiche we followe, taketh not away free will: vnlesse peraduenture we will imagine such a liberty of the will, that it can clayme all thinges vnto it selfe, yea euen those thinges also which are geuen of God freely. But that is farre wide from the true sence of sayth. For no man commeth vnto Christ, vnles he be drawen of the father. And Christ sayth vnto the Apostles: Ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chosen you. Chrysostome addeth mozeouer, that the Apostle in this place entreateth not of the maner whereby God gouerneth creatures, but of that submission, which we ought to exhibite him. I graunt in dede y here is not entreated of y administration either of al creatures, or of all humane euent: but yet I doubt not, but that Paul speaketh of that kind of administration, whereby, befoze the foundations of the world were layd, vnto some he gaue mercy, and vnto other some he gaue it not. I confesse mozeouer, that a man ought to thinke lowly and humbly of himselfe: but yet not in such sort that he ought to adde thereunto a lie. Wherefore if we thinke, that we are not in very dede as clay in the hand of the potter, that God may at his pleasure either make vs or remake vs, but is compelled to follow and to haue a regard vnto our workes, it is no iust dealing, that we should otherwise either teach others, or perswade our selues. For we must not by reason of humility or deiection of mynde thinke otherwise of our selues the we are. Whereunto addeth Chrysostome that these thinges pertayne neither to the condition of man, nor to the necessity of the mynde, but only to the dispensation of varietie. Neither doubtles do we here speake of the necessity of the minde, or of the

A double error of those which in this question oppose themselves against God. We must neither repine against God, nor falsely accuse him of iniustice.

Paul in this place spake not one word of obedience. Free will perissheth not by reason of the free election of God. It is not in our power to be borne without originall sinne.

We must not graunt such a free will as may clayme vnto it selfe all thing.

Under the pretence of submission, we must not adde a lie.

Election
may be called a dispensation of mercy.

Man cannot be free from sinne, when
as he is borne in it.
What will
of ours, is crowned of
of God.

In simili-tudes & me-
taphores
the scope is continually
to be kept
whole.

How the wills of men are the selfe
same, & how they are not the selfe
same.

Originall
sinne bur-
steth forth into sundry formes of sinnes.

What is the first sinning of man.

How apt
the simili-
tude of the potter is.

the condition of man: but of the election, or reprobation of God, which I see not, why it can not be called a dispensation, when as God bestoweth and dispenseth his mercy vnto whome he wil. But Chrysostome vnderstandeth that dispensation, whereby God recompenseth the workes of men according to their nature. Of which thing it is certayne that Paul in this place entreateth not. Moreover he saith, that he affirmeth these thinges, least man should seeme to be without blame and yet be without desertes condemned: and least Paul should seeme to be against himselfe: for he euery where crowneth the will: but these absurdities follow not of our sentence. For how can man be free from blame, when as he is both borne in sinne, and also conceaued in iniquity? Neither doth Paul crowne that will, which is grafted in vs, and which we haue of our owne nature, but that will which is made & changed of God, not by chance or at all auentures, but by his appointed counsell & purpose. Farther to y<sup>e</sup> end he mought after a sort extenuate & weakē y<sup>e</sup> force of y<sup>e</sup> comparison, wherewith he is vehemently vrged, he saith, that y<sup>e</sup> nature of similitudes is hyperbolical, which ought far to exceede those thinges which are entreated of: for other wise they can not thoroughly moue the mindes of men. Neither do we doubtles deny this: howbeit this we adde, that in metaphors & figures, though they be neuer so notable and vehement, we must allwayes (as we haue before admonished) kepe still the scope whole. Lastly, he thinketh that we are deceaued, for that being led by the similitude of the clay, we thinke, that in all men, soasmuch as they haue one and the selfe same nature of substance are one & the selfe same willes: which opinion he supposeth to be conceaued of a blockish and dull vnderstanding. But we are not so blockish, to thinke that the willes of men are in all poyntes the selfe same. But we consider the disposition or nature of man as it was euen from the beginning, at what time there could be in it no vse of will. And being taught by the holy scriptures, we acknowledge it to be utterly corrupted and vitiated. And as touching this, we do not without iust cause affirme, that the willes of all men are a like, for all are brought forth out of one and the selfe same lompe. Afterward when men come to moze yeares, wherein is had the vse of the will, we say that endeuors and desires of all men are the selfe same: not indeede simply, for there are diuers endeuors, and sundry enterprises, but all to euill, in as muche as they are gouerned by the lawe of sinne. For being left destitute of the grace of God, they can bring forth nothing of themselves but sinnes. Howbeit herein we acknowledge diuersity of wils, for y<sup>e</sup> vnto all men are not offered the selfe same occasions. For euery one hath his impulsions, according to the consideration either of education, or of the body, or of the workes, or of the place, or of the time. By meanes whereof it cometh to passe that originall sinne bursteth forth into sundry formes of vices. But whereas he saith that the vessels of the potter haue not theyr difference of the lompe whereof they are made, but only of the appoyntment of them which vse them, and that men in like sort haue theyr differences of the diuersity of elections and of wils, that doubtles is not true. For the vessels of the potter are not first made differēt by theyr vse, but by the workmanship of the potter. For men therefore vse them not a like, bycause they are made hauing diuers formes. So men before that they are sundryed by theyr desires and willes, are first sundryed by the predestination or reprobation of God. If a man diligently weighe the similitude which Paul bringeth (to come to him agayne at the length leuing Chrysostome) he shall see, that there could not haue bene found a similitude moze apte and moze mete for the question put forth. For the matter which the potter vseth is so vile and abiect, that if peradventure there be of it made any fayre or crime vessel appoynted for the table, or for some other honorable vse, the same is wholly to be ascribed vnto the industry and conning of the potter. But when contrariwise of the clay are made pots for the kitchen, the matter cannot complaine, that it hath iniury done vnto it. For it was of his own nature most abiect. Yea rather when as it is appoynted to be made so vile vessels, it can not deny, but that bys so defoꝛmed nature hath receaued greate oꝛnamentes. But if a goldsmith oꝛ a lapidary should of gold oꝛ pꛛecious stones make any vessel to serue foꝛ a vile vse, he mought woꝛthely be blamed foꝛ that he had delt so vile and vnwoꝛthely with so pꛛecious a matter. Foꝛ so the Ethnike Poete, repꝛoued Bassus, foꝛ that he by reason of to much sumptuousnes, ealed nature in a potte of gold. Wherefoꝛe Paul considered that mā after sinne was made, both as touching the body, and also as touching the soule, so abiect and vile, that if he be by the election of God exalted to the dignity of eternall gloꝛy, the same he ought wholly to assigne, not to the excellency of his nature, which now by reason of sinne is bzought into a most miserable estate, but vnto the most excellent cunning woꝛkeman. But if any man be in the election of God overhipped and be made a vessel of woꝛath, yet can not therfoꝛe the pꛛedestination of GOD be blamed, as though he relected a woꝛthy creature vnder his desertes. Wherefoꝛe not with out iust cause doo we finde this metaphoꝛe so oftentymes repeted in the holye Scriptures. Foꝛ being well considered, it ministꝛeth excellent doctrine. Foꝛ, that is in my iudgement a notable place whiche is in the 56. chapter of Esay, where the Pꝛophete humblye pꝛayeth vnto GOD vnder the person of the people afflicted with the captiuitie of Babilon. Thou sayst he art our father, but we are claye: thou art the potter, and we the worke of thine handes. The people coulde not moꝛe aptly confesse their vilenes and vnwoꝛthines: oꝛ moꝛe expꝛesse the mercy which they imploꝛed at Gods hand, then by that similitude taken of the potter, and of the father. Foꝛ when God is called a potter, thereby is signified that he both is able, and knoweth how of vile men to make them gloꝛious: and when he is called a father, thereby is declared, that he beareth such good will towarde hys, that he will also pꛛefoꝛme that thing. Wherefoꝛe, it is not lawfull foꝛ the potte (as the Apostle concludeth) to contend with his maker, that is, to chide with God, foꝛ that it is not appoynted to serue a hinges table. And although these thinges which Paul here writeth pꛛertayne chiefly to election and pꛛedestinatiō, yet way they extend farther to our edificatiō: so that of these woꝛdes we may gather, that it is not lawfull foꝛ vs to complayne of our estate, and as it were to contend with God. If the flesh suggest vnto vs, that it were better foꝛ vs to be richer, to be endewd with greater honour, and to haue moꝛe strenght of body, let vs streight way supꝛesse it by this similitude, that we are as clay in the hand of the potter. Being warned oꝛ admonished by this consideration, we shall not dare to complayne of our estate, oꝛ to grudge aganst the vntemperatenes of the heauen oꝛ of the ayꝛe, oꝛ agaynst the administration of any other thinges. Foꝛ what thing ells is this, but foꝛ the clay to go aboute to pꛛescribe lawes vnto the potter? Wherefoꝛe let man remember his estate: and seing that he is euē vanity it self, it is not mete, that he should take vpon him to contend with God, who is most good and most mighty. Dauid in the 38. Psalme sayth, I was domme and I opened not my mouth: bycause thou madest me. Thys is a most firme reason wherunto we must in all chanches of mans life, perpetually cleaue: namely that whatsoeuer happeneth, is done by the commaundement and will of God. Such a meditaciō maketh men in pꝛosperity moderate, neyther suffreth it them to ware insolent. Foꝛ when they remember, that they are as clay in the hand of the potter, streight way they vnderstand, that all those thinges may enen at one instāt be turned vpside down, and that that felicity may be turned into extreme misery. Agayne being in aduersities vpholden by this consolation, they are not discouraged. And so much the rather, when they vnderstand, that that most cunning potter can sodenly change claye being in extreame infelicite, into a vessel of gloꝛy.

A place of Esay.

The thinges
whiche Paul hath spoken, may be extended
farther.

What meditation may make men
very moderate.
Whereby consolation
is to be sought foꝛ
in aduersi-
ties.

If God willing to shewe his woꝛath, and to make hys power knownen, suffreth with long patience of minde the vessels of woꝛath prepared to destruction: that he might declare the riches of hys gloꝛy

Cap. 9.      A Commentarie vpon the ry vpon the vessels of mercy, which he hath prepared to glory.

After the reason take
of the efficient cause,
followeth
that reason
which is taken of the ende.
Of endes
some are nie, & some farre of.
Here is en-
treated of the extreme and bitter-
most ende.

We must not alter
one iote or title in the scriptures.

Why God
so long suffereth vessels of perdition.

If God vwillig to [hevv his vvrath.] When the Apostle had befoze declared by the efficiēt cause, that is lawfull for God, being as it were a potter, to electe some me, and to relecte other some, and that vutterly in such sort at his pleasure, that no cause can bee geuen, w by this man is elected, and that man relected, now in this place he thought to pprove the same by the end. And that end is, that the goodnes and polver of god might be declared, howbeit his iustice remaining in the meane time sound. But there is no man, I suppose, which is ignozant, that there are some endes which are farther of and moze distāt, and other some moze nere. Heare is touched the vttermost end: which is the declaration of the prophecies of God. Unto the Ephesians is touched an end moze nigh: for there we are sayd to be to this end elected, to be holy and blameles, which selfe thing is signified in the epistle to Timothe. For thus Paul writeth of himselfe: I have obtained mercy, that I might be saythfull. And beyond these nigh endes there is another extreme ende, namely, that the glory or polver of God might be declared. And this reason is not taken out of the secrecy of the counsell of God, or out of the deepe pit of the wisdom of God: but out of those thinges, which easely of fre them selues vnto the mindes of the godly. But this reading is somewhat obscure, which thing also Origen hath noted, and after him Erasmus. Origen saw that there was nothing which answered vnto this consūtion εἰδῆ, that is, If, and that here is bled y figure Anantopadotō: & therfore he thought y y sēce mought be plaine and redy inough wout that cōsūtiō: but so durst not I do. For I iudge it a thing wicked, to alter one iot or title in y holy scriptures. Erasmus thinketh y that which is wāting may be had of those thinges, which were a litle befoze spoken, so that this should be the sence, If God willing to shewe his power, suffreth the vessels of wrath to make knowne the riches of his glory. &c. And againe, O man what arte thou which makest aunswere vnto God? Again: Hath not the potter power over the clay? W that which wanteth may thus be supplied. Men haue not, whereof to accuse God. Caluine to make the sence moze plaine, readeth these wordes by way of interrogatiō. What if God would shew forth, &c. As though it were a kinde of figure called Reticentia. He sayth that God would shew forth his wrath, and make known his polver, and that by the vessels of wrath, which he suffreth with much lenity. The wicked are called vessels of wrath, because they are prepared, appointed, and destiniēd to vengeaunce.

Which God suffreth.] This place may be two manner of wayes interpreted: of which the first is, that God brought forth and created those vessels: and in that sence Augustine many times citeth this place. The seconde is, that God doth not straight way ouerthrow or destroy the wicked being now produced and created, as they deserue, but a long time suffreth and tollerateth the. This latter sence I iudge better then the first: not inuēde by reason of the signification of the worde (for in very dede this worde ὑπομνη, hath either of both these significations) but because Paul addeth ὑπομονῇ πολλῇ, that is, with much patience. Unless peradventure some will say, that God sheweth great lenitie, when he bringeth forth those, whome he knoweth shalbe enemies, and rebels vnto him: which yet cannot so properly be sayd, if the naturall signification of that word μακροθυμία be well considered. Wherefore God tollerateth such vessels a long time: for that by that meanes they are made moze manifest. For if he should straight waye breake them, the polver of God could not so easely be considered, nor shine forth, neither could men so easely take example by them. But when God long time tollerateth the wicked, & at the length by his most mighty power punisheth and destroyeth them, he thereby not onely declareth his power, but also by one and the selfe same worke declareth, how plentiful his mercy is towarde the elect. For those elect, when they compare themselves with them so forsaken, delected, and broken, thereby vnderstande, how greate a benefite, and how great mercy is bestowed vpon them. And here haue we the

the end. But the cause why some are appoynted to wrath, and other some to mercy ought to be sought for of those things which haue bene already spoken: namely, of the will and power of God. By vessels, Paul in this place meaneth, instrumentes. Wherefore Augustine very well noteth, that σκευος, is not with the Grecians that which containeth licour, for, that (sayth he) is called by an other name αγγειον, but σκευος he thinketh signifieth, impediments or instrumentes: the like woordes also do the Hebrewes vse. For Jacob called Simeon and Leui Cele hammas, that is, vessels of deceate or guile: for that they were instrumentes of these vices. After the manner of which hebrew phrase, Paul was called a vessell of election, that is, an organe and instrument elected of God. And Paul in the second to Timothee: He (sayth he) which shall purge himselfe from those things, shall be a vessell sanctified to honor, and prepared to euery good worke. Such kindes of speach declare, that men of themselves can do nothing. For God is sayd to vse them, not onely because he moueth them, but also because he directeth and applieth them to whatsoeuer thinges he will: which is to be vnderstanded not onely of the godly, but also of the vngodly. For although of themselves they haue prauity and corruption, yet God vseth them as an instrument of his counsell. Therefore the scriptures vse to call wicked men and cruell tyrans, the rodde of the Lord, his are, his sword, his hammer: for that they are moued by his prouidence and gouernement. For although they perpetually sinne and worke wickedly, yet can they not deceaue nor frustrate the counsell of God. For so Judas, being so sore infected with couetousnes, that he woulde do any thing for gain sake, by the preparacion of God was the instrument to accomplish that actiō before appointed, wherby Christ was deliuered vnto the Jewes for our saluation: and therfore he mought be called a vessell of wrath prepared to destruction. That preparacion although it be of God in that maner whiche we haue now declared: (for he reiecteth euen from eternally, and after ward, the merites of men so requiring, he maketh blinde and hardeneth) yet because that men reiecte of God haue in themselves corruption and vice, therefore Paul simply sayth, that those vessels are prepared to destruction, making no mencion at al of him that prepareth them: for they may also be counted no les to be prepared of themselves then of God. Howbeit afterwarde when he entreated of election, for that we haue in our selues no groundes of piety, therefore Paul expessedly named God: Which vessels God (saith he) hath prepared. Wherefore as farre as we can gather by this kinde of speache, all men are the vessels of God: but they are so distinguished, that some are vessels of wrath, and some of mercy, as God sheweth forth and declareth his proprieties in them: for other wise of themselves owne nature they are not distinguished the one from the other. For some for this cause onely excell other some, for that they are elected, and haue obteyned mercy, when as others are ouerhipped, and reiecte. And God would haue this diuersity of vessels to be, for that he coulde not in one onely kinde declare his excellency, and that cometh to passe chiefly by reason of the imbecillitie of our vnderstanding: which selfe thing we see to happen in the knowledge of thinges natural. We al wonder at the light of the Sonne: but doubtles his brightnes should not seeme so notable, if al other thinges should shine as bright as it. For by comparing it with other starres which shine more obscurely, the greatnes of the lighte thereof is the better known: whiche yet is made muche more manifest by the darkenes of the night. So the mercy and goodnes of God towarde the elect is manifestly known, when it is considered as it is communicated by vnlike degrees: but then at the length shineth it forth most brightly, when we referre our eyes to the condemnation of the vngodly. For thereby we see how gentle and louing God hath bene towarde vs, which hath not suffred vs to be perpetually in the like calamitie. And God would haue this knowledge of his goodnes to be amongst vs, not that there by any felicity should redounde vnto him, but that we being stirred by the mediation of this so great mercy of God towarde vs, & geuing thanks vnto him for the same, mought the easlier be brought vnto him. Farther this is to be noted, that Augustine in his booke de nuptiis & concupiscentia to Valerius, by

C.C.J.

this

Vessels signifie instrumentes.

A vessell of election.

In what sort God vseth such men. God vseth also wicked men.

An example of Judas.

There is mention made of god in the vessels of mercy, and not in the vessels of destruction. Why they are called vessels of wrath and of mercy.

God for our sakes wold haue this difference of vessels to be

Note an argument of the Pelagians.

Augustines answer.

The wicked also will they or nill, do seruice vnto the will of God. The argument of the Pelagians is made against Paul

Why God createth men whom he knoweth shalbe damned.

How God sheweth his power in punishing the wicked. What moued the holy prophets to pray vnto God to destroy the wicked. The vehemency of the wordes of Paul.

The wrath of God.

Children of wrath, and vessels of wrath.

this sentence of Paul (wherein he affirmeth, that all men are the vessels of God, & whether they be of the elect or of y<sup>e</sup> reprobate, they do seruice vnto his will) maketh answer to the Pelagians. For amongst other reasons whereby they denied original sinne, this reason also was one, that God when he createth men (as the Catholics say) obnoxious vnto this crime, may seeme to create the for the deuill. For all as many as are infected with any spot of sinne, are without all doubt the bondslaves of Satan. But Augustine answereth them after this manner. That God at the beginning made the first parentes, innocents, and obnoxious vnto no sinne. But afterward when they had fallen, his will was that other men should issue out of their stocke, and would not create a new masse or lombe whereout to produce them. Wherefore he createth men which according to their nature are good: but the sinne wherewith they are born, he made not, but found it being before in the masse or lombe: and yet can it not therefore be sayd, that he created men for the deuill. For the wicked and reprobate, although they geue themselves to prauitye and wickednes, yet will they or nill they, do seruice vnto the counsell of God. Yea neyther can the Deuill hymselfe eschew, but that he also ministereth vnto God: whyche thyng Paule moste playnely declareth, when he ascribeth vnto God the vessels not onely of mercye, but also of wrath. Wherefore let them moue this question (saith Augustine) not vnto vs, but vnto Paul. For he sayth, that God, as doth the potter, maketh some vessels to honour, and other some to contumelye. Neither doth he for anye other cause call the reprobate, vessels of wrathe, but for that they are the instrumentes of God. Wherefore seeinge that God vseth at his pleasure the wickednes both of these menne and also of the deuill, whose seruantes they are, he oughte not therefore to be sayde to create wicked menne rather for an other, then for hymselfe. And euen this selfe same may be answered vnto those which vse to enquire, why God will create men whome he knoweth shalbe damned: namely, for that he hath decreed to vse their malice, which malice yet he hymselfe made not. And God is sayde to shew forth his power vpon the vessels of wrath, when he plageth them and punisheth them, for that then he doth not seeme to winke at sinnes. For the wicked become at the length so wanton and so vnbzielded, that they seme after a sort to deride God: and God might easely seme vnto the weaker sort, to geue place vnto the furiousnes of the wicked, if he should not punish their sinnes. The Prophets hauing hereunto a respect, oftentimes in the scriptures pray vnto God to destroy the wicked, and not to suffer their wicked fates to be any longer unpunished, least the weaker sort should be offeended, and the wicked should be made more insolent. For holy men saw, that by the declaration of the iudgements of God many sometimes repented, and the weaker sort standing in a doubt were strengthened, and by that reuenging power and vengeance the name of God was made more illustrate. This place of Paul is handled with wordes so notable and of such greate signification, that nothing could with so great briesenes be spoken more vehemently, or with more efficacy. For here thou hast the power and wrath of God declared, and that by his long suffering and patience. Thou hast also vessels of wrath prepared to destruction: and thou hast vessels of mercye which are prepared to glory, that in them might be shewed forth the riches of the glory of God. And all these thinges are so warily taught of the holy ghost, that of the consideration of them we may gather greate edification. But whē we heare that mention is made of the wrath of God, we must not thinke that that wrath is such an affect whereby God is troubled: for God is alwayes pacified and quiet. But by this word are declared the effects of wrath: for God when he punisheth doth that which angry men are wont to do, namely, to avenge iniury and dispite done vnto them. And by such vengeance he sheweth forth and declareth his power: for that he subdueth men rebellious and obstinate, yea euen against their willes. This is also to be noted, that the wicked are in the scriptures called not only vessels of wrath, but also children of wrath: in which kinds of speach one and the selfe same thing in a manner is signified. Howbeit sometimes it happeneth, that of certayne vessels of wrath are made vessels of mercye, although Paul at this present spake not of those. For here he entreateth of them only, which by eternall destruction shalbe instruments of the the wrath of God. For in this place is entreated of predestination and reprobation, which are fixed and unchangeable. And God is sayd, to prepare vessels of mercy: by which word is signified, that those whom God electeth, are of their own nature not one whit better then others: for the thinges that are prepared, are not of themselves apt: And therefore they haue nede of a certaine aptacion. Hereout may be gathered a reason against merits: for if of our selues we be not apt, but must nedes haue God to prepare vs, no man can by right ascribe vnto himselfe that which he doth vprightly. This kind of speech moreover serueth not a litle to expresse the free goodnes of God towards the elect. For he doth not only geue vnto them eternall life, but also prepareth them vnto it. We are admonished also, that as often as we see the wicked which presently flourish in riches, and fauor, to be depriued and spoyled of their riches and dignities, we attribute not that to chance, or to men, or to vnwarenes, but rather to his power and auenging iustice of God. Farther this is to be noted, that the Apostle sayth, that God with great lenity suffereth the vessels of wrath, and therefore let vs apply our selues to imitate him. For if he being so mighty, do not straight way auenge, it is vnseemly, that we being inferior to him should seeke to auenge euery trifling iniury, and that euen as soone as we can. This doubtles is not to imitate our heauenly father, who maketh his Sunne to shine vpon the good and vpon the euill: & rayneth vpon the iust, & vpon the vniust. It is the duty of Christians to follow the doctrine of Christ. But Christ sayth: Be ye perfect, as your heauenly father is perfect. Of this goodnes of God neither were the Ethnikes doubtles ignorant: but haue set it forth vnto vs to imitate. For Cleanthes the philosopher, being vpon a stage, and wonderfully scoffed at by a certayne Poet, tooke it so patiently, that he not so much as once changed his countenance. Afterward when the Poet acknowledged his fault, & desired pardon, Cleanthes answered, that a man which is a philosopher ought not to be moued, when as the Gods themselves being mocked & had in derision of the Poets, do yet not with standing so gently & patiently suffer it. But whereas Paul saith, that God would not only declare his glory, but also his riches, thereby he signifieth his vnmeasurable abundance, & incredible might of his goodnes of God towards the elect. Vpon which selfe same consideration in an other place he calleth God, rich in mercy, & before in this selfe same epistle he sayd, Dost thou despise the riches of his goodnes, and patience, and longe suffering? And a litle afterward he crieth out, O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God. For so great is the abundance of the mercy and goodnes which God vseth towards his, that he seemeth vnto himselfe neuer to haue done inough in adorning them: from whiche persecution we are so farre distant, that when we bestow euen but a light duty vpon our brethren, we beginne straight way to wane weary. And here vnder the name of glory we thinketh we may by the figure Metonymia, vnderstand goodnes. For of his declaration of goodnes springeth glory. Origen sayth, that God sheweth forth his lenity or patience: when he differeth to take vengeance of the sinnes of the wicked: but sheweth forth his power when at the length he punisheth them. By vessels of mercy he vnderstandeth those which haue made themselves cleane from filthynes. But as we haue taught, no man can make himselfe cleane, but he vnto whom God geueth that grace. Wherefore seeing that this making cleane dependeth of the mercy of God, it can not be the cause, why we should be vessels of mercy. Origen addeth, that these vessels can not be prepared to glory by a grace without reason, or coming by chance: but when they haue cleansed themselves from filthynes. But as we haue said, this cleansing can not be said to be the cause of grace: for it is geuen freely: neither can it be the cause of mercy: for it is bestowed vpon vs, before any thing be done of vs, namely, before the foundations of the world were layd. Neither also though we attayne not vnto grace by our merites, ought that grace therefore seme to be without reason. For it issueth from the most high wisdom of God: which hath in it reasons sufficient: neither ought those reasons to be altered by things created: yea neither can it be

EE. y.

said

Not all the vessels of wrath, and children of wrath are to be considered alike. Against merits.

The goodness of God expressed. The auenging power of God is to be weighed in the scale of the wicked.

A metaphor taken of riches.

The glory of God is taken for goodness.

Our cleansing is not the cause of grace, or of election. The grace of God is not without reason, though it depend not of our merites.

The grace of God commeth not by chaunce.
As touching God, nothing is done by chaunce or fortune.

A simil-
tude.

In what sence wrath
is not strange fro
God.

Faith profiteth more
then feare.
An answer of a philosopher.

The patience of God
which profiteth not
the wicked,
profiteth
the elect.

said to come by chance. For, as the philosophers teach, those things come by chance, which happen besides purpose and deliberation: but soasmuch as God bringeth to passe all thinges according to his counsell and will, we ought not to thinke that he doth any thing rashely, or by chance. And vnto whomsoever he geueth grace he geueth it by his eternall purpose, and decree. But if Origen in thus writing, haue respect vnto vs, to whome grace is geuen, and will haue grace to come by chance, for that grace is not geuen vnto all men, but is bestowed vpon them which deserue it not, and thynke not of it, therein I will not much contende wyth hym. For selue are elected, as the Lord sayth, neither was any of vs the cause of his owne election. And therefore in the scriptures the iust are called the lot of God. And when I consider of this matter, I call to mynde a sentence of Plutarch, which he bringeth out of Plato, namely, that y life of men is like to those which play at dise. For first it is required, that they haue good happe or lucke in their casting: & the whatsoeuer shal chace to vse it warely. So vnto vs for y obtain- ment of eternall life, is first necessary felicity, that we be in the roule and number of the elect, and that we be called and iustified by grace, and by the spirit of Christ. And after that we haue obtayned these thinges, we must with great industry, care fulnes, and warines excercise our selues, and wisely worke together with God. Origene addeth, that he wondreth at, in what maner God will declare his wrath: when as wrath is farre straunge from him, & goodnes is most nigh vnto his nature. For Dauid saith, how great is the multitude of thy sweetnes, O Lord? Which thou hast hidden in them that feare thee? Nowbeit touching this matter he bringeth this reason, for that it is expedient for vs to be vnder the feare of wrath, least through our frailenes we should decline to synne: and through hope of the bountefulnes of God we should be made loose and become negligente. But if by the wrath of God we vnderstand his power whereby he ministreth iustice, & auengeth sinnes, I do not thinke y that wrath, is strange fro God, but y which he citeth out of Dauid: I do not so take, as though he ment that God hideth all his goodnes, for we seele a great part therof yea also euen whilest we liue here. But I thinke that Dauid speaketh of that goodnes, whiche a- bideth vs in an other life. And after this manner as the goodnes of God is hidden, so are also the last punishments of the dāned hidde: so that in this thing there is no difference at all. I confesse indeede, y in the elect is y feare of God: but I deny that that feare is more profitable then faith, which herein consisteth, that we embrace the goodnes of God offred in the promises of God. A certaine philosopher when it was laid vnto him as a fault, that he was fearefull. For that cause (sayd he) sinne I the lesse. Which saying we may inuert, and say, the more faith and hope we haue, so much the lesse we sinne. Origen also thinketh, that the riches of the glozy of God are made known, when those which are condemned of men are taken of God. For so in the olde time the nation of the Jewes was abiect and vile, so that it was op- pressed with a most greuous kinde of seruitude. So the Ethnikes, althoughe they were ouerwhelmed with idolatry and infinite other vices, yet were they called vn to Christ. But we ought to consider, that here is not entreated onely of some vni- uersall people, but those thinges which are here spoken may be applied vnto every particuler man. Moreouer Paul meaneth, that by the vengeaunce which is taken vpon the vessels of wrath, are declared the riches of his glozye vpon the vessels of mercy. Neither seemeth he at this present to entreat of that assumption or taking, whiche is made by election, but of the execution of predestination. The Græke Scholies say, that of God are made vessels of wrath, thorough faith which he fore- seeth, and vertues which shall follow. But we haue at large declared, that none of those thinges are the causes of the mercye of God, but rather the effectes thereof. Ambrose in this place first weigheth, what this signifieth, to be vessels prepared to destruction. And this he saith God doth, When with lenity and long suffring he differ- reth punishments: for by that meanes men are made the les excusable. And God in this wayting is sayd to vse patience, for that he foreseeeth that they shall not be conuerted. And it seemeth a great patience, if thou wayte for that a long time, which thou knowest shall not come to passe. And yet doth not God this in vaine. For, that space whiche is geuen, al- though though it profite not the wicked; yet it profiteth the elect. For they by their example come to amendement. Whereby it is manifest, that those wordes, Prepared to destruction; Ambrose referreth vnto God: when as yet in very dede they may be applied vnto me which through theyr vitiate nature, & corrupt inclination are of their own accord apte inough to destruction. Although as I haue before taughte the selfe same thinge may be attributed vnto God. Farther Ambrose interpreteth the riches of glory, to be that dignity, which we shall haue in eternall felicity. Which dignity although I know right well shalbe a most full declaration of the mercy of God, yet I do not thinke that this sentence of Paul is to be contracted vnto it. For the mercy of God towarde the elect is aboutiantly declared, both when they are called, and when they are iustified, and when they lead an holy life. Moreover, to prepare, he thinketh, is to foreknowe what manner one euerie man shalbe. But if he plucke away this foreknowledge from the good pleasure and purpose of God, & fro that mercy which God in electing followeth, I can by no meanes assent vnto hym. For preparation, signifieth, the gifts which are bestowed vpon the elect. Chrysostome also at large entreateth of this place: & by the example of Pharaos declareth who are vessels of wrath. For he thinketh, y Pharaos was through his owne default called a vessel of wrath, for that through his hardenes of harte and obstinacy he alwayes more and more kindled the wyathe of God againste himselfe. If by the wrath of God we vnderstand the last effect thereof: namely, the punishment of eternall damnation, that is true whiche Chrysostome saith. For euerie wicked man kindleth against himselfe continually by committing of sinne. But if we thus interpretate the wrath of God, that God euen from the beginninge woulde not on some haue mercy, and that he preserving some he wuld ouerhip Pharaos with many others: that doubtles came not of themselves. For this is done by the mere purpose and free will of God: namely, not of workes, but of him that calleth to the ende election might abide according to purpose. Therefore was it said, Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated. Again, He hath mercy on who he will, & who he will he hardeneth, as Paul before taught. Chrysostome addeth, Eue as Pharaos omitted nothing which might serue to his owne destruction: so God left nothing vndone which might serue to his correction. The first part I confesse, namely, that all thinges which Pharaos did, forasmuch as they were sinnes, helped forward his damnation. But that God omitted nothing which mought serue to his saluation I admitte not. For he abused hym not in such sorte as was necessary to saluation: although all those thinges whiche God did towarde Pharaos were suche, that vnles they had lighted vpon a minde hardened, they might haue muche furthered hym to saluation. But forasmuche as God softened not his hart, neither toke away his hardenes (which vnles he do, no man can be saued) he cannot be sayd, to haue done all thinges which mought conduce to his saluation. He addeth, God suffered him with much lenity to the end to bring him to repentaunce: which thing vnles he so intended, he woulde not so long time haue suffered him. I graunt indeede, that those thinges which the Lord did, mought be folkes of his will tending to saluation: and therfore they are to be referred to the wil of the signe: but not vnto the will of efficacy, wherof we at this present speake. For if God by this kinde of wil, wuld haue brought hym to repentaunce, he had without all doubt repented. For he made all thinges which he wuld, both in heauen, and in earth, and no man resisteth his wil. Yea rather God to this end rayled hym vp, to declare in him his power. The thinges which follow in Chrysostome are diligently to be noted. For he saith, When Paul saith, Which he hath prepared to glory, he doth not to this ende so say, that he will haue all thinges to be of God. For if it were so, there should nothing let, but that all men should be saued. Whereas Chrysostome denieth that all thinges are of God, y is not to be graunted. For if there be nothing which is ours, and we haue nothing which we haue not receaued of God, it followeth of necessity that all thinges are of God. And the argument which he vseth is weak: for they which attribute all whole to God, do not yet for all that graunte, that all

God made not soft the hart of Pharaos, neither toke he away his hardenes.

If God had utterly willed that Pharaos should repent, it had vndoubtedly ben done.

All thinges are of God which serue to saluation

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

Although al
whole be of God, yet do we not all obtaine sal-
uation.

Our goodnes is not proper vn-
to vs.

Chrysostom
putteth that which is in vs to be very little.

Men are not to be counted as stocks and idle persons.
Men can do nothing
to obteyne
the election
of God.

Pharao
had much lesse at gods
hand, then the vessels of mercy
haue.

men shalbe saued. For that whole which is attributed vnto God, they deny is ditributed vnto all seuerally. But therefore Chrysostome thoughte his consequence to be good, for that he beleued that the grace of God is equally geuen vnto all men, & that it lieth in our power, either to reiect it, or to admitte it. But we haue before at large confuted that sentence. Therefore we affirme that all whole is of God: & yet doth it not thereof follow, that all men shall obtaine saluation. But after ward he moze plainely uttereth himselfe, for he saith: Euen as Pharao was through his owne proper iniquity made a vessel of wrath, so are these through theyr own proper good- nes made vessels of mercy. These things are not altogether consonant vnto the truth.
For although iniquitie be proper vnto me (for soasmuch as they are concealed & borne therein, there is no neede that it should be from any els where infused into them) yet our goodnes cannot be sayd to be proper vnto vs. For vnto the Corinth. it is witten, that Christ is made vnto vs redemption, righteousness, wisdom, and san- ctification. If we haue righteousness of our selues & proper vnto vs, hath not Christ then died in vaine? Doubtles I am wont sometimes to wonder, how these fathers, when as sometimes they wrote excellently well touching the grace of God and his mercy, yet notwithstanding after ward somewhere they burst forth into these sayings, whereby sound doctrine is wonderfully corrupted. But for that this father, being otherwise excellently well learned, saw that this terte of Paul maketh against this sentence, for Paul calleth the elect the vessels of mercy, he saith: Although the better parte be of God, yet they theselues haue brought wyth them a certain modicum.
And therefore the Apostle calleth them not either vessels of faith, or vessels of vertues, but vessels of mercy. And in this manner he confesseth, y it may be said to be al whole of God, for y that which we bring is a very smal thing if it be copared with y which we haue at Gods hand. But of this matter we haue before spokē at large, whē we declared these wordes: It is not of him that willet, nor of him that runeth, but of God that hath mercy. This thing only wil we now adde, that vnto vs, for teaching this doctrine, is vniustly objected of some, that thereof followeth that me ought to do nothing, but only ought to be stocks and stones: which thinges doubtles are very wide from our doctrine. For we say that men when they repent, do geue assent vnto the wordes of God, do long, wish and desire saluation. But these thinges we say are effectes of his mercy, whose vessels they are already made: neither were they able to do any thing whereby we obteyne the first election of God. But these thinges which follow in Chrysostome are yet farre moze harder.
For he sayth, That God, as much as lay in him, had mercy also on Pharao: and that he was not saued, the same came wholly through his owne will: so that that God did no lesse vnto hym, then he did vnto others which were saued. But it is one thing that God adorned Pharao with some giftes: and an other thing to haue mercy vpon him, as Paul in this place speaketh of mercy. For here is entreated of the summe and ground of election, when it is witten, He hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. But we doubt not, but that it is the gift of God, that a man should be admonished by wordes, and should be any while tollerated in his wickednes. And yet are not they which are so admonished and tollerated alwayes to be nombred amongst the elect, amongst those in especiall, which by predestination obteyne mercy. Farther how can it be true, that Pharao had nothing les at Gods hand then the vessels of mercy haue? When as God softened not his hart, neither brake that hardening, neyther changed him to a better estate? For, that all these thinges are geuen vnto the elect, and vnto those whome he will haue to be saued, no man can deny. These things I thought good therefore the moze at large to reherse, to geue you to vnderstand, what the fathers thought touching this question, chiefly by theyr own writings: and that by the berpe wordes of of the Apostle it might appeare playne, how farre they strayed from the scope and native sence of the wordes.

Euen vs whome he hath called, not only of the Jewes, but also of the Gentiles. As he sayth also in Osea: I will call them my people, which were not my people: and her, beloued, which was not beloued. And it shall be in the place where it was sayd vnto them: We are not my people, that there they shalbe called the children of the liuing God.
of

Euen vs vvhome he hath called. ] Now is dissolued the principall poynt of the question which the Apostle hath hether to entreated of. And that the methode of this question may yet the better be perceaued, it shal be good somewhat more depely to consider of it. The Apostle had now concluded, that righteousness cometh not of workes, but of fayth. Of this sentence seemed to folow two absurdities, the one was, that the promises of God wherein he bound himselfe vnto the posterity of Abraham seemed, so; that the Jewes relected Christ and his doctrine, to be made voyde: the other was that those workes touching ceremonies and sacrifices, which seemed so goodly to shew, are nothing worth before God. But this latter question shall afterward be entreated of in the 10. chapter. Touching the first, the Apostle hath here at large entreated, and hath declared that the promises are not made of none effect, although there were many of the Jewes which were not saved. For although the promises are set forth indefinitely and vniuersally, yet are they not of efficacy but only in the elect. God promised salvation vnto the posterity of Abraham. But that was to be vnderstanded of that posterity which should haue election ioyned with it. And that election he declareth to be free, and not bound vnto carnal propagation. For Ismaell and Esau were relected, who yet as touching flesh pertained to the posterity of Abraham. And that the Apostle might the more confirme this liberty of the election of God, he dischargeth it also fro al respect of workes. And therfore he thus writeth of those twines: Which being not yet born, & whē they had done nether good nor euil, it was said of the, Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated: not of workes, but of him that calleth: That election mought abide according to purpose. And this discourse the Apostle hath hitherto vled. Now that he hath thus proued and established this liberty of election, he declareth how it contayned not it selfe amongst the Jewes only, but also spread abroad vnto the Gentiles: yea it toke greater frute amongst the Gentiles then it did amongst the Jewes. Which thing soasmuch as it was odious to be spoken, and mought easely offend the Jewes, the Apostle would not pronounce it vnder his own person, but thought it good rather to vse the oracles of the prophetes, which most manifestly foresold that this thing should so come to passe. By this methode being, as I suppose, playne and perspicuous, it manifestly appeareth, that the Apostle at the beginning of this chapter began not to entreate of the calling of the Gentiles, as many thinke. For this thing only he thought, that the promises of God are not made voyde, although many of the Jewes be condemned: so; that the execution of the promises depēdeth of the free election of God. Now from this liberty of the election of God, which is bound neither to blood nor to workes, the Apostle notably descendeth to the calling of the Gentiles. Wherefore he sayth, Vvhome he hath called, not only of the Jewes, but also of the Gentiles. ] In some Greke booke is read ἡμῶν, that is, vs: so that the relative οὗ that is, whome must be referred to the pronome, so; if this pronome should wante, it mought seme, that the Apostle kept not the gender of the antecedent. For other wise it seemeth that he should rather haue sayd ἐμῶν, then οὗ. For that ἐμῶν, that is, vessels, is in the neuter gender. But in that he vseth a relative of the masculine gender, he passeth from the metaphore vnto the thing it selfe which was entreated of; namely, vnto men that are called, as wel Gentiles, as Jewes. When he sayth vvhome he hath called, by the effectes he declareth, that predestination pertayneth not only to the Jewes, but also to the Gentiles. By vocation in this place I vnderstand that calling whiche is of efficacy, whiche Augustine after

The methode of the question, & also of the solution.

The Apostle in the beginning of this chapter began not to entreat of the calling of the Gentiles.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the Vocation

of efficacy is an effect
of predesti-
nation.
We must pronounce nothing touching prede-
stinatio, but so far forth as it uttereth it selfe
by the effectes.

Pauls phrase calleth, According to purpose: namely, that vocation whereby the elect are drawen vnto saluatio. And that is an effect of the predestination of God. For otherwise the common vocation is set forth also vnto the reprobate: and therefore it can not be an assured signe of election. Wherefore we are admonished not to take vpon vs to pronounce any thing of the predestination of God, but so farre forth as it uttereth it selfe by the effectes. For so Paul heare proueth that the Gentiles pertaine to election, for that they are called together with the Iewes vnto Christ. But this we ought to note, that Paul at the beginning to put forth the matter more gently, spake not altogether so much as he would afterward proue. For he proueth that few of the Iewes were called, and that by a testimony of Esay. But first he dispatcheth y<sup>e</sup> which he first pronounced: namely, that the Gentiles should be called vnto Christ. And of that thing he reciteth a testimony of Osea, saying: As he sayth in Osea. By these wordes he declareth that God gaue this oracle, and that by Osea the prophet. And he alludeth to the beginning of the prophecy of Osea: where it is thus written, The beginning where in the Lord spake in Osea.

I will call them my people, which were not my people, and her my beloued, which was not my beloued. And it shal be in the place, where it was sayd vnto them, Ye are not my people; that there they shal be called the children of the liuing God. ] How these wordes may be applied to the Gentiles, the interpreters take greate paynes. But this seemeth to be the opinion of the soundest sort of expositors, as well of the old writers, as also of the new. For as much as the Iewes, being by reason of theyr idolatry and other theyr wicked ades put from the dignity of being the people of God, are yet notwithstanding sayd that they shal be agayne restored into the selfe same estate, and shal be made partakers of the mercy of God, it seemeth not strange, that the Gentiles also which before were, not the people of God, should be admitted to the selfe same dignity. For the Israelites being by reason of theyr impiety reiecte of God, were now nothing els but Gentiles. And soasmuch as they which are called, are both by the Prophet and also by the Apostle said, not to be the people of God, and to be strangers from mercy, it playnly appeareth, what our life, and what our workes were, before we were called to God. Wherefore they are worthely to be reprobued, which as firme that men euen before iustification are after a sort iust, and do by theyr workes deserue of congruity (as they vse to speake) to be iustified. But as touching the prophecy of the Prophet, that it may the better be vnderstanded, I will as briefly as I can comprehend the whole summe thereof. God would haue the Israelites admonished by Osea both of the greate wickednes of theyr idolatrye, which they committed, and also of the punishments whiche God would sende vpon them: and to the ende they might the more thoroughly be persued, he would not vse vnto them a simple kinde of speech, but a wayghtye and figuratiue kinde of speech. For God commaunded the Prophet to take to wife an harlot, and to beget of her children of whoredome. By that face would God teach, that he had ioyned vnto himselfe as a wife that nation of the Iewes: when yet not withstanding she was euen from the beginning an harlot. For both the parentes of Abraham were idolaters in Chaldea, and also the elders of the Israelites had with most filthy supersticion serued in Egypt: and yet did the Lord boughsafe to take them, and to count them for his. Farther out of that sinagoge also were borne children geuen to fornication, who beyond all measure worshipped idols. Wherefore God decreed to auenge so great iniury, which they had recompensed him with for so many, and so great benefitts. And therefore God commaunded the first sonne of Osea, to be named Israhel, which word signifieth the seede of God: but with a farre other etimology or derination, then that whereby y<sup>e</sup> Iewes so greatly boasted, that they were the seede of God. For God in that place by the name of that sonne would signify, that the Iewes should like seede sowne be dispersed, and sowed abrode throughout the whole world. For he had appointed to ouerthrow

They
which are called, were before strangers from God.
Strangers
from God
can haue no good wor-
kes.
Against me-rite of con-
gruities.
A place of
vile.

uerthow the kingdome of the ten tribes: ouer whome Iehu was king. And to the end God would the more declare the greatnes of his wrath, he commaunded the daughter which was after ward bozne to be named Lorachamah, for that she had not obtayned mercy. And the sonne that was last bozne he willed to be called Lo-am, that is, not my people. These names were signes that that people should be reiecte, & that so that they should no more be the people of God, neither should they haue the fruition of the benefit of his mercy: by which punishment the Iewes were vtterly made equall with the Gentils. Wherefore when as the Prophet after ward promisseth, that they shalbe called the people of God, and shalbe partakers of his mercy, there is nothing to let, but that also y<sup>e</sup> selfe same benefit mought be bestowed also vpon the Gentiles: for they also at that tyme were not the people of God. Neither left the Prophet vnspoken of, whence this reconciliation should come: namely, hereof, for that all they which should be called home agayne should take vpon them one name, namely Christ Iesus, the Messias and Sauioz. And this instauration began then to take place, when the people were brought home agayne from captiuitie, in which thing is to be considered not only the ciuill benefit of the bodics: but much more that they were brought agayne to restore the Church, and to renew the worshipping of God, wherby true piety might be nourished and encrease: all which things are herein most of all performed, in that many are dayly called vnto Christ. Paul in this place ioyneth together two testimonies: the one out of the first chapter of Osea: the other out of the second: and that which is put first, is taken out of the second chapter. The words in Hebzeu are thus, Verachamahthi eth lorachamah veamarti loimmah Iemaa atha, that is I will haue mercy on her, which obteyned not mercy, and I will say to it which was not my people, thou art my people. The other testimony out of the first chap. where it is thus written, Vehaiah bimcom aschar iaamar lahem lohimmi athem vehamar laheni Bene el chai, that is, And it shalbe in the place, where it was sayd vnto them, ye are not my people, there they shalbe called the sonnes of the liuing God. When as God calleth the people of Israell, not his people, he declareth, what might be vrayned vnto them, when they waxed insolent against the Gentles, which were called vnto Christ (for they said that they were strangers from God) for the selfe same thing mought be replied against them. For God himself by the Prophet so pronounceth of them. Of this oracle the Apostle concludeth, that it ought not to seme a thing new or vnseemly, that the Gentiles should pertaine to election, and should be made partakers of the mercy and vocation of God. For, that which seemed to be a let that it should so come to passe, was, as the Prophet testifieth common to the Iewes and to the Gentles. And if a man diligently weigh the sence of these two places, he shall see (which thing oftentimes happeneth in the Prophets) that God setteth before their eyes the sinne, wherewith the Israelites were infected, namely, idolatry: after that he declareth the punishment which he would inflict vpon them, but least they should begin to dispayze, he addeth one only remedy, namely, our Sauioz and Messias so long before waited for. And this being thus declared and ordered, straight way followeth that which the Apostle here teacheth that forasmuch as both the Iewes and the Gentles are in perdition and destruction, out of ech people should rise vp the Church, which is the body of the members of Christ. For ech of them were like a farre of from saluation. But it may seme wonderfull, how the Apostle calleth them, not beloued, which by conuersion are drawe vnto Christ: for if before they were called they pertayned vnto electio, how could they be called, not beloued? But this we ought to know, y<sup>e</sup> although the scripture speake sometymes accordyng to the determination of predestination, and calleth them the sonnes of God, which are not yet conuerted to God, (for so Iohn writeth, that the sonnes which were dispersed might be gathered together: in whiche place the Gentiles not yet regenerate are called the sonnes of God) yet oftentimes it speaketh contrariwise of men accordyng to their present estate: as here we see the Apostle doth: and as he doth to the Ephesians the second chapter

Names were signes
of the earnest
to come.

A place of Ose.

How these things may be applied to the Gentiles

The scripture spea-
keth two maner of wayes of the predesti-
nate.

What are the duties of them that are made the people of God.

The scriptures plainly testifie
the calling
the Gentiles.

That place of Ose why it can not be vnderstan-
ded of the Jewes.

chapter, where he sayth that they were once aleants from God, strangers for the testaments: and a litle before, children of wrath. Neither is it a small dignity to be no-bized amongst the people of God: for it herein consisteth, that we beleue in God: and haue our sayth sealed with the sacraments: and that we publicly pro-fesse that which we beleue: and publicly and priuately inuocate and worship our God: and so lyue as his word prescribeth vs, and as his spirite suggesteth vs. The latine interpreter hath, Et non misericordiam consecutam, misericordi-am consecutam: that is, And here which had not obtayned mercy, to haue obtained mercy. But in Greke it is read, ἡ γὰρ χάρις and ὅτι ἡ χάρις, that is, Beloved and not beloved. Although Ierome expounding this place sayth, that in some bookes it was οὐκ ἡ χάρις, that is, not hauing obtained mercy and he alloweth this reading better then the other, as more agreeable vnto the meaning of the Prophet. And peradventure it happened, that some writer, considering this di-uersity of readings thought he would kepe still each reading in the Latin translation: When as Paul vsed only one. And how great a dignity it is, wherunto the Prophet and Paul say, that the elect are exalted, to be made the people of God, John declareth in the beginning of his Gospell. He gaue (saith he) vnto them power to be made the sonnes of God, namely vnto them which are borne of God, and haue receaued Christ. Peter also in his epistle had a respect vnto this oracle of Ose. For he sayth, y we of such which were not his people are made his people: and haue now obtained mercy, which were cleane voyde of mercy.
But Origen objecteth, that the Iewes peradventure in this place will say, that these things pertaine vnto them only: for in the holy scriptures it can not easely be shewed, that the Ethnikes were called, not his people: and that they should one day be made the people of God. Vnto this objection he thus maketh answer, God speaketh not vnto rocks or stones, but vnto the hartes and consciences of men. Therefore they which worke wickedly, and liue noughtely, wyll they or nill they, haue of their conscience and spirite, that they are strangers from God, and haue departed from hym: as contrariwise, when they beginne to amend themselues, and to liue holily, they beare in their hart, that they are the people of God, and that they are come to hym, and do pertaine vnto hym. But if the Iewes would object these thinges vnto vs, we ought not therefore to go fro this ankerhold, as though the vocation of the Gentiles were not plainly inough testified by the scriptures: for they in many places abundantly teach both, namely, y the Gentiles of their owne nature are strangers fro God, & also that by the grace of Christ they should succede in the place of the Iewes: of which matter we will speake more at large afterward. It is true in dede which Origen sayth, that those testimonies of the scriptures little profit vs, vnles the spirite speake inwardly within our mynde, and testify that we are the sonnes of God.
Chrysostome agreeth with this interpretacion which we haue cited: and sayth that the Iewes, for that by reason of their sinnes they were reiected, were made not the people of God, and so became equall with the Gentiles. But he sayth it ma-keth no matter that the Iewes were newly reiected, when as the Gentiles neuer at any time were the people of God: for the Iewes at the length fell into the selfe same estate. All these thinges are exceedingly wel to be liked, although when I diligently weigh that place of Ose, I see that he speaketh onely of the kingdome of the ten tribes, yea he excepteth the kingdome of Iuda by name. Wherefore seeing that the prophet prophesieth, that that people of the ten tribes shoulde be brought to that poynt, that it shoulde be, not the people of God, and forasmuch as he agayne addeth that the selfe same people shoulde agayne be called, the people of God, it is manifest, that these thinges can not altogether be vnderstanded of the Israelites. For those ten tribes were neuer restored fro that captiuitie of y Assirians. For they which in the tyme of Nehemias and Esdras returned, pertayned vnto the tribes of Iuda & of Benjamin, and partly also to the tribe of Leui, which dwelt scatredly in y lots of these tribes. Wherefore it seemeth y Paul toke y Prophet in this sence, that he vnderstode y not only y Iewes shoulde be conuerted vnto

unto Christ, but also the Gentiles. Although it may be, that they which are blind amongst the Jewes, shal in the last time be called home to y<sup>e</sup> Church of Christ: as we shal straight way heare in the 11. chapter. Now followeth, forasmuche as the conuersion of y<sup>e</sup> Gentiles is now proued by a testimony of Ose, to declare that which was the second part of the Apostles discourse, namely, that the number of the Jewes which should be saued should be small. And thys he proueth by an other Prophet.

Esay also crieth concerning Israell: Though the number of the children of Israell were as the sand of the sea, yet shall but a remnant be saued. For he wil consummate and make short his woord in righteousness: for the lord wil make short his woord in the earth. And as Esay sayd before, Except the lord of Sabaoth had left vs a seide, we had bene made as Sodom, & had bene like to Gomorrah.

Esay also crieth concerning Israell: Though the number of the children of Israell were as the sand of the sea, yet shall but a remnant be saued. ] He sayth y<sup>e</sup> Esay crieth, for that he speaketh playnly and distinctly: and when he bringeth him in thus crieng, he moueth the Jewes to attentiuenes, more diligently to harken vnto they<sup>r</sup> crier: but in the meane time he seemeth to haue had a respect vnto that which is written in Esay the 46. chapter, Cry out, cease not, as a trumpet lift vp thy voyce. The summe of this oracle is: Although by carnall propagation the people of the Jewes hath increased into such a multitude, that it may now be compared with the sand of the sea, yet shall few of them be deliuered. And this is vnderstanded partly of the time of Ezechias, wherein the whole kingdome of Iuda also (Jerusalem only excepted) was inuaded, and partly of the time of the captiuitie of Babilon, wherein many died, before power was geuen them to returne. Many of them also would not returne when they might, for that they now dwelt freely amongst the Babilonians: neither would they returne into Jewry to labours and pouerty: and for sake the goodes which they had gotten in Babilon. So also happened it in Christs time: for very few were saued, which few yet brought forth greate and most plentifull frutes: for as we rede in this prophesy, they made righteousness to overflow. For the Apostles although they were few, yet they preached Christ throughout the whole world, and that with such celerity, that Paul toward the end of this epistle, and vnto the Colossians sayth, that in his time the Gospel was in a maner euery where preached. Therefore the Prophet saith, that God had consummated, that is, had exceedingly diminished the number, and out of that multitude which was like the sand of the sea, had elected only a few. And this is to be noted, y<sup>e</sup> in this place Paul reasoneth of election by the effects, and by that, y<sup>e</sup> few of the Jewes were saued, proueth, that predestination pertayneth only to a few of them. These wordes are taken out of the 10. chapter of Esay: Ci im ijhich ammecha israhel, cechol haiom shear iaschus bo, Cillaion i haruts schoteph tledaka. Ci calah venechratsa, adonai ichouah tsebaoth ofeh bekereb col haarets. Whereas Esay sayth, in the midst of the whole earth, it is not to be vnderstanded generally, but only of the land of the Jewes. For the prophet speaketh of that land only: and Paul writeth of Israell. And this phrase is very much vsed amongst the prophetes. Which I therefore put you in minde of, for that I know there are some, which sometimes referre these wordes to the whole number of the saythfull: being in dede moued thereto by that sentence of Christ, Many are called, but few are elected. Which sentence, as it is most true, so is it not of necessity y<sup>e</sup> it should pertayn to this place. Paul saw, that these wordes of Esay are of great force to plucke away the mindes of men from the confidence in y<sup>e</sup> flesh, and in humane procreation. For by the is taught that of so greate a multitude of the children of Israell, which were like the sand of the sea, very few attained vnto saluation. And thinges which were the done were

Why Esay
is said to cry.

There were few of the Jewes converted vnto Christ, but those few were fruit-
full.

were not only shadowes and types of the Church of Christ, but also a certayne beginning and progresse therof. And as those thinges at that time were not obscure, so in the comming of Christ were they most euident. Paul followed the translation of the seuentie interpreters, that the Church of the Romanes, vnto whome he wrote, might vnderstand those thinges which he cited out of the Prophetes: but that the Seuentie added this greke woꝛde λόγος, that is, woꝛde, and yet obserue the Hebrew phrase. For with the Hebrewes, Dabar, which they turne vword, signifieth also a thing, or a matter. So we rede of the adultery of Dauid that the woꝛde of Vrias displeased God. And Moses sayth, Man liueth not by bread only, but also by every word which commeth out of the mouth of God: in which woꝛdes he signifieth that the power of God is not bound to thinges, but y<sup>e</sup> he can fede his, if he will, with any other thing, as well as with bread: and therefore it was not wonderfull though the Israelites were fed in the desert with Manna which fel from heauen. Wherefore the sence is, that God would make his woꝛd, that is, the matter of that people cut of, shorte, and extenuated, so that that so greate multitude should be brought vnto a small nombre. And this is it which Jeremy complayneth of, in his 8. chapter, and also Ezechiell in his 11. chapter. And Amos the prophet compareth the remnantes of the people of the Jewes with a young shepe deuoured of a lion: which when the shepeherd seeketh to deliuer can recover nothing but only a legge or an eare of it: so sayth he, when the Jewes shall be led away into captivity, a very small part of them shal retorne home again. In Hebrew it is writtē, A consumption made. Venehadtsah, which signifieth not only a thing lessened and cut of, but also a thing definitely appointed and determined, as though the sentence were alredy geue: which signification serueth very well to the purpose of the Apostle. For his meaning is to declare that this diminishing and reiection of the people, which God would bring to passe, depended of the appoynted purpose, and of predestination: not that the Jewes had not thorough theyr sinnes deserued to be reiected: but because all these thinges were appoynted by the sentence of election and reprobatio. For by these thinges as it were by the effectes Paul declareth, that few of the Jewes are elected, but many are reiected. Vnto this lessening & cutting of of the Israelites, Iohn Baptist seemeth to haue had a respect, when he sayd, That the are is put vnto the rote and that Christ hath his faune in his hand, to purge his wheat. And to this purpose Paul afterward sayth, That the remnantes shall be sauēd according to election thorough grace. Micheas also the prophet, saimeth God to be like one that gathereth grapes, who when he hath gathered his grapes leueth oftentimes certaine few clusters in the vineard. And Esay sayth, that the daughter of Jerusalem should be lefte, as a cottage in a vineard. And in the time of the floud only eight soules were left onliue, howbeit those few which were lefte brought forth incredible fruite. For euen as sedes, when they are few, do yet notwithstanding draw vnto them greate quantity of ioyce and moystnes of the earth, and conuert it into theyr owne nature, and for euery grayne render sometimes thirty, sometimes threescore, and sometimes an hundred: so that little flocke of Christ by theyr preaching conuerted vnto the Gospel great Churches of the Gentiles. And this is it which Osee the Prophet when he had entreated of the reiection of the people, sayd yet notwithstanding, that the nombre of it should be like the sand of the sea. Which selfe thing Jeremy prophesied in his 33. chapter, when he spake of the coneuant which should be renewed thorough Christ. For they which of Ethiopes were conuerted by the disciples of Christ, were made Israelites, for that they had Christ for theyr hed, and became his members, and liued by his spirite, and were made flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones. And of this thing Christ admonished vs, when he sayd, y<sup>e</sup> God could euen of stones rayse vp sons vnto Abraham. Neither ment Esay any thing els, when in this place he added, that righteousnes should ouerflow. Origen sayth, that the Prophet prophesied these thinges, for that he foresaw the infidelity of the Jewes, for which they should

Paul here
reasoneth of the effectes.

A simili-
tude.

The Gentiles conuer-
ted vnto Christ, are Israelites.

Should be reiected & therfore he thinketh that the prophet said, If thy people were as the sand of the sea, for that they by theyr sinnes had made themselves barren, and were unfruitful, as the sand is, out of which can nothing spring. But the multitude (he sayth) of the godly, which should come out of the seed of Abraham is compared with the starres, and not with the sand. It is true indeede that the Jewes were reiected by reason of theyr infidelity and wickednes. But if we wil attaine to the meaning of Paul, we ought to vnderstand, that by these thinges as by the effectes is declared, that the election of God pertayned vnto a few of them only: and so may these thinges bee knit together with that which went before. Further Origen not considering the maner of the Hebrew phrase, as touching that word λογος, that is, word or speache, thought that that sentence is to be vnderstanded of the doctrine of the new testament: for that the workes of the law, and of the old ceremonies should be taken away from it, and for that all the thinges which we now beleue are now contracted into a moste bryefe simbole or crede. And seeing that Origen was not only of moze antiquity then all the rest of the fathers, but also was as a certayne fountaine out of whome the greatest part of them drew theyr interpretations, it is no meruaile though Chrysostome writeth in a maner the selfe same thinges: for he saith, that those few, whome the Prophet mencioneth of, for that cause abode, for that they had shewed themselves worthy. God (saith he) passeth not vpon kinred or number: but onely hath a regard to worthines. But we ought to know, that whatsoeuer worthines or good is in man, the same cometh wholly of the good pleasure of God, neither is there any thing in vs which we haue not receiued of God: Wherefore Paul saith, that our sufficiency is of God, neither can we so muche as thinke any thinge, as of our selues. Chrysostome addeth mozeouer, that the Prophet ment to teach, not onely that but a few of the Jewes should be saued, but also how those selfe same should be saued: namely, not by workes of the law, or by great preparation of ceremonies: but by faith which is very bryef: & he putteth faith for the object of faith: namely, for those thinges which are beleued. And to this sentence touching the bryefenes of doctrine haue our newe writers subscribed, which had not a respect to the maner of the Hebrew phrase. It is true, I confesse, that from the Gospel are cut of the olde ceremonies: howbeit as touching the principall point & somme of doctrine, we haue not one whit les now then they had then. And because the Seventy interpreters vled the Greeke worde συντελειν, somme haue turned it in latine consummationem, or perfectionem afferre: that is, to bzing consummation or perfection: as though the Gospel is not onely new, but also perfect and absolute: namely, for that Christ, when he entreated of mutuall loue, said, I geue vnto you a new commaundment: and for that he hath contracted all the commaundementes into two principall poyntes: namely, into the loue of God, and the loue of our neighbour. And yet hath not Christ therfore altered the doctrine. For although the thinges which we haue be moze cleare, yet are they the selfe same, which the elders had. Neither did Christ therfore say that he gaue a new commaundment, as though that had neuer bene heard of of the elders: but herein consisted that renouation, for that by the working of grace, and by the power of the spirite, which Christ most abundantly powred into the Apostles, he renued that commaundment being now in a maner blotted out in the minds of men. The word also abbreuiated some thinke in this place to signify Christ: for that he being the Sonne of God abased himselfe, and toke vpon him the forme of a seruant. But whatsoeuer these men say, it is plaine inoughe euen by the wordes both of Osea and also of Esaie, that these expostions are wide fro the texte. For both of them entreate of the multitude of those which should be reiected, and of the fewnes of the remnaunt. Which thing the text it selfe being diligently weighed doth teach. For when it was sayd, If the number of the children of Israell were as the sand of the sea, yet shall but a remnant be saued, straight way is added: For God will consume and make shorte in righteousness. By which words is declared (forasmuch as this word, γαρ, that is, for, is a particle causall) that a reason of the sentence going be-

The thinges
which we beleue are contracted into a most bryefe sim-
bole or crede.

Our doctrine and the doctrine of the He-brewes is one and the
selfe same.
How Christ
gaue a new commaunda-
ment.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

foze is geuen: and therfoze a remnant onely should be saued: foze that God would in such sort cut of and shorten the rest.

And as Esay said before, Except the Lord of Sabbath had left vs a seede, we had bene made as Sodoma, and had bene like to Gomorrha. ] When he sayth that Esay spake this befoze, he meaneth, that this is witten in the firste chapter: foze, that oracle which was befoze mencioned, is witten in the .x. chap. And fozeasmuch as the Prophet so complained, foze that it so happened amongst the fathers in the old time, that the number of those whiche were saued was exceedingly diminished in comparison of those which perished, Paul doth therof conclude, that these men vniustly complaine, when as they see, that no other thinge happeneth vnto them, then happened vnto the fathers: then whome they coulde not doubtles say that they were better. Unles there had bene a few left (sayth he) like vnto seede, we had bene as Sodoma: Foze the inhabitantes of that city were all destroyed. Foze although Lot escaped, yet was not he of that country, but a straunger. Whigen again descanteth in this place vpon the seede remaining: and thinketh that the Prophet meaneth Christ, foze that he was that onely seede promised vnto Abzabam, of who Paul writeth to the Galathians. As if the Prophet should haue sayd, vnles Christ should be borne of vs, we should be in worse case then Sodoma. But this interpretation is not necessary. Foze although Christ be the hed of al those which are saued: yet is here expessedly entreated of the small number of the remnante. But as touching the rest which were reiected, I nothing doubt but that they were in worse case then the Sodomites. Foze Ezechiell writeth that so greate was the iniquity of Israell, that it iustified Sodoma. And Christ (as saith Mathew) sayd y it should be moze tollerable vnto Sodoma, then vnto those cities of Galilie, wherein he had preached, and wrought miracles. Yea he saith: That if these thinges had bene done amongst the Sodomites, those cities had still remayned. And the reason is: foze that they were ouerwhelmed with all manner of lustes, and shewed themselves cruell and barbarous towarde straungers. But the Jewes besides that they were contaminated with these heinous sinnes, or also with many moze and moze greuous, contemned mozeouer the doctrine and miracles of Christe, and crucified him, and most dispitefully draue his Apostles out of their borders. And in that the Prophet saith, that the Lord had left remnantes, thereby we vnderstand that our preservation dependeth of him, and not of our selues. He electeth vs: he prouideth that we fall not: he stirreth vs by to liue holily: he gouerneth vs: he geueth vnto vs perseuerance: Wherefoze seing that those are his giftes, let vs count to haue receaued the at his hands. But why God is called the Lord of Sabaoth, sondry reasons are geuen. Some say that by hostes, ouer whome God is the chiefe, are vnderstanded the starres: which being worshipped of the Ethnikes foze Gods, by this title it is verie plaine how farre the God which the Jewes worshipped surmounted them. Foze by that worde is declared, that he is the moderatoze and gouerner of all the celestiaall orbes, and ornaments. Some thinke, that God was so called by reason of y hostes of the Israelites, in the midst of which hostes was caried the Arke of the couenant, as often as they should pitche going thowow the desert. Others againe will haue this word to pertaine vnto y angels, who are y hostes of God. But as I iudge he was so called because al creatures are as it wer his hosts. Foze they are instrumets of his power & wil, & do no les obey him then souldiers do they captaine: yea also wicked men and the Deuils, vniustly, and vntwitting do seruice vnto his counsell. And although those thinges which Esay the Prophet prophesied of the fewnes of those which should be saued happened in the time of king Ezechias, at what time the city of Ierusalem was deliuered from the siege of Sennacherib, and also in the restitution of the captivity of Babilon from whence very few returned, yet came they moze truly to passe in the time of Christ, when by Titus and Vespasian, Ierusalem with the whole common wealth of the Jewes was vtterly ouerthrowen. Christ some weighing this which is witten, that it is God which left seede, confesseth that these few, were not of themselves preserved, but of God: which I suppose he vnderstandeth, as he hath oftentimes declared, in comparison of that whiche we bring

The Jewes
that were reiected,
were in worse case then the So-
domites.

The preseruation of the godly de-pendeth
wholy of God.
What the God of Sa-
baoth signi-
feth.

All creatures are the hostes
of God.

bying. For, that if it be compared vnto that which is geuen vs of God, he saith is very small and to be counted for nothing. But we say with Jeremy, It cometh of the mercy of the Lord, that we are not consumed.

What shal we say then: That the Gentiles which followed not righteousness, haue attayned vnto righteousness, euen the righteousness which is of fayth. But Israell which followed the law of righteousness, attayned not to the law of righteousness. Wherefore, because they sought it not by fayth, but as it were by the workes of the law: for they haue stumbled at the stumbling stone. As it is written: Behold I lay in Sion a stumbling stone, and a rocke to make men fall and euery one that beleueth in hym shal not be ashamed.

What shal we say then? That the Gentils which followed not righteousness haue attained vnto righteousness, euen the righteousness which is of faith. But Israell which followed the law of righteousness, attained not to the law of righteousness.] The Apostle in the beginning of this chapter beganne to entreat of the groundes of our saluation: that is, of election, and of reprobation. After that he declared the endes: namely, that the elect are predestinated to saluation, and do attaine vnto it: but the reprobate are left in damnation, and are reiect of God. Nowe he entreateth of the meanes whereby the elect are brought to saluation, and the reprobate to destruction, and those meanes, he sayth, are faythe, and vnbeliefe. Vnto the electe is geuen fayth, whereby they apprehende righteousness, that is, saluation, the other are left voyde of fayth and therefore obtayne not righteousness to saluation. Those thinges which the Apostle in the beginning of the chapter entreated of, had place in vs without any our assent namely, before the foundations of the world were layde. But fayth and incredulity whereof is now entreated, are brought forth in vs, but yet not after one and the same maner. For fayth is not of our selues, but is breathed into vs of God: for it is the gift of God. But incredulity of it selfe bursteth forth out of our originall sinne. These two thinges may easely be perceaued of vs: for euery one hath experience in himselfe, whether he doth beleue or not beleue. But those two first, namely, election and reprobation, soasmuch as they pertaine vnto the hidden will of God, we can not attayne vnto the knowledge of them, either by sence or by reason. Touching them we are certified only by the spirite, and by the scriptures. And by the methode of the Apostle we plainly see how vtterly they peruert this order, which wil haue predestination and reprobation to depend of our workes. They should haue considered, that Paul at this present maketh mencion of these thinges as the effectes of these groundes: although they depend not of them after one and the selfe same maner, as it is euident by these thinges which we haue oftentimes before spoken. For he will haue these to be meanes, whereby some are brought to saluation, and other some to condemnation. Those thinges also which the Apostle now teacheth conduce to the solution of the other question. For of that, that iustificatio cometh only by fayth, seemed to follow two absurdities. First, that the promises of God are made voyde: for that the Israelites, vnto whome those promises seemed to be made, were strangers from saluation. The Apostle hereunto answereth that the promises are firme: for they are by election contracted: and as for election he sayth is free, and not onely extendeth vnto the Iewes and vnto Gentiles, but also comprehendeth many mo of the Ethnikes the of the Iewes. The other doubt was, for that amongst the Iewes were many goodly and shining workes, which seemed to pertaine vnto righteousness. And that mought seme absurde, if they should be disallowed of God: which yet must needs be sayd, if iustification should consist of fayth. This doubt the Apostle dissolueth, and sayth that it is no meruayle, if this kynde of workes be reiect of God, soasmuch as it was

J. J. Y.

seth

Incredulity
bursteth
forth out of originall sin.
We seele
fayth and incredulity in our selues.

Two doubtes
which arise against ius-tification by fayth.

Goodly wokes why
they are sometymes relected of God.
How great
the might of predestina-
tion is.

* A Paradore is a strange sentence not easily con-ceaved of the common sight.
Pauls sentence seemeth
in dede to be a Paradoxe

Wherin
Christ exco-dingly offended the Jewes.

Of that sentence, he which se-
keth, findeth.
What it is to seke well,
and to seke
ill.
The righte-ousnes whi-
che we haue
by Christ,
is the mere gift of God.
Against
wozkes of preparatiō.

teth sayth without which can not consist the righteousness, which we haue before God. And although this matter be much more entreated of in the next chapter, yet here he beginneth to make an entrance vnto it. And soasmuch as the Apostle sayth, that the Gentiles which followed not after righteousness, attained vnto righteousness, but the Jewes attained not vnto the lawe of righteousnes which they followed, thereby may be vnderstand, how mighty the predestination of God is, which bringeth to their endes the predestinate although vnto them vnwares, and their thinking nothing els. Thereby also is declared how great the imbecillity of humane strenghts is, when as the reprobate, though they take neuer so great labour and paynes, yet attayne not vnto righteousnes, but are left in their damnation. This semeth to be a Paradoxe which Paul here in this place teacheth: namely, that they which sought not, found: and they which earnestly sought, were frustrated: but yet is this sentence of great force to refell that which the Jewes alwayes objected agaynst the Ethnikes: namely, that the Gentiles had bene perpetually strangers from the lawe, but they had alwayes bene studious therein. For Paul here declareth, that that was no let to the saluation of the Gentiles. And therefore I much meruaile, that Christostome should say, that Paul in this place hath most plainly dissolved the question: namely, that the Ethnikes were therefore elected of God, for that they were worthy: and the Jewes were relected, for that they were unworthy and wicked. This place teacheth, that they which are conuerted vnto God, did not before follow after righteousness: yea rather they were utterly strangers from it: and that they which applied themselves vnto wozkes and vnto the lawe of righteousnes were relected. And soasmuch as this (as I haue sayd) is a Paradore, therefore Paul setteth it not forth simply, but rather gathereth it out of the testimonies of the Prophet, which he had before alleaged: and sayth: VVhat shall we say then? As if he should haue sayd, This followeth of those thinges which haue bene spoken, that the greatest part of the Jewes are relected together wth that their outward zeale or endeuor in the law: but the Gentiles were adopted, which yet regarded nothing lesse then piety. But how much humane reason is here offended, thereby it may be perceaued, in that the Pharisees and Scribes therefore spake ill of Christ, for that he admitted Publicanes & sinners:
And when that unfull woman came to anoynt and washe the fete of the Lord, the Pharisey whose guest he was sayd, If this man were a Prophet, he would doubt-les know who and what manner of woman this is. Howbeit we ought to know, that that approued and receaued sentence. He which seketh findeth, is not by these wordes refelled: for it is to be vnderstanded of those which seke rightly and orderly. But that can not be done but onely of those which are already regenerate.
Of such Christ sayth, He which seketh findeth, and vnto him which knocketh it shall be opened. But what is the difference betwene them that seke well, and betwene them that seke ill, here is declared. For the difference consisteth in sayth, and in infidelity. Paul, for that he was a preacher of the Gospel, enery where commendeth vnto vs faith, as the instrument, whereby saluacion is taken holde of.
Further this place most euidently teacheth, that the righteousness which we ob-tayne by Christ, is the mere and pure gift of God: soasmuch as it is geuen to them that seke it not: and is not apprehended of those which greedely follow after it. By this reason also are ouerthrowne those, which obtrude vnto vs wozkes of preparation. For what preparatiō can there be in those which follow not after righteousnes? If our wozkes should merite (as these men say) of congruitie & true righteousnes, they could not haue bene iustified, who as Paul sayth, sought not after righteousness. Further certayne Ethnikes attained vnto such wozkes, as doubtles in a ciuile consideration were good. For Socrates, Aristides, Scipio, Cato, and such other like exercised moste excellent vertues. But of this confidence in the mercy of God, which is through Christ breathed into vs by the beauefly spi-rite, they were utterly ignorant. Wherefore they followed after that morall righterighteousnes, and not without prayse attayned vnto it. But Paul at this present speaketh not of that righteousnes: for it in very dede is sinne, and nothing condueth vnto righteousnes. Moreover the Apostle, when he sayth, that the Gentiles followed not after righteousnes, expreſſeth in wordes les then he would to be vnderſtode. For they did not onely not follow after righteousnes, but also they openly withſtoode it, both in liuing wickedly, and also a long while and errectly reſiſting the preachers of the Goſpell. Origen in this place noteth, that the Apoſtle is againſt himſelfe; for in an other place he wiſteth, that they are made the veſſels of mercy, which haue purged themſelues from filthynes: and at the beginning of this epiſtle he wrote, that the Gentiles were therefore iuſtified, becauſe they had by the light of nature fulfilled the law: but here he contrariwiſe ſayth, that the Gentiles attayned vnto righteousnes when as they followed not after righteousnes. Now Origen in this place when he ſaw, that he was by the very wordes of the Apoſtle manifeſtly taken in a ſnare, ſeeketh a ſubtle woyle to wynde himſelfe out, but ſuch yet as is very frivolous and weak. For he ſayth, that it is one thing, ſectari legem, and an other thing, infectari legem.

For thoſe he ſayth do ſectari legem, which hauing it deſcribed vnto them, ſeek to imitate it: which thing the Jewes did, vnto who was ſet forth the law geuen and written by Moſes, & therfore ſo far as much as they did ſectari legem, they attained not vnto righteousnes. But infectari legem, he thinketh to be, by our workes to expreſſe the law being by the light of nature grafted in our mindes. And therfore the Gentiles, although they followed not the law written, for that they had it not, yet notwithstanding attayned vnto righteousnes, for that they had performed the law of nature grafted in their mindes. But this ſond deuile is ſufficiently of it ſelfe vttered and confuted. For the Apoſtle when he ſpeaketh of the Gentiles maketh no mention at all of any law, but only ſayth, that they, when as they followed not after righteousnes, yet notwithstanding obtayned righ-teousnes: wherefore the argument is ſure and firme. For which way ſo euer thou takeſt righteousnes, whether ſo that righteousnes which commeth of the lawe of nature, or ſo that which commeth of the law of Moſes, the Gentiles are ſaid to haue obtained righteousnes without it. Therfore that is vaine which Origen ſo often obiecieth, that men therfore are made veſſels of mercy, for that they haue purged themſelues from filthynes. But what the verbe meaning of that place is, we haue beſore declared. And that the Gentiles performed by nature thoſe thinges which are of the law, we thus expounded, that they did many thinges in outward diſcipline, which were commaunded in the law of Moſes as in the which they eſchued theſis, whoredomes, adulteries, & other ſuch like ſins. Therfore Paul concluded, the which waited not the knowledge of vice & vertue, of right and wrong, ſo the which in many thinges they fell & ſinned, they could not be excuſed by reaſon of ignorance. There are others which vnderſtand thoſe wordes of the Gentiles now conuerted vnto Chriſt, which being endewed with the holy ghoſt executed the commaundementes of God, and declared both in life and in ma-ners the righteousnes conſiſteth not of the law of Moſes, of which thing the Jewes continually boacted of. But the firſt interpretation more agreeth with the wordes of the Apoſtle. But whether ſoener interpretation be admitted, Origen hath ther-by no defence to proue, that men attayne vnto righteousnes by the worthines of workes. Yea rather the very wordes of the Apoſtle moſt plainly declare, that true righteousnes dependeth not of the endeuer or worthines of men, but of the goodnes and mercy of God. For he ſayth, that the Iſraelites following the law of righteousnes, attained not vnto righteousnes. But this ſemeth vnto humane reaſon very abſurd, namely, that thoſe which followed not, ſhould obteyne, and thoſe which followed, ſhould be fruſtrated. Howbeit this we ought to conſider, that the Iſraelites did not vprightly and lawfully ſeek it. For if they had ſought it according to the meaning of the law, ſo far as much as Chriſt is the end of the law, they had doubtles beleued in him, and ſo ſhould haue bene iuſtified. But by cauſe Paul in this place twice repeteth the righteousnes of the law, ſome think

J. F. 14.

that

Howall actions nothing
conduce to the obtaine-
ment of the righteous-
nes of God.

Origenema-keth a diſtinction between ſecta-
ri iuſtitia,
and infecta-
ri iuſtitia.

Paul here
maketh no mention of the law,
but of righ-
teousnes.

How the Gentiles did by nature
thoſe thinges
which are of the law.

True righ-teousnes de-pendeth not of the ende-
uer of men,
but of the
goodnes of God.
The Jewes
did not rightly follow rights-
ousnes.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the Wherefore

the law of God is called the law of righteous-
nes.

The ground
of the error
of the Jewes in following of righteous-
nes.
Faith the oule of the commaunde-mentes of God.

What Paul in this place
understand-eth by workes.

In the obscuring of righteousnes workes are as contrary
opposed vn-
to faith.
They which ascribe right-
eousnes vn-
to workes,
are not iusti-
fied.

Three things here
out gathered against the meaning of the Jewes.
How the
righteous-
nes of faith
is greater,
then the righteous-
nes of workes.

¶ Those wordes are not in either place to be a like vnderstanded. For in the first place, by the law of righteousness, they thinke is to be vnderstanded, the outward law: and in the second place, the true righteousness, as though Paul should saye, that the Jewes applied themselves vnto the outward obseruation of the law, but could not attayne vnto the true righteousness in Christ. Which interpreta- tion I in dede dislike not: howbeit I thinke that these wordes may in eyther place be taken in one and the same sence: so that the meaning is: although that the Jewes had purposed in theyr minde to kepe the law geuen them of God, which law is called the law of righteousness, for that in it is contayned moste perfect righteousness, yet being vopde of sayth and of the spirite of Christ, they could not kepe the law, and therfore they were frustrated of theyr purpose and of that which they had determined in theyr minde: so that they neyther had the true righteousness, which the Gentiles had obteyned, and also were frustrated of that righteousness which they sought for. And the ground of that error was for that they, being destitute of sayth, and in the meane time supposing that they mought be iustified by workes, applied themselves vnto workes only. But without sayth these thinges are in bayne enterprised. For sayth is the soule and life of all those thinges which are commaunded in the law. Seing therfore that they sayled of the prescript of the law, they had not Christ, by whome their transgression of the law mought be forgiven, and by whome, that which wan- ted mought be supplied. And these workes whereof Paul speaketh, the fathers referre vnto the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, but that as we haue declared is strage from the very methode and doctrine which Paul vseth in this epistle. The contention in dede at the first beganne (as we haue oftentimes said) aboute ceremonies. But Paul to proue that they can not iustify, added a gene- rall proposition, namely, that no workes of what kinde soeuer they be, in as much as they are workes, haue power to iustify, wherefore Paul in this place by workes vnderstandeth not only ceremonies, but also all duties of life. This mozeouer is woorthy to be noted, that Paul in this place in such sort affirmeth that righteousness is taken hold of by sayth, that vnto it he opposeth workes as contrary. For when he had said, that the Gentiles attayned vnto righteousness by sayth, straight way he addeth that the Jewes fell away from the law of righteousness: although they endeuored themselves thereunto namely: for that they sought it not by sayth: But why they sought it not by sayth he geueth a reason: for that they sought it by workes. Whereof it followeth, that they are not iustified, which ascribe righteousness vnto workes. For, to put confidence in them, and to attribute righteousness vnto them, is an assured and euident let, that thou canst not attayne vnto the true righteousness. Chrysostome noteth, that these wordes of Paul which eyther pertayne vnto the Gentiles, or which pertayne vnto the Jewes, may be reduced to three wonderful principal poynts. For first of the Gentiles he sayth, that they attayned vnto righteousness, which thing the Jewes could in no case abide to heare: for they would haue had none but themselves counted to pertayne to the kingdome of Christ. Secondly, which is also moze wonderfull, he sayth, that they attayned vnto righteousness, when as they gaue not themselves vnto righteousness. And which is most wonderfull of all, he sayth that the righteousness of sayth: which the Gentiles take hold of, is farre greater then the righteousness of workes. And therefore Paul before in this selfe same epistle thus wrote, If Abraham were iustified by workes, he hath glory: but he hath not whereof to glory before God. But how the righteousness of sayth is greater, and excellenter then the righteousness of workes, is thus to be vnder- standed, that although the workes of men not regenerate seme to be honest and notable, and bying with them a cerryne ciuill righteousness, yet notwithstanding is that righteousness of so small balew, that before God it is none at all, yea rather it is counted for sinne. Farther the holines and vprightnes of workes which are done of men regenerate, although it please God, yet can it not abide to be examined & tried by his eracte iudgment. For our righteousnesses are like a cloth stayned with the naturall course of a woman. And we al pray vnto God, not to enter into iudgement with his seruantes. Wherefore it is euident, that the righteousness of woꝝkes, whether they go before oꝝ follow after regeneration, is lesse then the righteousness of sayth. And as touching the Jewes, Paul thus sayth: first that they attayned not vnto the law of righteousness, when yet they were most studious in the law of Moses, which law vndoubtedly contayned in it all manner of righteousness. Finally which also is most of all wonderfull, he sayth, that they attayned not so muche as vnto the lesse righteousness. For they liued not vprightly as the law prescribed them to liue. Thys place reprooueth defenders of woꝝkes: for hereby they may easely se, that if they put confidence in woꝝkes they can be iustified. Moreover Paul here teacheth, for what cause the Jewes beleued not. For he sayth,

They haue stombled on the stombling stone, and on the rocke of offence. The Jewes were offended at Christ, for that they looked, that they? Messias should be some great monarch of the world, & a man famous by reason of his godly & gorgeous pompe. Wherefore when they sawe Christ so abica and base, they began to despise him. They wayted also for such a Messias, as in outward and superstitious holines should be of greate renowne. But whē they saw him kepe company with sinners and publicanes, they were highly offended. The Jewes also are sharply to be reproued, for that when as they could not abide Christ, they dispitefully reiected him. Neyther, is the consideration of our times in the preaching of the Gospel much unlike. For the flesh cannot abide to be reproued: it is offended with the small number of them that beleue: and most of all, for that it seeth the saythfull to be perpetually afflicted. And besides that, ciuill men are afrayd lest by the change of religion should be desurberd and ouerthrowen the common welth. And such which professe some shew of piety, although in be ty dede they are most farre of from it, when they heare that vnto God is attri- ted power to iustify, and that men can not satisfill the law of God, crye out, that of vs is opened a window vnto licentiousnes, & that we peruert all ozdinances concerning god maners. Wherefore on euery side men stamble vpon Christ. Therfore Christ very wel admonished vs, Blessed is he which is not offended in me. If a man will compare the offence of the Jewes, whereby they beleued not in Christ, with the offence of the Papists, whereby they not only reiect the Gospel but also persecute it, he shall finde, that the Jewes haue sinned much moze tollerably. For they mought seme to haue had so much the moze iust occasion why to reiect Christ, for that they? ceremonies, rites, and iudgments were instituted of the true God. But al those thinges, for which the Papists reiect the Gospel are inuēted of men, and doe confirme the tyranny of Antichrist. The Apostle for that he sawe, that it was horrible to be spoken, that the Messias so earnestly, and so longe tyme looked for, should be vnto the Jewes a stomblinge blocke and an offence, lesse he should seme maliciously to haue inuēted it of his owne hed, bringeth an oracle of the prophet Esay. wherein was long tyme before foretold, that it should so come to passe. But this is to be noted, that this testimony is gathered out of two chapiters, out of the 8. chap. and out of the 28. Paul thus citeth it: Behold I put in Sion a stombling stone, & a rocke of offence, and euery one that beleueth in him shall not be ashamed. The first & last parte of the sentence is taken out of the 28. chapter of Esay. But that which is placed in the middelt is taken out of the 8. chapter. In which place the God of Zebaoth is said to be a stone in the sanctuary, as touching the godly, and a stone of offence, as touching the vngodly, vnto whome he is said to be not onely as a stombling block but also a snare and a gillnet. And soasmuch as that which is there by the Prophet ascribed vnto the God of Zebaoth, is here by the Apostle attributed vnto Christ, thereby is most euidently gathered, that Christ is that God of hostes, which was in the olde time set forth vnto the fathers. And that which was done at that time a-

Why the Jewes were offended.

These lesse thinges are aptly applied vnto our times.

If men in a manner stamble vpon Christ, The Jewes haue sinned a great deale more tolerably then the Papists.

Christ is the God of Zebaoth.

A place of Esay.

Christ is the foundation.

What is to be confounded.

Faith & hope haue one &
the self same
propertie.

A simile
made.

The Jewes
are not excused by their ignorance.

What St. meant in pronouncing of Christ.

graeth very well with that which is here entreated of, by the Apostle. For euen as the elders by this oracle were auocated from the confidence which they did put in the Egyptians, and in the Assirians, so here by the selfe same are they called backe from the confidence in workes and merites, least Christ, which was geuen for saluation, should be made vnto them destructiō. And if these oracles were true in the time of Esay, the doubtles much more truer were they in the comming of Christ. The beginning and ende of this testimony are in this maner in the 24. chapter of Esay, Behold I lay in Sion a stone, a stone of triall, that is, a tried stone (for it is an Hebrew phrase, wherein, as we haue said, those genitiue cases are resolued into adiectiues) a stone of a corner, and of price. that is, a corner stone and a precious stone, a sure foundation. He that beleueth shall not make hast. These wordes indeede were spoken, whilest y<sup>e</sup> history of Ezechias was in hand, howbeit there is no doubt but that Prophet had a respect vnto Christ, of whome Ezechias was a type: especially seeing that Christ shoulde as touching the flesh come of that king: of whome shoulde come vnto y<sup>e</sup> people of God not a shadow of saluatiō, but the true and assured saluation. But how the nature of a foundation agreeth with Christe; the Apostle hath declared vnto the Corinthians saying, Other foundation can no man lay besides that which is layd, which is Christ Iesus. Paul following the 70. interpreters, thus writeth, He that beleueth, shall not be confounded. To be confounded, or to be made ashamed, is nothing els, but to be frustrated. Whiche doubtles then commeth to passe when thinges other wise happen then we hoped for. This is to be noted, that this selfe same propriety which Paul here attributeth vnto faith, was before assigned vnto hope. For he sayth in the 5. chapter, hope confoundeth not. Wherby we gather y<sup>e</sup> forasmuch as faith is before hope, & hope is included in it, therfore vnto hope belongeth also the property of faith, namely, not to make ashamed. The sentence in the Hebrew is full of elegancy. For he which beleueth truly, patiently wayteth for the thinges promised, neither maketh he hast. But the vnbeleuers, would straight way see the accomplishment of the promises: and if it be any while differred, they throw themselves down headlong, and dispayre. It may also thus be vnderstanded, that they which faithfully beleue are not rash in executing their deuises. For first, they serch out the wil of God, neither desire they to obtaine any thing, but y<sup>e</sup> which they know shalbe acceptable vnto him. Chrysostome in this place interpreteth to stamble, not to beleue. For euen as they which hauing their eyes fixed an other way then that way which they should go, do easely stamble, so they also stamble, which haue a respect vnto any other thing in Christ, then to that wherfore he was sente. A stone oftentimes is not scene, either because it is little, or els because it sticketh in the earth, yet notwithstanding it oftentimes maketh a man that is not ware to fall: So was it with Christ, when he liued here vpon the earth. Therefore Esay saith of him: We haue sene him: and there was no beauty in him: and therefore we esteemed him not. With this offence without all doubt wer the Jewes enfecte. Whiche thing Paul testifieth to the Corinthians. If (saith he) they had knowne him, they had neuer crucified the Lord of glory. But forasmuche as this ignorance was suche, that themselves were the cause therof, it could not excuse the. And that which is in this place sayd of Christ, is written in the first to y<sup>e</sup> Corinthians. We preach (saith Paul) Christ crucified, vnto the Jewes indeede an offence, and vnto the Grekes foolishnes: but vnto the called both Jewes and Greekes, Christ the power of God, and wisdom of God. And Simeon in Luke sayth, that Christ is put to the fall & resurrection of many. For they which beleue, haue him for a foundation, and wholly lene vnto him: and therfore they cannot fall: but the vnbeleuers stamble vpon him, and are broken to peeces. Origen demaundeth, why Christ Iesus, when as other wise he is adorned with most excellent titles (for he is called the pastor, the doze, the way, y<sup>e</sup> light, the truth, and such like) is here of Paul by a horrible name called an offence and a stambling stone. And he reasoneth that Christe was an offence, that is a let and an impediment to them that runne vnto sinnes: for he therence called men backe by admonishing, preaching, and correcting. But this is farre wide from the meaning of Paul

Paul. For such an offence had bene profitable, and had much conduced to edificatio. But the Apostle speaketh of that kinde of offence, whereby the Jewes fell. Wherefore we may say rather, that Christ is the stone, whereby either the faithfull are edified, or the unbeleuers fall hedlong into damnatio. Esay calleth Christ the stone of the foundation: for that vpon him is built the church: he is called the corner stone, for that by him are in the church ioyned together two distinct walles: namely, the Gentils and the Jewes. He is also called a pretious stone, for that he buildeth vpon to a most excellent ende. To this selfe thing alluded Peter in his 2. chapter of his first Epistle. Unto whome (saith he) we come, who is the liuely stone being indeede of me reiected, but before God elected and precious. Farther he also vseth the testimonie of Esay. Behold (saith he) I lay a stone in Sion to be laid in the chiefe corner, a stone elected, and precious: and he that beleueth in him shall not be made ashamed, wherfore vnto you which beleue, he is precious: but vnto them which beleue not, he is a stone which the builders haue reiected. Being that either of the Apostles saith, that faith maketh not ashamed, they manifestly declare, that men which beleue truely and faithfully, forasmuch as this is the nature of faith, ought to be assured of theyr saluation. Wherefore let vs beware, least, as the Jewes gloried of the righteousness of the lawe, of which yet they had no part at all, we also in the same manner put confidence in a shadowed security of faith, which is dead and no faith at all, vnles it haue woorkes ioyned with it. Let vs take heede also that we stamble not vpon Christ, that is, vpon his woord: which they do, which when they are repproued and inuited to repentance, straightway stepp backe. And if we will truely cleaue faste vnto the stone Christ, we must of necessity into a farre country banishe superstitions, which are farre straunge from him. For vpon this foundation they cannot well be builded. Lastly, let vs not kepe in silence nor dissemble true and sound doctrine, foolishly fearing, least by the preaching thereof men should be offended. Wherefore forasmuch as Christ was geuen vnto the worlde, although many should stamble vpon him, let vs vse dexterity and discretion, to set forth all thinges warely in their due place and time, as the holy Ghost shall prompt vs: but yet in such sort that we leue not the truth for feare of offence.

Why Christ is called the stone of foundation, the corner and precious stone.

The certainty of saluation commended.

Who they be that stamble vpon Christ and his woord.

Of predestination.

But now least in reasoning our talk should stray too farre abroad, which thing might easely come to passe in so large a field of Gods predestination, the entreaty whereof is full of perplexity, we entend to deuide into fouer principall pointes all that which we minde to speake of. First I will diligently search out of the nature and definition thereof. Secondly, what are the causes of it: for nothing can perfectly be knowen, which is not knowen by his causes. Thirdly, what are the effectes which predestination bringeth forth in men: for there are many thinges, which by their effectes are most plainly vnderstand, and perceaued. Lastly, whether the power or force thereof be such, that it bringeth vnto men necessity: and whether it either taketh away or hindreth the liberty of the will of man: and whether it may be altered or changed. And these partes being diligently discussed, we will then make an end of this discourse. And yet will I not promise of this matter to speake all that were to be spoken. For there are infinite thinges, which are offered vnto them that settle them selues to consider vpon this matter. But those thinges only will I touch at this present, which shall seme most necessary, and are in greatest controuersy: which being so compact and ordered, it shall be no hard matter for others to gather otherwayes many other thinges. But before we go to the definition of predestination, there are two thinges to be answered vnto. First, whether it stand with true Christian religion either to dispute, or to preach of predestination, for if that were not lawfull we should then seme to do wickedly. Secondly, forasmuch as the Logicians teach, that the question, whether a thing be or no, naturally goeth before that question Distinction of the question.

Whether it stand with true christian religion either to dispute of predestination.

tion

The elections of God
are diuers.

Their reasons which say that we ought not to dispute
of predesti-
nation.
Prosperus & Hilarius.

tion, whereby is demanded, what a thing is, least we should go against that order, let vs first consider, whether there be any predestination or no: to the end we may afterward the more certainly define it. As touching the first question, this it is to be vnderstand, that there are sundry elections of God. For there are some which serue for the executing of some certaine office, as the election to the office of a king, or to the office of an Apostle. There are other elections vnto eternall life.
And these elections are sometimes seperated a sonder. For it happeneth oftentimes that he which is elected vnto a kingdome is not straight way elected vnto eternall life. Which thing also happeneth of the office of an Apostle, as in Iudas. Howbeit sometimes they are ioyned together, so that whereas it is spoken of temporal election, we may vnderstand that the same is ment also of the eternall election. And after this sort Paul sayth: that he was called to be an Apostle, and put a part from the wombe of his mother, namely, to the Apostleship, and preaching of the Gospell: and yet together therewithall he vnderstandeth, that he was predestinate to eternall saluation. Christ also sayd, that he had elected his disciples to go, and to bring forth fruit and that their fruit should abide: and yet together therewithall he commaundeth them to be of good comfort, for that their names were writen in heauen.
There is therefore betwene these elections a great difference: and there is also be-twene them a great coniunction, so that oftentimes the one is taken for the other.
So Paul by his wonderful wisdom transferred vnto spiritual things those things which being in Genesis and Malachy forespoken of Iacob and Esay seemed to be te-porall. Now as touching this latter election, I see that there haue ben many, which haue ben of this iudgement, that this disputation is not to be medled with all: whose reasons Prosperus, and Hilarius bishop of Mileance sometimes disciple vnto Augustine do plainly declare in the two epistles which are prefixed vnto the books of the predestination of saintes. Which epistles were vpon this occasion writen. For that whereas Augustine writing agaynst the Pelagians touching the grace of Christ, had in his bookes inculcated many things of predestination, many of the brethren in France, and not of the meanest sort, were sore troubled, and wonderfully offended therewithall. For they affirmed that by this doctrine is taken away from such as are fallen an endeour to rise vp againe: and vnto such as stand, is brought a slouthfulness: for that either party iudged, that diligence should be in vaine, if by the predestination of God it was already determined of them: that the reprobate could not be restored againe: and the elect could by no meanes fall away: and yet could they not kepe a constant and firme course, for as much as they were vncertaine of their predestination. Wherefore seeing by this doctrine is taken away industry, and there remaineth only a certaine fatall necessitye, it is muche better, that this matter be lefte vnspoken of. They adde moreouer that it is superfluous to dispute of that thing, which can not be comprehended. For it is writen, who hath knowen the mynde of the Lord? or who hath bene his counsellor? Wherefore their iudgement was, that we should teach, that God of his goodnes would haue all men to be saued: but in that all men are not saued, it hereof commeth, because all men will not be saued, and this say they is a safe doctrine: but contrarily this doctrine of predestination taketh away all the force and vse both of preachings and also of admonitions, and corrections. For if there be appointed a certaine number of the elect which can neither be diminished nor increased, then shall preachers labour in vaine. For if the determination of God be vnmoueable, then shall there be an intollerable confusion betwene the elect and the reprobate, so that none of the one can remoue to the other, nor none of these can passe ouer to them: and therefore in vaine and vnprofitable shall be all the labour and trauaile of such as teach. This doctrine also semed vnto them new, because the old fathers had writen as touching this matter either nothing at all, or very litle, or els entreated of it after an other sort. And for as much as euen vnto Augustines time, the Church had without this doctrine defended the doctrines of faith against heretikes, they also could euen then be content to want it:

for they affirme that such as teach this do nothing els, but call men backe to an vncertainty of the will of God: which thing is nothing els, then to driue men vnto desperation. All these things were objected vnto Augustine: which if they were true, then should we rashly, and without adujsment take in hand the entreaty of this matter. But the reasons with which Augustine defendeth himselfe, may also defend our purpose. Wherefore those things which we entend in this place to speake of, we will briefly gather out of two booke of his: of which the one is entituled, De bono perseuerantia: In which booke in the 14. 15. and 20. chapters he confuteth those objections, which we haue now made mencio of: The other is intituled De correptione & Gratia, Where in the 5. 14. 15. 16. chapters he entreateth the selfe same thing. First of all he meruaileth, that those men should thinke that the doctrine of predestination should subuert the profit and commodities of preaching, especially seing Paul the teacher of the Gentiles, and preacher of the whole world doth in his epistles both oftentimes and also plainly and of purpose inculcate that doctrine: as in this epistle vnto the Romanes, vnto the Ephesians, and vnto Timothe. Pea and he sayth, that Luke also in the Actes of the Apostles, And Christ himselfe in his sermons maketh mencion thereof. For Christ saith, Whome my father hath geuen me, those can no man take out of my hand: And, that many are called, but few elected: And in the last day he sayth, that he will answer vnto the godly, Come ye blessed of my father: possesse ye the kingdome, which was prepared for you from the beginning of the world: And he geueth thanks vnto the father, for that he had hidde those things from the wise men, and had reuealed them vnto infants, Because it was his pleasure so to do. In an other place also, I (saith he) knowe whome I haue elected. Also, ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chosen you. And if Christ and the Apostles haue in their sermons oftentimes made mencion hereof, no man (saith he) ought to doubt, that this doctrine is against the fruit and commodity of preaching. He affirmeth also, that it followeth not, that although our will, saluation, and good woorkes depend of the will and appointment of God, therefore we should cast away all our diligence, endenour, and care. For Paul when he had said, that God woorketh in vs both to will and to performe, yet cessed not to geue good admonishments. And when he had written vnto the Philippians, that GOD which had begonne in them, would accomplishe the woork which he had begonne that they might be blameles in the daye of the Lorde: (in which woordes he attributeth vnto GOD bothe the beginning and successe of good woorkes) yet in the selfe same epistle wonderfully exhorteth he them to holynes. Christ also commaunded his Apostles to beleue, and yet on the other side he sayth, That no man can come vnto him, but whome the father shall draw. He also sayth, He which hath eares to heare let him heare. And yet God sayth in the scriptures, that he would geue them an hart from aboue to vnderstand, eyes to see, eares to heare. Wherefore these things are not repugnant one to the other: namely, that the appointment of good woorkes lieth in God, and that the gift of them is to be hoped for at Gods hands only and that we also must put to our care and endenour to liue vprihtly and holyly, for as we haue before sayd, the holy scriptures teach both. Farther if for thys cause we should deny predestination, seing that by the selfe same maner the foreknowledge of God is certayne and can not be deceaued, shall we therefore deny, that God foreknoweth all thinges, if peraduenture there be some, which may be offended with this doctrine. And in his booke de bono perseuerantia the 15. chapter, he bringeth an example which happened in his time. He saith, that in the same monastery that he was in, was a certaine man not of so vpriht a life. This man, when he was admonished of his faulte was accustomed to say, Such a one shall I be, as God hath foreknown me to be. And when he so spake, saith Augustine, he spake indeede the truth, but although his iudgement were true, yet became he euery day worse and worse, at the last also (saith he) he returned to his olde vnnite: howbeit (saith he) what manner of one he shall as yet in time to come be, God onely knoweth. Though this man abused the truth, yet will not therefore any godly man deny that God foreknoweth all whereby Augustine defendeth his treatise and disputations of predestination.

Reasons

Paul hath oftentimes inculcated the doctrine of predestination. Christ and the actes of the Apostles haue made mencion of it.

That is not against preaching which Paul & the rest of the Apostles & Christ himselfe also haue taught Saluation & our good woorkes depend of God, & yet ought not we to cast away all manner of care to lyue well.

As well the foreknowledge of god as predestination is certaine. An example brought by Augustine.

Cap. 9. . A Commentarie vpon the

The thing is not made cull by the abuse therof

The fore-
knowledge
of God
ought not to call vs backe from our endeuor to prayers.
The giftes
of God are not acknowledged, except the foun-
taine of the
be knowne.
What is the fountaine of the giftes of
God.

We are comaunded to geue thanks for our election.

It confirmeth the doctrine of free iustifi-
cation.

It is no new doctrine sayng
it is set forth in the holy scriptures.

Heresies
were the causes, that doctrines
were more diligently entreated of

The fathers that were before Augustines
time taught this doctrine.

How prede-stination is obscure, and how not obscure.

When we will do any thing, we must not haue an eye to predesti-
nation, but to the scripture.

all things. And that this foreknowledge of God is no let vnto good workes, Christ declared, when he commaunded his disciples to pray, when as yet in the meane time he plainly told them, that God knewe right well what thinges they had neede of. Wherefore the foreknowledge of God doth not call vs backe from the endeuor of praying: for the thinges profitable and necessary which God hath decreed to geue vs, he hath decreed to geue the by this meane. They also are deceaued which thinke that this doctrine is an vnprofitable doctrine, yea their sight is but small, and they vnderstand not the profite therof. Vnto the godly it is very profitable, to the ende they should not put any confidence either in themselves, or in any other men: but should fire all they whole hope and affiaunce in God onely. Which thing vndoubtably none can truly and from the harte do, but those which are fully perswaded, both that their saluation, and also they good workes, depend not vpon themselves, but of God. So we cannot acknowledge the giftes of God, except we vnderstande from what fountaine they spring. But that fountaine is the fre purpose, and mercy of God geuen vnto them, whome he hath elected, before the constitution of the world. He which seeth not this, seeth not the goodnes of God towarde him. By this doctrine may men be brought not to glory in themselves, but in the Lorde: which thing they cannot do, which ascribe vnto their own free will that little, how much so euer it be, for which thing sake they affirme that God electeth them. For they haue in themselves whereof to glorye. Farther the scripture willet vs that we should mortifye our selues, and behaue our selues lowly: there is nothing that is more easelier bringeth this to passe, then doth this doctrine. The certainty also of saluation, which we defend, is by no other means better made manifest. And in the latter Epistle to the Thessalonians, Paul willet vs for this thing to geue thanks vnto God, that we are elected of God. But this can we not do, vnles this thing also be wholly made plaine and knowne vnto vs. Neither without this doctrine can the grace of God be defended against the Pelagians: for they thought that the election of God commeth by our merites. Free iustification also should pearish, excepte we be rightly taught of predestination. Seeing therefore this doctrine being soundly vnderstande, is vnto so many thinges so profitable, no man oughte to count it vnfruitfull. And sithen it is set forth in the holy scriptures, it can not vndoubtedly be called a new doctrine. And if the fathers before Augustines time, haue not so diligently spoken of it, it ought not to be meruailed at: for the occasions, wherfore doctrines were more diligently discussed and searched out, wer heresies, which dayly sprang vp in the Church a freshe. And for that before Pelagius time, no man had spoken against the grace of God, there was no neede that any man should defend it: but when there arose vp a new error, it was necessary, that this doctrine should the more diligently be examined. And yet did not the fathers which were before Augustines time, alwayes leue this thinge vnspoken of. Which thing Augustine himselfe pro- ueth in the .i. chapter of his booke de bono perseuerantia. Ambrose vpon Luke saith, that God could if he would of vndeuous persons make deuout. And againe he saith that God calleth them whome he vouchsafeth, and him whome he will he maketh religi- ous. These things writeth he vpon that place, where it is written, that the Samaritans would not receiue Christ. He citeth also Gregorius Nazianzenus, who sayth that God geueth that the faithfull both beleue the blessed Trinitye, and also confesse it. But whereas it was objected, that this doctrine is very obscure, neither can be vnderstand, but rather bringeth men to be vncertaine of the will of God, he aunsw- reth, that in deede it is an obscurennes vnsearcheable, if a man should go about to seke out reasons of the iudgements of God, why other men being reiecte, this man, or that man is elected. But if so much be taughte of predestination, as the holy scriptures do set forth vnto vs, those thinges are not so obscure, but that they may be perspicuous inough vnto our faith. Neither counsell we, that when a man dothe any thing, he should deliberate with himselfe of predestination: but rather that he should re- ferre himselfe vnto the will of God expessed in the scriptures, and euery one also ought to haue a trust that he is not excluded from predestination. Neither is this any any leſſe preaching, that the number of the elect (as it is in very dæde) is certaine & vnmoueable. For by preaching we go not about, to tranſſerre men out of the nōber of the reprobate, into the nōber of the elect: but that they which pertaine to the elect might by the miniſtery of the woꝛde be brought vnto their appoynted ende: Which ſelfe ſame miniſtery as vnto the one it is profitable, ſo vnto the other it bringeth deſtruction, and taketh away from them all manner of excuſe. But whether predeſtination and election vnto ſaluation may be ſayde to pertaine vnto all men, that God will haue all men to be ſaued, we will afterwarde in his due place ſpeake of. Howbeit in the meane time Auguſtine willethe vs not to kepe in ſilence the truth touching predeſtination, ſo that thereon hangeth daunger, leaſt by the euill vnderſtanding thereof ſhould be confirmed corrupt doctrine: neither are thoſe which are of capacity, to be deſrauded ſo they ſakes which are not able to attaine vnto it. And ſo much as out of this doctrine may be had many conſolations, it is indifferently to be ſet forth both to the learned and to the vnlearned: although not alwayes after one and the ſelfe ſame manner. For, ſo ſome, milke is mete, and ſo other ſome, ſtrong meate. And this ſelfe ſame thing may ſo aptly be entreated of, that it may ſatiffy both the learned, and the vnlearned: Which thing Auguſtine did very well accompliſhe: who not onely moſt ſharpely diſputed of this matter againſt the Delagians: but alſo in his Homelies and familiar ſermons plainly and gently entreated of the ſelfe ſame thing vnto the people. What, (ſaith he) is more deepe then the ſentence of Iohn, In the beginning was the woꝛde? or then this: And the woꝛde was made fleſh? In which ſentences many may fall, and perniciously erre: and yet notwithstanding we muſt not ceaſe to ſet it forth both to the learned, and to the vnlearned: but yet vſing therein diuerſe manner of ſpeakinge. We ought not ſo to preach predeſtination to the people of God, to ſay whether thou doſt this, or doſt it not, thou canſt not alter the determination of God: and if thou be of the elected, whatſoener thou doſt cannot remoue thee from ſaluation. For this might eaſely hurt weake & vnlearned men. It is the poynt of an unſkilfull or rather of a malicious philoſition ſo fooliſhly and vnaptly to apply a medicine which is otherwiſe good, that it maye be hurtfull vnto health. But to ſet forth this doctrine profitably and with fruit, the endes and vtilities which we haue befoꝛe ſpoken of ought to be regarded. And let all our ſpeech be directed to this, that they which are of Chriſt ought not to put confidence in theyꝝ owne ſtrengths, but in God: and that they ought to acknowledge his giſtes, and to gloꝛy in God and not in themſelues, and to ſeele the grace & mercy exhibited vnto them: & that they are freely iuſtified by Chriſt. Let the vnderſtād alſo y they are predeſtinate to be made like vnto the image of the Son of God into the adoption of childꝛe, & to walke in good woꝛkes. Laſtly, y they haue a teſtimony of the certayntie of Gods good will towardeſ them. Farther every thing hath his eares or handels, by which a man may moſt aptly hold it: which if it ſhould be taken by any other way or by any other partes, eyther it would ſlippe out of the handes, or els hurt hym that taketh it. This haue we gathered out of theſe bookeſ of Auguſtine which we befoꝛe cited, in which he anſwereth to the obiections of Hilarius and Proſperus. Now reſteth two doubtſes to be diſolued. Firſt that they ſay, that we appoynte a certayne ſatall neceſſary, ſecondly, that they thinke that men by this meanes are brought to deſperation. As touching the firſt, if by fate or deſteny they vnderſtand a certayne ſorce proceeding from the ſtarres, and inuincible connerction of cauſes, by which God himſelfe alſo is brought into order, we (and that not without iuſt cauſe) do vtterly reſect the name of fate. But if by that name, they vnderſtand the order of cauſes, which is gouerned by the wil of God, then can not that thing ſeme to be againſt piety, although in my iudgment I thinke it beſt, that we ſhould vtterly abſtayne frō that name, leſt the vnlearned ſort ſhould thinke, that we appꝛoue the ſaynings of the Ethnikes. Of this matter hath Auguſtine excellently well wꝛitten in hys 5. booke De ciuitate dei the 8. chapter. Neyther by this predeſtination are the natures of thinges changed, as touching neceſſity, and happe, or chance: as we

C.C.f.

The determination
ber of the elect hindꝛeth not preaching.

Many con-ſolations by this doctrine of pre-
deſtination.
Predeſtina-
tion is to be preached vnto al
men, but not after one ſort.
Auguſtine
bringeth an argument of the like.
What thin-
ges are to be ſake hede of in preaching prede-
ſtination.
A ſimili-
tude.
With what dexteritie predeſtina-
tion is to be entreated of

Whether
by this doctrine be confirmed a ſa-
tall neceſſi-
ty.
We muſt ab-ſteine from the name of deſteny, although the thing being well vnderſtand be not euill.

haue

By predesti-
nation we are made
free.
The confi-deration of
predestina-
tion confir-
meth our hope.

Our salua-
tion is moze
safely comit-
ted vnto God then
vnto our selues.
The knowledge of pre-
destination
aduanceth
the glory of God.
Predestina-
tion is a part of the Gospell.
None absolutely deny-
ed the prede-stination of
God.
Rightly
coloured.

Although
in God be no courses
of tymes,
yet the creatures want
not a beginning, which creatures
are predestinate before they begin to be.

Ad aliquid

Dead men are not now
predestinate
for that they are come to their ende.

The conclusion that men are predestinate before they haue their beginning.

haue before declared, where we entreated of prouidence. Yea rather, by the effect of predestination, that is, by grace, we are made free from sinne, and made seruantes vnto righteousness: which seruitude is holy, and in the lord worthy to be embzased. And so farre is it of that by predestination our hope should be broken or diminished, that euen by it it is most strongly confirmed. For Paul in the 8. chapter of this Epistle, when he had sayd, Hope confoundeth not, & had added, That vnto them that loue God all thinges worke to good, confirmeth the same by predestination. For whom God hath foreknown, those (sayth he) hath he predestinate. And he addeth farther: Who shall separate vs from the loue of God? Shall tribulation? Shall anguish? Or? And streight way, Neyther death, nor life nor angells, nor principalities, &c? Wherefore we are not by this doctrine driven to desperation, but rather much moze confirmed in hope, and by it we receaue greate comforte. And vndoubtedly it is muche moze safer to committe our saluation to the care and prouidence of God, then to our owne iudgment. For we, as we are changeable, should euerie day, yea rather euerie hower, spil out selues. But our saluation, for as much as it lieth in the hand of God, is most safe and sure. And to conclude, there is nothing that moze aduanceth the glory of God, then doth this doctrine. Wherefore we ought not to abhorre from this doctrine of predestination: and especially seeing it is a certayne parte of the Gospell, which is not to be receaied only by some parte, but fully and wholly. And thus much as touching the first parte of our Exordium, or beginning. In the second part we haue to consider, whether there be any predestination or no, lest we should seme to go aboute to set forth and define a thing sayned and imagined: not that euer any haue bene which openly and of purpose durst deny the predestination of God, but for that there haue bene some, who haue layd such groundes, which being graunted, predestination can not stand. For some say, and amongst them especially Pighius, y in God is neyther any thing past, or any thing to come: & therfore he presertly, that is, alwayes predestinateth & foreknoweth. And he sayth, that we are herein deceaued, y we thinke, y God already before, & in times past hath predestinated some: wherof are gathered many absurdities, vnto God saith he al thinges are present: therfore he alwayes foreknoweth, and predestinateth. And therof he inferreth, that it lieth in euerie man, what manner of one he may be foreknowne of God: and that it is in our power, to be predestinate, to be such ones as we wil our selues. But this sentence strayeth farre from the trithe. For although in God there be no courses of tymes, neyther with him is any thinge past, or any thinge to come, yet that creature whom God foreknoweth and predestinateth, is not without beginning. Wherefore seynge it is not coeternall with God the creator, it followeth of necessity, that God predestinated it before it was brought forth. For predestination is of the number of those actions of God, whiche haue respect to an other thinge. Wherefore we must not flye vnto the eternity of God: for in it men haue no participatio with God the creator. This thing may better and plainely be vnderstand by the tyme past. Wherefore a man may thus say: Certayne men are now deade, and past. But vnto God all thinges are present: wherfore God now predestinateth them, and now also it lieth in their power, how they wil be predestinated. Here there is none so blockishe, but that he seeth the absurditye. For they are not now predestinated, when as they are now come to their ende: neither lieth it in their power, either that that should not be, or how that should be, which they haue already receaied. And if their reason be so weake touching the tyme past, how can it be firme of the tyme to come. But we will leaue this argument, which yet is most strong, and will weigh what the scriptures say. Doth not Paul say of those twines, before they were borne or had done either good or euill, it was sayd, the elder shall serue the yonger. And to the Ephesians doth he not say, that we were predestinate before the foundations of the world were laid? These places, and many such other like, do most manifestly declare, that men are predestinate, before they beginne to haue their being, which thing he that taketh from vs, doth therewithall take away from vs a great consolation: which we hereby receaue, for that we know that we are predestinate of God vnto glory before all eternitie. But to what end I pray you doth Pigghius thus w<sup>re</sup>st these thinges, forsooth to this end, to confute this, that our doinges are determined and appointed of God before they are done. For then he thinketh should fall away the liberty of mans wil, and men should be left vnder necessity. This euill he thinketh may thus be remedied, if we say, that God doth all thinges presently. But he should haue remembred, that in the prophetes and other scriptures are red many prophesies, in which many thinges were determined and appointed how they should be done long time before they were done. What shall we here say? Shall we thinke, that those prophesies went not before those thinges which were to come? Christ saith, that it becometh that the scriptures should be fulfilled. Wherefore these fond imaginations are to no purpose. These mē study only with their lying inuētions to make darke a thing plaine & perspicuous, as y<sup>e</sup> fish called a Cutle casteth out her ynke, because mē should not take her. Pigghius also goeth on farther, and saith, that the prouidence of God hath not perskred vnto men the time or maner either of life or death, yea he saith that there haue bene many, which as touching the prouidence of God mought haue liued longer, if they had not either by negligence, or intemperancy shortened their life. For if these thinges were so determinate (saith he) a murtherer which hath killed a man may be excused, because he hath executed the will of God. I wonder vndoubtedly, that such a great diuine could let such a fond fabulous reason once come out of his mouth. As though the murtherer when he slayeth a man, hath a regarde how to please God. Thys regardeth he onely, how to play the theefe, & to accomplish his hatred or enmities. For how coulde he knowe, that thys is the w<sup>ill</sup> of God, when as God hath in hys lawes commaunded the contrary? Doth he thinke, that Iudas can be excused of his wicked treason, bycause he had heard the lord foretell his mischeuous fact? Or shall Pharao therefore be excused, bycause God had foretolde, that his hart should be hardened? Wherefore it is foolish, of the appoyntmēt of thinges which we put in God, to inferre excuse of sinnes. But Pigghius addeth also an other argumente. If our doings sayth he should in such sort be determined of God, then should all our care, diligence, and endeour be takē away: For what should it profite, sayth he, to auoyde theeuish and dangerous toznie, or saylinges in the winter, or surfeatinges, or vnholosome meates, if both the kinde and time of death, and such other like be alredy before certaynly appoynted of God? Here cometh to my mind that which Origen hath in his 2. booke against Celsus: where he maketh mencion of a subtil argument tossed betwene them which disputed of fate or destiny. A certayne one gaue counsell to a sicke man not to send for the phisition: bycause (sayth he) it is now alredy appointed by destiny, eyther that thou shalt recouer of this disease, or that thou shalt not. If it be thy destiny that thou shalt recouer, then shalt thou not nede the phisition. If it be not, the phisition shall nothing helpe thee. Wherefore whether destiny haue decreed, that thou shalt recouer or not recouer, thou shalt in vayne send for the phisition. An other by the like argument dissuaded his frende from marriage. Thou wilt marry (sayth he) a wife, to begette children: But if it be thy destiny to haue children, thou shalt haue them euen without a wife also. If it be not, then will it thereunto nothing profite thee to marry a wife. Wherefore what soeuer destiny hath decreed, thou shalt in vayne marry a wife. Thus did they deride, and scozne fate or destiny. For they entēded to shew into what absurdities men should fall, if they would defend fate. Contrarywise they which defended destiny, thus dissolued these reasons: and shewed that the reasons should not trouble men. Wherefore they sayd that the sicke man mought thus haue made answer. Yea rather if by fate it be appoynted that I shall recouer, I will send for the phisition, because he professeth to restore health to the sicke: that by hys

G. G.

industry

Prophesies went before
the thinges
to come, and yet they were no
let to the liberty of mē

When a murderer
killeth a mē
he hath not a regard vn-
to the will
of God.
By predesti-
nation is not inferred excuse of
sinnes.

A subtille argument as touchyng
fate.

A confuta-
tion of the same.

industry I may attayne vnto the appoyntment of deskeny. And that other which deliberated for the marieng of a wife, they imagined thus to answer: if it be appoynted that I shall haue children, soasmuch as that can come by no other meanes but by the fellowship of the man and the woman, I will marry a wife that deskeny may take place. Let Pigghius also thinke, that these things are answered vnto him. For, him also do the holy scriptures openly reprove. For vnto the life of Ezechias were added 15. yeares. And vnto the captivity of Babylon there prescribed 70. yeares. And Christ sayth, that all the heares of our head are numbered: and that not so much as a sparrow shall fall vnto the ground without the will of God. That also is childish, which he addeth, namely, that our prayers should be in vayne, if the euentures of things were certainly appoynted. Of this thing we haue spoke in an other place, that God hath not only decreed what he will geue vnto vs, but also hath determined meanes by which he will haue vs to attayne vnto them. So Christ sayth, that God knoweth what we haue neede of, and yet neuertheles he admonisheth vs to pray. This is nothing ells, then to leade away a man from the prouidence of God. For, that prouidence is not new, but an eternall disposition of things. Vnto the death of Christ, both the place, and time, and manner was so prescribed, and reueled in the foresayings of the prophetes, that it could not otherwise come to passe. Christ him selfe sayth, Myne bowe is not yet come. And that which was true in Christ, how can it be denied in others? We graunte that by starres are longe before sene the reasons and causes of windes, howers, tempestes, sayrenes of wether, and byrnes: and shall we not put those reasons in God, which infinite wayes comprehendeth moze things then doth the heauen? And the Scriptures do not onely manifestly speake thys, whiche we haue before sayde of those twines, before they were borne, or had done eyther good or euill, it was sayde, the elder shall serue the younger, and Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated. But also they speake the selfe same thing of the time to come, I will haue mercye, on whome I will haue mercy. Also, not of woorkes, but of hym that calleth: that the purpose shoulde remayne accordyng to election. And in Deutonomye it is written, He choose theyr seede after them. Vnto Dauid was appoynted a posteritye euen to the comminge of Christe, and when he had committed sinne, it was told hym, that the sworde should not depart from his house: and that his wiues should openly be deflowred of his neighbour. And of Ieremy it is written: Before that I formed thee in the wombe, I knewe thee. Christe sayth, that the elect also shoulde be deceaued if it were possible: and that as many as were geuen him of his father, no man should be able to plucke them out of his hand. And in the Actes we read, they beleued as many as were ordeyned to eternall life. In this place also God is compared with a potter, who vndoubtedly before he beginneth to worke, appoynteth in his minde what kinde of vessel he will frame. And a little before, Whome he foreknew, those also hath he predestinate, to be made like vnto the image of his sonne. Here in the firste place is put predestination, and afterward followeth the conformity to the image of the Sonne of God. And in the Actes we reade, that he Jewes toke Christ, and crucified him, according to the foreknowledge and determinate counsell of God. What neede we anye moze testimonies? Paul to the Ephesians sayth, that we were elected before the foundations of the worlde were layde. These things sufficiently declare, that we are not deceaued, when we teach, that the foreknowledge and predestination of God doth before all eternitie goe before those things whiche are foreknowne and predestinate: and that vnto this determination there is no let, that in Gods action there is nothing either passe, or to come. By these things which we haue brought out of the holy Scriptures it is very manifest, that there is a predestination of God: which thing also those things which we shall afterward speake, shall manifestly declare. Which I wil now also confirme by reason, and by such a reason vndoubtedly as in my iudgement ought to be counted an anodus, or a certaine demonstration. The ende whereunto we are made, farre passeth nature, so that by our owne strengthes we can not attain vnto it. Wherefore we haue neede of God to prepare vs & to lead vs vnto it. Wher-

Prayers
are not in vaine, though the euentures
of things
are defined.

Man and his doings
are in no case to be drawen from the prouidence
of god.
All things were most certainly determined concerning
Christ.
We must not deny vnto God that which he attribute
vnto heauē
and vnto
the starres.

By these places it is proued that before all eternity, pre-
destination
is before
creatures.

It is pro-
ued by firme reasons, that there is pre-
destination.

foze we haue neede of God to prepare vs, & to lead vs vnto it. Therfoze Paul sayth, to the Corinthians: The eye hath not seene, nor the eare hath heard, neither hath it entred into the harte of man, the thinges that God hath prepared for them that loue him. Therfoze seeing that of necessitie we must by God, be brought vnto the ende, this cannot be done by chaunce oꝝ rashly, but by the counsel of God, and that from eternally determined and appoynted. Now seeing that there is no let but that we may come to the definition of predestination, I thinke it best to beginne with that that the Logicians call, Quid nominis, that is, what the word signifieth. The Grecians call predestination προορισμους, of this verbe προορίζειν, which signifieth to determine and appoynt before: for ὅρος is terminus, that is a band oꝝ limite. Therfoze the elect are seperated a sonder frō them that are not electe. The latine men call it Prædestinatio. For, destinare, is nothing els, then firmly to determine & constāly to appoynt any thing in the mind, oꝝ by some firme decre of the mind to direct any thing to some one ende. But predestination which we speake of may be taken two manner of wayes: eyther as touching the bringing of it to the effecte, as that Paul going to Damascus was conuerted to Christ, and by that meanes seperated from the vnbeleuers: oꝝ in as much as it is with God from eternally, before men are bozne. Of this Paul speaketh writing to the Galathians, that he was set a part to preach the Gospell from his mothers wombe long before he was conuerted. And vnto the Ephesians also, he sayth, that we were predestinate before the foundations of the worlde were layde. And to the Romanes of the twines he sayth, Before they had done eyther good or euill, Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated. And we at this present speake of this eternall predestination of God. Therfoze the other is nothing but a declaration of this. Predestination therfoze may be taken both commonly & properly. But forasmuch as God doth all thinges by an appoynted counsell, and nothing by chaunce oꝝ fortune, vndoubtedly whatsoeuer he createth oꝝ doth, he appoynteth it to some ende and vse. After this manner neither the wicked, noꝝ the deuill himselte, noꝝ sinnes can be excluded from predestination, for all these thinges doth God vse according to his will. Therfoze Paul in this place calleth wycked men appoynted to vtter damnation, οὐκ ἔσται, that is, the vessels of God, vpon whome he maketh open hys wyath. And Salomon in hys Proverbs sayth, that God made all thinges for himselfe, and the wicked man also to the euill day. And of Pharaos it is said, Euen to this end haue I raysed thee vp, to shew forth in thee my powre. Per if predestination be thus taken, then shall it be common vnto all thinges. Neither shall this word signifie any thinge els, then the eternall ordinance of God touching his creatures vnto some certayne vse. But the holy scriptures do not much vse this word, but touching the elect only: although in the 4. chapter of the Actes we rede, They assembled together to do whatsoeuer thy hand and counsell had predestinated to be done: which wordes yet if they be referred vnto the death of Christ, and vnto the redemption of mankind, passe not the bandes of the election vnto saluation. But if they haue a respect vnto those also which assembled together against the Lord, they comprehend also the reprobate. But now let vs iudge by the Scriptures, as they for the mosse parte vse to speake. Therfoze the Schole deuines also affirme, that the elect onely and not the reprobate are predestinate. That sentence will we also at this present follow: not vndoubtedly because of that reason which they bring, for it is a reason very weake, as we shall after ward declare in his place: but because I see the scriptures so speake for the most part. Therfoze in this treatise vnder the name of predestination we will comprehend the saintes only. And for that cause I thinke Augustine entituled his booke de predestinatione sanctorum, that is, of the predestination of saintes: which signifieth the decree of God, whereby the Saintes are appointed to hōmunion of saluation. And vnto predestination, by Antithesis, oꝝ contrariposition, is set reprobation. Thus farre as touching the word. Now before we come to the true and proper definition, we must suppose certaine thinges, of which the first pertayneth to the sozeknowledge of God.

Of the definition of predestination.
Quid nominis.
Destinare.

Predestination is taken two manner of wayes.

In other distinction of predestination.

Here shall be entreated only of the predestination of saintes.
What predestination signifieth.

Which as Paul testifieth is ioyned together with predestination. For whome he hath foreknowne (saith he) those hath he predestinate. And although in God all things are one and the selfe same, yet because of our capacity and vnderstanding, those things that are attributed vnto him, are by some manner of way to be distinguished. Wherefore first this is to be known, & the knowledge of God extendeth farther then his foreknowledge. For his knowledge reacheth not onely to things present, past, and to come, but also to those things which shall neuer come to passe, whether the same be possible, or (as they vse to speake) vnpotable: but his foreknowledge pertayneth but vnto those things which shall come to passe. Wherefore foreknowledge requirerh a will, which goeth before, for there is nothing which shall come to passe, except God will haue it so. For otherwise he would let it. Wherefore God foreknoweth those things that he will haue to come to passe. Farther God doth not also predestinate all those whom he foreknoweth, for he foreknoweth also the reprobate: whom he knoweth to be damned. But euen as the foreknowledge of God hath ioyned with it his will, yet notwithstanding pertaineth to the knowledge and vnderstanding of God: so contrariwise predestination, although it can not be without foreknowledge: yet it properly pertaineth vnto the will. Which thing Paul declareth to the Ephesians. when he teacheth, that we are predestinate according to purpose, by the power whereof God worketh all things according to the decrees of his will. By these things we may after a sort see, how predestination is ioyned with foreknowledge, and what it differeth from it. Now let vs see what it hath common or diuerse with prouidence. This it hath common with prouidence, that either of them requirerh a knowledge and is referred vnto the will, and that either of them hath a consideration to things to come. But herein they differ, for that prouidence comprehendeth all creatures: but predestination, as we spake of it, pertayneth onely to the saintes and vnto the elect. Farther prouidence directeth things to their naturall endes, but predestination leadeth to those endes which are aboue nature: as is this, to be adopted into the sonne of God, to be regenerate, to be endued with grace, whereby to liue vprightly, and last of all to come vnto glory. Wherefore we do not say, that brute beastes are predestinate, for they are not able to receaue this supernaturall ende. Neyther are Angels now predestinate: for they haue already attayned vnto their ende: but predestination hath a respect vnto things to come. Whereas we sayde that prouidence pertayneth to all thynges, that may thus be proued, because nothyng is hydden from God: otherwys he shoulde not be most wysse. And if he know all things, eyther he gouerneth all those things, or els he abiecterh the care of many of them. If he abiecte the care of any thing, he therefore doth it, eyther because he can not, or bycause he will not take vpon him the care of those things. If he can not, then is he not most mighty: if he will not, then is he not most good. But to deny that God is most wise, most mighty, and most good, were playnly to deny him to be God. Wherefore it remaineth, that Gods prouidence is ouer all things: which thing the scriptures in infinite places most manifestly testifie. For they teach, that the care of God extendeth euen to the leaues of trees, euen vnto the heares of the hed, euen vnto sparrowes. Prouidence may thus by the way be defined: prouidence is Gods appoynted, vnmoueable, and perpetuall administration of all things. When I say, God, I say, that he is endued with greate authoritie and that he is mighty. Administration signifieth, that his gouernment is not tirannous, but quiet, gently, and fatherly. For tirannes violently oppresse theyr subiects, and referre all things to to theyr owne commodity and lust. But God violently p[re]sseth no man, neither by this gouernment getteth any commodity vnto himselfe, but only communicerh his goodnes vnto creatures. And this administration extendeth vnto all things. For there is nothing free from it, neyther can without it indure. It is called appoynted, bycause it is ioyned with most excellent wisdom, so that it

The knowledge of god extendeth
farther then his fore-
knowledge.
Gods will goeth before
his fore-
knowledge.

The fore-
knowledge
of God extendeth farther the pre-
destination.
Foreknow-
ledge pertaineth vnto
the vnder-
standing, &
predestina-
tion vnto
the will.
In what things pre-
destination
agreeth
with prouidence.

The difference of prede-stination &
prouidence.

Brute beas-tes are not predestinate

Why the prouidence
of God is said to be common to all things.

Definiton of prouidence
The go-uernment of God is not
tyrannous.

Why prou-idence is vnmoueable

admitteth

admitteth no confusio. It is vnmoueable, bicause h knowledge of this gouernor is not deceaued, neyther can his power be made frustrate. It is also perpetuall bycause God himselfe is present with the thinges. For neyther did he, when he had created thinges, leue them vnto them selues: yea rather he him selfe is in them, and perpetually moueth the. For in him we liue, we moue, and haue our being. And thus much of prouidence, vnto these thinges also is fate or destiny of very nigh affinity. From which word, if as we haue before sayd, it be taken for a certaine inescapable necessity which dependeth of h power of stars, the fathers haue not without iust cause abstained. But if it signifie nothing ells but a certayne connexion of second causes, which is not caried rashely or by chance, but is gouerned by the prouidence of God, and may at his will be changed, I see no cause why the thing it selfe should be of any man released. Howbeit bicause there is danger that error might sometimes crepe in, Augustine thinketh it best that we vterly restryne from that word. We ought also to remember that which we haue in an other place taught namely that the loue, election, and predestination of God are so ordered together, that they follow one an other in a certaine course. First vnto the knowledge of God are offered all men, not being in happy estate, yea rather being needy and miserable: whome God of his pure and singular mercy loueth, those he careth for, and putteth a parte from other whome he ouerpasseth, and embaseth not with his beneuolence and they by this seperation are sayd to be elected. And those so elected, are destined or appointed vnto an end. Augustine in his booke de predestinatione sanctorum the 10. chapter: thus defineth predestination, that it is a preparation of Grace: and in the 12. chapter he sayth, it is foreknowledge and a preparation of the gifts of God, by which they are certainly deliuered which are deliuered: but the rest are left in the masse or lump of perdition. In an other place he called it the purpose of hauing mercy. The Master of the sentences in the first booke, distinction 40, defineth it to be a preparation of grace in this present time, & of glory in time to come. These definitions I reiect not: howbeit bicause they comprehend not the whole matter I will bring an other definition more full as nigh as I can. I say therefore, that predestination is the most wise purpose of God, whereby he hath before all eternity constantly decreed, to call those whome he hath loued in Christ to the adoption of his childe, to iustification by fayth, and at the length to glory through good workes, that they may be made like vnto the image of the sonne of God, and that in them should be declared the glory and mercy of the creator. This definition as I thinke, comprehendeth all thinges that pertaine vnto the nature of predestination. And all the partes thereof may be proued by the holie scriptures.

One, election, & predestination how they are ioyned together.

How Augustine defineth predestination.

A full definition of predestination.

First, we take purpose for the generall word. For, that word is common both to predestination, and vnto reprobation. Paul vnto the Ephesians sayth, That we are predestinate according to the purpose of God. And in this Epistle to the Romanes he sayth, That the purpose might abide according to election. But what this purpose is, we vnderstand by the first chapter vnto the Ephesians. For there thus it is written, That God hath predestinate vs according to his good pleasure. By these wordes it is manifest, that that is called his good pleasure, which Paul after ward called purpose. And that this purpose pertaineth vnto the will, those thinges whiche after ward followe doo declare. By whose power, sayth he, God worketh all thinges accordinge to the counsell of his will. But by this will we ought to vnderstand that will whiche is of efficacy, whiche they call, the will of the consequent: by whiche is brought to passe, that the predestination of God is not made frustrate. This purpose we call moste wise, because God doth nothing rashely, or by chaunce, but doth all thinges with moste great wisdom. Therefore the Apostle before ioyned predestination together with foreknowledge, saying, Whome he hath foreknowne, those hath he predestinate.

Purpose is common to predestination, & vnto reprobation.

The purpose of God is his good pleasure. Purpose pertaineth vnto h will.

The mighty will of God.

By which purpose, God hath from eternally.] This is therefore added, be-

Predestina-
tion is no
new thing.

cause predestination is no new thing, neither such whiche (as manye sayne) goeth not before thinges or euer they are done. Paul sayth in his latter Epistle to Timothy, Which hath called vs with his holy vocation, not by our workes, but according to his purpose and grace, which we haue receaued before the times of the world in Christ Iesus. Here we manifestly see, that with the predestination of God is toynded the eternity of times. And vnto the Ephesians, we are sayd to be electe before the foundations of the world were laide.

The prede-stination of God is immutable.

Whereby he hath constantly decreed. ] By these woordes we are taught, that the predestination of God is immutable. For Paul sayth in the latter Epistle vnto Timothy, The foundation standeth firme, The Lord knoweth who are his. And before in the 8. chapter: when the Apostle would teach, that hope maketh not ashamed, and that they that had an assured hope should be saued, he bringeth a profe of the same by predestination: saying, Whome he hath foreknowne, those also hath he predestinate. And he addeth, who shall seporate vs from the loue of God? Shall tribulation? Shall anguish? &c. And Iames sayth, that with God is no chaunging, or varietie of courses of times. And in Esay God crieth: I am God, and am not changed. And in this Epistle the 11. chapter, where is entreated of predestination, Paul sayth, The giftes and calling of God are without repentance. But whereas God in Ieremy the 18. chapter sayth, that he would change the sentence which he had threatned vnto any nation, so that they would repent, the same is not to be vnderstand of predestination, but of those thinges which are forgetolde shall come to passe by that will of God, which they call the will of the signe: namely, when by his Prophets he declareth vnto me eyther what they sinnes haue deserued, or what hangeth ouer they, hedes by reason of naturall causes.

Sometimes
the promises & threat-
nings of God are chaunged.

The giftes
of God
come vnto
vs by Christ.
Christ is the hed of all the predestinate.

Whome he hath loued in Christ ] This we adde, because whatsoeuer God geueth or decreeth to geue, that geueth he and will geue throughe Christe. And as we haue oftentimes alleadged, Paul vnto the Ephesians saith, that we are elected & predestinate in Christ. For he is the Prince and heade of all the predestinate, yea none is predestinate, but onely to this ende, to be made a member of Christ.

To call into the adoption of children. ] So Paul in a maner euery where speaketh, and especially in the first chapter vnto the Ephesians. For there he saith, that we are predestinate to the adoption of children. And that vocation followeth straight way after predestination, those woordes which we haue before alleadged declare: Whome he hath predestinate, those also hath he called.

To iustification by faith. ] That vnto vocation is adioyned iustification, Paul by these selfe same woordes teacheth. Whome he called those also hath he iustified. But that we are iustified by faith, it hath ben so manifestly declared, that here we shall not neede any playner declaration.

Vnto glory by good workes. ] This thing also Paul teacheth in the selfe same place, Whome he hath iustified (saith he) those also hath he glorified. And that glory followeth good woorkes, and that we are predestinate vnto those good woorkes, that place vnto the Ephesians which we haue already often cited, manifestlye pro- ueth. For first he saith, that we are predestinate, that we shoulde be holye and blameles before God. Afterwarde he sayth, that God hath prepared good woorkes, in which we should walke.

That they might be made like vnto the image of the sonne of God. ] This Image indeede is begonne in vs by regeneration when we are iustified: and in the that are of full age groweth dayly to perfection by good woorkes: & is fully finished in the eternall glory. But in infanten this likenes hath place, when it is begonne by regeneration, and is finished in that last glory. Howbeit in them for want of age are not required good woorkes.

That in them might be declared the mercy and goodnes of the creator. ] This is the laste ende of predestination, shadowed vnto vs by Paul in the simili- tude of the potter, which hath power to make one vessell to honoꝝ, and an other to contumely. So God hath prepared his vessells to glory, that in them he mighte de- clare his glory. By this definition we gather, that God hath predestinate vnto the the elect not only glory, but also good works, that is, meanes by which he will haue his elect come vnto glory. By this we may see how slowly they are deceaued, which liue wickedly, and yet in the meane time boast that they are predestinate. For the scriptures teach, y men according vnto the predestination of God are not brought vnto glory, by wicked factes and noughty deedes, but by vertuous life and manners. Neither are they to be harkened vnto, whiche crye out, howsoeuer I liue, the predestination of God shall haue his effect. For this is utterly to be ignorant what predestination is, and impudently to goe about to abuse it.

He that li-
ueth wickedly cannot boast of pre-
destination.

Now that we haue seuerally after this maner examined this definition by his partes, let vs gather thereout certayne things not vnprofitable. First this, that predestination is a worke of God, and is to bee placed in the minde of God. For although men are sayd to be predestinate, yet must we not appoint predestination in them. So also things are sayd to be perceaued and known: when as yet in them is neither knowledge nor perceauure, but onely in the man that knoweth them. Wherefore euen as we can foresee either rayne, or colde, or fruite before they come: so God predestineth men, which as yet haue no being. For of relatines, some are such, that of necessity the one can not be but together with the other, as a father and a sonne: and some there are whereof the one may be although the other be not together with it, as before and after and science, and that which is known by science. Predestination therefore is referred vnto the latter kind of relatines. Which predestination yet, forasmuch as it is (as we haue said) in the mind of him that predestineth, those things vnto which the predestinate are directed are in them namely, grace, iustification, good works, and glorification. For these haue no place but in the saints. But in that we haue put the effects of predestination in the definition thereof, it is not to be meruailed at. For this definition can not be geuen vnles the correlatues (as they call them) be also expressed. Predestination is indeede defined: but of necessity there muste be expressed and declared the endes vnto which men are by it directed. And therefore they are ioyned with foreknowledge: because God knoweth bothe the beginnings and meanes and endes of our saluation. This moreouer is to be known, that when of the fathers (as sometimes it happeneth) predestination is called foreknowledge, it then signifieth not onely a bare knowledge, but also an approbation, or an allowing: which as we haue declared pertayneth vnto purpose. Wherefore we did what we could to speake properly, to the end, these things should not be confounded. Lastly is to be considered also, how in predestination are knit together the goodnes, wisdom, and power of God, whiche are his moste chiefe proprietie. Purpose, which commeth of his goodnes, is placed in the will of God: foreknowledge declareth a wise preparation: for the will purposeth nothing which is not beforeknown: lastly, when it is come to be put in execution, then is power present. And now because things contrary pertaine to one and the selfe same knowledge: & the one of the serueth much to y knowledge of the other: euen as we haue defined predestination, so also will we define reprobation. I sayd before, that I was of the same minde that the Scholemen are, namely, that the reprobate are not predestinate, not for that I iudged their reason to be so firme, but because the Scriptures vse so to speake for the moste parte. This is their reason, because predestination directeth not onely vnto the ende, but also vnto the meanes whiche leade vnto the ende. But forasmuch as sinnes are the meanes by whiche men are damned, they say God can not be put to bee the cause of them. Andoubtedlye if we will speake vp rightly, and properly, God can not be saide to bee the cause of sinnes, whome yet we can in no wise utterly exclude from the gouernment and ordering of sinnes for he is the cause of those actions which in vs are sinnes: although as they are of God, they are mere iustice. For God punisheth sinnes by sinnes. Wherefore sinnes as they are punishments, are vpon men layd of God, as of a iust iudge. Farther it is God which withholdeth his grace from men: which being withholden, it can not be chosen but that they

Predestina-
tion is not in the thin-
ges, but in the minde of
God.

Predestina-
tion is before the pre-
destinate.
The endes
of predesti-
nation are in the prede-
stinate.
Why the effectes are put in this definition.

How prede-stination is sometimes called fore-
knowledge.

God is not
the cause of sinnes, if we speake properly.

must

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

must fall. And forasmuch as through his agitation or stirring all we both liue and moue, vndoubtedly it is of necessity, that all the works which we do after a manner be done by his impulsion. Although thereof followeth not that he should poure into vs any new malice. For we haue malice abundantly inough of our selues, both by reason of originall sinne: and also because, if the creature be not holpen by God, of it selfe it declineth without measure and ende, to worse and worse. Furthermore God, and that vndoubtedly iustly, ministreth vnto the reprobate and vnto the wicked, occasions of sinning, and wonderfully enclineth the harts of men not only to good things, but also (as Augustine sayth) by his iust iudgement to euill things. Yea also he vseth the malice of men will they or nill they vnto those ends which he hath purposed vnto himselfe. And the holy scriptures sticke not to say, that God deliuereth men into a reprobate sence, and maketh them blind, and seduceth them, and many other such thinges. And yet for all this he can not be truly called the cause of sinnes, when as we abundantly haue the true cause of sinnes in our selues. Wherefore that reason of the Scholemen is not firme, neither leneth it to a very sure foundation. Howbeit I therefore separte the reprobate from the predestinate, because the scriptures no where that I know of, do call men that shalbe damned, predestinate. Which sentence, though I sawe no reason why, yet woulde I iudge is to be followed, because of the authoritie of the worde of God. Howbeit I thinke the holy scripture so speaketh, for that as we haue before sayde, predestination hath a regarde vnto those ends, vnto which we can not by nature attayne: such as are iustification, good life and glorification: by which God exalteth vs farre aboue all strengthes of nature. But the sinnes for which we are damned although they are not excluded from the gouernment of God: namely, after that manner as we haue already declared, yet do they not passe the strengthes of our nature. For euery man of himselfe is prone inough to sinne. Wherefore reprobation is the most wise purpose of God, wherby he hath before all eternitie constantly decreed without any iniustice, not to haue mercy on those whome he hath not loued, but hath ouerhipped: that by theyr iuste condemnation he might declare his wrath towards sinnes, and also his glory. The former partes of this definition are already declared, when we defined predestination euen vnto that part, without vnrightheousnes. Which part is therefore added, because God doth no iniustice vnto any man, although he bestow not his mercy vpon some. For he is not bound vnto any man, by any law: neither is he compelled of duety to haue mercy vpon any man. Wherefore God aunswereth in the Gospel. Is thine eye wicked? I am good. Is it not lawfull for me to do with mine owne what I wil? The selfe same thing hath Paul taught by the power of the potters. And yet he affirmeth, that therefore there is no iniustice in God. For here is entreated of mercye and not of rightheousnes. And vnto Moses was answered in Exodus: I will haue mercy on whome I will haue mercy, &c. I will not haue mercy on them. &c. By those wordes is signified that all men are of theyr owne nature in misery. For mercy is bestowed vpon none, but vpon them that are in misery. Out of this misery God deliuereth some, and those he is sayd to loue. Other some he ouerpasseth, and them is he sayd to hate, for that he hath not mercy on them. That by theyr iust condemnation he might declare his anger against sinnes, and his rightheousnes. The damnation of these men is said to be iust, because it is inflicted vnto them for their sins. And yet we ought not hereby to inferre, that sinnes for esane are the cause, why any man is reprobate. For they cause not, that God purposeth that he will not haue mercy. Howbeit they are the cause of damnation, which followeth in the last time, but not of reprobation which was from eternally. The lasse ende of reprobation is the declaration of the mightye iustice of God, as Paul hath taught: namely, that these vessels are prepared vnto wrath: because God woulde shew in them his power. And God aunswereth of Pharao, Euen vnto this end haue I raysed thee up, that I might shew in thee my power. The farthest ende is damnation, which as it is iust, so also is it allowed of God. But the niest ende are sinnes. For God commanded.

Sinnes are not all manner of waies excused from the prouidence of God. By the manner of speaking of the scriptures the reprobate are to be seperated from the predestinate. Why the reprobate are not called predestinate

Definition of reprobation

God doth no inturp vnto them, vpon whom he hath not mercy.

Men of their owne nature are in misery.

The reprobate are condemned because of their sinnes. Sinnes for esane are not the cause why a man is reprobate.

maunded, that the people should be made blinde, that they should not vnderstand, that they should not heare: Lest peradventure (saith he) they should be conuerted and, I should heale them. For sins although as they are sins, they are by God, in his lawes condemned, yet as they are iuste punishments, they are by him imposed for the wicked desertes of the vngodly. But we muste not stay in these nearer endes. We must go farther, that we may at the length come to that ende, which Paul hath set forth: namely, that the iustice of God should be declared. And thus muche hitherto as touching the first article.

Now let vs come to the second, wherein is to be sought the cause of predestination. Forasmuch as predestination is the purpose or will of God, and the same will is the first cause of all thinges, which is one and the selfe same with the substance of God, it is not possible, that there should be any cause thereof. Howbeit we do not therfore deny, but that sometimes may be shewed some reasons of the will of God, which although they may be called reasons, yet ought they not to be called causes, especially efficient causes. But that in the scriptures are sometimes assigned reasons of the will of God, may by many places be gathered. The Lord sayth, that he therfore did leade aboute the children of Israell throughe the deserte, rather then throughe shorter passages, throughe which he could haue lead them, that they should not sodenlye meete with theyr enemies. Adam also was placed in Paradise, to husband it, and to keepe it. And God testifieth that he woulde not as yet expell the Cananites out of the land of Chanaan, because they had not yet as filled y measure of their sinnes. Howbeit although as we haue sayde the scripture vse sometimes to bying reasons of y wil of God, yet no mā ought to take vpon him to rēder a certain reason of it, but that which he hath gathered out of the scriptures. For so, as we are dull of vnderstanding, we should easely vsurpe our owne dreames in stede of true reasons. But that there are small causes of the predestination of God, we deny not. For they are expessedly put of Paul, and especially, when he citeth y of Pharao: euen o this end hane I stirred thee vp, that I mighte shewe in thee my power: and of the elect he sayth, that God would in them shew forth his glorie. The materiall cause also may after a sorte be assigned. For men which are predestinate, and those thinges which God hath decreed by predestination to geue vnto the elect, as are these, vocation, iustification, and glorification, may be called the matter, about which predestination is occupied. This mozeouer is to be noted, that the end may sometimes be taken, as it is of vs in minde and desire conceived: and then it hath the consideration of an efficient cause: for being so conceived in the minde it forceth men to worke. Sometimes also it is taken as it is in the thinges, and as we attayne vnto it after our laboures. And then properly it is called the end, bycause the worke is then finished, and we are at quiet as now hauing obteyned the end of our purpose. But we therfore put this distinction, that if at any time we should be asked whether God do predestinate men for workes or no, we should not rashly eyther by affirming or by denyinge geue hasty sentence. For the ambiguity is in this word, for, how it is to be vnderstand. For if good workes be taken as they are in very dede, & are wrought, bycause God predestineth vs to this end, that we should liue byrightly, as we rede in the Epistle vnto the Ephesians, namely, that we are elected, to be holpe and immaculate, and that God hath prepared good workes that we shoulde walke in them, as touching this sentence or meaning the proposition is to be affirmed. But if that worde, for, be referred vnto the efficient cause, as thonghe the good workes, which God foresaw we should do, are as certayne merites and causes which should moue God to predestinate vs, this sence is by no meanes to be admitted. It is possible in dede that the effectes of predestination may so be compared together, that one may be the cause of the other. But they can not be causes of the purpose of God. For vocation which is the effect of predestination, is the cause that we are iustified. Iustification also is the cause of good workes: and good workes although they be not causes, yet are they meanes by which God byingeth vs vnto eternall life. Howbeit none of all these is the cause, or the means

Of the cause of predestination.

Of the will of God may sometimes be geuen a reason, but neuer any cause, especially an efficient cause.

We cannot geue any reasons of the will of God, but those which the holy scriptures haue set forth vnto vs.

Predestination may haue a final cause.

The material cause is after a sorte found in predestination.

The end is considered two maner of wayes.

It may be both true & false, that we are predestinate by workes.

One effect of predestination may be the cause of an other effect, but they cannot be causes of the purpose of God.

If sinnes
were the causes of re-
probation,
no man
should be elected.

The purpose of God
not to haue
mercy, is as free as the purpose to
haue mercy.
Why good
workes foresene are not the causes of prede-
stination.
A place out of the first epistle to Timothie.

Man cannot by himselfe
make him-
selfe a vessel
of honour.
Free will is not proued
by propositions hypo-
theticall.

meane why we are chose of God: as contrariwise sins indebe are causes why we are damned, but yet not why we are reprobate of God. For if they should be the cause of reprobation, no man could be elected. For the condition & estate of all men is a like. For we are all borne in sinne. And when at any time Augustine sayth, that men are iustly reprobate for theyr sins, he vnderstandeth together with reprobation the last effect thereof, namely damnation. But we may not so speake, if by reprobation we vnderstand the purpose of God not to haue mercy. For that purpose is no lesse free then any other purpose of shewing mercy.

These things being now thus declared we will assigne reasons why we deny that good workes foresene are the causes of predestination. The first is because the scriptures nowhere teach. But of so weighty a matter we ought to affirme nothing without the holy scriptures. Howbeit I know that certain haue gone aboute to gather this sentence out of the first epistle to Timothe, where it is thus written, In a greate house are vessels of gold, silver, and wood. And if a man shall cleanse him selfe from these, he shall be an honorable vessel of God, and mete for euery good worke. Whereby they conclude, that certayne are therefore destined to be vessels of honour, because they haue cleansed them selues from the filthines of sinne, and fro corrupt doctrine. And because they are here sayd to haue power to performe this, they say, that it lieth in euery man, to be predestinate of God vnto felicity. But these men make no good collection: For the sentence of Paul in that place is thus to be taken, He had sayd before, The foundation standeth firme. The Lord knoweth who are his. As if he should haue sayd, *me may sometimes be deceaued: for they oftentimes iudge those to be goodly, which are most farre from godlines. In which wordes he reproued Hymeneus and Philatus. For a litle before he had spoken of theyr peruerse doctrine. For they taught that the resurrection was done alreedy, wherefore Paul would not that men should be iudged as they appeare to be at the first sight. For God hath in this world, as it were in a greate house vessels, some of golde, some of silver, some of woode, and some of claye. And he knoweth beste whiche of these are honorable, and whiche are made vnto contumely. But we which know not nor vnderstand the secret of his will, can iudge of them but only by the effectes: that whosoener is cleane from corrupt doctrine, and liueth godly, the same is a vessel vnto honour.
Neither doth this place proue, that men can cleanse themselves, or make themselues vessels of hono. For as Paul hath taught vs in this epistle, it is God onely which bringeth this to passe. For he as it were a potter, hath power of one and the selfe same masse or lombe, to make one vessel to hono, and an other to contu-mely. Wherefore this place enterpretateth the other. And therefore we ought not to gather moze of those wordes of Paul then that such cleansing, is a token whereby we iudge of the worthines or of the vnworthines of the vessels in the Church. It is God which knoweth truly what maner of one euery man is, and his foundation standeth firme: for it can not be deceaued. But we can not iudge of others but only by certayne tokens and effects. And this is it which Christ ad-monisheth, By their fruites ye shall know them. Neither do they rightly vnderstand the Apostle, which by these wordes, If a man keepe himselfe cleane from these things, teach, that it lieth in our will, to make our selues vessels of honour. For the strengthes of our free will are not proued by propositions hipotheticall or hauing conditions, that we should thus inferre, the holy scriptures teach, that if ye shall do this or that, or if ye shall beleue, ye shall haue saluation: Wherefore we can of selues beleue or liue holily. Suche conclusions are weake: for God in another place teacheth, that he will make vs able to walke in his wayes. Preceptes therefore and exhortations, and conditions are to that end added, that we should vnder-stand, what is required at our handes, and what maner ones they shall be, which pertaine vnto God, and shall obtaine eternall life. Wherefore we ought not out of these places to gather what our owne strengthes are able to do. But it is easy to declare, why men that are purged of God, are notwithstanding said to purge them-*

themselves. For God worketh not in men as stones, and stones are moved without sense and will. But God when he regenerateth men, so cleanseth and reneweth them, that they themselves both understand those things which they do, and also about all things desire and will the same, after they have once received a fleshy hart for their stony hart. Wherefore after they are once regenerate, they are made workers together with God, and of their owne accord they bend themselves unto holynes and unto purenes of life. God by Moses commaunded the Israelites to sanctify themselves. And yet in an other place he manifestly testifieth, that it is he which sanctifieth the people. And Paul unto the Corinthians sayth, that Christ was made unto us wisdom, righteousness, redemption and sanctification. God also commaundeth us to beleue: and yet the scriptures in an other place testify that faith is the gift of God. By all these things therefore it is very manifest, how little this place maketh for our aduersaries, which way soeuer they turne themselves. Besides all this the scriptures do not only teach y<sup>e</sup> predestination is not of works foresene, but also plainly teach y<sup>e</sup> contrary. For Paul as we see in this epistle pronounceth of those twines, before they were borne or had done eyther any good or any euill, it was sayd, The elder shall serue the younger: also, Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated, that it should not be of workes, but of him that calleth. Wherefore he denieth that either the loue or hatred of God commeth of workes. But they are worthy to be laughed at, which after this sort cauill, that Paul in deede excludeth workes already done, but not those which are to be done. For they see not that Paul in this place goeth about to remoue all maner of difference from those two brethren, that we might fully vnderstand, that they were utterly like as touching their persons. For when he declared that they were bozne of one and the selfe same father, and of one and the selfe same mother, y<sup>e</sup> they were brought forth also both at one burthen, his meaning tended to no other end but vnto this, by their equality to shew, that the election of God is free, so that it laye in him to elect the one and to reiect the other. But if there had ben only this difference left as touching workes foresene, then should Paul in wayne haue put so great an equality. Wherefore Paul sayth vniuersally, not of workes: in which words he comprehendeth as well workes to be done, as workes already done. And that we mought the more surely vnderstand this, he addeth, But of him that calleth. Wherefore Paul sendeth vs vnto God, and not vnto workes. And if a man diligently consider all those things which follow in this chap. he shall see that the Apostle draweth those thinges which he teacheth of predestination to these principall pointes, namely, vnto power: For he saith, Hath not the potter power? vnto purpose or good pleasure, for vnto the Ephesians he vseth both words: vnto will, for he saith, He hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. vnto mercy or loue, for he saith, It is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth: but of God that hath mercy. Also, Iacob haue I loued, but Esau haue I hated. Being Paul what cause soeuer he eyther here or in any other place geneth of predestination, reduceth them to these foure principall pointes, can we doubt of his meaning? or shall we take vpon vs to geue sentence otherwise? But as touching workes he speaketh not so much as one worde, wheresoeuer he entreateth of this matter, but onely to exclude them. Farther consider this, that there is nothing more against the scope and meaning of Paul, then to put workes foresene to be the causes of predestination. For by that meanes workes shoulde be the causes of iustification. But that doctrine the Apostle hath in this Epistle by all manner of meanes oppugned. And I hereby proue this reason to be firme, because the Apostle maketh predestination to be the cause of vocation, and vocation, the cause of iustification. Wherefore if workes be causes of predestination, they shall also be causes of iustification. For this is a firme rule among the Logicians, whatsoever is the cause of any cause, is also the cause of the effect. Farther no man can deny but that god workes procede of predestination. For we are sayd to be predestinate, that we shoulde be holys and blame-

God maketh the godly cleane, & they are said to make themselves cleane.

The scripture teacheth that predestination is not of workes foresene.

A cauiltie ouerthrowne

Unto what principall pointes, the predestination of God is reduced.

Iustification should come by workes, if election should depende of workes foresene.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the Good

workes are
the effectes
of predesti-
nation.
Against the good vse of
of free will.

He which is drawen,
was before
unwilling.

Workes can not be the causes of our calling.

If we should be predestinate
by workes,
the exclaima-
tion of Paul were to no purpose.

The question is assop-
led, when it is reduced to the highest cause.

Now the questiō may be said to be assopled &
not to be assopled.

blameles. And God by predestination hath prepared good workes, in which we should walke. And Paul himselfe confesseth that he obtained mercy to be faithful. Wherefore if workes be the effectes of predestination, howe can we then say, that they are the causes thereof: and chiefly those kinde of causes, which are called efficient causes: for, that vse of free will is nothing worth, which they so often boast of, as though we haue it of our selues, and not of the mercye of God. For Paul sayth, that it is God which worketh in vs both to will and to performe. And God in Ezechiel sayth, I will take away from them theyr stony hart, and wil geue vnto them a fleshy hart. We can not (saith Paul) thinke any thing of our selues, as of our selues. And if we had in our selues that good vse which they speake of, what shoulde let but that we mighte gloze thereof: Andoubtedly the Lord sayth, No man cometh vnto me: vnles my father draw him. And Ierome against the Pelagians excellently wel writeth, that those which are sayd to be drawen, are by that word signified to haue bene before withstanding, resisting and vnwilling, but afterward God so worketh, that he chaungeth them. This selfe same thing also doth the nature of grace proue. For Paul sayth, That the remnantes might be saued according to the election of grace: & is, according to gracious or free electiō. For so is the genetive case after & Hebrew phrase to be resolved. Farther in the definition of predestinatiō in & first place we haue put this word purpose: which seing it signifieth nothing els (as we haue declared out of the Epistle vnto the Ephe.) but the good pleasure of God, thereby it euidently appeareth, that from no other where, must we seeke the cause of predestinatiō. For ouer workes can not be the causes of our vocation, and much les of our predestinatiō: for predestination goeth before vocation. And that workes are not the causes of vocation, is declared by the Epistle vnto Timothy. God hath called vs (saith Paul) with his holy calling not by our works, but according to his purpose, and the grace which we haue in Christ before the times of the world. Whereby it most manifestly appeareth, that workes are not the causes of our calling. Yea neither also are workes the causes of our saluation: whiche yet were farre more likely: for by good workes God bringeth vs to felicity. But Paul to Titus sayth, that God hath saued vs, not by the workes of righteousness, but according to his mercy. Farther what needed Paul after this disputation to cry out, O the depth of the riches of the wisdom & knowledge of God: how vnsearcheable are his iudgements, and how vnaccessable are his waies? For if he would haue followed these mens opinion he might with one more word haue dispatched the whole matter: and haue sayd, that some are predestinate, and other some reiected, because of the workes which God foresaw should be in both of them. Those men Augustine in mockage called sharpe witted men, which so trimly and so easily saw those things which Paul could not see. But say they, & Apostle in this place assoileth not & questiō. But it is absurd so to say: especially, seing & he brought it in of purpose, & the soluciō therof serued very much vnto & which he had in hand. And how in Gods name can he seme not to haue assopled the question, when he reduced that euen vnto the highest cause? namely vnto the will of God. And therewithall sheweth that we ought not to go any farther: when God had appointed limitics at the fote of the mounte Sina, if any man had gone beyond those limitics, he was by the law punished. Wherefore let these men beware, with what boldnes they presume to go further then Paul would they should. But they say, that the Apostle here rebuketh the impudent. Be it so. But yet is this rebuking a most true solution of the question. For Paul by this reprehension prohibiteth vs, not to enquire any thing beyond the mercy and will of God. If these men meane such a solution, which may satisfie humane reason, I will easily graunt that the question is not in such sorte assopled. But if they seeke & solution which sayth ought to embrace and to rest therein, they are blind if they se not the solution. But let vs se what moued these men, to say that workes foresene are the causes of predestination. Andoubtedly that was nothing els, but to satisfie humans iudgement: which thing yet they haue not attayned vnto. For they haue nothing to answer touching an infante, which being grafted into Christ, dieth in his infaney. For if they will haue him to be saued, they must nedes confesse that he was predestinated. But forasmuch as in him followed no good woorkes, God doubtles could not foresee them. Yea rather this he foresaw: that he should by his free will doo nothing. But y is more absurd, which they obiekt that God foresaw, what he would haue done, if he had happened to liue longer. For humane reason will not so be satisfied. For reason will complayne, for some that are ouerhipped and reiected, for those sinnes which they haue not done, and especially therefore, for that they should haue committed those sinnes if they had liued. For ciuill iudges punish not any man for those sinnes which they would haue committed if they had not bene letted: And that God is nothing moued with those woorkes which men would haue done, Christ playnly declareth whehe entreateth of Corosaim, and Bethsayda, and Capernaum. If (sayth he) the thinges which haue bene done in thee, had bene done in Tire and in Sydon, they had doubtles repented: and those cities had bene at this day remayning. Behold God foresaw, that these nations would haue repented, if they had sene and heard those things which were graunted and preached vnto these cities. Seeing therefore that they perished it is manifest that God in predestinating followeth not those woorkes, which men would haue done if they had liued. Neyther yet ought any man to gather out of this sentēce of Christ, that they by themselves, euen by the strength of free will could haue repented. For as we haue in other places taught, repentaunce is the gifte of God. But the meaning of that place is, that God added not those means to conuert these men, wherby they mought haue bene moued.

 These men suppose, y euen by nature is a distinction in men, which y election of God soloweth. Neither consider they, y all men are bozne the sonnes of wrath: so that as touching the masse or lombe wherout they are takē, there can not be put in the any difference at all: for whatsoever good cometh vnto vs, y same wout al doubt cometh fro God & from grace. And y in the nature of mē is not to be put any difference, y Apostle declareth euē in this selfe same chap. For when he would declare that the one of the two bzytheren was taken, and the other reiected only by the free will of God: first he vsed an example of Isaac and Ismael.
 But when in these two it mought be obiekted that there was some difference, for that the one was bozne of a free woman, and the other of a handmaydē, afterward he brought two bzytheren that were twines, Iacob and Esaū, which had not onely one and the selfe same parentes, but also were brought forth both at one and the selfe same tyme, and in one and the selfe same trauaile. And as touching woorkes there was no difference at all betwene them. For as the Apostle sayth, Before they had done eyther good or euill, it was sayd, The elder should serue the younger: Agayne Iacob haue I loued, but Esaū haue I hated. What nede was there that Paul should so diligently alledge these thinges, but to make those two bzytheren equall in all poyntes as touching nature: which doubtles had bene to no purpose, if still there had remained so much difference in woorkes foreseene. Wherefore it soloweth, that whatsoever difference is in men, the same dependeth only of the will of God: For we all otherwise are bozne obnoxious vnto sin. Further if there should be any thing of our selues which mought moue God to predestinate vs, that should chiefly be sayth. For Augustine also, when he was yet young, neither so greatly nor thorowly acquainted with this question, thought that God in predestination and reprobation hath a respect vnto faith, and vnto infidelitie: whiche sentence Ambrose before him and Chrysostome had embraced.
 But in very deede neither also can it be attributed vnto faith. For faith also cometh of predestination. For it is not of our selues, but is geuen of God: and that not rashly, but by his appoynted counsel: which may easely be proued by many places of the scriptures. For Paul vnto the Ephesians writeth, By grace ye are sa- ued through faith: and that not of your selues: for it is the gifte of God, leaste anye man should

The aduer-saries satis-
 fie not by mane reason.

God vnto
 some addeth
 not such means whi-
 che mought
 moue the to saluation.
 As touching nature, there is no difference in mē,

Faith foreseene can not
 moue God
 to predesti-
 nate vs.

By the Scripture
is proued
that faith is
of God.

If faith be not the cause of pre-
destination,
much les other works

Our works cannot be of more wor-thines, then
predestina-
tion.

What which is constant & certaine, dependeth
not of that which is uncertaine &
unconstant.

We must not so defend our liberty,
that we
spoil God of his liber-
tie.

We must goue vnto God that liberty whic
che the scripture genereth
vnto him.

should boast. And againe in the selfe same Epistle; Charity and sayth from God the father through Iesus Christ. And in this Epistle vnto the Romanes, As God hath de- uided vnto euery man the measure of sayth. And vnto Timothy, I haue obteyned mercy, that I might be saythfull. Vnto the Phillippians, Vnto you it is geuen, not only to be- leue in Christ, but also to suffer for his sake. In the Actes, God opened the hart of the wo- man that sold filkes, that she mought geue bede to those things which wer spoken of Paul. And in the 13. chapter, They beleued as manye as were ordeyned vnto eternall lyfe. Christ also sayth in the Gospel, I confesse vnto thee O father of heauen and earth: that thou hast bidden these thinges from the wise and prudent, and hast reueled them vnto in- fantes, Euen so father: bycause it hath so pleased thee. And in an other place, Vnto them (sayth he) I speak in parables, that when they feare they should not heare, and when they se, they should not se: But vnto you it is geuen to vnderstand. And vnto Peter he sayd, Blessed art thou Simon Bariona, for fleshe and bloud hath not reueled thys vnto thee. And there are many other testimonies in the holy scriptures, wherby is proued that sayth is geuen and distributed of God only. Wherefore it can not be the cause of predestination. And if sayth can not, the doubtles much les can works.

Howeuer no man can deny, but that the predestination of God is eternal. For Paul to Timothe sayth, That God hath elected vs before the times of the world. And vnto the Ephesians, Before the foundations of the world were layd. But our works are temporall: wherefore that which is eternall can not come of them. But they vse to cauell, that those workes in whose respect we are predestinated, are so to be take as they are foresene of God: and by this meanes they can not seme to be temporall. Graunt that it were so: let them be taken after that maner. Yet can it not be denied, but that they are after predestination, for they depend of it, and are the effectes thereof, as we haue before taught. Wherefore after these mens doctrine, that which cometh after should be the efficiente cause of that which went before. Which thing how absurd it is, euery man may easely vn- derstand. Further the efficient cause is of his owne nature more worthy and of more excellency then the effect, especially in that it is such a cause, wherfore if workes be the causes of predestinatiõ, they are also more worthy & of more ex- cellency then predestination. Howeuer predestinatiõ is sure, cõstãt, & infallible: How the shall we appoint y it depēdeth of y workes of free will, which are vn- certaine & vncõstant, & may be bowed hither & thither, if a mā cõsider the particula- ly: For men are alike prone vnto this or y kinde of sinne, as occasions are offred. For otherwise if we will speake generally, by reason of the sinne of the firste pa- rentes, free will before regeneration can do nothing els but sinne. Wherefore ac- cording to the sentence of these men, it must needes follow, that the predestination of God, which is certaine, dependeth of the workes of men, which are not onely vn- certaine, but also are sinnes, neither can they say, that they mean of those workes which follow regeneration. For those (as we haue taught) spring of Grace and of predestination. Neither do these men consider, that they to satisfie humane reason and to auouch I know not what liberty in men, spoyl God of his due power & liberty in electing: which power and liberty yet the Apostle setteth forth, and saith that God hath no les right ouer men then hath the potter ouer the vessels whiche he maketh. But after these mens sentence God can not elect but him only, whom he knoweth shal behaue himselte wel: neither can he reiect any man, but whom he seeth shal be euill. But this is to go about to bring God into an order, and to make him subiect vnto the lawes of our reason. As for Erasmus he in vaine speaketh a- gainst this reason. For he sayth, that it is not absurde to take away from God that power which he himselfe will not haue attributed vnto him: namelye, to do any thing vniustly. For we say, that Paul hath in vaine yea rather falsly set forth this liberty of God, if he neither haue it, nor will that it should be attributed vnto him. But how Paul hath proued this libertye in God, that place whiche we haue cited most manifestly declareth.

They also to no purpose object vnto vs the iustice of God: for here is entreated only only of his mercy. Neither can they deny, but y they by this their sentence do rob God of a greate deale of his loue and good will towarde men. For the holy scripture when it would commend vnto vs the fatherly loue of God, affirmeth, that he gaue his sonne, and that vnto the death, and that then when we were yet sinners, enemies, and children of wrath. But these men will haue no man to be predestinated which hath not good woorkes foreshene in the minde of God. And so euery man may say with himselfe, If I be predestinated, the cause thereof dependeth of my selfe. But an other, which seeth truly in his harte, that he is freely elected of God for Christes sake, when as he of himselfe was all manner of wayes vnworthy of so greate loue, will without all doubt be wonderfullye inflamed to loue God againe. It is also profitable vnto vs, that our saluation shoulde not depende of our woorkes. For we oftentimes wauer, and in liuing vp rightly are not very constant. Doubtles if we should put confidence in our owne woorkes, we should vtterly dispayre. But if we beleue that our saluation abideth in God fixed and assured for Christes sake, we cannot but be of good comfort. Farther if predestination shoulde come vnto vs by our woorkes foreshene, the beginning of our saluation shoulde be of our selues: against which sentence the scriptures euery where cry out. For that were to raise vp an idoll in our selues. Whereouer the iustice of God, shoulde then haue neede of the externe rule of our woorkes. But Christ sayth, Ye haue not elected me, but I haue elected you. Neither is that consideration in God which is in men, when they beginne to loue a man, or to picke out a frende. For men are moued by some excellent gifts wherewith they see a man adorne. But God can finde nothing good in vs which first proceedeth not from him. And Ciprian saith (as Augustine oftentimes citeth him) that we therefore can not glory, for that we haue nothinge that is our owne, and therefore Augustine concludeth, that we oughte not to parte stakes betwene God and vs, to geue one parte to him, and to keepe an other vnto our selues touching the obtinment of saluation: for all whole is without doubt to be ascribed vnto him. The Apostle when he writeth of predestination, hath alwaies this ende before him, to confirme our confidence, and especially in afflictions out of which he saith, that God will deliuer vs. But if the purpose of God shoulde be referred vnto our woorkes, as vnto causes thereof, then could we by no meanes conceaue any such confidence. For we oftentimes fall, and the righteousness of our woorkes is so slender, that it cannot stand before the iudgement seate of God. And that the Apostle for this cause chiefly made mention of predestination, we maye vnderstand by the Chapter of this Epistle. For when he described the effectes of iustification, amongst other things he saith, that we by it haue obtained the adoption of sonnes, and that we are moued by the spirit of God, as the sonnes of God, and therefore with a valiant minde we suffer aduersities: and for that cause euery creature groneth, and earnestly desireth to be at the length deliuered. And the spirit it self also maketh intercession for vs. And at the last addeth, That vnto them that loue God all thinges worke to good. And who they be y loue God, he straightway declareth. Which are called (saith he) according to purpose. These seke Paul to make secure: that they shoulde not thinke that they are hindered, when they are exercised with aduersities: for that they are foreknowne, predestinated, called, and iustified. And that he had a respect vnto this security, those thinges declare whiche follow: If God be on our side, who shalbe against vs? Who shall accuse against the elect of God. First by this methode is gathered, that the aduersaries much erre supposinge that by this place they may inferre, that predestination commeth of woorkes foreshene. For Paul before that gradation wrote these woordes: To them that loue God all thinges worke to good: as though foreknowledge and predestination whereof he afterwarde maketh mention shoulde depende of that sentence. And to this purpose they cite this sentence out of the Proverbes of Salomon, Those that loue me, I loue. Neither consider they (as we haue said) y Paul in this place entredeth to declare who they are vnto who it is geuen to loue God, and to haue all thinges to worke vnto them to good. And those he saith are they, which are by the predestination of God elected

W. 19

A loue towards God is kindied
of the true feeling of pre-
destination.

The consideration of
the election
of God, and
of the election of man
is diuers.

Vnto God
is all whole
to be ascribed.

If predestination shold
depend of woorkes, it
shoulde
make vs
not to hope but to dis-
payre.

In which woordes of Paul the ad-uersaries are deceiued.

A place of Salomon.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

The loue of God spring-
geth not of our loue,
but contra-
rily.

Of the comparison of God to the potter.

God worketh according to his will, & not according to oures.

The mercy of God is more declared, if we be predestinatē fre-
ly, then if of woorkes.

elected. And as touching Salomon we also confesse, that those whiche loue God, are againe loued of him. But this is now in question, whether the loue of God where- by he embraceth vs do spring of our loue, or no. This thinge doth Iohn by expresse wordes declare in his Epistle, Not, (saith he) for that we haue loued him: He hath first loued vs. The second thing that we gather of these wordes of Paul, is, that the predestinatiō of God, if it be of this force, to confirme vs touching the good wil and loue of God towarde vs, can not depende of our woorkes. For our woorkes are both weake, and of mosse slender righteousnes. Farther this is to be considered, that Paul kept not in silence those causes which might be geuen: for he expresse- ly putteth the ende: namely, that the mercy and iustice of God might be made ma- nifest. But when he commeth to the efficient cause, he will haue vs so fully to stay our selues on the will of God, that he compareth God to a potter, and vs to clay. In which comparison he declareth, that there is nothing whiche oughte farther to be enquired of. I know that the aduersaries say, that that comparison is brought one- ly to suppress the malepertnes of the demaunder: not that the matter is on either behalfe in very dede so. For God electeth men by woorkes foresene. But if it so be, how then by this similitude shall the mouth of the murmurers be stopped. For they will saye, if the iustice of God requyre thys, that election be of woorkes foresene, what needed Paul to saye. *Before they had done eyther good or euill, it was sayde. The elder shall serue the younger? Iacob haue I loued, and Esau haue I hated? Agayne, Not of woorkes, but of hym that calleth, that election mighte abide firme accordinge to purpose? And why is this similitude of the potter brought, when as the thinge it selfe is farre otherwyse? and neyther doth God as a pot- ter do all thynges as please hym: neyther are we as clay vtterly without differ- ence? doubtles by this reason of these men, the malepert demaunder is not re- pressed: yea rather there is offred an occasion of cueling, for that the similitude which is brought serueth not to the purpose. There is also an other sentence of Paul vnto the Ephesians, wherby is strongly confirmed this our sentence. For whē he had said, that we are predestinated according to y purpose of God, he added, By the power whereof he worketh all thinges according to the counsell of hys wyll. But if it were so, as these men imagine, God should not worke all thinges accor- ding to his will, but according to the will of an other. For as we should order our woorkes, so should he moderate his election: and that is to be led by an other mans wil, and not by his own. This self thing testifieth Paul to the Corinthians, saying: *God hath chosen the foolishhe, weake, and vile thinges of thys world, to confound the wise, mighty, and noble men. Looke brethren (saith he) vpon your vocation, not many wyse men, not many mighty men, not many noble men are called: And in the selfe same epi- stle, when he had described the former estate of the elect, & had reckoned by a great many & greuous sinnes, at the length he added. And these thinges were ye, but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified. And vnto the Ephesians, *Ye were (saith he) once with- out God, without hope in the world. These thinges proue that the vocation and pre- destination of God depend not of our merites. But as Augustine writeth vnto Simplicianus, God ouerhippeth many philosophers, men of tharpelwit, & of nota- ble learning: he hath also ouerhipped many, which if a man haue a respect vnto ciuill maners, were innocentes, and of a good vertuous life. Neither doubtles is this to be meruailed at. For if God to this ende predestinateth to make mani- fest the riches of his mercy, that is soner accomplished if he bring to saluation those, which both more resist, and by reason of their desertes of life are more stranger from it: then if he should elect those whom humane reason may iudge to be more mete. Hereof it came, that Christ gathered the flocke of his disciples out of sinners, publicanes, and vile men: neither disdaind he to call vnto hym chylren and harlots. In all which men, what consideration, I beseech you, was there to be had vnto merites? Paul also writeth vnto the Corinthians, We preach Christ crucified, vnto the Iewes in dede an offence, and vnto the Grekes, foolishhenes: but to them that are called both Iewes and Gentiles, Christ the power of God, and wisdom of God. We see also in this place, wherehence the Apostle seeketh the difference when he affirmeth that some thinke well of Christ preached, and some ill. For all this he saith commeth wholly of vocation. For he sayth, But vnto the called, as if he should haue said, They which are not called haue Christ for an offence, and for foolishnes. But they which are called, do both follow him, and also embrace him for the power and wisdom of God. In the prophets also when God promisseth that he will deliuer his people, he sayth not, that he will do it for their workes or merites sake: but I wil do it (saith he) for my names sake. From this reason Paul departeth not. For he sheweth that God by predestination will make open the riches of his glory, that all men might know, how little the Jewes had deserued this election of God, that other nations being overhipped, they alone should be counted for the people of God. Which thing Steuens expresth in the Actes of the Apostles, when he saith, That they had euer resisted God, and had bene alwayes stiffnecked. What good workes then did God see in them, to preferre that nation aboue all other nations. Ezechiell notably describeth, howe God looked vpon the people of the Jewes at the beginning, namely, as vpon a maiden naked, and on every side defiled, and filthily wrapped in bloud. I passed by sayth the Lord: and when I saw thee in that case, I had compassion of thee. Farther let vs remember what is the scope of the Apostle in this epistle. For if we will iudge vprightly of controuersies, we must not cast our eye of fro the scope. This was the scope of the Apostle, by all maner of meanes to commend the grace of Christ. And to this purpose can nothing moze be a let, then to affirme that the predestination of God, that is, the head and fountaine of grace commeth of the workes of men. And if it be counted a fault in orators, if in their oration they peraduenture inculcate things which should much hinder the cause which they toke in hand, how can we suspect that the holy ghost prestid not in that, which he began, but speaketh thinges strange from that which he purposed. Neither doubtles can there be any other reason geuen of the members, then of the head, which is Christ Iesus. Seing therfore that no man can doubt, but that the sonne of God toke vpon him humane nature freely: For if the question should be asked, why he rather toke vpon him man of the virgen Mary, then any other man, there can no reason be geuen, but for that it so pleased him. For as touching workes, any other man bozne of an other virgen might haue had them, no les then he which was bozne of Mary. For whosoener had had the diuinity, as Christ had, he should doubtles haue done the selfe same workes which Christ did. Seing therfore that that humanity was taken of the son of God freely, & of the pure & mere mercy of God, euen after the self same maner, whosoener are the members of Christ are elected freely and without any merites of workes. Finally all those reasons which proue that iustification consisteth not of workes, the same also proue that predestination dependeth not of workes. Now resteth to declare, whether Christ and his death may be sayd to be the cause of predestination. Here we answere, that Christ and his death is the first and principall effect of predestination: for amongst those thinges which are of God geuen vnto the elect, is Christ himselfe and the fruit of his death. For whatsoener is geuen vnto vs, is deriued vnto vs from God by this way, and as it were through this pipe. And forasmuch as it is certaine, that the effects of predestination may so be compared together, that one may be the cause of the other, but vnto none of them agreeth to be the beginning of predestination, therfore we deny that Christ as touching his humanity or death is the cause of our predestination: although he be the beginning and cause of all good thinges, which come vnto vs by the purpose of God. I know that there haue bene some, which haue gone about to conciliate the sentences of the fathers with this most true doctrine, which we haue now by many reasons proued. For they say, that the fathers, when they write that predestination is of workes foresene, by the name of predestination do not vnderstand the worke or action of God, whereby he electeth or predestineth any man, but rather the end and cer-

W. iij.

taine

The difference of the beleuers & of the vnbelleuers, dependeth of vocation. God said that he would deliuer his people not for their workes but for his name sake. The Jewes were not of God preferred before the Gentiles for their workes.

The son of God toke vpon him freely humane nature.

As iustification is not of workes. so neither also is predestination. Christ and his death is the first effect of predestination. Christ as touching his humane nature and death, is not the cause of predestination.

Sentences of many of the fathers
agree not fully with this doctrine.

It is not true that they say all whole is not
of God.
It is not true also that God electeth, because of faith fore-
sene.

We must geue sentence according to the scriptures, & not according to the fathers.

If election
be free, why is there added a respect
vnto works

ταπεινοφρο-
συνη.

ταπεινοφρο-
συνη.

Harp meet not that we was elected for any her
merite.
The song of Harp setteth forth
the mercy
of God and not merites

taine meanes, for as touching them nothing can let, but that workes may be causes. For it is without all doubt certayne that the last damnation commeth of workes, as of the cause: and good workes spring of faith, as of their beginning. I see in dede that the intent of these men is not to be discommended, which labour to apply the sentences of the fathers vnto the truth as much as is possible. But yet that which they auouch, I can not affirme to be true. For there are certaine sentences of the fathers so hard, that they can by no meanes be drawen to this meaning. For they, to defend the liberty of our will, will not haue all thinges to depend of the predestination of God: And of purpose say, that all whole is not of God but somewhat also is required of vs. And they expessedly write, that God electeth some, for that he foresaw that they should beleue. They haue also here and there many other such like sayings, so that I by no meanes can see, how their sentences can agree with our doctrine in this point. Howbeit Augustine fully agreeth with it. Ierome also disagreeth not from it, although oftentimes in many places he agree with Origen and others. But against the Delagians he highly commendeth the sentence of Augustine touching this matter, and exceedingly alloweth his wri-tinges against this heresy. Seeing therefore that Augustine oftentimes vsed this argument against the Delagians, it must nedes be, that the same very well pleased Ierome now being olde. Ciprian also, as we haue besore sayd, manifestly writeth, that there is nothing which is ours. Wherefore it folloiweth of necessity, that all whole is of God. But howsoever it be, there is no nede, that we should at this present much reason touching the fathers. For when I interpreted the text it selfe, I aboundantly spake of them as the opportunity of the place serued. As in all other things which pertayne vnto faith, so also in this question, we must geue sentence according to y<sup>e</sup> scriptures, and not according to the fathers. And this self thing euē the fathers themselves required at our hands. Which I thinke we to our ability haue performed in alleadging of reasons. Amongst the latter writers Pig- ghius, being forced by the vehemency of the scriptures, graunteth vnto vs that workes are not causes of predestination, for he confesseth, that it consisteth freely and of the mere mercy of God, with a respect yet (saith he) vnto workes: which thing I suppose he sayd, least he should seme in vaine to haue with so many words contended. But if predestination be free, and do depend of the mere goodnes and mercy of God, as the scriptures testifie, why durst this man of his owne head imagine this new respect of workes? For the holy scripture, and especially Paul utterly excludeth workes from this matter. But Pigghius the more to betwray that his vile desire of contending, bringeth certaine arguments which make vtterly nothing at all to the matter. That (saith he) which as touching election happened in the blessed virgen the mother of God, ought in others also to take place: but she was not predestinated freely, but because of her humility: For she sang, For he hath looked vpon the humility of his handmayden: Wherefore the selfe same thing ought to take place in others. I meruaile doubtles how this man saw not, that there is great difference betwene ταπεινοφροσυνη, and ταπεινοφροσύνη. For ταπεινοφροσύνη, is a vertue, which the lattines call modestia, that is modesty: whereby men haue a lowly and moderate opinion of themselves: vnto which vertue is opposite pride or arrogancy. But ταπεινοφροσυνη, is a vilenes and basenes which commeth vnto men either by reason of pouerty, or by reason of base blood, or by reason of such other like things. Wherefore the blessed virgen reioysed, and with prayles extolled God, for that he had exalted her to so great an honor, whereas she otherwise was base, obscure, and vnworthy. For she was not (as this man dreameth) a setter forth of her owne merites and vertues, to say that she was therefore elected of God, for that she had deserued it through her humility. And if thou diligently consider the course of that song, thou shalt easely see that she ascribeth all her good things vnto God. Thy mercy (saith she) is from generation to generation. And she addeth: He hath remembered his mercy. Afterward, with mercy she ioyneth the promises. As he spake (saith she) vnto Abraham our father. But I meruaile this good man could not see

sa, that the image of our predestination is to be set rather in Christ, then in the virgen. But Augustine saith, that the humanity of Christ was predestinated and taken altogether frely, and utterly without any respect of good workes. They object also vnto vs the words of the Lord to Samuell. For he when he should anoynt one of the sonnes of Isay king ouer Israell and had first brought befoze him Eliab the eldest, the Lord sayd vnto him: This is not he whome I haue elected: Haue not a regard to the talnes of stature: For men see these thinges which appeare outwardly: But I behold the hartes. Lo, saith Pigghius, this place teacheth that God is moued by the perfection of the hart: and not by outward conditions. But in that history is not entreated of the eternall predestination of God, whereby he hath elected vs vnto perpetuall felicity, there is entreated only of the exalting of a man to a kingdome. As touching which thing God hath set forth vnto vs a notable example, that when we will commit an office or function vnto a man, we haue chiefly a respect vnto the ability and skilfulness which are required to the execution of that office: according to which doctrine Paul also to Timothe setteth forth vnto vs what thinges are to be required in him, which should be chosen an elder or a Bishoppe. God himselfe also in the old testament, hath at large described, of what conditions he ought to be, whom he would haue to be appointed a king. Vnto which seece Peter also semeth to haue had a consideration, who when, two were set befoze him, of which the one was to be placed in the roome of Judas, called vpon God the sercher of hartes, soz that he only knew the mind and hart of him whome he would haue to be chosen. And yet ought we not to thinke, that God findeth in men that hart which he hath a respect vnto. He rather changeth and maketh mete those, whome he will appoint vnto any office: as we rede he did in Saul: of whome we rede, that he was so changed, that he became utterly an other man. For whereas befoze he was simple and rude, afterward he was able to prophesse amongst the Prophets. Which thing soz that it was new and strange, gaue an occasion of this prouerb. What is Saul also amongst the Prophets. Pigghius cauilleth mozeouer, that of this our doctrine will follow, that men will seeke the causes of their damnation not in themselves, but in God, which is a thing both absurd, and wicked. But let this man consider, how this can be inferred of our sentence. For we teach that euery man is obnoxious vnto sinne, and therefore deserueth damnation. Neither euer said we vnto any man, that he hath not in himselfe a most iust cause of hys damnation: yea we both are and alwayes haue bene perswaders vnto all men that when they will take in hand any thing, they seke for counsell no where els, but out of the will of God reueled, that is, out of the holy scripture, and not out of secrecy of the predestination of God. And yet both it not therefore follow, that by this forme of teaching is no vse of the doctrine of predestination. For vnto it then chiefly must we haue a respect, when we are tossed with aduersities, and when through the very force of afflictions we fele that our sayth is weakned. This thing taught Paul in the 8. chapter of this epistle, and therefore he added, If God be on our side who shall be against vs? who shall seperate vs from the loue of God? shall tribulation? Shall anguyshe. &c. Wherefore this doctrine is not so to be left, as though no man can apply it vnto himselfe: It must rather diligently be kept till opportunity shall serue to vse it. Neither is it a point of arrogancy, but of the spirituall wisdom, for a man to vse it in his owne behalfe when nede requireth. Mozeouer Pigghius falsely saith, that those thinges which we speake are against the goodnes of God: as though it should seme a thing vniust, that God should elect vnto himselfe a certaine few, and in the meane time ouerhippe infinite others. For this mought shew (saith he) some cruelty in God: especially if we say that he is offended befoze that any thing is committed against him. But it is mete (saith he) that the purpose of God be reasonable: and yet of his iustice can no other reasons be geuen, but only the workes of them which are predestinated: neither can the iustice of God by any other meanes be defended. Those thinges beare in dede a godly shew, but they much conduce not to ouerthrow that which we haue proued. For first

The image of our predestination appereth in Christ. A place of the first booke of Samuell.

In committing of functions or offices to a man, we must haue a respect vnto the condition of the person.

God findeth not a good hart in men, but maketh it good. An example of Saul.

The cause of our damnation is not to be sought for in God.

What is the vse of predestination.

No creature void of the goodnes
of God.

Many are called but few elected.

Many nations were ouerhipped
but only the Iewes were chose.
The Iewes
were many but yet a remnant only were sa-
ued.

In nature things precious are rare.

We wonder not but at things
rare.

What properly belon-
geth vnto cruelty.

There is great difference betweene me-lancholly and cruelty.

How the iustice of God is to be defended

first to entreat of the goodnes of God there is no creature which can seeme to be void of it. For God perpetually bestoweth many good things, yea even vpon the wicked: For he maketh his Sunne to arise vpon the good and vpon the euill: and raineth vpon the iust and vpon the vniust. And although he do not equally distribute his goodnes vnto all men, yet can he not therfore iustly be accused. For Christ answereth in the Gospell, May I not do with myne owne what I will. If Pigghius think it a thing vnworthy that out of many are chosen few, he moueth this ple not against vs, but against God. For the scriptures manifestly teache, that many are called, but few are elected: and that of many nations only the people of the Iewes was taken of the Lord to be his peculiar people, and that even in y people, although y number of it were such y it might be copared with the sand of y sea, yet a remnant only should be saued. Against those testimonies so manifest, how can Pigghius contende? Do we not see also, that in things naturall, things that are most excellent, are alwayes most rare? For there is greate plenty of comon stones: but of precious stones there is wonderfull greate scarcety. Unprofitable herbes growe euery where: whereas of good herbes there is in a maner greate dearth. And why God will haue to be thus, he hym selfe best knoweth. We may peraduenture suppose, that he therfore doth it, that the giftes of God might be the more commended vnto men. For we are so blockish, that we neuer wonder at those things which are customabie done. But this is nothing but an humane coniecture. But soasmuch as God hath not rendred a reason of his counsell in this thing, I thinke it not our parts to be to curious in seeking a reason. This thing only will I add, that God is not only good towarde vs and louing, but also in him can not be found so much as any shew of cruelty. For this is y nature of cruelty, to reioyce in the punishmentes of other men, and chiefly when innocentes be afflicted. For to take pleasure, namely for that thou seest iustice exercised agaynst the wicked, or to be sory if thou seest them to liue happely, can neyther be ascribed vnto enuy, nor vnto cruelty. For in the prophets, and especially in the Psalmes we see many such affects: which doubtles pertayne vnto zeale, and not vnto cruelty or enuy. And although the purpose of God be reasonable, yea even reason it selfe, yet are not the reasons to be sought for in those which are elected: for that they lye hidden in the most deepe wisdom of God. Whither doth Paul call vs backe, when he crieth out, Oh the depth the of riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God: how incoprehensible are his iudgments, and how vnsearchable are his wayes. Who hath known the minde of the Lord? or who hath bene his counseler? Paul by those wordes teacheth nothing els, but that God indeede by reason of his manifold and infinite wise-dome wanteth not reasons: but yet notwithstanding those reasons are vnto men vnsearchable, for that they are not by him reueled. I wonder also, that Pig-ghius would complayne that the iustice of God should be violated. For, that thing Paul obiecteth vnto himselfe: and yet changeth he not his sentence. Neyther is it any meruayle: for as Paul himselfe testifieth, all this whole matter pertaineth vnto mercy, and not vnto iustice. In which thing yet notwithstanding as Augustine teacheth, we may very well defend, that God doth nothing vniustly. For what so euer he geneth vnto the elect, he geneth it not of an other mans, but of his owne. And whatsoeuer he requirerh of the reprobate, he iustly and by most good right requirerh it: These things had not Pigghius obiected vnto vs, if he had diligently weighed with him selfe the Antithesis, whiche Paul hath put betwene our workes & the purpose of God. For he sayth, Not of works but of him that calleth: that electio might abide according to purpose. He thinketh also that it is absurd that the predestinatio of God should be made so free: for by that meanes he supposeth is layd vpon men necessity: and all consideration of blame is taken away. But this argument pertaineth to our fourth article, where we will entreate of this necessity. Howbeit I meruayle how this could come into his hed, that the consideration of sinne is taken away, if a man put necessity.

As though foresooth any man can auoyde originall sinne: and yet doth it not thereof follow, that such a sinne is not sinne. He addeth mozeouer, that we can not auoyde, but that we must make God an acceptor of persons. But if he had considered, that this fault is then committed, when we are moued to distribute o; to geue iudgment by such circumstances & conditions, which make nothing at all to h cause, he would neuer haue spokē this: for this thing can not haue place in God. For he found not those circumstances and conditions in men: but putteth in them euen such circumstances and conditions as please him. Wherefore no man object vnto him, that as touching election he hath not attributed vnto his person that which belonged vnto it. For God is the autho; of all persons, and of all brightness. But (sayth he) the care and endenoz to liue vprightly is taken away: as though we by this doctrine do make men worse, and do open a window to licentiousnes, and losenes of life. But how strange and false these things are, I suppose it is thereby manifest, for that we alwayes teach, the predestination belongeth not only to h end but also to the meanes. For we are predestinated not only vnto felicity, but also vnto good wo;kes: namely, that we should walke in them, and be made like vnto the image of the Sonne of God. The wicked regard not these things, and euen also without this doctrine liue wickedly. But the godly, for that they haue confidence that they are predestinated, labour by holpe wo;kes to make their vocation sure. And vnto them by this doctrine is opened a window vnto modestye, vnto patience in afflictions, vnto gratitude, and vnto a singular loue towards God. But take away this doctrine, and there is made open not a window, but a greate wyde gate to pride, to ignorance of the gistes of God, to vncertaynty, and doubting of saluation in aduersities, and the weakening of our loue towards God. But these men say farther, that this also maketh very much agaynst vs, for that nothing can light vnder predestination o; reprobation, but that which God willet. But, that God should will sinnes, is to be counted for most absurd and for a blasphemous doctrine. They say mozeouer, that God can not iustly punish, if we committe those things, which he him selfe both willet, and wo;ket. But this must we of necessity say, if we affirme that not only our ends, but also our meanes to the endes depend of the purpose of God. To satisfie this doubt, first let them remember, that it can not be denied, but that God after a sorte willet, o; as other some say, permitteth sin. But sozasmuch as that is done without any coaction of our minde, therefore no man when he sinneth can be excused. For he willingly and of his owne accord committe those sinnes, for which he ought to be condemned, and hath the true cause of the in him selfe, and therefore hath no nede to seke it in God. Farther this is no good comparison which these men make betwene good wo;kes and sinnes. For God so wo;ket in vs good wo;kes that he ministreth vnto vs his grace and spirit, whereby these wo;kes are wrought: for those are the groundes of good wo;kes: which groundes doubtles we haue not of our selues. But sinnes he so gouerneth, and after a sorte willet, that yet notwithstanding the groundes of them, that is the flesh and our corrupt and vitiate nature are not in God, but in vs. Wherefore there is no nede that they should be powzed into vs by some outward motion. And God is sayd after a sorte to will sinnes, eyther for that when he can he prohibi- teth them not, o; for that by his wisdom he directeth then to certayne endes, o; for that he suffereth them not to burst forth, but when, and how, and to what bles he him selfe will, o; finally, for that by them he will punish other sinnes. But these adde, that God by no meanes willet sinne. For so it is written in Ezechiel, As truly as I liue sayth the Lord: I will not the death of a sinner, but rather that he be conuerted and liue. But we answer that the Prophet in that place entreateth not of the mighty and hidden will of God, and of his will of efficacy. For God by that will wo;ket all things which he will both in heauē and in earth. But he entreateth of that will which they call the will of the signe. For no man can

*Necessity
taketh not away the nature of sinne.*

*The doctrine of pre-
destination openeth a window to good wo;kes
and not to wicked
factes.
The sentence of our aduersaries
openeth a way vnto
many euils.*

*How God
is said after a sorte to will
sinne.*

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

The first answer.

In other
answer.

God doth
not against his will punished wicked actes.

How it is
to be vnderstande that God deceiueth no mā.

They whiche are de-ceiued, are iustly dect-
ed.

Our nature as it was in situated of God was not corrup-
tion.

can by those signes and tokens which are expressed in the law, gather, that God willet his death or condemnation. For the lord commaunded bys lawe to be published vnto all men: he hath vnto all men set forth those things which should be profitable and healthfull: lastly he vpon all men indifferently powreth greates benefices. Wherefore by this will, which we call the will of the signe he willet not the death of a sinner: yea rather he prouoketh them to repentance. But as touching the other will, which they call the will of his good pleasure, if by it he would that no man should perish, then doubtles no man could perish, and there is no will so peruerse, as sayth Augustine, which God if he wil can not make good. Wherefore according to this will he hath done all things whatsoever he would. This is a redy and playne interpretation: which if our aduersaries admit not, but will nedes contend that the wordes of the Prophet are to be vnderstanded of the mighty will of God, and of his wil of good pleasure, the will we answer by sentence pertaineth not vniuersally vnto all sinners, but only to those which repēt. And those are the electe & predestinated vnto whome God as according to his purpose he geueth faith and vocation, so also geueth he repentance. Wherefore which sense so euer they followe, they shall neuer by those wordes conclude, that God vtterly & by no meanes willet the death of sinners, or willet sinne. But they obiect certaine wordes out of the first chapter of the booke of wise dome, where it is witten: God reioyseth not in the destruction of the liuing. But if (say they) he by anye manner of meanes willet sinne or the punishment thereof, he can not be said not to reioyce therein. For he reioyseth doubtles in that which he will haue to be done. First, I aunswere, that that booke is not in the Canon, and therfore the authority thereof maye be refused. But admitte that that booke were canonicall yet do those wordes make nothing against vs. For he, whatsoever he was that was the author of that booke, ment nothing els, but to remoue from God that prauitye of nature, whereby wicked men take pleasure in euil things. And yet was not his meaning that God punisheth wicked factes against his wil. For other wise, whatsoever that author vnder the name of Salomon was, he should be against the true Salomon. For he in his Proverbes vnder the person of wise dome thus writeth of the vngodly and of the vnbeleuers: I also will laugh in your destruction. In which wordes is declared, that God with a laughing, that is, with a chiereful minde administret iustice. As touching the wordes of Ecclesiasticus which are witten in the 15. chapter: That no man ought to say of God, Αὐτός με ἐπαλυνσεν, that is, he hath deceaued me, in which place the lattine translation hath, Me implanauit, vntles we will haue that place to be manifestly repugnant with many other places of the scripture, in which God is sayd to haue deceaued the people by false prophets, and to haue commaunded, that Achab the king should be deceaued, and to haue made blind the hart of the people that they shoulde not see, we must nedes after this manner expounde those wordes, That no man ought to lay the fault in God, as though he woulde excuse himselfe. Achab though he was deceaued, yet he moste iustly deserved to be deceaued, for that he contemned the true oracles of God, and delighted himselfe in false Prophets. The infidelity also and impiety of the people of Israell caused the vengeance of God, and execution to come vpon them, so that when they were deceaued they could by no meanes be excused. Our aduersaries also seeme somewhat to be offēded, for that we affirme, that men haue in themselues the cause of sinnes, that is, a corrupte and viciate nature. For in the first chapter of the booke of wise dome, the generations of the world are sayde to be good, and not to haue in them φάρμακον ὀλέθριον, that is, a medicine of destruction. This is true indeede, so that it be vnderstanded of the first constitution of thinges, and chieflie of the creation of man, which was created of God in a good estate. But after ward thorow his fall he spilt both himselfe and his posterity. Pigghius moreouer canilleth againste our doctrine, as though we stirre vp mē to hate God. For Christ thus speaketh of Judas: Wo be vnto that man, it had bene better for him neuer to haue bene borne. He being reiectēd and a reprobate, it must nedes follow that he hated God, when as God first hated hated him. And soasmuch as the number of the reprobate is the greater number, every man (say they) might easily surmise, that he is one of that number. And so it should come to passe, that many should abhorre from God. But we aunswere, that Christ said wel, that it had bene better for that man if he had not bene borne. For every one of vs ought rather and gladlier to desire, either neuer to haue bene, or to be brought to nothing, then that by committing of sinne we shoulde offende God. Wherefore Christ sayd truly and plainely, that it had bene better for Judas, that he had neuer bene borne. Howbeit simply & as touching God, it had not bene better: for by him both the counsell of God, as touching our redemption was fulfilled, and also by the punishment which was inflicted vpon him both the iustice and power of God appeared the moze manifest. And it is baine that they say, that many fall into suspicion of their reprobation. For out of the holy scriptures no man can gather any argumentes of efficacye, that he is a reprobate. And if God will sometimes reueale it by a certayne secret iudgement, yet cannot that be made a common rule. In our time in daede it happened, that a certayne man in Italy called Francis Spiera inwardly felt that God had inflicted vpon him this euill. But this I suppose was done to the terroz of others. For he after that he had at the beginning knowne the truth of the Gospell, and openly professed it, being broughte to Venice befoze the legate of the Bishop of Rome, publickely abiured it. Afterwarde being stricken with a greuous wounde of conscience, he perswaded himselfe that he had sinned against the holy Ghost. By meanes whereof he was throwne into so greate a desperation, that he woulde neuer afterwarde receiue any consolation, though he were assisted euen by notable and religious men, which exhorted him to haue a good hope of Christ, and of his death. And he woulde saye, that these thinges serued well to be spoken vnto others, but vnto him they nothing at all preuailed, for that he knew most assuredly y he had sinned against the holy Ghost, and y there was no remedy remaining to deliuer him from damnation, and so remaining in this desperation he died. God would in this man by a certayne singuler and vncustomed dispensation feare away others from the like wickednes, and impietie. Howbeit this neither customably happeneth, as farre as we can gather out of histories, neither also can any man by the holye scriptures gather this desperation. And peradventure God did not put this into the heade of Spiera, but the Deuill (whose bondslaue he was, hauing now renounced piety) to the ende to driue him to vtter desperation. Wherefore we must make a distinction as we befoze admonished that either we speake of them that are vtterly without all feeling of piety, or els of the godly, and of them that are now called. If we speake of those that are straungers, they either nothing regarde these counsels of God, or els they are alreadye in dispayre of themselves: If we meane of the godly, they will not suffer themselves to be any longer tormented with this suspicion, for that they now see that they are called, that they haue obteyned faith, and therefore are iustified, all which thinges moue them to haue confidence, and to hope that they names are in the roule of the elect. Lastly Pighius imagineth, that we speake things absurd, for that we teach that men were first in a masse vitiated and corrupted with originall sinne, befoze that they were predestinated of God, as though we would here by iustifie the purpose of God: when yet notwithstanding we in the counsell of predestination put condemnation, and eternall infelicity befoze sinnes, and our corrupt nature, and so we iustefy that which is first by that which cometh after: he addeth also, that by this meanes as touching the purpose of God euen by our owne doctrine the ende is first appointed, and those thinges also whiche bring vnto the ende. Wherefore soasmuche as originall sinne is one of the meanes whereby we are condemned, it cannot as we imagine go befoze reprobation, when as it falleth and is comprehended vnder it, is a meane vnto eternall condemnation. But these thinges declare, that this man vnderstode not what we say. Neyther Augustine nor we euer sayd, that originall sinne goeth befoze predestination, when as predestination is befoze al eternity, but Adams fall was in time. Neyther is it so absurd

Whether it
had bene better for Judas that he had ne-
uer bene
borne.

No man
hath a certaine and infallible argument of his reprobatio.
An example of Frances Spiera.

The godly suspect not that they pertaine to the number of the reprobate.

Pighius
vnderstand-
eth not our sentence.

Originall
sinne goeth
not before
predestina-
tion.
Sinnes
how they fall vnder re-
probation.

Originall
sinne goeth
before euery mans dam-
nation.

A fond imagination of Pighius.

as he imagineth, that sinnes should fall vnder reprobation, not indeede as the cause thereof, but as the cause of condemnation, and of eternall misery. And whereas he saith, that if it were so, it should follow, that God willeth sinnes, we haue before declared how this is to be answered vnto. Neyther can he deny, but that God willeth sinnes, which are continually committed, to those endes whiche he himselfe hath appointed. And soasmuch as this is not done of him rashely, but by his appointed counsell, how can it be, that after a sort sinnes are not comprehended vnder reprobation? For we if he contendeth that God willeth not sinnes neither is the cause of sinnes, in such sort as he willeth good works, & is the cause of good works, we also affirme the same. But yet in the meane time let him cease to count it for a thing absurde, that both the ende and also the meanes either of predestination, or of reprobation are comprehended vnder the purpose of God, although after a diuerse manner. And as touching originall sinne, we also affirme that it goeth not before predestination or reprobation, but of necessity followeth it: for that God would not produce men out of any other stocke or matter, but out of the progeny of Adam, by meanes wherof we are all borne infected with the spot of corruption. And soasmuch as this was not hidden from God, therefore Augustine, and we also with hym saye, that God from eternallie purposed to haue mercye on those whome he loued, and not to haue mercye on others whome hee loued not: so that if they whiche wante that mercye whyche is bestowed vpon others, do leade theyr life in originall synne, and when they are come to age and to the vse of reason, do adde vnto it many other sinnes, then are they iustly and woorthely condemned. And this may strongly be sayd to repell those, which peradventure presume to lay the cause of theyr damnation, not vpon theyr owne sinne, but vpon God.

Wherefore originall sinne goeth before the birth of all men, so that thou haue a respect vnto euery perticular man: it also goeth before the damnation of all the wicked, although it could not be before the eternal purpose of God, but only as touching foreknowledge. These thinges being as we haue declared them, as they are in no case absurd, so also may they well be perceaued, if we depart not from the sence of the scriptures: which sence how much in this place Pighius overpasseth by meanes of his owne fond inuencion, I will in few words touch. He maketh many degrees or actes in the minde of God, which he setteth in order betwixt them selues, not in dede by distinction of time, but by distinction of nature, and therefore such actes he calleth signes: and yet had he not that out of the holy scriptures, but borrowed it out of Scotus. In the first signe (sayth he) God appointed to bring forth all men to eternall saluation, which they might haue fruition of together with him, and that without any difference: and ouer them he would haue Christ to be the hed, whome he thinketh also should haue come in the flesh, although the first man had not sinned. In the second signe he sayth, that God foresaw the fall of man, by reason whereof it was not now possible that men should come vnto saluation, that is, vnto the end, which God had purposed in him selfe, when he decreed in the beginning to create man. Howbeit that the matter might go forward, he sayth, that God did put in the thirde signe remedies in Christ, namely, of grace and of the spirit, and such like, wherby might be holpen those which would receaue them, and those forsake which should refuse them. Lastly in the fourth signe for that he foresaw that manye would embrace these aydes, and would vse them well and actiuelly, he therefore predestinated them to saluation: but others whome he saw would reject these benefites of God, he adiudged to better destruction: this he speaketh touching them that be of ful age. But soasmuch as by this fond imagination he could not satisfy as touching infantes which perishe before they can haue the vse of free wil, he patcheth thereunto an other fable: namely, that they after the iudgment shalbe in this world happy with a certayne naturall blessednes, wherein they shall continually prayse God, and geue thanks vnto him for that theyr estate is so tollerable. So this man sayneth a doctrine, which he can not proue by any one one word of the scripture. For how attributeth he vnto God, that he in the first signe decreed those things which should not haue successer. Namely, that al mē should enioy felicity. Is it the poynt of a wise man, I will not say of God, to decree or will those things which shall take no effect? Let him also bring forth some oracles of God to declare vnto vs, that the sonne of God should haue taken vpon him humane flesh, although man had not sinned. But he is not able in any place to shew any such thing, when as the holy scriptures euery where testify vnto vs, that he was geue for our redemption, and for the remission of sinnes, which thing also mought haue taught him if he had considered, that originall sinne went befoze all the effectes of predestinatiō, only creation excepted: when as Christ was to this end predestinated and geuen vnto vs, that we might haue a remedy of our falles, of all which falles originall sinne is the head and principall. And he had not taken vpon him humane flesh, if there had bene no sinne committed. He without the scriptures also imagineth, that it lieth in the power of our free will, to receaue the remedies being generallie set forth, when as this is the most absolute gifte of God. And that whiche he last of all bringeth, namely, of the naturall felicity of childzen, is not only auouched besides the scripture, but also is playnly against it, which teacheth that all perish in Adam, vnles they be reuued by the mediator. But, to perish, or to dy, how repugnant it is with felicity, al men easely vnderstand. And besides that he hath not on his side one of all his fathers whiche durst imagine any such fond deuises. Neyther can I be perswaded, that Pelagius him selfe if he were a liue agayne, would more diligently colour his opinion, then this man hath paynted it and set it forth. That which we haue hitherto proued touching predestinatiō, namely, that it dependeth not of workes foreseene, the selfe same thing also affirme we of reprobation, for neither it also dependeth of sinnes foreseene, so that by reprobatiō we vnderstand not extreme damnatiō, but that most depe eternal purpose of God of not hauing mercy. For Paul writeth alike of Esaue and Iacob: Before they had done any good or euill: it was sayd, The elder shall serue the younger, Iacob haue I loued, but Esaue haue I hated, that it should not be of workes, but of him that calleth. And Wighius labourereth in vayne, to haue this sentence of Paul vnderstanded of one of them only, that is, of Iacob: when as the Apostle ioyned them both together vnder one and the selfe same conditiō. Which thing he more manifestly afterward declareth, saying, He hath mercy on whome he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. Further if sinne were the true cause of reprobation, the should none be elected. Vnto as God foreknoweth that all men are contaminated with it. Which selfe thing Augustine proueth vnto Simplicianus.

But now we will entreate of the third article, to see what are the effectes of predestination and of reprobation. And we will be the briefer, for that those thinges which shalbe spoken haue much light by those thinges whiche haue already bene spoken. The first effect therfore of predestination is Christ him selfe, for the elect can haue none of the giftes of God vnles by our sauiour it be geuen vnto them. Then also let there be put those effectes which Paul describeth in the 8. chapter when he sayth: Whome he foreknew, those also hath he predestinated, who he hath predestinated, those also hath he called, and whome he hath called, those hath he iustified, and whome he hath iustified, those hath he glorified. Whereby it is euident, that vocation also, and iustification, and glorification are the effectes of predestination: whereunto also may be added conformitie of the image of the sonne of God, when as Paul reckoneth it by as an effect of predestination. God workes also may be added, seeing that God is sayd to haue prepared the that we should walke in the. The followeth certaynty or confirmation of our saluation, which certaintie of what sort it is, we will declare in the 10. chapter. Lastly is the declaration of the riches of God, which ende Paul manifestly mencioneth in this 9. chapter, and vnto the Ephesians he writeth, That we might be to the prayse of his grace and glory. But as touching reprobation if it be compared vnto the first man, God from eternally decreed to produce hym, that by free will, and cer.

God appointeth not those thinges which shall haue no successer. Christ had not come vnlesse sinne had ben committed.

Infants perish vnlesse they be reuued by the mediator.

If sin were the cause of reprobation, no man should be elected. What are the effectes of predestination. Christ is the first effect of predestination.

Effectes of reprobation. Of the first of the first man.

Whether
the first mā
were of the number of the predesti-
nate, or of the repro-
bate.

sayne grace geuen vnto him he mought haue stode if he had would: and God could haue geuen vnto him greater grace, so that he could not haue fallen, but he would not. But whether Adā were of the number of the reprobate, or of the predestinate, can not be gathered out of the holy scriptures, although all the fathers in a manner consent that he was saued, and therefore pertained to the number of the predestinate. But other men which were reprobated, were offered vnto God in a masse of perdition and utterly corrupted. For God decreed to produce them not els where, but out of the seede of Adam and sozasmuch as by his free purpose he would not bestowe his mercy vpon the multitude which is made reprobate, therof followed refection, wherby they were left in theyr natie sin. Further sozasmuch as God suffreth not his creatures to be idle, they also are perpetually pricked forward to worke: and for that they were not healed, they do all thinges of theyr corrupt ground: which although they seme sometimes to be beautifull workes, yet before God they are sinnes. Moreouer according as theyr wicked faces deserue, God continually punisheth in them sinnes by other sinnes, as vnto the Romanes many are sayd to haue bene deliuered by into a reprobate minde, for that when they knew God they glorified him not as God. But yet as touching the sinne of the first mā, this is to be considered, that that sinne could not be sayd to haue bene the punishment of an other sinne. For if it were the first sinne, it had not any other sinne before it: and that God utterly willed not that sinne, that can not be sayd, for agaynste his wil how coulde it be committed? And he saue that he woulde fall if he were not confirmed with his spirit and with a more plentiful grace, and yet he holpe him not, neither put he to his hand to kepe him from falling. Moreouer the deuil, vnles God had would, durst not haue tempted him. Furthermore he had appointed by him to declare his goodnes and severity: hereof he gaue an occasion, when he set a law, which he knew should not be kept, and also in geuing him a wife which should entise him. And finally the action it selfe which as a subject or matter sustained the prauation of brightness, could not without the power and might of God haue bene produced. Therefore it is euident, that God after a sort willed that sinne, and was some way the authoz hereof, although that it were not a punishment of sinne going before. But contrariwise he is sayd not to haue willed it, and not to haue bene the authoz of it, for that he prohibited it, punished it, and willed it, not simply, but for an other ende: he of himselfe ministred not prauity, neither infused he it into him, but the wil of Adam not being letted by a more mighty grace, of his owne accord declined from brightness. Esay also bringeth as an effect of reprobation, the blinding and making grosse the hart of the people, that they should not vnderstand. And God oftentimes, either by himselfe or by euil angels sendeth cogitations, and offereth occasions, which if we were bright mought be taken in the best part: but for as much as we are not renewed, we are by them brynged vnto euil: afterwarde iustly and woorthely foloweth damnation for sinnes: and finally the declaration of the power and iustice of God is the last effect of reprobation. All these thinges folloio reprobation, although God, as we haue before declared, is not a like the cause of them all. But because al the benefites of God which are geuen vnto the predestinate, are referred vnto grace as to their hed and fountain, therefore let vs see, whether that principall effect of Gods predestination be, as some haue imagined, set forth of God comon vnto al men: for if it were so, then should al men be predestinated, & it should lye in their owne power, or in their own handes (as the saying is) to be predestinated, so y they would receaue grace whē it is offered. We in no wise say, y grace is comon vnto al men, but is geue vnto some, and vnto others according to the pleasure of God it is not geuen. And to confirme this sentence we alleadge these places of the scripture. In the 6. of John it is sayd, No man cometh vnto me, vnles my father shall draw him. And I wonder, that the aduersaries should say, that al men are drawen of God, but

God is not like the cause of all the effects
of reprobation.

Whether
the grace of God be set forth as common vnto
all men.

all

all men will not come. As if a man should say, no man can attaine vnto learning or good artes, which is not endued with reason and witte. And yet doth it not thereof followe, that though all men haue reason and witte, all men should attayne vnto good artes, for besides those grounds are required an endeuor, and wil. So say they all men are drawen of God, but besides the drawing of God there is required, that we haue a wil thereto and do geue our assent, for other wise we are not brought vnto Christ. But doubtles it can not be that in all those propositions whiche are spoken with an exception, that exception should belong vnto all men. For Christ said vnto Pilate, Thou shouldest not haue power against me, vnles it were geuen thee from above, that we therefore take vpon vs to say that vnto all men was geuen power against Christ. And wher as it is writte. That no man shall enter into the kingdome of heauen, vnles he be of water and the spirit borne agayne, that we thereof inferre, that all men are borne agayne of water and the spirit. And when the Lord sayth, ye shall not haue life in you vnles ye eate the fleshe of the sonne of man, and drinke his blood, that we thereby vnderstand, that all men eate the fleshe and drinke the blood of the Lord? And if this ought not so to be, why wil these men, when we say, No man cometh vnto me, vnles my father shall draw him, therof inferre that all men are drawen vnto the father? We rely if a man consider the course of the text, he shall see that this sence cannot stand. After that he had made mencio of the eating of his fleshe, & of drinking of his blood, the Jewes were by reason therof offended, & the disciples went their way. Upon occasion wherof Christ said, No man cometh vnto me, vnles my father shall draw him, which he ought in no case to haue said, if he had ment only to reprove the of infidelity. He should not doubtles haue made mencion of the father, as though he drew them not, if he do bestow this gift vpon all men. And Augustine when he interpreteth this place saith: Why he draweth this man, and draweth not that man, do not thou iudge if thou wilt not erre. In which words he declareth that all men are not drawen of God. And in the selfe same chapter it is written, Euery one that my father geueth vnto me, shall come vnto me: Wherefore if all men were drawen, they should all come vnto Christ. And in the same place it is written, Entry one which hath heard of my father, and hath learned, cometh vnto me. Wherefore seeing that many come not vnto Christ, thereby is declared that many neither haue heard nor learned. And in the 10. chapter when Christ had sayd, that he is the shepherd, and hath his shepe, amongst other thinges he sayth: Those whome the father hath geuen vnto me, no man can take out of my handes. But we see that many fall away from saluation, and therefore we ought to thinke, that many are not geuen of the father vnto Christ. But here also the aduersaries cauille, that although no man can take them away yet notwithstanding men of their owne accord may depart away. As if a man had seruants being himselfe a Lord of great might, he mought doubtles say, no man can take away these seruants from me: but they may of their owne accord depart from me. But how bayne this their cauillation is, the words which follow, declare. For Christ addeth, That which the father hath geuen vnto me is greater then all. By which words he declared, that therefore those whome he had receaued of the father, could not be taken away from him, for that he is most mighty: wherefore if they which are in Christ can not be taken away by others, neither also are they able to withdraw themselves: not that they are compelled by force, but by the way of perswasio, it is of necessity that they abide. Which self thing the Lord also spake touching the temptation of the latter times, namely, that the elect should be deceaued if it were possible. In the selfe same 6. chapter of John Christ sayd, That no man cometh vnto him, but he vnto whome it is geuen of the father. Which place hath one and the selfe sence with that other sentence wherin he said, No man cometh vnto me vnles my father shall draw him. And John Baptist, as it is written in the 3. chapter of John when he heard of his disciples, that Christ baptised many, answered, that no man can receaue any

Whether as are drawen
of God.

A similitude.

A cauillatio

A similitude.

It is of necessity that the predestinate do abide.

The reueling of Christ is not common vnto
all mē.

A cauilla-
tion.

Repentance
is the gift
of God.

Grace is not to be put as nature.

thing, vnles it be geuen him from heauen. And in the selfe same chapter, The spi-rite bloweth where it will: which thing although it be spoken of the winde, yet not withstanding is it applied vnto the holy ghost which regenerateth. For to declare the force of the holy ghost the similitude is taken of the nature of the winde. But this is moze manifestly set forth in Mathew, when it is said, No man knoweth the father, but the sonne, and he vnto whome he will reuele hym. In which place we are taught, that the reueling of Christ is not geuen vnto all men: which thing Christ in the selfe same Euangelist declared, when turning him vnto the father he said, I geue thee thanks o king of heauen and of earth, for that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent men, and hast reueled them to infantes. Here also is declared that the reuealing of true doctrine is not common vnto all men.
But if thou wilt say, that therefore it is not reuealed vnto the wyse men, for that they wyll not receaue it: The wordes whiche followe do not render thys cause, but rather declare that the wyll of God hath so decreed. For it followeth, For so hath it pleased thee. And agayne, when the Apostles enquired why he spake in Parables vnto the people, he answered, Vnto you it is geuen to knowe mysteres, but vnto them it is not geuen: and he sayde, that he so spake vnto them, that they seeing shoulde not see, and hearinge shoulde not vnder-stand. And he cited a prophesie out of the sixte chapter of Esay, wherein was commaunded, that the people should be made blind, and that theyr hart should be made grosse, lest peradventure they shoulde be conuerted, & God shoulde heale the. Moreouer y apostle citeth out of y booke of Exodus God thus speaking, I wil haue mercy on who I wil haue mercy, and wil shew compassion, on who I wil shew cōpassion. Also y which is writen of Pharao, To this ende haue I raysed thee up, that I mighte shewe in thee my power. And he saith also that some vessels are made to honoz, and some to confume-ly: Which wordes most evidently declare, that grace is not set forth common vnto all men. Peter also in the Actes of the Apostles sayd vnto Simon the sozcerer, Repent, if peradventure God forgue vnto thee this thought. But they saye that in this place Peter doubted not, but that grace is common vnto all men, but he was vn-certaine whether Simon would receiue it, and earnestly repent. But this subtle diste nothing helpeth them, for as the Apostle teacheth vs vnto Timothe, euen repentance also is the gifte of God. For he admonisheth a Bishop to kepe fast sound doctrine, and to reprove them that resist, If peradventure God geue vnto the to repent.
Whereby is concluded, that it lieth not in the handes of all men to returne into the right way, vnles it be geuen them of God. Moreouer some sinne againste the holy ghost, who are not pardoned, neither in this world nor in the world to come.
Wherefore it is manifeste, that vnto these men grace is no longer set forth, nor common. And in the Actes of the Apostles, God is laide to haue opened the harte of the womā that solde silkes, to geue heede to those thinges which Paul spake: which is spoken as a certaine thing peculiarly geuen vnto that woman. And this place maketh that plaine which is writen in the Apocalips, Behold I stand at the doore, and knocke, if any man open vnto me. &c. For we are sayd to open, in as much as God worketh that in vs: for he maketh vs to open, and it is he whiche geueth vnto vs to wozke our saluation, as it is said vnto the Philippians. And in the Gospel it is many times writen, that many are called, but few are elected. Paul also declareth the liberty of the spirite, in distributing his giftes whē he sayth vnto the Cor. That one and the selfe same spirite distributeth vnto all men, as pleaseth him. Which sentence although it may be vnderstanded of frē gifts & gracious (as they cal the) & other gifts also, yet may it no lesse be transferred vnto the grace wherby we are reued vnto saluation: whēas God is a like frē in the one, as in the other. Lastly whilēt these men thus make grace common vnto all men, they conuert it into nature, whiche thing in no wise agreeth with the doctrine of the holy scriptures. And howe muche they are deceued, hereby it may easily be proued, for that, they seeke of these things to inferre that it lieth in euery mans power to receaue grace when it is offred vnto them, which in no case agreeth with the holy scriptures. For Paul sayth, that we are not able to thinke any thing of our selues, and that all our sufficiencie is of God. And vnto the Phillippians he writeth, that God woorketh in vs both to will and to performe according to his good will. And vnto the Corrinthians, when he had saide, that he had labored much, he added, not I, but the grace of God which is in me. In this Epistle also he writeth, that it is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Which could not be true, if it lye in our will, to receaue grace when it is offered. Touching which place Augustine to Simplicianus in his first booke and second question saith, that the meaning of those wordes is not, as though it is not sufficient for vs to will, vnles God ayde vs with his grace, for by that meanes he moughte contrarywise haue sayd, It is not of God that hath mercy, but of man that willet. But the sence is, as it is written vnto the Phillippians, that it is God which woorketh in vs to will and to performe. And it is true, that we in vaine will vnles God haue mercye and helpe. But who will say that God in vaine hath mercye, if we will not? In Ezechiell the Prophet it is sayd, that God himselfe would chaunge our hartes, and in steade of stony hartes geue vs fleshy hartes. And Dauid in the Psalm singeth, Incline mine hart O God vnto thy testimonies, to declare that it pertaineth vnto God to bow our wills: which thing he in an other place ment, when he sayd, A cleane hart create in me O God. And in the booke of wisdom it is written, that no man can haue a chaste hart, but he vnto whome God shall geue it. And Christ most manifestly taughte, y an euill tree cannot bring forth good frutes. Wherefore so long as men are not regenerate, they can not bring forth frute so good, that they should assente vnto grace when it knocketh. Wherefore first it is necessary, that they be chaunged of it, and that of euill plantes they be made good. As in the generation of the fleshe, no man whiche is procreated any thing thereto helpeth: So also is it in regeneration, for that there also we are bozne againe through Christ, and in Christ. Whereouer if we should geue place vnto the sentence of these men, all boasting shoulde not be excluded: for euery man mought boast of that his owne acte, whereby he receaued grace when it was offered. Furthermore seeing that this apprehension is by faith according to our sentence, but as they thinke, by charitye, what will they do? Will they deny that faith and charitye are the giftes of God? Augustine also reasoneth, that as in Christ the diuine nature tooke humane nature freely, not wayting for the consent therof: so they which are iustified, are not iustified by theyr owne will or assent. The same father also noteth, that eternal life is in the scriptures somtimes called by the name of a rewarde, for that good woorkes do go befoze it. But grace (saith he) and rightousnes are neuer in the holy scriptures called by the name of a rewarde, for that befoze it goeth no good woork acceptable vnto God. And vnto the Rom. Paul writeth: I know that in me, that is, in my flesh dwelleth no good: Where, by fleshe he vnderstandeth, whatsoever is in a man not yet regenerate. And dare they notwithstanding attribute vnto man, being yet in the flesh, that is, not yet regenerate, so much good, that he is able to apply saluation vnto himselfe? And vnto the Corrinthians, What hast thou (sayth he) which thou hast not receaued, and if thou hast receaued, why boastest thou, as though thou haddest not receaued? Neither wil we suffer these men to runne vnto creation, for here we speake not of the soule, or of the powers therof, that is, of will or vnderstanding, which we had of God by creation: but of that action or woork which these men seeke to picke out of free will to the receiuing of grace. And soasmuch as they say that they haue this of theselues, they manifestly speake against the Apostle. For the Corrinthians mought haue answered, thou demaundest of vs, what hath seperated vs, what haue we that we haue not receaued? Behold we now shew vnto thee that act and assent, wherby we freely and by our own power receaue the grace which thou preacheest vnto vs: this hath seperated vs from others: and so Paul had in vaine in such sorte reproued the, Whereouer if grace were set forth as common vnto all men, as these men teache, what shoulde we pray vnto God for the conuersion of infidels? Doubtles we so do, for that we beleue that it lieth in the hand of God to open theyr hartes if he wyll. Neither must we thinke, as these men saine, that God geueth vnto euery man so
are

A. iij.

It lieth not in our power to receiue
grace when it is offered.

A simile
tude.

Grace and rightousnes
are neuer called a reward.
What flesh signifieth in
the holy scriptures.

Why we pray for infidels.

much

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

Whether God do
geue vnto
euery man
so much
grace as is sufficient.

Type and Sydon, wā
ted that which sufficed.
The aduer-saries are compelled to say that no man is elected of God.

To the arguments of the aduersaries.
Outward
calling is common to the predesti-
nate and to the repro-
bate.

much grace as is sufficient to moue them, so if that were sufficient, they shoulde without all doubt be moued. For if there were set before a mā a great heuy thing, and he being willing to moue it had in him so much strength as were sufficient, that is, as might ouercome the waight which is to be moued, the doubtles there would follow motion. So if God (as they say) would in very deede moue the hartes of the wicked, & would geue so much strength, that is, so much grace, as shoulde suffice, yea rather as much as shoulde exceede the hardenes of the wycked harte, nothing coulde lette, but that it shoulde be bowed, not in deede by compulsion, but by most effectuall persuation. Augustine vnto Simplicianus in his first booke and 2. question sayth, That vocation is of two sortes, one is common, whereby men are called, but not by one and the selfe same maner whereby they are apt to be moued and conuerted: others are called, as they are apt to be moued, neyther. sayth he, must we thinke that God could not so haue called Esaū as he might be moued and as he might be made apt: for all men are not after one and the selfe same maner moued and allured vnto God. Merely forasmuch as he is omnipotent, he might by his impulsion take away y hardnes which is grafted in vs. But say they, if he would he might and yet wil not God alwayes do that which he can. Let it be so: we say euen the selfe same, that God ouerhippeth some, and will not haue mercy on them, and therefore geueth not vnto all men so much as might be sufficient vnto they saluation. And in those whome he ouerhippeth, he attayneth to that end which he willet: as it is written of Pharao: To this purpose haue I raysed the vp, to declare in the my power, & that my name might be published abroad thorough out the whole earth. Christ knew very well, as he he him selfe testified that Tyre and Sidon, and Sodoma shoulde haue bene moued to repentāce, if he had shewed vnto them the miracles and doctrine which he shewed vnto the Iewes: wherfore forasmuch as he gaue not those thinges vnto the, they wanted that which sufficed vnto saluation. The lord also sayd vnto the Apostles: I haue chosen you, but ye haue not chosen me. But by the opinion of the aduersaries, putting that vniuersall grace, no man shoulde be chosen of God, forasmuch as he shoulde be after one and the selfe same sort vnto all men, yea rather we shoulde chose God, in receauing his grace when it is offred, and we shoulde be potters of the election of God, and shoulde not be formed of him. I haue planted (sayth Paul) Apollo hath watered, but God hath geuen the encrease, that is, life and spirite. But if those thinges shoulde be put common vnto all men, he shoulde rather haue sayd, ye haue receaued vnto your selues, the spirite, life, & grace. The selfe same Apostle sayd, that God had begonne in the Corinthians a good worke, and also would performe the same agaynst the day of the lord. Which wordes playnly declare that all whole is to be ascribed vnto God, namely, to beginne, and to performe. And vnto the Ephesians, He worketh all thinges according to the counsell of his Will, not (sayth he) according to the counsell of an other mans Will. Which thing doubtles he shoulde haue sayd, if euery mā had in his power to receaue saluation, or not to receaue it. Agayne vnto the Galathians, When it semed good vnto him, which seperated me from my mothers wombe, &c. If it were as these men affirme, Paul shoulde haue said, whē it semed good vnto me. For as touching God, they affirme, that grace is alwayes redy, and layd forth vnto all men. Wherfore by they sentence conuersion shoulde then come, when it shoulde please vs. And these argumentes, although many more might be brought, I thinke at this present sufficient. Only now resteth to ouerthrow those reasons which seme to make agaynst vs.

But before we enter into that matter this we say, that we in no wise deny, but that God by outward calling, namely, by his prophets Apostles, preachers, and scriptures calleth all men. For this man is no more excluded from the promises or threatninges then that man: but these thinges are alike set forth vnto all men, although all men are not predestinated to attayne vnto the fruite of them. This is diligently to be noted, if we will redely answere to those thinges which are objected. And when they lay agaynst vs, which thing they very often do do, that the promises are common, and are vniuersally set forth, neither ought to be contracted vnto these men, or vnto those men, and that God dalieyth not in them, but dealeth in god earnest. First as touching vniuersality, I will bring other propositions no les vniuersall: All flesh shall see the saluation of God: All shall be taught of God: All shall know me from the least to the greatest. I wil poure of my spirit vpon all fleshe. Shall we say that these thinges are true as touching all men? no doubtles, vnles Origen's fable should be renewed, that all men shall at the last be saued. They will answer, that these propositions ought to be contracted vnto the beleners, vnto them that are willing, and vnto them that receaue the grace of God. And we also say, that they are to be contracted, but we referre our contraction moze higher, and ascend vnto the election of God and vnto reprobation: and whether resolution I besech you is the perfecter? & whether contraction is of moze equity? And yet do we not say that God dalieyth in these vniuersall promises. For sozasmuch as the predestinate and the reprobate led theyr life together, neyther are they knowen one from an other, it is mete, that preaching should be had vnto all men together, and that for the reprobate the elect should not be defrauded, which by the preaching of the word of God receaue profit. And by this vniuersal preaching God bringeth to effect that end which he himselfe willet. For the godly whē they se that the reprobate are left in their owne sence, and beleue not, thereby vnderstand that grace is not nature: and in them consider what should also haue happened vnto them selues without the mercy of God, whose gift conuersion is, and lieth not in the strength of man. And the vngodly are made vnercusable, when as they haue not so much as perfozmed those outward woꝝkes, which they mought haue done, as it is declared to the Romanes in the first and second chapters. First the aduersaries imagine, that they are setters forth of the mercy of God, for that they put it common vnto all men. But if we consider the matter moze thorowly, we attribute much moze vnto mercy thē they do. For we affirme y al whole dependeth of it, which thing is of thē in the meane time denied, whilest they wil haue it to lye in our power, to receaue the grace of God. And if we say, that mercy is not a like vnto al men distributed, we can not therfore be reppoued, sozasmuch as the scriptures manifestly testify the same. But these men when they say that it lieth in our wil to receiue grace, although they extenuate the same, yet is it in very dede pꝛoued to be much: for what should it profit to haue grace vniuersally set forth vnto al men, vnles a man would by his owne proper wil apply it vnto himselfe? Therfore let them cease to adorne this theyr opinion with the title of the mercy of God. They bring also an other argument: that sozasmuch as God prouideth for al men thinges competēt vnto the life of the body, it is not very likely, that he wil sayle them as touching the preperation of eternal saluation, which he should not do, vnles vnto euery man were set forth so much of the grace of God as is sufficient. But by this theyr similitude they them selues are reppoued: for euen as God geueth vnto euery man corporall life without any theyr assent, so also must they nedes conclude of spiritual life, which thing by al meanes they refuse to graunt. We graunt in dede that God thorough his mercy maketh his Sonne to aryle vpon the good and vpon the euill, and we also confesse, that both the predestinate and the reprobate are partakers of some of the benefites of God. And euen as in this life the commodities of the body and of life are not a like geuen vnto al men: so also predestination vnto eternall felicity is not common vnto al mē. Some are bozne leproous, blind, deafe, solish, most pooze, & utterly vnapt vnto al maner of natural felicity, neither attayne they vnto it at any tyme, wherefore the comparison which they bring maketh very much agaynst them selues. But say they God hath created al men to his owne image, and therfore hath appoynted al men vnto blessednes, wherefore we ought not to say, that some are predestinate, and some are reprobate. That men are made to the image of God we graunt, & that they were able to receaue blessednes: but after the

Whether
sentence as-cribeth
moze to the mercy of God.

The reprobate want
not all the benefites of God.
Many are
bozne vn-
apt to natu-
rall felicity.

Whether al
men haue
power to be made the sonnes of God.

How this to be vn-
derstanded, Christ hath died for all.

The comparison of Adam with Christ
how it is to be understanded.

How God
will haue al
men to be saued.

the fal, nature was vitiated, and the image of God much blotted. Wherefore men can not of them selues attayne vnto felicity, but haue nede to be deliuered from misery. But that God hath now decreed to deliuer al men from misery, and thorough Christ to make them blessed, the scriptures teach not. Wherefore we do not without iust cause say, that he hath decreed to deliuer some, and to leaue other some, and that iustly: the causes of which iustice yet are not to be sought for of our workes, when as they are known to God only thorough his hidden and vnspcakable wisdom. They obiekt this also out of Iohn, He gaue vnto them power to be made the sonnes of God. As though they could thercof inferre, that euery man may be made the sonne of God if he wil. But they geue no hede to those things which folow: for it is added, Vnto those which haue beleued in him, which are borne not of bloude, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the wil of mā, but of God. These things if they be rightly peysed, declare, y this dignity & priueledge is geuen vnto the beleuers and vnto the regenerate: for to haue power geuen to be the sonnes of God, signifieth nothing els. Wherefore this dignity is put as an effect of regeneration and of faith, and not as the beginning thereof, as these men dreame. They alleadge also, that Christ dyed for vs all: and thereof they inferre that his benefite is commō vnto all men. Which thing we also wil easely graunt, if only the worthines of the death of Christ be considered. For as touching it, it might be sufficient for all the sinners of the world. But although in it selfe it be sufficient, yet it neither had, nor hath, nor shall haue effect in all men: which thing the scholmen also confesse, when they affirme that Christ hath redeemed all men sufficiently, but not effectually: for thereunto it is necessary that the death of Christ be healthfull vnto vs, that we take hold of it, which can not otherwise be done but by faith, which faith we haue before abundantly declared to be the gift of God, and not to be geuen vnto all men. This also is obiekted vnto vs, that the Apostle compared Adam with Christ, and said vnto the Romanes, that euen as in Adam we all dye, so in Christ we are all quickened. Wherefore by this meanes they say that the grace of Christ ought vniuersally to be layd forth vnto all men. But if they will so take this comparison, they shalbe compelled to graunt that all shall by Christ be brought vnto felicity, as by Adam all are thowen hedlong into sinne and into death. But seing that the thing it selfe declareth the contrary, they may easely perceane, that this similitude is not to be taken as touching all the partes thereof, especially when as none fall of their owne consent into originall sinne: but those men will not haue grace to be receaued but through a mans owne consent. Wherefore if they admit this difference, how dare they affirme that the matter is on eche side a like? The skope of the Apostle in this comparison is to bee considered, and besides the skope nothing is to be inferred. And in that comparison Paul ment nothing elles, but that Christe is to those whiche are regenerated, the beginning of life and of blessednes: as Adam is vnto them that are deriued of him, the cause of death and of sinne. Howe whatsoeuer is afterwarde besides this scope gathered touching the equalitie of multitude, or of the manner, the same is per accidens, that is, by chaunce, and pertaineth not vnto the skope and substance of the similitude. They obiekt also the sentence vnto Timothe, God will haue all men to be saued. For this sentence Pigghius perpetually inculcath as though it were inuincible, whē yet Augustine oftentimes hath taught, y it may in such sort be expounded, that it bringeth no waight at all to proue those mens fond inuention. First we take it to be spoken of all estats and kinds of mē, namely, that God will haue some of all kinds of men to be saued: which interpretation agreeth excellently well with the purpose of the Apostle. He had commaunded that prayers and supplications should be made for all men, and especially for kings and those which haue publike authoritie, that vnder them we may liue a quiet life in all piety and chastity. And therefore to declare that no estate or kind of men is excluded, he added, that God wyll haue all men to be saued. As if he shoulde haue said, no man is letted by that vocation and degré wherein he is placed, so that that it be not repugnant vnto the word of God, but that he may come to saluation, and therefore we ought to pray for all kind of men. But hereof we can not inferre, that God endueth euery man perticularly with grace, or predestineth euery man to saluation: as in the time of the flood all liuing creatures are said to haue bene saued in the Arke with Noe: for that only some of euery kinde were gathered together in it. Or we may vnderstand it thus, that God will haue all men to be saued, for that as many as are saued, are saued by his will. As if a man should say of one that teacheth Rhetorike in a city, that he teacheth all men. By which kind of speech is not signified, that all the citizens are learners of Rhetorike, but that as many as learne, are taught of him. And this also is like: If a man pointing to the gate of a house, should say, that all men enter in this way, we must not thereby vnderstand, that all men enter into that house, but that as many as do enter, do enter in by y<sup>e</sup> gate only. Farther there are some which interpretate these wordes of the Apostle of the will of the signe, or of the antecedent will: that all men are invited, for that preaching is indifferently set forth vnto all men, neither is there any in a manner, which inwardly seeth not some p<sup>r</sup>icke, whereby he is continually stirred vp to liue well. So that if we haue a consideration vnto this will of God, we will easily grant that he will haue all men to be saued. But they will not haue it to be vnderstanded of the hidden and effectuell will which they call the consequent will: and after this manner may those kindes of speech be vnderstanded, God illuminateth euery man which commeth into this world. Come vnto me all ye which labour and are laden. For all men are prouoked by the oracles of God, and all men are inwardly moued by some p<sup>r</sup>icke. All these interpretations are doubtles very likely, and also apt. And yet is there an other besides these, both reddy and playne. The holy scriptures set forth two societies of men, the one of the godly, and the other of the vngodly, and do of eche society pronounce vniuersall propositions, which ought of the wary reader to be contracted ech to their kinde. The Prophetes say, and Christ citeth the same, All men shalbe taught of God. And all men shall know me from the least to the greatest. Agayne, When I shalbe lifted up from the earth, I will draw all thinges vnto my selfe. These vniuersall propositions, vntles they be vnderstanded of the godly which are elected, are not true. As are these also, I will poure of my spirite vpon all fleshe. And all flesh shall come in my sight and shall worship in Ierusalem. Agayne, All fleshe shall see the saluation of God. Againe also, God lifteth up all them that fall. Now who seeth not that these things are to be vnderstanded only of the Saints? Contrariwise to the fellowship of the vngodly pertaine these sentences: No man receaueth his testimony, and yet many beleued. He shalbe hated of all men. Agayne, All men seeke the thinges that are their owne. Agayne also, All men haue declined, and are all together made vnprofitable, there is none which doth good, no not one. When yet notwithstanding holy men, and they that are now regenerate, are acceptable vnto God, and do endeuor themselves to exhibite vnto him some obedience of the law. But these vniuersall sayings ought not to be extended beyond their society. This distinction had Augustine a regard vnto in his booke de Ciuitate Dei, where he declareth and proueth that there haue ener ben two cities, namely, one the city of God, and an other the city of the deuill. Wherefore in these generall propositions we muste alwayes haue a consideration vnto what order or fellowship of men they pertayne. Whiche thing if we in this present place do, then shall we apply vnto the Saints and vnto the elect this sentence which we are now in hand with, namely, that God will haue all men to be saued: and by that meanes all maner of doubt is taken away. Otherwise that God with efficacy willett not the saluation of all men, very many infantes declare, which perish without Christ, and many also which are borne fowles and deafe, and had neuer in their life time the right and iust vse of reason. And it oftentimes happeneth that some haue liued long time indifferent honestly and faithfully, and yet in the meane time do at the last fall, and being taken out of the world do eternally perish. And contrariwise others, which haue perpetually led their

Two societies of men, whereof eche haue their vniuersality.

Two cities

Sound objections.
against the
aduersaries

their life wickedly, being at the end of their life endued with sodaine faith and repentance, are saued. Whē yet notwithstanding those first mought haue ben take away, that maliciousnes mought not haue chaunged their mindes. Who will in these examples say, that God with efficacy a like willett the saluation of all mē? They object also a sentence of Christ, How often would I haue gathered together thy children, as a hen gathereth together her chickens, and thou wouldest not? But here also is ment of the antecedent will of the signe, whereby God by his Prophetes, preachers, Apostles, and scriptures continually inuited the Jewes, to tye vnto him by repentance, which thing yet they refused to do. But yet God by his will of efficacy which they call the consequent will, perpetually dzeu vnto him those that were his: neither was there euer any age, wherein he gathered not together as many of the Hebrewes as he had predestinated. Therefore Augustine sayde, Those which I would I haue gathered together, though thou wouldest not.

Whether Christ wer letted that he could not gather toge ther his.

How the Gentiles ar said to be in excusable.

They thinke also y this maketh on theyr side, which is writte in the beginning in his epistle cōcerning y Gentils, namely, y they were inexcusable: which they say could not haue bene saide, vnles vnto euery mā were geue so much grace & helpe, as might suffice vnto saluatiō. But this is to be known, y the Apostle in y place en treated only of knowledge, namely, that the Gentils could not excuse theyr sinnes for that they had not a law geuen vnto them of God, as had the Jewes, neither for y God had not in such sort opened himself vnto them, as he had opened himself vnto the people of the Jewes. Ye knew God (saith he) by his creatures, & by the lighte of nature ye wanted not the knowledge of right & of wronge. Therefore ye are inexcusable. Wherefore we must not thinke that this sentence extendeth farther, the wherefore Paul spake it. And if also thou weigh the matter better, thou shalt se that the Ethnikes and vngodly men, against whome the Apostle writeth, thought not that they wanted strengthes to perfoyme those thinges which they knew to be vpright forasmuch as they ascribed all thinges vnto free wil. Wherefore the Apostle very well concludeth against them. As if he should haue saide, do ye thinke that ye haue strength inough, so that ye iudge that ye haue no nēde of Christe? But forasmuch as I haue proued, that ye wanted not knowledge, and haue yet notwithstanding lined wickedly, I do thereof inferre y ye are in excusable. Furthermore infirmity and wante of strengthes excuseth not, seeing that we haue it not in our selues by creation, & by our first constitution, but by the fal and sinne which was brought in into our whole kinde by the firste man. The Ethnikes also were excusable, for that they perfoymed not that in ciuill iustice whiche lay in them to do. Wherefore nothing can be inferred of this place, whiche can proue the sentence of the aduersaries.

They thinke that this also maketh with the, which is spoken in this selfe same Epistle. Is God the God of Jewes onely? and not of the Gentiles also? yes of the Gentils also. The labour of this place to inferre, that God geueth vnto all men sufficient aide, for that he is the God of all men. But they shoulde consider, that Paul there reproboueth the Jewes, for that they thought that the beneuolence and grace of God was so bound vnto them, that the Gentils were vtterly excluded. Wherefore he declared that God hath not onely elected some of the Jewes, but also hath his elect amongst y Gentils. Neither followeth it therfore of necessity, that vnto all y Gentils should be geuen grace which mought suffice vnto saluation, when as neither were all the Jewes pertakers of suche grace. And we speake this, not as though we deny, that God is the God of all men: for we know that euen the wicked also, will they or nill they are subiect vnto him, neither can they auoyde his prouidence whome, although he bring not to eternall saluation, yet at the least way he punissheth for theyr euill desertes. But he is peculiarly said to be the God of them, vnto whome he hath geuen, to acknowledge him for theyr God, and hauing acknowledged him, to worship him. But that place seemeth to be of more difficulty whiche is written vnto Timothy, where God is called the saviour of all mē, and especially of y faithful. In which wordes this word saviour, that is saviour, is to be take, not

God is the God of all men.

Whose god peculiarly God is said
to be.
How God
is the saviour of all men.

as though God geueth vnto all men eternall saluation, but as it signifieth that he preserueth and defendeth all men from many euils, whiche otherwise the Deuill practiseth against them. For so great is his rage against mankind, that if he were not restrained of God, he would destroy all thinges. He would suffer no common wealth nor church, but would bring to nought both goods and al thinges whatsoever pertaine to mans life. Wherefore in such sort is God the Sauour of all men, in that he dyueth away so great euils from men. But as touching eternall saluation, that is to be vnderstanded of the elect onely: and therfore it is added, And especially of the faithfull. For soasmuch as they are predestinated, they aboue all others attaine vnto this benefite.

They wiest that also out of the Prophet Esay, whiche we shall haue a little afterward in this Epistle, All the day long haue I stretched abroad mine handes to a people that beleeueth not, but speaketh against me. Out of which place they can gather nothing els, but that which hath oftentimes bene saide, namely, that all men in vniuersall are invited of God: that the Prophets were sent indifferentlie vnto all men: that the holy scriptures are set forth vnto all men. But this maketh nothing to that grace of efficacy whereof we speake. We graunte also, that he standeth at the doore, and knocketh, and will enter in, if any man wil let him in: but this they should adde that there is no man, which can of himself open, but it is necessary that that be first geuen vnto him of the mere goodnes of him that knocketh.

And to commend also the mercy of God they bringe a sentence of Ieremye, Thoughe a mother can forget her children, ye will not I forget thee. Whiche sentence doubtles very little, or nothing at all pertaineth to this matter, whereof is now entreated. Who euer denied but God is constant of faith, and standeth to his promises and couenantes: This thinge doth God in that place promise of himselfe, namely, that he will not forget his promises. And we also euerie where hetherto haue taught, that the predestination of God is most certaine, wherefore whether this place of Ieremy be vnderstanded of predestination, or of the couenantes and promises, yet doth it not thereof follow that it is to be vnderstanded of all men.

Pigghius also cannot abide that which both Augustine and we saye, namely, that the reprobate do serue the purpose of God, to illustrate and to set forth the power of the seuerity of God, and saith farther that God hath no neede of thys cruell dealing to illustrate his name, whiche thing he laboureth to proue by a certaine sentence taken out of the booke of Ecclesiasticus. But that is thus to be interpreted, That none of vs ought to thinke, that God hath neede of the woorkes of men: for his felicity is perfect and absolute without the aide and helpe of anye creature: But that the iustice of God is made manifest by the vnfaithfulnes & wicked facts of men, when God taketh vengeance of them, who dare deny, when as Paul teacheth that most evidently and plainly.

He citeth also out of the selfe same booke of Ecclesiasticus, God hath mercy vpon all men, and winketh at the sinnes of all men, because of repentance. But the solucion of this obiection evidently appeareth by that whiche hath bene spoken, namely, that these wordes are to be vnderstanded of the vniuersallitie of the electe. For by the winking of sinnes, it is so farre of, that the wicked do aspire vnto repentance, that rather becomming euery day worse and worse, they fall hedlong into more greuous sinnes. But it pertaineth to the predestinate onely, to returne againe into the right way, after that God hath borne some while with them. And touching answering to obiections here will I finish and consequently end the third article. Howbeit this we will in the meane time put you in minde of, that the reprobate may sometimes in some degree do good woorkes, and that the predestinate on the other side may fall into sinnes most greuous. Of the firste parte Saul may be vnto vs an example and firm testimony: for he was at the beginning moderate, hauing a modest opinion of himselfe, as the scripture saith. Salomon also at the latter ende of his age fell greuously, yea he fell away from God, when yet at the beginning he was most holy, and had in his prayers when he was consecrated required those things

things

Whether
the reprobate
do serue
the purpose
of God.

The reprobate
maye
for a while
do good woorkes,
and the predestinate
may on the other syde
fall into moste greuous
sinns.

Cap. 9 A Commentarie vpon the

things which highly pleased God, wherfoze he was also heard. Ahab also repented, which repentance God talking with Helias, commended. And also Ioas the king so long as Ioiada the priest liued behaued himselfe well. Ezechiell also teacheth this selfe thing when he writeth, If a righteous man depart from his righteousness, and liue wickedly, I will forget all his righteousness. Yea and experience it selfe testifieth, that there are many which haue liued indifferent honestly, & yet do at the length in the last time of theyr life perish. Wherefoze it is manifeste, that in the reprobate good woorkes sometimes haue place, which yet come not fro a sincere and perfecte faith but from a fayth, that endureth but for a time: and therfoze they can not simply be said to be good, neither do they in very dede please God, but onely haue a shewe of goodnes, and may as touching outward discipline be praised. And that the predestinate do sometimes mosse greuously sinne, Dauid is a witnes, who committed adultery and murther: Peter also is a witnes, who abiured his sauour. Moses also & Aaron ar witnesses, who as the scripture testifieth committed no light sinne. We dayly also see, that they whiche are peradventure in the number of the predestinated, do fall into horrible crimes. And therfoze we may affirme, that good woorkes do sometimes serue vnto predestination, and sometimes also to reprobation. Predestination by them bringeth the elect vnto eternall life: and as touching reprobation, they are sometimes reasons why the fall is made the greuouser: for they whiche fall away from God, soasmuche as they were by him adorned with good woorkes, as they sinne is moze greuous, so also is theyr punishment moze sharpe. Sinnes also serue both to reprobation and vnto predestination: for they which are reprobate, are by them brought to eternal destructio: they which are predestinate, by the more illustrate the glory of God, when they are deliuered from the. And therby also is ministred vnto them occasion, moze and moze to know themselves, and to acknowledge the benifites that are geuen vnto them of God, and so to geue thanks for them, and to call vpon him for helpe. And yet are not these things so to be taken, that, for that God by his most singular wisdom bleseth these thynges most rightly to our saluatio, we should therfoze sin: we must follow the holy scripture, which commaundeth, that euill things are not to be done, that good may of them ensue.

Good woorkes do serue both vnto predestination, & vnto reprobation.

Sinnes also serue vnto the purpose of god.

Whether of predestination or reprobation be inferred necessity.

What is necessity. Distinctio of necessity.

Now let vs at the length come vnto the fourth article, in which we purpose to entreate of three things in especiall. First, whether by the predestination or reprobation of God is brought vnto vs any necessity: Secondly, if there be any necessity, whether the same do hinder free will: Lastly, whether by the foreknowledge or predestination of God be taken away his iustice, whereby he is sayd in the scriptures to render vnto euery man according to his woorks. These things being thoroughly declared, I trust, the article proposed shalbe fully satisfied. Touching the first part, this we sayd first, that necessity is defined to be that, which can not be otherwise: but the principles or grounds of necessity are sometimes inward, and sometimes outward. Things which of theyr owne nature ar of necessity, & of an inward principle, ether they are simply necessary, as God, and whatsoeuer things if they should be changed include contradiction as they speake. As, that fower is not an euen number, or that fower and three are not seuen. And this is called a geometrical necessity, for that it suffreth no variety. Other things are of necessity of an inward ground, but yet not absolutely and simply, vnles we followe the accustomed course of nature. Fire is sayd of necessity to burne that which is apt to be burnt. And the Sonne also of necessity perpetually moueth: but these are not simply necessary: for God is able to let them & to cause these physical & natural things sometimes to cease from theyr proper operation: as it is manifest of the three children put into the oven of fire, which were not burnt, although the flambe were most great. The Sonne also stayd from his course, whilest Iosua pursued after his enemies. And in y time of Helias it is most likely that there were vapors drawen out of the earth, & out of y sea, and yet for all that for the space of three yeares came not downe out of the cloudes cloudes, deſo, oꝝ rayne. This alſo is manifeſt of Ezechias, that his diſeaſe was by nature to the death. And theſe things ſhall ſuffice touching inward neceſſity.

That neceſſity alſo which cometh outwardly is of two ſortes, the one violent, when things are compelled to abide oꝝ to worke contrary to theyꝝ nature, the other is by ſuppoſition: by occaſion whereof the ſcholemen haue ſayd, y there is one neceſſity of the conſequence, & an other of y conſequent. By which diſtinction they ment nothing els, but that the connerſion is ſometimes neceſſary, although that which is inferred be not of it ſelf neceſſary. The logicians alſo haue thus diſtinguiſhed them, that they call the one a compoſed ſence, and the other a deuided ſence: as, if thou wilt ſay y it is not poſſible that white ſhould be blacke, that will they graunte, if theſe two things be taken coniuually, and together: namely, that one and the ſelfe ſame thing ſhould be both white and blacke, which is by no meanes poſſible: but if they be taken a parte, then it may be ſayd not to be impoſſible. For that which is now white, may be changed and made blacke. Wherefore the ſcholemen thinke, that the whole difficulty of this controuerſy conſiſteth in the neceſſity of the conſequence, and of the conſequent, in the compoſed ſence, and in the deuided ſence. But we for moze perſpicuity will adde an other diſtinction, that there is a neceſſity of certainty oꝝ of infalliblenes, and an other of compulſion. Now let vs moze narrowly ſerch out, how thoſe diſtinctions of neceſſity may be applied vnto this preſent purpoſe.

Fiſt I ſay that our actions haue not neceſſity by an inward principle: for the ground of them is the will, which of his owne nature, that is, as God hath created it, is mutable and flexible vnto eyther part: howbeit they haue neceſſity by ſuppoſition. For that ſo ſone as thou conſidereth the foreknowledge and predeſtination of God, it followeth of neceſſity, that it ſo come to paſſe as it is of God foreknown and predeſtinated. Our will in dede hath an aptnes, that it may alike be bowed to eyther part: but it hath not the action therof, namely, the turning oꝝ bowing, but to that parte only which God hath foreknown. Wherefore the neceſſity ſalleth vpon the connerſion and continuation of the predeſtination of God with our workes: which thing they ment by the compoſed ſence, and by the neceſſity of the conſequence. For our workes, if they be conſidered a parte, and if we only haue a reſpect vnto theyꝝ neceſſary ground oꝝ beginning, that is, vnto the will, are not of neceſſity. Here alſo is confeſſed neceſſity of certainty, oꝝ of infalliblenes, for that God can neyther be changed noꝝ be deceaued. Neyther do we playnly graunt that predeſtination bringeth neceſſity of coaction: for coaction and violence is agaynſt the nature of the will. For if it ſhould vntwillingly do any thing, it ſhould not now be called will, but rather nill (if a man may ſo terme it) which were to deſtroy will. I knowe that the ſcholemen ſtrive amongſt themſelues, whether God foreknoweth thoſe things which he foreknoweth, neceſſarily, oꝝ contingently. But in this contention I will not entermedle my ſelfe, for that there is no ſuch matter ſet forth in the ſcriptures. It is ſufficient vnto me to diſcharge God from all maner of change and alteration, for the contingency and newnes is in the things: but God alwayes and perpetually abideth one and the ſelfe ſame. But that there is ſuch a neceſſity, namely of the conſequence oꝝ of the compoſed ſence, oꝝ of infallibility found in the holy ſcriptures, we will alledge certayne places which evidently proue the ſame, leſt any ſhould thinke it to be but a fayned inuencion. Chriſt ſayd, It muſt needs be that he ſhould be deliuered vnto the Iewes to be mocked. This neceſſity can be of no other thing inferred, but of the definite counſell of God: which thing Peter teacheth in his ſermon in the actes of the Apoſtles. Chriſt alſo ſayd, that it muſt needs be that the ſcriptures ſhould be fulfilled. In Iohn it is written, The ſcripture can not be broken, that is, It is not poſſible, but that it muſt needs be fulfilled. Vnto y Hebꝛues, It is impoſſible, that they which once being illuminated, &c. In which place is entreated of ſinne agaynſt the holy ghoſt, that it is impoſſible that they which are guilty of it ſhould eſcape, for that God hath utterly decreed Neceſſity outwardly put to. Diſtinction of thys neceſſity. A ſence compoſed, and a ſence deuided.

Neceſſity of coaction & of certainty

Our actions haue not neceſſity of inward beginning. Our actions haue neceſſity by ſuppoſition.

The will can not be governed.

Proones of neceſſity by ſuppoſition.

These thin
ges pertain
also to providence.

Whether
our actions
are to be called necessa-
rye or contingent.

perpetually to forsake those which haue so sinned. Christ also sayd of the temptations of the latter times, That the elect also if it were possible should be deceaued. Agayne, Heauen and earth shall passe away, but my wordes shall not passe away. In which wordes is signified, that all those things which God hath spoken epther in the Scriptures, or in his eternall determination, can not be by anye meanes made frustrate. He answered also vnto his parentes, Did ye not know, that it becometh me to worke those things which pertaine to my father? Vnto Timothe Paul writteth, The foundation standeth firme, God knoweth who are his. And in Iohn Whome the father hath geuen vnto me, no man can take out of my hand. Lastly, All things whatsoeuer he would be made, both in heauen and in earth. Wherefore of all these things is gathered, how evidently this necessity of certainty and infalliblenes is set forth in the holy scriptures, nether is it as some thinke a deuise of man. And these things which we haue spoken of foreknowledge, pertaine also to prouidence: for although in this vniuersality of things many things are said to be done by chance, yet notwithstanding because that there is nothing, be it neuer so small, but it is subiect vnto the prouidence of God, therefore also hath it necessity, which we call necessity of certainty, and others call necessity of consequence. And if thou wilt aske: that forasmuch as things may be called partly necessary, and partly also contingent, or free, as we haue declared, whether of these conditions most agree vnto them? I answer, that that most agreth vnto them which is natural and inward. Wherefore forasmuch as the necessity whereof we nowe entreate cometh outwardly, and is onely by supposition, therefore things ought in no wise to be esteemed according to it, but according to those principles or groundes which are vnderstanded of vs: and so our workes, which procede of the will shall be sayd to be free: and those things which are so produced in nature, that also they contrary may come to passe are be counted contingent. Howbeit that necessity of certainty or of consequence which we put is neuer to be denied, nether must we plucke away our workes epther from nature, or fro foreknowledge, or from the prouidence of God. And as touching the will of God we must thinke that it in very dede governeth and moderateth all things which thing is of all men commonly graunted. For although we perceauie and fele, that they by the will decree and elect those things which they are minded to do, yet if they be men godly, they will alwayes saye, This or that will I do, if God will permitte. But if they be men that are yet without the religion of Christ, as were the Ethnikes, yet notwithstanding they alwayes make mention of Fate or destiny, of the three sisters called Parca, or of lot, which thing is oftentimes red in the Poets. Who, if (as we haue before sayd) by the word Fate or such like wordes they vnderstode the connexion of causes, ouer which God himselfe is the ruler, and moderateth and governeth it then is there no hurte in that opinion, although by reason of the abuse of the word, it be better, betterly to abstayne fro it. There are some also which dreame of a certayne fatall mighty and strong necessity affixed vnto the starres, and vnto naturall causes. Which God himselfe can not change: which opinion is erronius, impious, and also strange from the wise men of old time, who expressly declare, that by Fate they vnderstode the will and government of God. The verses of Cleanthes the Stoike which he wrote touching thys matter, Seneca in his 18. booke of Epistles hath turned into Latine. Whose sentence in English is thus.

Verses of Cleanthes touching destiny.

*Leade me (o soueraigne Sire, and Lord, that rulest the heauens hye) Where pleaseth thee: for I obey: to follow speedely.
Lo prest I am without delay. Though loth thou makest me.
Yet groning forward shall I go. And euill while I be,
What being good I might haue done, to do I shalbe fayne.
The willing persons, fates doo leade: unwilling they constrayne.*

Although in these verses be auouched fate, or destinie, yet is the gouernement thereof put in the hand of God: for he calleth vpon the moste high father, and desireth to be led of him. Whose will notwithstanding he affirmeth to be both certain and infallible. The selfe same thing seemeth Homer in his Odisea to haue ment in these verses which are thus in English.

Such is the minde in earthly men, and so themselves they bend, As moues the Sire of men and Gods, that dayly doth ascend.

And when we speake of foreknowledge we exclude not will, for, as we at the beginning admonished, God can not foreknow that any thing shall come to passe, but that which he willett shall come to passe, for there can nothing be, but that which God willett to be, and that which God willett, he also bringeth to passe in vs. For as Paul sayth, He worketh in vs, both to will and to performe. But this will ioyned to foreknowledge, neither inuerteth nor destroyeth things naturall, but so worketh in them, as is agreeing with them: and therefore forasmuch as the nature and propriety of the will of man is, to worke freely and by election, the foreknowledge and will of God taketh not away this faculty or power from it, although his predestination be the cause of all good actions, which are done of the elect, and in the elect. Which thing is not only proued by testimonies of the scriptures, but also the consent of the Church in their prayers affirmeth the same, for thus it prayeth, O God from whence all holy desires, all good counsels, and iust workes do proceede. &c. And sinnes, although after a sort they are subiect vnto the will of God, yet are they not in such sort produced of it, as good workes are. Howbeit this ought to be for certaine, that they also are not done vtterly without any will of God. For permission, which some put, differeth not from will for God permitte that which he will not let: neither ought it to be said that he permitteth vniwilling, but willing as Augustine saith. Wherefore in either kind of workes the will and foreknowledge of God in such sort bleth it selfe, that it ouerthroweth not the faculty or power of mans will. In the predestinate it prouideth, that nothing be of them committed, which may ouerthrow their saluation. And in the reprobate he taketh away from them no naturall power, which pertaineth to their substance or nature, neither compelleth he them against their wil to attempt any any thing: but he bestoweth not vpon them so much mercy nor so much grace as he doth vpon the elect, and as should be needfull for their saluation. But a great many hereat stamble, for that they thinke with themselves, If God haue foreknown that we shall meete together to morrow, then must it needes be that our will was vtterly determinate to this part, otherwise that could not be foreknown. But we answer as we haue already signified, that that determination in in such sort with God, as is agreeing with the propriety or nature of the will. But vnto it, is proper, so to will one part, that of his nature it can also will the other part. Wherefore we confesse that if we haue a respect vnto God, it is appointed and decreed, what we shal do. For his knowledge is not in bayne called foreknowledge for he hath not an opinion of things so that his knowledge can be changed, but hath a certaine and sure knowledge, or science, and there can be no science vnles as we haue said it be certaine and firme. But this determination and certainty of his we both haue said and do say, inuerteth not the nature of things, neither taketh away liberty from our nature. Which thing is proued by this reason. God foreknewe that many thinges are possible, which in very deede shall neuer be: and although they shall neuer be, yet the foreknowledge of God taketh not away from them, but that they are possible. Which thing we will declare by an example of the scripture. Christ when he was taken sayd, I could haue asked of my father, and he would haue geuen me eleuen legions of Angels, which should defend me from these souldiors. Wherefore Christ affirmeth, that it was possible for him to aske, and that vnto him might be granted so many legions of Angels: which yet was neither done, nor was by any meanes to be done. And yet notwithstanding God fore-

lik. iij.

knew

The foreknowledge of God is not to be separated from his will.

The foreknowledge of God ouerthroweth not natures Predestination is the cause of all our good workes. Prayers of the church.

Permission pertaineth vnto will.

Note this that is spoken of the reprobate.

Whether our will be determinate to one part.

Many things are possible which neuer shall be.

knew that it mought haue ben done, and although it should neuer come to passe, yet was it not lettred by foreknowledge, but that it was possible. Wherefore as the foreknowledge of God letteth not possibility, so also taketh it not away contingency and liberty. This necessity of infallibleness is not only declared and proued by the holy scriptures, and by reasons, as we haue now shewed, but also is acknowledged of the fathers. Origen against Celsus in his second booke against the argument of Celsus, which he obiected against the Christians, saying. Your Christ at his last supper foretold, as ye say, that he should be betrayed of one of his disciples: if he were God as ye contend he was, could he not let the doing thereof? Origen here wondereth, and answereth, that this obiection is very ridiculous: for soasmuch as he foretold that that thing should come to passe, if he had lettred it, then had he not spoken the truth: and therefore he added, that it was of necessity, neither could it otherwise be, but that that should come to passe which was foretold. Howbeit because that this foretelling chaunged not the will of Judas, therefore is he worthely accused, neither ought the blame to be layd vpon Christ which foretold it. Origen in that place acknowledgeth either, namely, the necessity of certainty, and that the nature of the will is not lettred. Ambrose also when he interpreteth those words of Paul, Iacob haue I loued, and Esau haue I hated, referreth the sentence of the Apostle to works foreseene, and yet addeth, that it could not otherwise haue come to passe, but as God foresaw that it should come to passe. Chrysostome also expounding that which is writtten vnto the Corinthians, It behoueth that heresies should be, confesseth that this necessity is a necessity of foretelling, which is nothing preiudiciall vnto the power of our will and choyce. Neither is this necessity taken away by certayne places in the scriptures which otherwise at the first sight seeme to put a chaunge of the sentences of God: as is that of Esay, when he threatened vnto Ezechias the king present death, which prophesie yet God seemed to change, when he prolonged his life fiftene yeares. And vnto the City of Binie it was foretold that it should be destroyed within forty dayes: which thing yet came not to passe. Those things in very dede make nothing against the truth before taught: For God foretold vnto Ezechias, death which was euen at hand according to the causes of the disease whereof he was then sicke, and therein was made no lye. But as touching foreknowledge, as God foreknew that the king should be in danger of that deadly disease, so also foreknew he that his life should be prolonged fiftene yeares. And as he foreknew that the sinnes of the Bininites deserued present destruction, so also foreknew he, that of his mercy he would geue vnto them, to repent and to be preserued. By which self rule is to be expounded that place of Jeremy in the 18. chapter, wherein God sayth, that he also would chaunge his sentence, or repent him of the plage which he had threatened to any city, nation, or kingdome, if they would repent. But what shall we say of Paul, who writeth to the Corinthians that he chastised his body, and brought it into bondage, that he might not be made a reprobate. What ment he to chaunge that firme purpose of God? Merely Paul ment not, that he was able to inuert the order of the predestination or reprobation of God: and therefore he sayde not, ne & reprobatus efficiar: that is, that I be cast out as a reprobate, but ne reprobatus efficiar: that is, that I be not a reprobate. For he induozed himselfe by all industry and diligence to bee obedient vnto the predestination of God: for they which are predestinated vnto eternall life, labour to mortifye the flesh. And he sayde that he would not bee made reprobatus, that is, he would not bee founde and accused to leade his life otherwise then he preached: which kinde of vice all men disallowe, detest, and condemne. Wherefore in that place was not entreated of the reprobation of God, but of that kinde of crime, which they are guilty of, whosoever geue good monitions, and in the meane time they themselves leade theyr life most wickedly. Although if a man will needes referre these thinges to the iudgement of God, we might wel graunt the same as touching present iustice or iniustice, but not according to firme purpose, whereof we at this presente entreat.

The certainty of foreknowledge of god is constant, and is not chaunged.

The saints worke wel, to the ende to be obedient vnto predestination. Why Paul chastised his body. It is a dishonesty for a man to geue good monitions & to live wickedly.

treate. Cicero a man other wise full of wit and excellently well learned was exceedingly deceaued in this question, as it is euident by his second booke de Diuinatione: which thing Augustine declareth in his sixeth booke de ciuitate Dei, the 9. & 10. chapters. For he thoughte that it was not possible, that the foreknowledge of things to come should not ouerthrow the faculty or power of mans will: therefore he took away all manner of prediction or foretelling: whiche opinion how much repugnant it is vnto our religion all men vnderstande, when as it is staide vpon the oracles of the Prophets, as vpon sure foundations. And we read not that God did euer any thing, which was of any waight, but that he first reuealed it vnto the Prophets. He shewed vnto Noe the destruction that should come by the flood, long time before it came to passe. Vnto Abraham he foretold the burning of Sodoma; And vnto him he signified the oppression and deliery of his posterity in Egipte. And vnto the selfe same Prophets in a manner he gaue charge to foretell the captivity of Babilon, and the returne from thence. He also commaunded all the Prophets to foretell the comming of Christ. Therefore vnto vs so constant is the authority of propheties, that to deny it, is vtterly to ouerthrow all religion. Wherefore Augustine not without iust cause said, that those men which were called Genethliaci, which auouched the fatal necessities of the starres, were more tollerable than Cicero: for they gaue some place vnto God. But if he be denied to foreknow things to come, therby also is he denied to be God. David saith, the foolish man said in his hart There is no God. Which saying of the wicked he hereby proueth, for that they when they commit wicked facts, thinke that God seeth them not, and that he will neuer punish them. And Cicero hath geue vs occasion to suspect, y he was after a sorte infected with this impiety, for that in his booke de Natura Deorum, he bringeth in Cotta, and the high priest thus reasoning together, that Cotta desired much that he might haue vndoubtedly proued vnto him that there are gods. Howbeit because he saw that it was a thing odious, hatefull, and in a maner infamous to deny that there is a God: therefore towards the end of the booke, he gaue sentence on Balbus side, who defended that there are Gods: but yet he so gaue sentence, that he said vnto Velleius, that the opinion of Cotta seemed vnto him more likely. Merely a Godly man, and one confirmed in religion, woulde neuer say that that sentence is likely to be true, wherein the diuinity is called into doubt. But these are the cogitations or reasonings of our reason whereof Paul abundantly wrote in the first chap. But after ward Cicero himself in his booke de diuinatione vnder his owne person taketh away fro God y foreknowledge of things to come, and maketh answer to Quintus his brother, who had in y whole course of the first booke confirmed oracles and Propheties. But why denied he foreknowledge: was he diuine vnto it therefore for that he saw that he must needs graunt an order of causes and of effectes which should be vnmoueable and constante for other wise things to come coulde not be foretold. Now if suche an order shoulde be graunted, he supposeth that nothing should remaine in our hande and power. But as in God there is to be put a most singular wil ioyned with a most singular power, so also vnto him is to be attributed the knowledge of all thinges: yet let vs not therefore be afearde, but that we do those thinges which we do, by our owne will and choyse. The Stoikes which did appointe fate or destiny, seeme also to haue bene somewhat moued with Ciceros reason, for they did place the motions of the will of man not to be vnder fate or the connerion of causes, Not that they vtterly made free the wil of man, but only they affirmed that in it lay, by the choyce thereof to meddle or not to meddle with some thinges: which if they meddled with straight way they were wrapped into the necessity of fate. By an example the thing may be made more plaine. They say that it was in the power of Oedipus to haue fellowship with a woman, or to temper himselfe therefore. But if he once should haue fellowship w her it could not be auoyded, but that he should committe incest, of which inceste shoulde be bozne children, which shoulde pollute themselves with murdering one the other, and shoulde ouerthrow they fathers kingdome. The auncienter Philosophers, as Democritus and

Cicero was deceiued.

God reueleth vnto Prophetes
the greates
works whi-
che he will do.

The authority of the Prophet is constant.

If God be denied to know things
to come then he denied to bee
God.

Note this that is spoken of Cicero.

Why Cicero denied the foreknow-
ledge of God.

How the Stoikes discharged
the will of man fro fate.

An example of Oedipus

Empedocles affirmed that the will also is subiect vnto fate, or vnto the connerion of causes. But Chrisippus the Stoike hereunto rather inclined, to excepte the will of man, as Oenomaus Cynicus (as Eusebius Casariensis de Preparatione Euangelica citeth him) saith, that Democritus made men bondmen, and Chrisippus halfe bondmen. But leuing these, let vs retorne vnto Cicero who said, If there be foreknowledge, then thinges should in such sort come to passe, as they were foreknown; neither can the euent foreseene be auoyded: so that then the liberty of men is utterly take away. Lawes the are in vaine, admonitions are in vaine, rewards, punishments, and such like thinges are in vaine: wherfore he setteth forth a choyce, that a man should chuse, whether he would rather admytte foreknowledge, or liberty of the will, for that they could not consist both together, as farre as he iudged. And because he was man hauing to do in ciuill matters, and delt in lawes & iudgements, he rather reiected the foreknowledge of God, then he would lose the liberty of the will of man. Wherfore Augustine sayth of him, Those which will be free be maketh sacrilegious persons, so that to defend their liberty they spoyle God of his foreknowledge. *Cicero*s reason was, If the will be free, there can not be a certaine and sure connerion of causes: for if it were certaine, it could not be broken of our will, and if there be no certaine connerion, then can there be put no foreknowledge: and therfore he affirmed that God also foreknoweth not what thinges shall come to passe, for if he should foreknow them, then should there be a certaine and firme order of causes, which being graunted, there should be nothing remayning in the power of our will. But we ought to hold either of these sentences: for of the one we haue by sence experience. For every man may consider in himselfe, how he woorketh by counsels and deliberation, and electeth that whiche pleaseth him. But the other, that is, the foreknowledge of God, we hold by faith, whiche knowledge is of no les force, then the apprehension both of sence and of reason. Wherfore we deny vnto Cicero this consequence. There is a certaine and constante order of causes whiche God foreknoweth, therfore there is nothing in our will. And we therfore deny the argument, for that our will also is to be placed amongst the causes of thinges, yea it hath not amongst them the vnworthiest place. Wherfore euen as God can foreknow, what shall come to passe of other causes, in like sort is he able plainly to see what our willes wil elect. And as in foreseeing other causes and theyr effectes he in no wise destroyeth nor chaungeth the natures of them: so also leaueth he in their full state the willes of men. This also moued Cicero that then nothing should come by chaunce: But soasmuch as very many thinges happen by chaunce and fortune it is manifest that there cannot be a certaine or sure order of causes, neither also any foreknowledge. In this sort reasoned he. But we aunswere, that those thinges which are said to come by chance, or so called thinges coming by chance, as they are referred to our vnderstanding, whiche soasmuch as it is weake, by reason of the dulnes therof seeth not the course or connerion of causes: but if they be compared vnto the mind of God from which nothing is hidden, they can not be said to come by chance or rashely. The infirmity of the mind of man is that it maketh fortune or chance to be, with thing we wil declare by an example. If a maister should sende his seruauent to the market, and commaunde him to be there by fyre of the clocke, and should also commaund his Balie apart to doo the self same thing, doubtles both the Balie and the seruauent should mete together, which to either of them should come by chaunce, for that they knew not of their maisters commaundement: but the maister he selfe who knoweth the matter, will not iudge this to come by chance: which thing hereby also may be made more plaine. Suppose that I knewe that there were treasure hidden in a place, and I should commaund one to digge in that place, when he should finde the treasure, he would cry god fortune, but I which knewe the matter would attribute nothing vnto fortune. So God soasmuch as he knoweth the course and connerion of all causes neuer ascribeth any thing to fortune. Wherfore let vs put all thinges to be subiect vnto the purpose of God, and amongst all other

The elections & counsels of man
are not against the providence of
God.

The will of man is placed in the order of causes.

God by his foreknow-
ledge chan-
geth not the nature of causes.

Fortune &
chaunce are referred vn-
to vs & not
vnto God.

ther thinges our wills, also which we affirme haue that power which God willed, who tempereth the natures of all thinges. There is a certayne cause, as sayth Augustine, which so worketh, that it is by no meanes wrought, and suche a cause is God. And there is an other cause which so worketh, that it also is wrought of an other, of which kinde is our will, which so willerth and worketh, in that that it also is wrought of God. Wherefore we ought neyther to assent vnto Cicero, nor to the Stoikes, for as we ought to withdraue nothing from the foreknowledge of God, so lest of all are our willes to be exempted from it: for they pertain to y better part of the world. For what should he haue a care of, or what should he foreknow, if he should neglect men? Our willes (as sayth) Aug- ustine, are able to doo so much, as God would and foreknew they should be able to doo: and therefore whatsoever they are able to doo, they most certainly are able to doo, and whatsoever they shall doo, they shall without all doubt doo, for that he whose foreknowledge can not be deceaued foreknew that they should be both able and also do it. And in y 10. chap. of the fifth booke before cited, he denieth, as we also did, a necessity in to two parts: one whereby we are compelled to suffer those thinges whiche we would not, as is the necessity of death, wherunto will we or will we, we must geue place. The other necessity he sayth is that, according to which any thing is sayd to be necessary, that is, shall vndoubtedly come to passe. And touching this there is no nede that we should be aferd concerning our will, for by it the will is not diminished, the first indeede is repugnant vnto it, for it is not possible that it should will anye thing vniwillinglye. But this latter is nothing at all a-gaynst the nature of the will. The life and foreknowledge of God, although they are necessarily attributed vnto him, yet they nothing hurt his nature nor will:
 He can not neyther be deceaued nor dy, and yet suffereth he not any thing which he willet not. So also we say y when we will any thing, by will we necessarily wil it, and yet do we not thinke that hereby our choyce is violated. And how the foreknowledge of God hurteth not our will, Augustine in his 3. booke de libero arbitrio in the 2. and 3. chapters very well declareth. And first he sayth, that by this question are exceedingly set a worke a greate many wicked men, which ey-ther would, that if the will be free, God had no prouidence nor care of thinges pertainyng to men, that they might with the more licentiousnes geue theselues vnto lusses, in denyng the iudgments both of God and of man, and to the bitter moost of they power auoyding them: or if it can not be auoyded, but that it must nedes be graunted that God prouiderh and vnderstandeth the thinges which are done of vs, yet at the least they would obteyne this, that his prouidence should so compell the willes of men, that they may be excused from blame of they wicked factes. But how these mens deuises are deceaued he easely declareth in setting forth, how the foreknowledge of God may stand with will, and that a free will. He demaundeth of him with whome he reasoneth, whether he knew that he should haue to morrow a will vpright or corrupt? He maketh aunswere that he could not tel. Doost thou thinke, sayth Augustine, that God knoweth thys?
 The other confelleth, that he thinketh that God knoweth this. Wherefore sayth Augustine: forasmuch as God foreknoweth this, he also foreknoweth, what he will doo with thee, that is, whether he will glorifie thee at the end of thy life: and if he foreknowe and can not be deceaued, then of necessity will he glorifie thee. But in the meane time tell thou me? Shalt thou be glorified agaynst thy will, or with thy will. Verely (sayth he) not agaynst my will, for I most earnestly desire the same. And hereby is concluded, that that which God wil of necessity do in vs, hindreth not the wil. He sheweth also that this shal be more plaine, if we consider of foreknowledge as though it were ours, Suppose that I foreknowe that a certayne man shal come vnto me to morrow, shal this my foreknowledge take away from him wil, but that if he come, he cometh thorough his owne election: Doubtes we can not so say: for he willingly cometh, neyther shal my foreknowledge diminish any thing of his liberty. And as our memory compelleth not thinges past to be past, so fore-knowledge

Our wills are not free
 frō the fore
 knowledge
 of God.
 Note a saying of Aug- ustine.

Necessity of two sortes.

Not every necessity hurteth the will.

What thin-ges wicked
 men wish for in this question.

Our memory compelleth
 not thinges past to be past.

knowledge compelleth not those things which shall come to passe to come to passe. This thing also may an other way be declared. If a mā should se Plato disputing with Socrates, or the Sunne or Moon to be eclipsed, the sight of the beholder causeth not that they which dispute together, should of necessity or agaynst they willes dispute together, neyther also causeth it that the Sunne or Moon should be eclipsed by chance, when as those eclipses of the heauenly lights haue they necessary causes. Wherefore he which seeth both, maketh not by his sight that which is contingent, necessary, neyther maketh he that which is necessary, contingent. Neyther ought we to imagine that the foreknowledge of God obteyneth his certaynty of the necessity of things, for so greate is the perspicuity of the minde of God, that it can also most certaynly vnderstand things contingent. Neyther is this reason any thing hindred by that which we before oftē admonished, namely, that the foreknowledge of God hath alwayes will forned with it, when as nothing can be foreknown of God to be, which he him selfe will not to be. But yet this will, wherby God worketh all in all, applieth it selfe to the natures of things. For in meate it nozareth, in the Sunne it shineth, in the vine it bringeth forth wine, and in the will of men it causeth, that they of they owne accord and freely wil those things which they wil. Paul as we rede in the Actes, cited that sentence of Aratus, In him we live, are moued, and haue our being. Whereof it followeth, that the will of man, hath his motions of God. But if a mā wil say, that it receauneth of God such motions, as it selfe before willet, then shal he speake things absurd: for the should our wil measure and gouerne the influences of God, which thing is far from the truth. But rather let vs say that it receauneth of God such impulsions and motions as he will geue. And let vs in y meane time marke, that God so worketh in our will, that it gladly, willingly, and of his owne accord receauneth the motions which God putteth into vs. But how it cometh so passe, that God most certaynly foreseeth things to come, when yet the willes of men, and many naturall causes are doubtfull, and worke contingently, it may thus be declared. It is true in dede, that those which consider things onely in they causes, are oftentimes deceaued, for that all causes do not necessarily produce they effectes: for sometimes they are letted, and enclpne an other way then they were supposed. Wherefore men are not deceaued, when they now behold the effect brought forth: but they are deceaued when they iudge of effectes lying hid in their causes. But the foreknowledge of God not only knoweth what things shall come to passe in their causes, but also thorowly seeth the, as if they were already brought forth, and of their causes made perfect: and hereof it cometh that we may of the foreknowledge of God infer necessity of certaintie and of infallibleness, and so can we not do of the second and nest cause. For when we say, that God foreknew that this or that thing shal come to passe to morrow, we wel conclude, y therefore it shal of necessity be. Necessity is not applied vnto a thing known, but as it is foreknown of God as present and already brought forth, which maketh not onely to perspicuity, but also to necessity. For enery thing whilist it is, is of necessity, neither must we afterward graunt, that y thing is of necessity, for that it is not taken in such sort as it was foreknown of God. Vther to haue we defended the power of mans will, whiche yet we wil not should be taken vniuersally, but only as touching foreknowledge and predestination. For although therby (as it is proued) be not letted free wil, yet doth not it otherwise want impediments or lettes. For we are bozne in sins, & wil we or nill we, we are wrapped in original sin, neither can we by any meanes wynd our selues out of sinne. And before regeneratio what maner of power so euer we geue vnto the will of man in things indifferent & ciuill, this first we ought to thinke, y which way soener it do turne it selfe, it of necessity sinneth, neither ca it do any thing which is in very dede acceptable vnto God, neither also can it geue vnto ciuill works y successe which it purposeth. Wherefore Augustine workethly wrote in his

How the will of God bringeth not necessitie to things.

The will receueth such motions of God as he will. Second causes may be doubtfull, whē yet the will of God is certaine.

All things are necessarily whilist they are.

We do not defend free will.

Enchiridion, that the first man in sinning, lost the liberty of choyse or will. This moreouer is to be considered that the willes, motions of the mind, & actions euen of men not yet regenerated, are directed of God, and so directed, that by his prouidence they are brought vnto the ende by him prefixed and determined. Yea also when we are regenerated, althoughe after a sort we obteyne liberty thorough Christ, yet is not it full, but only begonne. For the first motions whiche stirre vs vnto sinne, crepe vpon vs agaynst our willes: whiche motions to be sinnes, we haue in the seuenth chapter proued. And Ambrose plainly confesseth, that our hartes are not in our owne power, neyther is there any of the beleuers, which continually falleth not, when yet he would stand. Wherefore we ought all to pray, Forgiue vs our trespasses. And vnto the Galathians Paul sayd, The spirite fighteth against the fleshe, and the fleshe agaynst the spirite, so that ye do not those things which ye would. And in his epistle as we haue heard it is written: The euill that I hate, that I do, agayne, I feele an other law in my members struing with the law of my mind, & leading me a way captiue into the law of sinne. Which wordes can not be vnderstanded but only of a man regenerated. For he had sayd, In minde I serue the lawe of God, but in flesh the lawe of sinne, which in no wise can be referred to a man not yet iustified. We graunt in deede, that God coulde if he would geue vnto men so much ayde that they should not sinne at all: but that hether to hath he not done, neyther hath he promised that euer he will do it. Wherefore our will is subiect yet vnto some seruitude which as we desire to remaine certayne and vndoubted, so on the other syde we affirme, that by the foreknowledge and predestination of God the will is not letted.

God coulde kepe vs fro all maner of sinne but he doth not.

We haue hether to in this third article sene, what necessity cometh of the foreknowledge and predestination of God, namely, such a necessity which is not absolute, but by supposition, which we call necessity of consequence, of infallibleness, and of certainty, but not of coaction. And seeing that it is so, it is now euident, that no iniustice is committed of God, when he condemneth sinners, and glorifieth the iust, For vnto euery man is rendred according to his woorks: so that no man can say that his sinnes are not his owne woorks, when as he is not compelled to committe them, but exceedingly alloweth them and willethe them. Neither are lawes, admonitions, promises, and punishments in vaine, as it was objected: for they are so much of force as God hath decreed they shall be of force, as Augustine writeth in his fifth booke de Ciuitate Dei, in the chapter before cited. For Gods will is to vse them to the saluation of many: and though they profite not some, yet they want not theyr end, for they conduce to the condemnation of the wicked. Prayers also are not made vnprofitable, for by them we obteyne those things which God hath decreed to geue vnto vs by them. Wherefore this is an excellent saying of Gregory in his dialogues: That by prayers can not be obtayned but those things onely which God hath predestinated to geue. And howe by predestination, or foreknowledge, or predictions sinnes are not excused, we are taught by very many testimonies of the holpe scriptures. Christ foretold that Judas should betray him: verily that foretelling neyther toke away from Judas his wickednes, nor also powred it into him. He followed the entisements of couetousnes: he betrayed not the Lord to the end to fulfill his prophesie. Christ also was by the will of God slayne. For he sayd in the garden: Let this cup passe away from me if it be possible, but not my will be done but thine. And touching himself he foretold: I will geue my life for my shepe. Yea Herode and Pilate are in the Actes of the Apostles sayd to haue ioyned together, to do those things which the counsell of God had decreed. Are by reason of thys eyther the Iewes or those princes to be acquitted from sinne, when as they condemned and slew an innocent man? Who will say so? Can any man also discharge of villany the brethren of Ioseph, whē they sold theyr brother, although God would that by that meanes Ioseph should come into Egypt? Neyther shall the cruelty of the king of Babilon be excused, although the iustice of God decreed Monitions, lawes, and punishments are not in vaine.

Prayers are not vaine. Sinnes are not excused by the predestination and counsel of God. An example creed to haue the Jewes in such sorte punished. He which is killed, is sayd to be of him deliuered into the hande of his enemy. And God is also sayd to deliuer a city, when it is wonne by assault. And Iob said that those thinges, which were by violence and theft taken away from him by the Caldeans and Sabeans, were taken away by God. The Lord (sayth he) gaue, & the Lord hath taken away. Wherefore of that counsell of God, whereby he vseth sinnes to theyr appointed endes, can not be inferred any iust excuses of sinnes. For wicked workes are iudged and cōdemned, bycause of the vitiate and corrupt harte from whence they are deriued. Wherefore let no man be offended with the doctrine of predestination, when as rather by it we are led to acknowledge the benefites of God, and to geue thanks vnto him only. Let vs also learne not to attribute more vnto our owne strengths then we ought: let vs haue also an assured perswasion of the good will of God towarde vs, whereby he would elect his befoze the foundations of the world were layd: let vs mozeouer be confirmed in aduersities, knowing assuredly that whatsoeuer calamity happeneth, it is done by the counsell and will of God, and that it shall at the length by the gouernment of predestination turne vs to good, and to eternall saluation.

The tenth Chapter.

Brethren myne hartes desire and prayer to God for Istraell is, that they might be saued. For I beare them record, that they haue the zeale of God, but not according to knowledge. For they being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and going about to stablish their owne righteousness, are not subiect vnto the righteousness of God.

The summe
of this cha-piter.

Brethren mine hartes desire and prayer to God. &c.] Forasmuch as in the ninth chapter he had declared that the promises were not proper vnto the Jewes which perished, and therefore their distruction was no derogation either to the certainty of Gods promises or to the doctrine of iustification by faith, which he had befoze taught: for they to whome the promises pertain, do by faith come vnto Christ: now in the 10. chapter he remoueth another doubt, and ouerthroweth a strong hold, where with the Jewes were wont proudly to defend themselves, who without end boasted of ceremonies, workes, and outward righteousness: and he declareth that they being ignorant of the true righteousness, which is called the righteousness of God, in vayne went about to establishe their owne righteousness. And for that he vnderstande that it would be vnto them a thing very hard and sharpe, to be not only spoyled of the promises, but that also the righteousness of workes, which they chiefly embzased, should be abrogated: first by a preuention he lenifieth their mindes, in testifying his good wil towarde them. After that, for that they were infected with ignorance, he enstructeth them with a plaine and euident distinction of righteousness. And least he should seme of his owne hed to haue deuised the righteousness of faith, he confirmeth it by a testimony of Moses and of Osea the Prophet: which righteousness, he saith, God would haue to be brought euen vnto the Gentles which were farre and wide disperfed abroade: But so that it should not be hid from the Jewes, when as it was first manifested vnto that people. Which thing Esay testifieth, when he writeth, that God all the day long holdeth abroad his handes to a nacion, which perpetually resisted hym. This is the summe of the doctrine of this chapter.

We testifieth that he loueth the Jewes and
hateth the not.

And in the first part thereof to comfort the Jewes he taketh in hand to proue this proposition: I beare a singular good will towards you, neither am I led by hatred to write these things. And this he thereby proueth, for that he with a certaine

faint perpetuall desire had then alwayes in mynde, and was so carefull for their saluation, that he continually by prayers desired it. Unto them that geue admonitions, and also vnto them that preach the Gospell, these are necessary preparations of mens minds. For oftentimes the things that are spoken hardly profit, vnles the hearers feele or perceauie that they are beloued of him that speaketh vnto them. For euen as phisitions when they mind to minister strong purgations, to bring forth hurtfull humors out of the sicke body, do first lose the body by certaine drinks: so also their mindes with whom we deale, are first to be lenified with gentle speech, before we come to the bitterness of reproofing. So did Paul, when he wrote vnto other Churches, and especially vnto the Corinthians, whom at the beginning he commendeth as holy and elected, instructed in all wisdom and knowledge, and finally adorned of God with all good gifts. But afterward he vehemently and sharply accuseth euen the selfe same men of most haynous crimes: that they had sects and contentions amongst themselves: and that by humane wisdom they obscured the Gospell: that they punished not most horrible incest: that they disturbed the supper of the Lord: and that they did iniuries, and prosecuted matters of contention before infidels: and many such other like hay-nous facts he reproveth that Church of, to the end they should correct them. Wherefore it is no meruayle if in this place he vse the selfe same maner: and do say, that he writeth not those things with a hatefull mynde. Alwayes in his epistles after gentle and louing preuentions follow grauous and sharpe reprehensions: which maner we ought also to follow, that those things which we intend to admonish may the more profit. The hereticians vse this policy, neuer to speake any thing that is sharpe or vnpleasant but first do mollesy it by some colour. And forasmuch as the Scorpion that deadly stinging beast embraeth with her fore clawes, that he may the better strike with his tayle, and sticke in his benemous sting, why do not we also most earnestly with loue and charity embrace our neighbour that we maye heale hym. The Apostle to proue his loue towardes the Iewes sayth, that in his harte he had a behemente desire, and an incredible redines (whiche he calleth ῥοχαλα) towardes their saluation, wherof sprong prayers. These are assured tokens of Christian loue. And this is worthy to be noted, that Paul ioyneth these two things together: for prayers are neuer lively nor seruent vnles in the hart go before a most seruēt desire of the things which are to be prayed for. Some desire of God, that they mought abstaine from sinnes, but because they desire it not, with serueny, their prayers are faint. Others pray, that they may not be vnworthy ministers of the Church, but forasmuch as they are but lightly touched with this desire, their prayers are cold. And therefore it is no meruaille if they be so rarely hard. Wherefore Paul to declare that his prayers were no slender prayers, said, that there went before them a seruent desire. Hereby moreouer we learne, that they which preach the Gospel must auoyde offences geue out of time: and if offences must needes be geuen, the same ought to be lenified and made soft: vnles peraduenture the saluation of the hearers be past all hope, or that they are so obstinate and peruerse, that they can not be moued to God, but by most sharpe reprehensions: So Christ somtimes said of the Phariseis: Let them alone, they are blind, and leaders of the blind, This wicked and adulterous generation seeketh a signe, but none shall be geuen vnto it. Of Herode also Christ sayd, Go and tell that foxe. Iohn Baptist also said vnto the selfe same men, Ye generation of vipers. who hath taught you to fye from the wrath to come? Our Paul also when he was stricken as he strode before the iudge sayd, God strike thee thou paynted wall. And vnto Elimas, who was also called Barien he sayd, Thou sonne of the deuill, full of all guile, how long continuest thou to peruert the straight wayes of the Lord? Behold the hand of the Lord is vp-on thee, and thou shalt be blind, and shalt not see. But when we come to this poynt, we must examine the spirit wherewith we are moued, least peraduenture we be deceaued, and vnder a godly pretence serue a wicked affect. And we must take heede, that our brethren be not rashly turned away from the doctrine of the Gos-pell, and we must chiefly beware that we geue not them occasion to suspect that

Necessary
 preparations
 of the hearers.
 A simila-
 tude.

An example of heretici-
 ans.

What prayers are seruent and of efficacy.

Preachers must auoyde
 offences.

When sharpe
 reprehensi-
 ons are to be vsed.

The spirit
 is to be examined.

We must not flatter
them that
sinne.

An example of Christ.

The auto-ritie of the Jews was great in the Church.

A difference
worthy to be noted.

What was the ignorance of the Jews.

What zeale
signifieth.

Definition
of zeale.

we are by hatred, enuy, & desire of vengeance or by some wicked lust moued to speake those things, which we seme to speake somewhat vehemently. Furthermore on y other side we must beware of y other extremity, y we flatter not the y sinne, making a marchandise of y word of God either to win mis fauour, or for lucre sake, or for pleasure sake. For doubtles the truth as touching doctrine ought neuer to be kept in silence, neither are they which sinne to be spared, although troubles should therof arise, or that we should therefore suffer greuous things. Christ knew right well, that by teaching the truth and by reproving of vices, he should at the length be crucified, and be also forsaken of his disciples, and yet did he not therefore cease either from necessary doctrine, or from profitable reprehensions. Of that, that the Apostle so diligently seeketh to auoide the offending of the Jewes, we gather, that the authority of that nation was great in the primitive Church: for they before other nations beleued the Gospell, and the iudgement of them was had in great estimation. For the Jewes were studious in the scriptures, and most diligent obseruers of the worshipping of God, wherefore the offence of them could not be incurred without exceeding great hurt to the Gospell.

He calleth them bretherne, the more to conciliate them vnto him. For these are no small degrees of beneuolence, to wish well vnto a man, to pray for him, and to call him by a gentle and louing name. Nowbeit there is a difference betweene the reaso which he vseth in the ninth chapter, and betweene that which he vseth in this chapter to proue his loue towardes the Jewes. For there he saide, that he so feruently loued them, that for the redeeminge of theyr destruction he desired to be made accursed: but here he writeth that he prayeth out prayers for theyr saluatio. Of this difference this is the reason. In the 9. chapter he entreated of election or predestination, which is not chaunged by prayers: and therefore it had bene in vain there to haue made mencion of them. But in this place is entreated of the righteousness of fayth, which faith forasmuch as it is the gift of God, there is no doubt but that by faithfull prayers it may be obteyned for our neighbours.

He bringeth moreover an other argumente of his loue towardes the Jewes, whereby he excuseth theyr incredulity, as much as the nature of the thing suffreth, but yet he so excuseth it, that thereunto he addeth a most greuous accusation.

I beare them record (saith he) that they haue the zeale of God, but not according to knowledge. And yet must we not thinke, that all the Jewes had this zeale, for in that nation there were a greate many which were manifest wicked & filthy liuers. But when Paul thus wrote he had a consideration to the sounder sort: and vnder this common name ment them onely. And to be brieue he vseth the figure Synecdoche, whereby an indefinite proposition is by reason of some partes y it containeth taken for true. This selfe same excuse Peter in the Actes vled, when he said, For I know that ye did it thorow ignorance. &c. Paul nowe attributeth vnto them zeale, but he repponeth their ignorance as an haynous sinne. For seeing that they were by the law and by the scriptures dayly taught, they ought not to haue bene ignorant of those thinges. Theyr ignorance he hereby proueth, for y they knew not the difference betweene the righteousness of God and their owne righteousness, neither saw they that by establishing their owne, they fell away fro the true and perfect righteousness. That they had a zeale, he therefore saith, for that they sought to worship God, and that diligently: but they knew not the manner of true worshipping, wherefore their zeale was a blinde zeale. And to declare what zeale is, we will first consider the etimology thereof. Ζηλος, that is zeale, is a Greeke word deriued of του ζηλῶν. And this word signifieth to loue, but yet vehemently to loue, so that after loue followeth admiration, after admiration imitation, and the after that a grief if he may not enioy the thing which he loueth, or if others be admitted to enioy the same. This is the proper signification of the word. Wherefore we may thus define it. Zeale is an affection, whiche consisteth in that parte of the minde which lusteth or desireth, after which by reason of the vehemency followeth grief, both because of the fellowship of others, and also for the wante of the thinge which which is desired. But the nature of it is not of one sort. For there is a good zeale, & an euill zeale. Of the good zeale Paul spake, when he saide, I am zealous for you with the zeale of God, for I haue betrouned you, that ye should geue your selues a chaste virgen vnto one man Christ. Also in the first to the Corinthians, Be zealous of the better gracious gistes. God himselfe also is affected towards vs with a most perfect zeale, as the scripture oftentimes teacheth, although affectes are not properly attributed vnto him. But of the euill zeale is not at this presente entreated: But of it Paul to the Galathians thus writeth, that the false Apostles loued them with a zeale, that they might glory in theyr flesh, and leade them away from Christe into the bondage of the law. And in many other places is mencion made of it. But the cause wherof either a good or euill zeale springeth, may be thys. The manner is a lyke in thys affection, as it is in other affectiōs. Wherefore euen as boldnes, lust, and anger are so long time good or euill, how long they keepe themselves within certayne bondes prescribed vnto them by prudence, or passe those bondes: so also cometh it to passe in zeale. But this we ought to know, that accordinge to morall doctrine, prudence cometh by naturall vse or discipline, but in very dede as it is here considered, it can not be gathered but out of the holy scriptures by the breathing of the holy gost. Wherefore zeale is then good, when it is thowlo saith bydeled by a iust and godly knowledge: and it is then euill whē it is not by such knowledge restrayned: as a ship when the maister or gouerner is present is preserved, but he being absent goeth to wracke. Wherefore Paul spake most warely: for when he condeneth their zeale, he taketh away from them knowledge, and by one word, that which mought haue bene an excellent vertue he noted as a vice, and that dangerous. And as the difference is greete betwene a good and an euill zeale, so also the effectes which are of either deriued are much diuers. Christ was kindled with a good zeale, when he drave the biers and sellers out of the temple, ouerthrowinge theyr tables and chayres. With the selfe same zeale was Phinees moued when he thruſte thowlo the moste filthy whozemongers. Contrariwise the effect of an euill zeale we may beholde in Paul, who through zeale persecuted the church of Christ. And in John it is writen, that the time should be, when they shoulde thinke if they do Gods highe seruice, which afflict the faithfull of Christ. Peter also being kindled wth an immoderate zeale drue out his sword, to kill them which laid hands vpon Christe. There is also an other difference, for an euill zeale engendreth hatred: but a good zeale hath ioyned with it charity. For Samuel although with a great zeale he worshipped God, yet a long time he mourned for Saul. And nothing is more repugnant vnto euill zeale then charity: as vnto a good zeale is chiefly repugnant selfe loue. They also are of a contrary affect, which are either so blockishe, that they are stirred vp with no desire of good thinges, or els are so corrupt, that they are not asfearde to boast of wicked and villanous factes. These thinges generally spoken, we will now applye vnto the Jewes. They had a zeale forwarde the lawe, ceremonies, and outward workes, for that they exceedingly loued, and had in admiration, and onely embraced these thinges: wherefore it wonderfully greued them to be excluded from them, neither could they abide that the Gentiles shoulde be admitted into the fellowship of true religion. Wherefore they were affected with a zeale, but yet with an euill zeale: for that (as Paul saith) it wanted knowledge. But forasmuche as Paul seemeth to be moued with a desire and good wil towards the Jewes by reason of this zeale, there ariseth a question, whether anye sinnes may so please vs, that of them we shoulde take pleasure, or that therefore shoulde be engendred any good will. We must put a difference betwene sinnes, for there are certayne sinnes enoimious and grosse, which all men vnderstand to be sinnes: and there are other sinnes which although they be condemned before God, and are in very dede sinnes, for that they are committed of men not regenerate, who are as yet euill trees, neither directe they their workes vnto God as they ought to do, yet are they morally good. Wherefore if we meane of grosse sinnes, and speake of sinnes as they are of theyr owne nature properly and truly, then none that is godly will delight in this kind of sinne. For if a

A good zeale & an euill.

The cause of a good &
euill zeale.

A similitude.

Effectes of good & euill
zeale.

An euill
zeale of the Jewes.

Whether it
be lawfull to take pleasure
of sinne.
A distinction
of sinnes.

man loue God with all his hart of necessity, he wil abstaine from al sinnes, which are manifestly repugnant vnto the will of God and vnto his law: but per accidens that is, by chaunce it is possible that some pleasure may bee taken in them: as if we be now deliuered, the moze & greater the wicked actes are whiche we haue committed, the moze shal we therfoze reioyce. And if a man haue ben before proud and arrogant, & after some fal being repitant do behaue himself moze modestly, he wil somewhat reioyce by reason of his sinne. Which thing also happeneth, if after faultes committed be made good lawes, and an order appointed, that such faults be not after ward committed. For we reioyce that such an occasion was offered. And

We reioyce in sinnes
p accidens.

Good moral woꝝkes
delight vs,
although they be sin-
nes.

A simili-
tude.

We are also soꝝe by reason of the moꝝall woꝝkes of Ethnikes.

because that, as Paul saith, where sinne hath abounded, grace also shall abound, and vnto them that loue God all things worke to good, we will graunt that by a phrase of speech although not proper but per accidens, the godly may sometimes take some pleasure of sinnes. But if we speake of moꝝall woꝝkes which are done of them that are not regenerate, if we consider them simply, we can not but reioyce in them. For euen as it is a pleasure, and that no small pleasure, to consider y natures of herbes, the pꝛopieties of liuing creatures, of pꝛecious stones, and of the starres, so also is it a delight, to see the actes of notable men, which actes God would haue to be in the nature of man, for the pꝛeseruation of common wealthes, and of ciuil discipline. Who taketh not pleasure, when he readeth the honest life, and vertuous actes of Socrates? Or when he weigheth with himselfe the notable actes done by Scipio Africanus? and also when he seeth the things which are in our time done of notable men, when yet they are boyde of Christian religion? Pea soꝝe much as they haue a certaine shew and countenance of sounde vertues, the godly so much delight in them, that they are not seldome moued earnestly to pray for the saluation of those me, thus thinking with themselves: If God would vouchsafe to change these men, and to bꝛaue them vnto Christ, they should be a great oznamēt and help vnto the Church, neither do they easely dispayre of theyꝝ saluation. As a skilfull husbandman, if peraduenture he see a ground very ranke with bzakes and weeds desireth to buy the same: soꝝ he thus thinketh: What if the noughty herbes were weeded out, and the bzakes with a plowe rooted out, that grounde woulde plentifullye bꝛing forth the good corne. And so also will he doo, if he see wilde vine trees, or wild olive trees of their owne accord spring in any place, soꝝ he will thereby iudge the ground to be meete both for vine trees, and for fat olive trees, if it should be well husbanded. Christ also our Sauioꝝ, when a young man had asked him counsell, what he should do to attaine vnto eternall life: and he had answered kepe the commaundements, and the young man made answer, that he had thereunto endeuored himselfe euen from his yowth, which yet was not true, Iesus notwithstanding delighted in that his endeuour such as it was of enquiring touching saluation, and of obeying the commaundements of God as much as lay in him. For this is the meaning of that which Marke writeth in the 10. chapter, that Christ loued him: namely, being moued with mercy by reason of his present calamity, soꝝ that he labouring and going about to attayne vnto the righteousness of woꝝkes, fell away from it. And the Lord also, when he had made answer, that the greatest commaundement is, that we should loue God with all our hart, with all our soule, and with all our strengthes, and that the next commaundement is, that we should loue our neighbour as our selues: and a certaine scribe had commended this answer of the Lord, he sayd vnto him, Thou art not farre from the kingdome of heauen, although he yet beleued not, neither was yet by Christ iustificed. But the Lord would declare, that this his assent to the truth resembled some certaine shew of piety and of duty. Wherefoze in such woꝝkes which are moꝝally called good, the minde of the godly delighteth: although therewithall also it soꝝro- weth that those woꝝkes are not done as they ought to be done. And as touching this present sentence of the Apostle we must not gather, that he of sinne, that is, of seale without true knowledge conceaued a loue and good will forwarde the Jewes: soꝝ he reasoneth not from the cause: pe a rather by the effect he declarerh his his loue towarde them: namely, in that he not onely prayeth for saluation for them, but also agrauateth not the crime which they were guilty of, but rather as much as the thing suffreth excuseth it. It should be a false kind of reasoning a non causa vt causa, (that is, taking that for the cause which is not the cause) if a man would hereby proue, that Paul had a delight in the sinnes of the Iewes. But if a man will nedes contend, that this argument is taken from the cause, we say that iudoxeia, which is englished, harts desire, is in this place an affect which pertaineth to mercy: and so Paul had compassion vpon the Iewes, for that he saw the Iewes so miserably erred. And this sentence is of no small force to proue, that that zeale of the Iewes, though it were goodly to the Iew, was sinne: for nothing stirreth by mercy, but only misery and calamity: neither are we moued to pray for any that they might be conuerted from euil woorkes, vnles the same woorkes were sinnes, and that very hurtfull. Wherefore I wonder at the Nicodemites of our tyme, which obiect the hystory of Elizus, and of Naaman the Syrian, to proue that it is lawful for them, so that they thinke wel in their hart, to be present at vngodly superstitions. For Naaman the Syrian although he were newly conuerted yet he vnderstode that that was sinne, and for that he had not as yet so farre gone forwarde to departe from his commodities, he required of the Prophet to pray for him: which declareth that he iudged that such a sinne neded pardon. Wherefore we conclude that this zeale of the Iewes, whereunto the Apostle now beareth record, was in very deepe sinne: and although it haue some shew of vertue, yet is it very farre of from it. For as it is plaine by moral philosophy that vertues and vices are, as touching where about they are occupied, one and the same, but in some much differ: as fortitude and feare, temperaunce and intemperance, iustice and iniustice. For one and the selfe same affectes, when they are by right reason bidden to a mediocrity, and when thorough vice they either want or exceede, differ not in matter, although the habites or qualities which are occupied about them are much differing. And that which the Philosophers speake of vertues and of vpright reason, we ought to transference also vnto the holighost and vnto faith geuen vnto the scriptures. And although in a good and euil zeale the affect be one and the same, yet is the difference most great, when it is gouerned by true knowledge and faith, and when it is gouerned of it selfe, and wanteth true knowledge. As the water of the sea, and rayne water, although they agree together in matter of moisture, yet are they sundred by very many proprieties & differences. These thinges haue I therefore alleadged to confute those, which oftentimes defend wicked ades, for that they are done of a good minde & purpose, or as they say, entent: as though euery zeale were sufficient to make the worke good. Whose sentence, if it were true, mought safely excuse the Iewes, in that they killed Christ, and afflicted his Apostles: for they beleued that by these meanes, they defended the lawe of God, and ceremonies of their fathers. But the Apostle saith other wise: when he attributeth vnto them zeale, but yet a zeale ioynd with error: but when error lighteth in matters of faith, it is a deadly sinne. Wherefore let them well aduise themselves, what to say which so stoutly defend woorkes preparatory, doubles their meaning is nothing els, but that men although before iustification they absolutely worke not good woorkes, yet, by reason of a certaine vpright purpose and zeale, of congruity they deserue grace. Such woorkes for as muche as they want true knowledge, whiche is sayth, it followeth that they are such a zeale as the Apostle nowe speaketh of. We deny not, but that God sometimes bleseth suche our wycked woorkes, by the at length to bring vs vnto iustification: but that we our selues do thow we deserue iustification, it is farre from the truth: yea rather oftentimes it cometh to passe, that such woorkes are a great let vnto saluation. For the Philosophers and Pharesies being drunken & gluttred with those goodly woorkes, were ouermuch puffed vp: and for that they delighted in the selues, they

Paul loued not the Iewes for their euill zeale.

What iudoxeia in this place signifieth. The zeale of the Iewes was sinne.

The Nicodemites of our tyme. The fact of Naaman the Syrian, very ill cited.

Vices and vertues are occupied about one & the same matter.

A similitude.

A good intent is not sufficient to make the worke good

Errors in matters of faith is hurtfull.

Against woorkes of preparation

Goodly woorkes are sometime a let vnto saluation.

Cap. 10. A Commentarie vpon the

they contented them selues with those woꝝkes, neither endeoured they to ascend vnto the true degree of righteousness. We are by this doctrine also of Paul admonished not straight way to geue place vnto zeale: we must first trye and diligently examine it: for oftentimes vnder the goodly shew thereof lyeth hid den most great impietie: as it is manifest in the Iewes which shew Christ, and persecuted the Apostles, and as this place evidently declareth.

We must not straight
way geue
place to zeale

It is a gre-
uous sinne
to refuse to be subiect vnto
God.

A rule to try zeale.

For they being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and going about to stablish their own righteousness, are not subiect vnto the righteousness of God. What more wickednes could haue bene deuised, then to refuse to be subiect vnto God, and to seeke to prefer their own righteousness, before the righteousness of God.

The Apostle in these woꝝdes geueth vs a rule, whereby we may be able to trye and examine our zeale. And that rule is this, to see whether we will be subiect vnto God, whether we can abide that all thinges shoulde bee attributed vnto God, and claime nothing vnto our selues, as the true knowledge of God requireth. There are a great many in our daies, which as it were by a certain zeale labour to defend woꝝshipping of Images, pilgrimages, and other suche superstitious actes: vnto whom if a man manifestly declare, that those thinges are repugnant vnto the woꝝd of God, they will not be subiect vnto it, but straight way flee to the custome of their Elders, and to the helps of humaine traditions. There are some also which are moued with a zeale to defend sole lyfe of the spirituals of the Church, vnto whom if a man do shew that the bed of matrimony ought to be vndefiled in all men, as it is sayde vnto the Hebrewes, and as it is written vnto the Corinthians, It is better to marry, then to burne: They which canoe lyue continent, let them marry. Let every man haue his owne wyfe, and euery woman her owne husband to auoide fornication: they wyl not be subiect vnto this know-

Men will not be sub-iecte vnto
God.

ledge of the lawes of God, but bring forth the Fathers, Councils, and humane inuentions. Whereby it is plaine, what is to be iudged of their zeale. It is vndoubtedly a very euill zeale, and onely leaneth vnto selfe loue, and geueth it selfe to his own thinges, and nothing regardeth the thinges that pertain vnto God. Such are the Pharisees, which preferre their institutions, rules, and woꝝkes before all other thinges, which are commonly done of Christians, and much delight in condemning all others in respect of them selues. With this blind zeale are the miserable people euery where infected, whom the Pastors and preachers ought to succor and helpe, in discovering their want of knowledge, and setting before them the true knowledge of the scriptures, and that of a singular affection, and true Christian mercy, wherewith they ought thorowly to be touched in so great a dissipation of Churches, which can of no man bee sufficiently lamented. We haue neede of Jeremy to bewaile the calamities of the Church.

We must
euen of mercy be moued
to fall to prayers.

An example
of Christ.

And from this mercy we must go forward vnto prayers, as Paul sayth he dyd: and in imploꝝing the ayde of God, we ought there to recoꝝd before God, that which is in this place written, They haue the zeale of God, but not according to knowledge, which selfe thing our Saviour did vpon the crosse, when he prayed, Father forgue them, for they know not what they do. Further, seeing that we delight in the good moral woꝝkes of men not yet regenerate, and are soꝝy for that they are not done as they ought to be done, we maye thus gather: If these men displease God, and are condemned, which yet of a good entent (as they speake) doo these so honest thinges, when yet notwithstanding they want true knowledge, what shall at the length become of vs, which being endued wth knowledge, liue filthily, yea euen against our conscience. They are able to pretend a zeale, but we Pharisees, what excuse shall we make, when as wee professe the Gospell: Howbeit this is not to bee passed ouer, that the Iewes, of whom the Apostle

The Jews had not the zeale of God.

speaketh, had not, if we wyl speake properly, the zeale of God: for there hath not bene at any time, nor euer shal be any true God, which wyl haue the law of Moses to be defended against Christ and his Gospell. Wherefore they abused the name of God, when as they defended not him, but rather their owne opi-
ons

ons. As the Turkes also, although they boast that they worship and call upon the true God, yet they lye, for there is no where such a God, which hath not our Lord Jesus Christ, and the holy ghost of one and the same substance with him: which forasmuch as they take away from the God whom they worship, they worship they owe inuencion for God, & fight and are zealous for it & not for the true God. And Paul speaketh according to the accustomed manner of the scriptures, which oftentimes nameth things not as they are, but as they seeme to be. Seeing therefore that those men thought that they were moued with the zeale of the true God, neyther did they for any other cause enter into these zeales but for that they thought them to be acceptable vnto God, therefore Paul sayth, that they had the zeale of God, when yet they were deceaued. For if they had bene kindled with the zeale of the true God, they would neuer haue resisted Christe. Wherefore in Iohn the lord sayd excellently well vnto those which boasted that they would beleue Moses and not him. If ye beleued Moses, ye would beleue me also: for he wrote of me. Wherefore Chrysostome in this place very well noteth, that Paul gratified the Iewes, but yet in wordes only. Further let vs consider, that the arte vsed of the Apostle farre differeth from that which the Rhetoricians vse. They to couer and to extenuate vices, adorne them with the name of the vertues nexte vnto those vices, defending a conetous man, by the name of frugallity, a bold and rather person, as valiant, and so in other vices. But Paul because he had named an effect, which seemed to approach nigh vnto vertue, to the end he would not deceaue, made open the vice thereof, in taking away from it knowledge. And this he proueth, adding thys.

For they being ignoraunt of the righteousness of God, and going about to stablish theyr owne righteousness, are not subiect vnto the righteousness of God, Agayne when he maketh mention of ignorance, he seemeth to gratifie the Iewes. And indeede he sheweth that they were not so culpable, as if wittingly and willingly they had resisted the truth knowen: albeit notwithstanding he most greuously accuseth them. It is certayne that ignorance signifieth defect or wante of knowledge, not indeede fully, but requireth a subiect or matter apte to know. For betwene naturall prouations and morall there is greates difference for in phisicall or naturall prouations, the greater the nighnes & aptnes is vnto any perfection, so much of more valew is the thing counted. For for the drink or liquor of frutes is more apt to resemble wine, therefore of so much the more worthines is it. The gold of the Alchymistes is better then yron: because with a greater aptnes or nighnes it draweth nere vnto true gold. But in morall things if a man seeme to be more apte to receaue vertues, or to attayn vnto knowledge then other are, and by his owne default or folly, will not take any paynes in them, he is more to be accused then others are, which are farther off from that commodity. Wherefore seeing that the Iewes had aboue all other nations giuen vnto them the scriptures, the Prophets, the Apostles and Christ himselfe for theyr erudition, and were taught by ceremonies, preaching, and miracles, the ignorance of Christe coulde not but to theyr moste greates rebuke be objected vnto them.

Paul in this place maketh a diuision of righteousness, and the one he maketh proper and theyr owne, and the other he maketh to be of God: of which diuision he maketh mention also in an other place. For in the thirde chapter he speaketh of the one parte when he saith, The righteousness of God is reuealed by sayth, And in the same place of Abraham he writeth, And if he were iustified by woorkes, he hath wherof to glory, but not before God. And vnto the Phillippians in the thirde chapter, when he saith, That I may be found in him, not hauing mine owne righteousness which is of the law, but the righteousness of God. And the Apostle when he would declare the ignorance wherewith the Iewes were infected, the more to lay the blame thereof before theyr eyes, saith that they had erred in y thing which is the chiefest in mans life, namely, in that righteousness which hath saluation and felicity ioyned

with

The turkes worship not
God.

The scripture oftentimes na-meth things
not as they are,
but as they seem to be.

Paul deceaueth not as Rhetoricians
do.

What ignorance is.
Difference
betwene natural proua-
tions & mo-
rall.

A distinction of righte-
ousnes.

The Jewes
erred concerning the chief good concerning.

What our righteousness is.

Our righteousness is of two sortes.

The good
workes of the faithful
are both imperfect, and also do follow iusti-
fication.

What is the righteousness of
God.

Definition
of sinne.

What is to be absolved
from sinne.

Absolution
taketh not
away the defect.

Definition
of absolutio

The righteousness wherby we are iustified
is without vs.

The righteousness of God cannot properly be called ours.

The righteousness
which fol-
loweth regeneration
may be called both ours & the righteousness
of God.

We are not iustified by faith as it is a worke.

with it: they had no byright iudgement of the ends of good and euill, nor also of the fountaine of all piety. And of this thing were the Jewes ignorant, who about all other nations seemed to haue a care of religion. Wherefore he deuiceth righteousness into two partes: whiche thing they could not do: and by our righteousness he meaneth that righteousness which is gotten by workes. And that righteousness may be considered two wayes, either as it goeth before regeneration, or as it followeth it: of which partes onely the first maketh to the purpose. For this place can not be vnderstanded of workes whiche follow regeneration: for Paul dealeth againste those which reiected Christ. And y righteousness which was allowed of the Jewes before faith, for that it was no righteousness, coulde not stande before God. For that can not be constituted or stablished which is nothing. But that righteousness which followeth faith, may indeede after a sorte be established, for that it pleaseth God: howbeit it is such, that by it we cannot be iustified: both because it is vnperfect, and also for that it followeth iustification. Now resteth to see, what is the righteousness of God. And it may thus be defined, that it is an absolution from sinnes by faith through Christ. And that we may the better vnderstand the nature of this absolution, we muste on the other side weigh the nature of sinne: for this being knowne we shall the easier know, what it is to be absolved from it. Sinne is a defect or falling away from the law and will of God, which ought to be the rule both of vs & of all our doings, and to this defecte is necessarily annexed an obligation to eternall death and damnation. Wherefore when by the mercy of God this obligation and guiltines is taken away, a man is absolved from sinnes: for the defect is not taken away, for there abideth in vs an infirmity, and therefore our actions alwaies want of that perfection, whiche they oughte to haue. And it is not possible but that the thinges which we haue already committed haue they defect or want. Wherefore God when he forgiveth sinne, taketh away the obligatiō, wherby we were bound vnder the curse. Now by these thinges it is manifest what absolution is: namely, an action of God, wherby he so deliuereth and acquiteth vs, not indeede from the discommodities of this life, but from sinnes, that is, from guiltines, and obligation vnto eternall death. But that we should not thinke that so greate a benefite cometh thorough our desert, therefore there is added, through Christ. For him as an instrument, both God vse to this deliury of ours. And that we shoulde not be ignorant how the sacrifice and redemption of Christ is applied vnto every one of vs, it is added, by faith. This definition is a great helpe to the right vnderstanding of iustification. This righteousness Paul saith is the righteousness of God. And if thou demaund, whether it may be called ours: I aunswere, that properly it cannot be called ours, forasmuch as it is without vs. For it is an action of the will of God, the respecte whereof, although it be directed vnto vs, yet is it not in vs. And if at anye time it be called ours, that is by a figuratiue speech, namely ether because that we haue the fruition thereof, or for that we by faith whiche is in vs embrace it. But the righteousness whiche followeth regeneration may be called both ours, and the righteousness of God. Of God, because it is done by his spirite and grace, which he geueth vnto vs in regeneration: for by it we are impelled to leade a godly and holy life, and to attaine to true vertues. It is also called ours, because our strengths being renewed we worke together to the attaining vnto it, and it is done in vs, and resteth in our hartes. But if thou say, that forasmuche as the righteousness of God is applied vnto vs by faith, we seme to worke together to the obtaining thereof. We aunswere: that faith indeede is a worke wherby in the minde we geue assent vnto the wordes of God: but we are not by the merite and worthines of this worke absolved from sinne: for, that commeth of the clemency of God and force of his promise, which by faith we embrace. Wherefore when the scripture sayth that we are iustified by faith, as soone as we heare the name of sayth, we must straighte waye haue a consideration vnto the object or correlative thereof, namely, vnto the mercy of God, and promise thorough Christ. By these thinges let vs gather, that this righteousness of God is most farre distant from the righteousness which is knowne by nature nature: for neither reason nor Philosophy knoweth any other righteousness, but that which hath his abiding in the minde. Not that they were ignorant of absolution of the pacifying of God, for, that thing did they sacrifices testifie, which doubtles tended to other ende: but they called not that pacifying of God our righteousness, neither euer understood they the true pacifying of God, nor in whom it consisted. But why the righteousness of works is called ours, Chrysostome saith, that the cause thereof is, for that it dependeth of our works, neither waicteth it for the helpe of God: but the other righteousness is called the righteousness of God, for that it utterly dependeth of grace, and cometh without our labour. He moreover noteth this word gratia, which signifieth to establish, and that Paul by that word meēt to declare the vnsustainednes of humane righteousness. For we labour not to confirm and establish, but onely those thinges which are weake and are not able to consist of themselves. But they which are godly, do, after the example of Paul to the Philippians, count theyr works, especially such which they do before iustification, for losse and donge, so farre is it of that they seeke to establish them, or to cleave vnto them, as vnto sound and true righteousness. In this place also is to bee noted an excellent antithesis, or contrary position. For here the Apostle counteth, to be iustified by works, and to be subiect vnto the righteousness of God as opposites or contraries, which can in no wise stand together. So y<sup>e</sup> I wonder at those which in our time dare mingle these two together, namely, that we are iustified both by grace, and also by our works. If these two might stand together, they should the reprehension of Paul be smal, yea rather none at al, who affirmeth, y<sup>e</sup> they which seeke to establish their own righteousness can not be subiect vnto the righteousness of God. And by this word subiectio he vnderstandeth nothing els, but not to be a receiuer or partaker thereof: yea & he speaketh most properly. For they which are iustified by faith do verely make themselves subiect vnto God counting themselves as sinners and such as haue neede of his grace. And hereby is geuen vnto him glory: for although they seme to glorify God which confesse the truth, and which for the truths sake put either their goods or life in danger, yet herein chiefly consisteth his glory, where we attribute not vnto our selues any vertue or holynes, but acknowledging our selues most miserable do attribute vnto him only, whatsoever goodnes or saluation we obtaine. The commentaries which are ascribed vnto Jerome herein very well agree. They are not subiect, say they, vnto the righteousness of God, that is, vnto the absolution from sinnes, as though they were not sinners, and had no neede of Christ. And Chrysostome saith, that Paul not in daide manifestly, but yet not obscurely noteth the most greivous punishment of these mens ignorance: namely, that through their own peruerse endeour they were left naked of all righteousness: for they could not attayne vnto their owne righteousness by works, and fell away from that righteousness, which by the faith of Jesus Christ they mought haue had. And doubtles the condition or state of such men is most miserable: for soasmuch as they are not iustified by faith, although they may after a sort apply themselves vnto outward works, yet notwithstanding when they see that they litle profit, they at the length cast away all endeour to liue godly and religiously, and in this life liue filthily, and at the last in an other life are most miserably tormented.

For the ende of the lawe is Christ vnto righteousness to euery one that beleueth. For Moses thus describeth the righteousness which is of the lawe, That the man which doth these thinges shall liue thereby. But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise: Say not in thyn hart, who shall ascende into heauen: that is, to bring Christ from aboue. Or who shall descende into the deepe: that is to bring Christ agayne from the dead: But what saith it, The worde is nere thee, euen in thy mouth and in thyn hart. This is the worde of fayth which we preach.

For

The righteousness of God is not known by nature.

Humane righteousness vnsustained.

The godly stablish not their owne righteousness. These thinges are not to bee mingled together which Paul putteth contrary.

What is not to be subiect vnto the righteousness of God.

They which are subiecte vnto the righteousness of God doo most of all glorify him.

The most miserable condition or estate of the which trust so theyr owne righteousness.

Cap. 10 A Commentarie vpon the

Why
Christ is the ende of the law.

End signifiethe two things.

The scope and ende of lawes.

The law by it selfe can not attaine
vnto hys
ende.

The law is our schole-
master to
Christ.
A scholema-ster muste
not be turned into a father.

In every commandment of the law two things to be considered.

The summe
of Christian religion.

If frō actions be take away they lust ende,
they are not
vpright.

For the end of the law is Christ vnto righteousness to every one that beleueth. Now he confirmeth the proposition which he took in hand: namely, that they which will be iustified by works are not partakers of the righteousness of God; for the end of the law is Christ vnto righteousness. This is a causall proposition, for Christ is called the end of the law, because y he bringeth the perfection and absolution of fulnes thereof. The property also of this word τέλος, that is, end, is to be noted, for it signifieth two things: namely, the extreme or uttermost part or limite of a thing: and after this manner death is called the end of living creatures, not doubting that we should liue to dye: for that which is the worse can not be the cause of that which is better. It moreover signifieth the perfection, and absolu-tion of fulnes of any thing, when it is brought to the uttermost of his action or motion. Now although as touching the first signification Christ by his coming set an end to the law, for he took away the ceremonies, and curse therof: yet in this place Paul meaneth not that Christ is in such manner the end of the law, but hath a respect vnto the other signification of this word, namely, vnto perfection and absolution, for that Christ hath made perfect and full that which the law could not.
And that this may the better be vnderstanded, let vs consider the end and scope of lawes. Lawes are made to make men good and iust, for for no other cause do they set forth things right and honest, but that they should be put in vze. But amongst other lawes, this law which God made chiefly requireth at mens hands righte-ousnes & holines: but this thing it can not attayne vnto, not in dede thorough hys owne default, but by reason of our corruption. Howbeit that which it can do it doth: namely, vrgeth vs, it accuseth vs and it condemneth vs, that at the least being ouerpresse with so great waight, we should thinke of one to deliuer vs, and by that meanes should be conuerted vnto Christ, by whome we may both be absolved from sinnes, and also may thorough his spirite and grace be able as much as y condition of this life wil suffer to be obedient vnto his law geuen vnto vs. Which two thinges Christ most liberally geueth vnto them that beleue in him, and so is called the end, that is, the consumation and perfection of the lawe. This, Paul in plaine words noted when he before sayde, That which was impossible vnto the lawe, in as much as it was made weake thorough the fleshe, God sending his owne sonne in the similitude of the fleshe of sinne, by sinne condemned sinne, that the righteousness of the lawe might be fulfilled in vs. Hereunto also had Ambrose a respect, who thus interpreteth this place, that Christ is called the end of the lawe, for that God by him bringeth to passe those thinges which he had promissed and commanded. These wordes of the Apostle teach, that this is the principal office of the lawe, to direct vs vnto Christ: wherefore vnto the Galatians it is called a scholemaster. Wherefore they are worthely to be reprobued, which of a scholemaster make it a father, seeking righteousness at the lawes had, which ought to be looked for at Christs hand onely. Let vs therefore hereby learne in every precept of the lawe to consider two thinges: namely, our sinnes, and Christ our deliuerer, whome all the commandementes thewe forth, for otherwise we shal vnprofitably consider of the lawe. And the Jewes, for that they excluded Christ, in vayne boasted of the lawe, as they which had not the lawe, but only a shadow thereof. And when that is added: Vnto righteousness to every one that beleueth. Paul putteth vs in mynde of the calling of the Gentiles, affirming that all kinde of men, so that they beleue, shalbe partakers of this ende of the lawe. Further let vs for a certainty know, that of this proposition dependeth the summe of Christian religion. For the Jewes in vrging the lawe of Moses and the Ethnikes in following the lawe of nature mought peradventure boast of some righteousness: but that righte-ousnes is straight way reprobued, when as we heare that Christ is the ende of every iust lawe. And I thinke no man is ignorant, that if from vertues and humane actions be taken away their due ende, all the vprightnes of them sayeth. Wherefore this place moreover proueth, y all the workes of infidels are sinnes

sinnes, for that they want their end. They which are endued with the righteousness of faith, attaine also vnto the righteousness of the lawe. For being iustified, they labour with all industry and diligence to obey the will of God. And contrariwise they which haue not the righteousness of faith, utterly want the righteousness of the lawe. For the thinges which they do, they can not make to frame, whē as they want their end. But if these two righteousnesses be so ioyned together, how are they by an antithesis opposite the one to the other. The answer is that the righteousness of faith, and that righteousness which followeth iustification are not opposite as contraries: for although the one be not the other, yet are they both one. But the antithesis is contrary betwene the righteousness of faith, and that which goeth before iustification. And the end is to obtayne iustification by this or by that, hath such a contrary oppositiō, that the one can not stand with the other. And Chrysostome is in this place warily to be read, when he saith, that the righteousness of faith, and the righteousness of the law differ not in very dede, but are one & the selfe same: for he is decreed: for it is not possible y it should be so, for y the righteousness of God (as we haue said) is the absolution from sinnes, but the righteousness of the lawe requires consisteth of good workes done after regeneration, or before regeneration. But peradventure he meet y which we now teach, namely, that y righteousness of faith is ioyned together with y righteousness which followeth iustification. We may by a similitude not vnaptly see in what sort this twofold righteousness is vnto iustification, namely as differentia, that is difference, and proprium, that propre is in Logike. For as differentia maketh the nature or kinde, so the righteousness of God maketh our iustification: for that when we are by him absolved from sinne, wee are iustified. And as proprium followeth the nature already made, so the righteousness of good workes followeth iustification now obteyned, and receaueth his force of it, and not of the lawe. For although the Lawe of God doo labour to make vs iust, yet by reason of the prones to euill, which is grafted in vs by nature euen from our infancy, it looeth his labour: for that the lawe amongst other thinges requireth good and spirituall motions, which they that are not yet regenerate can in no wise haue. And the Apostle by this his doctrine semeth not a little to comfort the weaker sort of the Jewes. They were somewhat asfearde lest by comming vnto Christ, & embracing the righteousness of faith, they should be excluded from the true righteousness of the law, but he saith, he not aserdy by comming vnto Christ, ye shall transgresse the lawe, for through Christ ys shall both fulfill it, and also be made partakers of the righteousness of God. And that he might not seeme to bring in a new or sayned distinction of righteousness, he alledgeth Moses, who maketh mention of either righteousness. First of the righteousness of the law he entreateth in Leuiticus in the. 18. chap. the wordes are these, Kepe my commaundements, and do myne ordinances, which if a man doo, bee shall lyue in them. The selfe same sentence also we reade in the. 27. chapter. They haue cast away my commaundements, which commaundements who sakepeth, shall lyue in them. But we must remember, that when lyfe is promised to them that doo or kepe the commaundementes, that is not to be vnderstanded of a certayne lyght and slender obedience, but of a most perfect: for suche an obedience the lawe requireth. But this obedience can no man performe. And where as vnto the obseruers of the law is promised life, some haue vnderstand thereby thys corporall and temporall life. For the transgressors of the law of Moses were put to death. For it is commaunded, He which curseth father or mother, let him be slayne. Blasphemers also, adulterers, and breakers of the Sabaoth daye were put to death, but they which obeyed, remayned on lyue. And hereunto it seemeth that the epistle to the Hebrues had a respect in the. 10. chapter, where we reade, He which maketh frustrate the law of Moses, perisheth without any mercy. This sentence, although it be Augustines and certayne others, yet I can not easely admit, for that I see that the life which God promised, was not onely temporall, but also eternal. For there is no doubt, but that they pertaine vnto God, which doo his will. Neither is it conuenient, that God should geue vnto them whose God he is, a saluation

The workes of infidels are sinnes. They which are endued with the righteousness of faith attaine also vnto the righteousness of the lawe but not contrariwise. The righteousness of faith and of the law in what sort they are opposite.

The righteousness of faith may be ioyned together with that righteousness of the lawe which followeth iustification. A similitude taken out of Logike.

They which are not regenerate can not haue good motions of the minde. Hereout is gathered a consolation of the Jewes

The law requireth a most perfect obedience.

What manner of life the law promisseth.

The lyfe which is promised, is not only temporall, but also eternal

tion

tion which endureth but for a tyme, for this thing haue brute beasts at his hand, and the wicked also. Wherefore Christ the most true interpreter of the law, teacheth the selfe same thing. For a young man demanding of him, what shall I do to possesse eternall lyfe. He made answer, Keep the commandementes, if thou wilt enter into lyfe. This place moste plainly proueth that the falke was of eternall lyfe. Neither is it anye meruaile, that the Lawe is the worde of God, whose propriety is to bring lyfe with it, so that it be receaued. Although the Lawe and the Gospell are not receaued after one and the selfe same maner. For the Lawe is receaued by doing, and moste exactly performing that whiche is commaunded: But the Gospell is receaued by a lyuely and effectuell assent of sayth. And that the propriety of the worde of God is to bring lyfe, it is manifest by the creation of thinges, wherein God called those thinges whiche were not, and straight way they had being. And Christ also many tymes said, his wordes are lyfe, which thing the Apostels also ment, when they sayd: Thou hast the wordes of lyfe. And Paul most manifestly before in this selfe same Epistle, in ch. 7. chap. writeth of the Lawe, that it is spirituall. And of the commandement of God he affirmeth, that it is iust, holy, and good, and ordayned vnto lyfe. Moses also in the 30. chapter of Deut. writeth of the selfe same lawe, that he had set before the people lyfe and death, manifestly declaring, that if the Lawe were receaued and fulfilled, it would bring with it lyfe, and that eternall lyfe. But for that wee are debarred of this commoditie, our mercifull God hath prouided an other worde, namely the word of sayth, which if by assenting vnto it, it be receaued, hath with it lyfe. By this place it is euident that the promises of the Lawe are given by supposition or condition of workes going before. So that if these workes be not performed, the promises are made voyde: yea rather in steede of them succeedeth a curse, which thing was declared in Deutero: when vpon Mount Garizim and Hebal were recited the blessinges and cursinges. But in the Gospell, if vnto promises be annexed workes, they are not to be taken either as desertes, or as causes of those promises, but we must thus thinke, that those giftes of God which are promised follow after workes although those workes be not perfect and absolute, as they are commaunded in the Lawe.

But the righteousnes which is of faith speaketh on this wyse: Saye not in thine hart, who shall ascend into heauen, that is to bring Christ from aboue. &c. As the first righteousnes is sayd to consist in doing, so this all whole standeth in beleuing. For if thou haue the word nere thee, that is, if thou beleue in thine hart, thou shalt obtaine saluation. The Apostle learneth by the figure Prosopopzia to bring in the righteousnes of sayth thus speaking, as though it should say, Say not in thine hart. &c. Although we may reade it other wyse, namely that Paule putteth forth this sentence absolutely.

But the righteousnes which is of faith. And straight way he addeth, this he sayth, as though Moses should speake of it. But which way so euer we reade it, it is no great matter. But this is certain, that he declareth the nature of faith by the propertie thereof, that we should not thinke that euery kinde of faith bringeth righteousnes, but onely an assured and constant sayth. For this is the nature of sayth, to exclude all ambiguitie and doubtles. For if we should with feare and suspicion geue our assent, that assent should be but an opinion, and not faith. Being therefore that there are two principall thinges set forth vnto vs to be beleued, namely that Christ perpetually obtaineth of the father grace and reconciliation for vs, and that by his death he hath overcome eternall death: Of these two humaine reason doubteth, and therefore it is brought in of Paul as though it should say, And who shall ascend up into heauen, to see that God is pacified towards vs through Christ? Or who shall go downe into the deepe, to see that eternall death is by hym broken and extinguished. After this sorte is the unbeleuing mynde woont to wauer, which thing Paule by the figure Mimesis expreth. These cogitations ought sayth to dye away, and onely to looke vpon the goodnes and power of God. Which thing our Apostle before did notably teache that Abraham did, for when he had sayd that Abraham beleued, & it was imputed vnto him to righteousness, he declared how his sayth resisted such reasoninges. He considered not

(sayth

The lawe & the Gospell are diuersly receiued. The worde of God bringeth lyfe.

The promises of the law are by supposition. The promises of the law were vnto the trasgressors of the law turned into a curse. The promises of the law freely follow the good workes of the that are fulfilled.

What is that sayth which ringeth righteounes.

Incredulity of mans hart.

In example of Abraham.

(saith he) his body now in a manner dead, nor the wombe of Sara now past child bearing, but gaue glory to God, most fully knowing that he was able to performe the things which he had promised. And so in hope he beleued against hope. Wherefore the proptie of fayth is, to mortifie these assaultes of reason.

Say not in thine hart. The Apostle therfore wrote this, so that althoughe these cogitaciōs of reason be not exprest by y<sup>e</sup> mouth, or by the wordes, yet they wander abroad in the harte. Neyther doubtles can we let, but that such cogitaciōs will assault our minde, howbeit we are taught to resist them. For he which geueth place to these thinges, both denieth Christ, and also despayreth of saluation. Paul not without iust cause cited Moses. For he was accused as though he were an enemy to Moses, and preached that men should fall away from him. Wherefore his meaning is to declare, that he is not agaynst Moses, but rather teacheth the selfe same thinges that he taught: wherefore we may say that he turneth y<sup>e</sup> argument of the aduersaries agaynst themselves. They sayd: We will not receaue the righteousness of fayth, for that we beleue Moses. P<sup>er</sup>ea rather sayth Paul, soasmuch as ye beleue Moses, ye ought to follow thys righteousness. But if Moses preach the righteousness of fayth, how is his ministry distinguished from the ministry of Christ and of the Gospell? Iohn sayth, The law was geuen by Moses, but grace by Iesus Christ. And if he preached the righteousness of fayth, he also brought grace. Unto this question we answer. That Moses, to speake of his doctrine, did not generally preach y<sup>e</sup> law without Christ: For in that he chiefly byged the Law, it was of necessity, that therewithal also he taught Christ, vnto whome the law as a scholemaster led them. But because his trauayle was to this thing chiefly bent, to set forth and expound the law, therefore was he peculiarly called the teacher thereof. As Christ and the Apostles in preaching repentaunce, taught also the Law, howbeit bycause that they chiefly hereunto endeuored themselves, to publike abroad grace and the Gospell, therefore they are called ministers, not of the law, but of grace, and of fayth. But Paul in alledging the wordes of Moses semeth not a litle to disagree both from his meaning, and also from his wordes: For in Deut. y<sup>e</sup> 30. chapter it semeth that the discourse of Moses talke was of the commaundementes of God. For he sayth: My commaundement is not wonderfully aboue thee, that thou shouldest say who shall ascend vp into heauen, to bring it vnto vs, that we maye heare it, and doo it? Neyther is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say: which of vs shall go beyond the sea, and bring it vnto vs, that we may heare, and do it? But the woorde is very neare vnto thee, in thy mouth, and in thine harte, that thou maist heare it, and doo it. But this we must know, that the Apostle considered the matter more depely, then the wordes shew at the first hant. For he sawe that Moses, althoughe before he gaue the lawe in the name of God, yet in this place he simply entreated not of the commaundement, but as it was now easy to be obserued by grace, and by fayth, and the spirite grafted in the harte: which workes can not be workes of the law. For when the law is set forth, the commaundementes are not therefore made easy to be obserued, yea rather we labour agaynst that which is forbidden vs, and we fly away and leap backe fro the gouernment of God, so farre is it of, that his commaundementes should be grafted in our harte. Those are the thinges which Paul had a respect vnto. And so that he saw, that those thinges come vnto vs thorough Christ, and the righteousness of fayth, therefore he gaue that sence which is proper and natie. He considered moreover that in the selfe same chapter at the beginning are such thinges set forth which can not be ascribed, but vnto Christ only, and vnto his spirite. For God sayd, that he would conuerter them vnto him, that they should loue him with all theyr soule, with all theyr hart, and with all theyr strenghts: and that also he would circuncise theyr hartes, and the hartes of theyr seide, and cause that they should heare and do his commaundementes. And seing that straight way after these thinges are added these wordes which Paul citeth, who

¶ ¶ 1.

The proptie of fayth is to mortifie the assaultes of reason.

We can not let but that such cogitaciōs of the mind will aryle. Paul was accused as an enemy to Moses.

The ministry of Moses, and the ministry of the Gospell in whatsoe they differ.

Declaratiō of y<sup>e</sup> wordes of Moses.

teeth

The nature
of humane
wisdom.

seeth not but that they pertayne vnto the Gospel: Wherefore the commaundement whereof Moses speaketh, is take epyther according to the bare and simple knowledge thereof, or els according to the mighty and effectuall power of brynging men to the obedience thereof. The discourse of Moses will not suffer, that we should take it in the first sence, when as the simple and playne vnderstanding the commaundement is not made easy to be done, neither is it grafted into our hartes and bowells. Wherefore we must nedes vnderstand an effectuall and mighty knowledge, which soasmuch as it is not had but by sayth & by Christ, therefore Paul erreth not from the true sence, whe he thus interpretateth Moses. The Sillogisme or argument is thus to be framed together. Moses speaketh of the word which is in our hart, and maketh vs apt to perfoyme the commaundementes. We preach the selfe same thing, when we set forth the iustificacion of sayth: Wherefore we speake the selfe same thing that Moses did. And in verye dede if a man consider that chap. of Deut. he shall see, that God most manifestly promisseth vnto the people his gouernment, not indede outward, which he had set forth in Sina, but inward, which in verye dede pertayneth to the ministry of sayth and of the Gospel. And the Apostle by these wordes of Moses notably declareth, what is the nature of humane wisdom, namely, perpetually to resist sayth. Vnto whose reasons they that geue place, do as much as lieth in them diminish the strengths of God, and of Christ, as though he can not perfoyme the thinges which he is sayd to haue done and promised. For as sayth ertollet the power of God: so incredulity weakeneth it. And this is it, which Esay sayd vnto Acha: Is it a small matter for you to be troublesome vnto men, but that ye will also greue God, And at the least thorough your opinion or rather incredulity make him weake. When the vnbeleuers heare, that Christ after his resurrection ascended vp into heauen, and there hath pacesied the father towarde vs, and ministrerth eternall life vnto the beleuers, streight way they saye with them selues: Who shall ascend vp into heauen to see if it be so? Which is nothing els but to fetch downe Christ from aboue, and to abrogate his power. Likewise when it is preached, that by dyng he hath overcome death, sinne, damnation, and hell they say, who shall descend downe into the deape, that we may be made sure of these victories: whiche is nothing els but to make voyde the benefite of Christe. These wordes may paradiuenture be applyed vnto other formes of doubtinges of the harte of man, but yf killeth not much. This we ought without all doute to thinke, that it was so sure, that yf thinges which Paul cited out of Moses are to be vnderstanded of Christ, that at that time the Iewes theselues durst not haue denied them: for they? Rabines which we haue now in vse, most manifestly apply those thinges which are wrytten in the beginning of this chap. of Deut. vnto the times of the Messias. Paul also weighed that although Moses had before put this word commaundement, yet afterward when he sayth that it is might vnto vs, & in yf hart, he calleth it Dabar, yf is, word, which word serued Pauls purpose, whe he sayth, This is the word of sayth which we preach. And the Apostle so alledgeth the sentence of Moses yf he excellently wel alludeth to his wordes, which he not only amplifieth, and by exposition maketh perspicuous, but also interpreteth. For when he sayth, To ascend into heauen: which Moses also hath, he addeth that it. To bring downe Christ from aboue. So that those thinges which Moses spake generally of distrust and doubting, Paul applyeth to those doubtinges, whiche most of all hinder the iustifying sayth. And so that it was a thing very requisite that the Iewes should be perswaded that the righteousness of sayth, is not repugnant vnto Moses, therefore would Paul the moze largely set forth this place and saye the longer in it. When he addeth.

But what sayth? It may seme doubtfull whether it ought to be referred vnto Moses, whome he had before cited, or vnto the righteousness of sayth, which is brought in as if it should speake. But thys is no matter of waight and there are some greke expleers wherin is added, h y paph, yf is, But what saith the scriptures, ther is this to be passed ouer, y in the Hebꝛue is had not only nigh, or next: but there is also added this aduerbe Meod which signifieth, very: whereby is noted a very nigh inward nērenes. The Seuentꝝ interpreters haue in their translation, not onely, in the hart, and in the mouth, but haue added, in the handes. But that is not had in the Hebꝛue, and Paul hath left it out. Augustine in his questions by pō Deut. who readeth after the translation of the Seuentꝝ, diligently noteth that. But if it be added, it nothing hindꝛeth, yea rather it helpeth the interpretation of the Apostle, whereby is declared, that in that place is entreated of the commaundment of God as it is grafted in the hart, as it is confirmed by the mouth, and as it is expꝛessed in woꝛke. But all these thinges are to be referred vnto Chꝛiste and vnto faith: for that is it which causeth our mind and harte to be opened and made able to receiue those thinges, which are vtterly repugnant vnto reason, iudgement and sence: and so is that made nigh vnto vs, which is by nature most farre of from vs. And that the scripture by name mencioneth the hart, it wanteth not a mistery: for although faith pertaine vnto the assent of the minde, yet notwithstandinge hath it most nighly ioyned with it the affect of the will, which is by the hart described: for that, if vnto our vnderstanding or minde be offered those thinges which are most manifest and plaine, it is so ouercome, that it straight way geueth assent: neither waiteth it for the commaundment or consent of the will, as it is euident in the first pꝛinciples of all sciences, and in mathematicall demonstrations. But when thinges doubtfull are set fōꝛth, and that the reasons on either side are obscure, and many thinges are agaynst the proposition set fōꝛth, the minde and vnderstanding geue not assent, but by the commaundment and consent of the will, which in that case peiseth and examineth the ambiguity. Wherefoꝛe when faith is engendꝛed in vs the holy ghost therein bleth two woꝛkes. The one is, so to illustrate the minde, that it may be made certaine of the thing set before it, although it be not very euident. The other is, that the will be so strengthned, that by the affect therof it may ouercome whatsoeuer sence or reason, do set fōꝛth which is repugnant vnto the woꝛd of God geuen vnto vs. For in the woꝛke of faith, vnto our will is ioyned the holy Ghost, for the assente whiche by beleuing we geue vnto the oracles of God is firme and of efficacy: for the spirite chaungeth the will, and maketh it of hys owne accorde vtterly to will those thinges which it before refused. Wherefoꝛe God when he geueth vnto vs faith, gouerneth ech power of the soule, as is agreable vnto their nature. And soasmuch as this pertaineth to y wil, not to iudge any thing of it self, but to follow the iudgemente of vnderstanding, the minde is by the spirite of God made assured of the thinges which are to be beleued: and vnto it therewithall it is made plaine, that we must wholly be obedient vnto God. Therof it commeth that the wil resisteth not, but represseth all thinges which other wise shoulde be a let to this assent required at our hands. He calleth the Gospel y woꝛd of faith, for none other cause, but for that by faith it is apprehended: whereby a figuratiue kinde of speech the obiect is illustrated and described by the vertue which apprehendeth it.

This is the worde of faith which we preach. This is not spoken, that we should beleue that the Gospell is not ioyned with the law: for how then could repentance be preached? But therfoꝛe it is wꝛitten, for that the chiefest parte of the ministry of the Apostles is occupied about the righteousness of faith. And when it is said, This is the word of faith, which we preach, by a certaine Emphasis is declared, that the doctrine of the Gospell is in no wise repugnant vnto the lawe of Moses, yea rather it excellently well agreeth with it. It is not onely sayd, that the woꝛde is nigh in the hart, but also in the mouth. Which thing Paul weying, moste aptly applied it to his purpose: for this he saith belōgeth to confessiō, which euer straight way foloweth a true & effectuell faith. Some of the Iewes vnderstōd this place as though Moses should say, now the woꝛd is in your mouth, y is, ye haue it in sight & before you: for this woꝛde Pi disagreeth not from this signification, for it is sayde Keephi lephi, which signifieth, hard by and nigh. Others also haue not vnaptly by, in the mouthe, vnderstanded expꝛessing or rehercing: for the lawe being geuen

¶¶¶.

and

How great
the strength
of faith is.

The minde
when it asseteth vnto thinges bery manifest waiteth not for the consent of the will.

How the
vnderstan-
ding & will are vnto
faith.

Cap. 10. A Commentarie vpon the

and written, the Jewes mought repeat and recite with themselves the wordes thereof. And the Leuites daylye repeated it in the Tabernacle or in the temple of God, and in this wise it was said to be had in the mouth. But this is to be considered, that it was for no other cause had in handes and sighte, or recited either of the Leuites, or of any of the people, but to bring men vnto Christe, and to stirre them vp to faith in him, and to prouoke the godly to confesse, to praise, and to allowe that which the Lord had spoken.

Why the law was oftentimes repeated.

If thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the lord Iesus, and shalt beleue in thine harte that God hath raised him vp from the deade, thou shalt be saued. For with the hart mā beleueth vnto righteousness, and with the mouth is confession made vnto saluation. For the scripture saith, whosoever beleueth in hym shall not be made ashamed. For there is no difference betwene the Jew, and the Grecian. For there is one lord ouer all, who is riche vnto all them that call vpon him. For whosoever shall call vpon the name of the lord shall be saued.

If thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and shalt beleue in thine hart that God hath raysted him vp from the deade. Although Paul seemeth not here to obserue a right order, for first we beleue, before we make confession: yet because that we cannot iudge concerning our brother, whether he beleue, vnles we heare him first confesse, for this cause the Apostle putteth the effect before the cause. And amongst other thinges which are to be beleued, he doth not without god consideration set forth vnto vs the resurrection of Christ, for that doubtles in the resurrection is accomplished our saluation. For, that which is now begonne in vs, we shall haue absolute and perfect, when we shall be partakers of that life, which Christ in his resurrection hath gotten not onely for himselfe, but also for vs. Farther if Christ had not risen againe from the dead, he should not now be with the father obtaining by his intercession grace, spirite, & life for vs. And as Augustine teacheth, the faith whereby we beleue that Christ arose againe from the dead, is proper vnto christians: for, that he died, the Jewes also, and the Ethnikes, and all infidels beleue: but that he arose againe, onely the members of Christ are persuaded thereof. Lastly, the resurrection of the lord is after a sorte a knitting together and a bond, whereby the articles going before and the articles following concerning the faith of our saluation are very well knit together. For if Christ rose againe, it followeth, that he died for our sinnes, and that his sacrifice was acceptable vnto God: neither could these thinges haue bene done, vnles he had for the redemption of mankinde taken vpon hym flesh, and had in very dede become man. Moreover if he rose againe, he hath eternall life, he is ascended vp vnto the father: neither is he in baine with him in heauen: yea there he is, as he hath promised, at hand to helpe vs, and prepareth a place for vs.

The faith of an other mā is knowen onely by confession. In the resurrection is accomplished our saluation.

The faith of the resurrection of Christ is proper vnto christians. The article of the resurrection is a knitting together of all the rest of the articles.

For with the hart man beleueth to righteousness, and with the mouth is confession made to saluation. With a certayne exclamation, and that doubtles very profitable he concludeth the entreaty of the place which hee alledged out of Moses, wherein he attributeth righteousness vnto faith onely, and ioyneth confession thereunto, because a man should not thinke that hee speaketh of a weake & dead faith, but of such a faith as byngeth forth confession. And although there are a great many good wordes which followe faith, yet Paule mencioneth that which is the chiefest, and may easeliest be gathered out of the wordes of Moses before alledged: for he as we haue heard, vnto the hart ioyned the mouth. And Christ saith, Of the aboundance of the hart the mouth speaketh. Now be it this is to be noted, and that not negligently, that Paule in this place attributeth iustification vnto faith, but some saluation he attributeth vnto confession. And by saluation he here vnderstandeth not the chiefest saluation, that is, our reconciliation wth God, or absolution from sinnes, as he before dyd, when he sayd, If thou beleue that God raysted him from the dead, thou shalt be saued. And afterward, Whoso-ener

uer shall call upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved. But by saluation he vnderstandeth a farther perfection, which is geuen vnto them which are now iustified: so daily the powers of their mynde, and the instrumentes or members of theyr body are made perfect by doyng good woorkes. And without doubt when wee confesse the Lord, by this laudable and holy worke we get much profit. So ment Paule vnto the Philippians, when he sayd, Woorkes your saluation with feare, and with trembling. And if thou contend that in this place by saluation is vnderstanded iustification, that, we wyl not like to graunt, so it be vnderstanded onely as touching the effect, and a posteriori (as they vse to speake) that is, by that which fol-loweth, namely, y<sup>e</sup> a mā may hereby iudge that such a one is iustified. This place also maketh very much against certayne Libertines, which renew agayne the errou of the Carpocratians, and say that we must not confesse the benefite of sayth before the iudgement sentes of persecuters. From whych errour the Pitoe-mites of our time are not very farre off, whych say that it is enough to thinke wel in the hart, although outwardly true pietie be dissembled, and although men go to the rites and ceremonies of the Papistes. We must in dede take heed that we doo not rashly call our selues into daungers, but when God hath brought vs into them, and that wee are examined touching the truth, wee must remember that they which are ashamed of Christ before men, he at the length wyl be ashamed of them before the father. Let our aduersaries go now, and obla vnto vs, that sayth can consist without good woorkes. The Apostle, when he entreateth of iustification, describeth alwayes such a faith, whych of necessity hath confession and good woorkes ioyned with it. For the scripture sayth, Who soeuer beleeueth in him, shall not be ashamed. Whych is manifest why the Jewes could not complaine of theyr relection, namely, for that they were vbeleuers. And it is euident that righteousness, if we speake of the true right-eousnes, whych is before God, can not be had but by sayth onely. Whereof we may inferre, that wheresoeuer sayth is, there also is iustification, and contrary-wise, where it wanteth, iustification can in no wise haue place. Wherefore the Jewes haue nothing whereof to complaine. For euen as the chiefest cause of our saluation, namely the election or predestination of God, is not contracted vnto the Jewes, but is also poured abroad amongst the Gentiles, as it hath bene declared in the 9. chapter: so sayth, which is the next cause of saluation is not but by amongst the Jewes onely, yea rather but fewe of them beleeued: therefore the Jewes ought not to haue bene displeased for the conuersion of the Gentiles: Whereunto the Apostle now endeouereth him self, to proue y<sup>e</sup> the sentence which he had before spoken indistinctly, namely, with the hart man beleeueth vnto right-eousnes, is to be vnderstanded vniuersally. Lest the Jewes peradventure should say: It is true in dede that thou sayest, but yet in our stocke onely, and in the seed of Abraham. It is not so (sayeth Paule) when as the Prophet Esay in hys 28. chapter, speaketh it by this word of vniuersality whosoever, for hee sayeth: Who soeuer beleeueth in him shall not be made ashamed. To bee made ashamed in this place is nothing els, but to be frustrated of the successe which was looked for. For when men are deceaued, they are ashamed of their hayne confidence. This testimony of Esay the Prophet is in the 28. chapter, which Paule also before vsed to, wards the end of the 9. chapter. But forasmuch as we haue there declared, how it is written in the Hebrew: and haue by the exposition of the Hebrew verity, and of the translation of the 70. interpreters, which Paule followed, shewed the nature and proper sense thereof, wee will now amitte to speake any more touching it.

For there is one Lord ouer all. This sentence firmly proueth that as touching saluation there is not to be put any difference betwene the Jewes and the Gentiles. The selfe same reason in a manner he before vsed in this selfe same Epistle in the 3. chapter, in that place, where he sayd: Is God the God of the Jewes onely: yea, and of the Gentiles also. And the argument of Paule is firme, for that it cleaueth vnto a sure ground: namely, that nature hath so framed y<sup>e</sup> things, which are ioined vnto any other things as causes of them or beginning haue a desire to,

Against Libertines 128 129 130
131 132 133
134 135 136

Faith con-sisteth not without good works.

The comaplaint of the Jewes
stopped.

What is to be made
ashamed.

Causen
haue an affect to wards
their el-
lects.

why God
helpeth not the damned

God is the God of all,
but yet hee
predestina-teth not all.

Preaching
is common
vnto al mē,
but faith is not commō
vnto al mē.
In what sense God is called rich.

A place of Joel.

wardes their effectes. As the father hath to his children, the workman to his workes, the Lord to his seruantes: so also hath God to his. But they notwithstanding, helpe, and adorne the thinges which pertain vnto them, wherefore God also will be vnto his both a helpe and also saluation: and that his propriety is to preserve them, the common prouerbe declareth, wherein it is sayd, Homo homini Deus, that is, Man is vnto man a God. And if thou demaunde why hee helpeth not the damned, when as they also pertain vnto him, we answer, because he is now compared vnto them as a iudge, and an auenger, and not as God, in whom they may any longer put confidence, or whom they can any more inuocate. Moreover, let vs note that this vniuersall sentence is to be vnderstanded, predestination and election remaining safe: for God is not so the God of all, that he electeth and predestineth all. This thing onely we ought to gather, that there are certayne of all sortes of people, whome hee hath from eternallye elected, and vnto whom in due tyme he will geue sayth: and that also hee woulde that sayth should be preached vnto all mē without difference, & yet hath chosen out certain, whom he bringeth to the obtainment of the promises. And in this sense also, as Augustine teacheth, and as we haue oftentimes admonished, is to be expounded that sentence of Paul vnto Timothe, God will haue all men to be saved. And that the proposition now alleaged is in this maner to be contracted, the wordes which follow plainly declare.

Rich vnto all them that call vpon him. They which are brought vnto saluation, call vpon God, and through the singular and principall gift of God do beleue, which gift is not giuen vnto all men. Wherefore it is euident, that preaching ought to be common: and so Christ is sayd to pertain vnto all men. But they which haue saluation, which are endued with sayth and the spirite, vnto whom God is sayd to be rich, are not indifferently all men, but are in a certayn and definyte number conteyned in the election of God. And God is called riche toward his, so that he enricheth them with his grace and giftes. In Greeke it is written ἀποτύγ, for God hath no neede to be increased, and enriched, but encreaseth, and enricheth those that are his. This sentence is of great force to pacifie the myndes of the Iewes, which through a certayne enuy were grieved that the Gentyles were called vnto the Gospel: which thing they woulde not haue done, if they had bene perswaded that God is so rich, that he hath aboundantly enough both for the Iewes and for the Gentiles: so that by the calling of the Gentiles nothing was taken away from the Iewes. And it is a comon phrase in the scriptures, by the name of riches to signifie the most plentifull goodness of God. As it is said in this epistle, Doest thou contemne the riches of his goodness, patience, and long suffering? And vnto the Ephesians, Who is rich in mercy. And Christ to the Colossians is sayd to be he, in whome are all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God. When he addeth, Rich to all them that call vpon him, he adioyneth an other worke of faith. For before by the testimony of Esay it was said, Who soeuer belongeth in him, shal not be made ashamed. Now for inuocation he annexeth a testimony taken out of the second chapter of Joel.

VVho soeuer shall call vpon the name of God, shall be saved. So that again we see that there is required a liuely sayth. And as before confession was added vnto faith, and Moses made mention not only of the hart, but also of the mouth: so now together with faith is mention made of inuocation. And without doubt Joel in that chapter spake of the Jewes: for he saith, that in those dayes should be geuen bloud, fire, & pillars of a cloude, and the Sunne should be turned into darknes, and the Moone into bloud. And there is added, I will poure my spirite vpon all fleshe, and your sonnes, and your daughters shall prophesie, your olde men shall dreame dreames: and I will poure my spirite vpon your seruantes and handmaydens. That all these thinges pertain vnto Christ, and vnto the pouring forth of his spirit, no man doubteth. Wherefore if Paul applie them to the inuocation vpon him, he nothing erreth from the native sence. The prophet had before said, that there should be a great destruction throughout the whole world, and throughout the regions adioyning: but he added therunto, that whosoener should call vpon the name of the Lord, should be saved: which forasmuch as he pronounceth generally and vniuersally, Paul therby declareth that this proposition is to be taken vniuersally. It is true in deede that the Prophet saith, that this saluation should be geuen in Jerusalem, and in Zion: but yet notwithstanding that letteth not, but that it may be applied vnto the Gentiles also: for he speaketh of that Jerusalem & of that Zion which are preferred by God: but the carnall kingdome of the Iewes is destroyed: wherefore it followeth, that such cities are figuratiuely taken for the people of the faithfull which lived in them. And those faithfull were in their time the Church, which afterward was spred abroad throughout the whole world: neither are there any which call vpon the name of Christ, but in the Church onely. And it may be, as some thinke, that by the inuocation of the name of God is vnderstanded the whole order of piety, and of sound religion. But in my iudgement I thinke it better by inuocation, simply to vnderstand the prayers of the faithfull. And this is diligently to be noted, that the Prophet writeth of that inuocation, which proceedeth from the spirite, and from a sincere faith: for prayers said but of a faction, and mumbled by without vnderstanding, obtaine not saluation. We must also cal to memory that which Paul said vnto the Corinthians, that no man can say the Lord Iesus but in the spirite. Whereouer the Prophet saith not, whosoener shall call vpon the name of the Lord, shall haue whatsoever he asketh, but shall be saved. For oftentimes we are ignorant, what it is that we aske: and then God which knoweth what thinges are profitable for vs, although perticularly he seeme not to graunt vnto our requestes, yet most of all he heareth our prayers when he geueth saluation: and therefore is he neuer in vaine called vpon of his faithfull. These things being thus set forth and confirmed, Paul setteth the Churches in quiet: declaring, that neither the Gentiles ought to despise the Iewes, nor the Iewes also ought not to enuy the Gentiles, when as faith and inuocation may be common to ech people. For the Prophetes also testifie, that wheresoener shall be sounde faith and inuocation, there also shall be saluation and an assured obtaynement of righteousnes. For as touching the lacke thereof, the Iewes and the Gentiles were both equall: as it is said in the 3. chapter of this epistle, For all haue sinned, and haue neede of the glory of God. Neither herein is there any difference betwene Iewe or Grecian. Whereouer neither people hath of himselfe faith, whereby to be iustified: Wherefore as touching these things, the lot both of the Iewes & of the Gentiles is a like. And therefore it was mete, y as the Gospel was preached vnto y Iewes, so also it should be preached vnto other people: & the Iewes wer vnwise men, for this thing to be angry with the Apostles. We are also taught, forasmuch as faith may be geuen of God vnto whomsoener he will, neither is his predestinatiõ knowe, to despayre of no mā, but by teaching, admonishing, & preaching to endenour our selues to draw all men vnto Christ. The Lord commaunded the Apostles, to go into the whole world, & to preach to al nations, neither excepted he any. Therefore Paul earnestly laboured to be made all to all, y he might winne all, or at the least some vnto Christ. None, when he falleth into any sinne, or in any thing disagreeeth from vs, is straightway to be reiecte: he may yet beleue and call vpon God, and thereby obtaine righteousnes and saluation. Neither ought we herof to be ignorant, that the wordes of the Apostle which we haue hitherto entreated of in this 10. chapter, so proue certainty of saluation, that vndoubtedly they can not be denied nor anoyded. First he sayd, Say not in thine hart who shall ascend into heauen? By which wordes he suffreth vs not to doubt, that Christ being in heauen, pacifieth the father, and maketh him mercifull towarde vs, and that by his death he hath overcome eternall destruction, sinne, the deuill, and hell fire, so that they can not preuaile against vs if we hope in him. Whereouer that we should not doubt, he added, He which be-

out

what man ner inuoca-
tion obtay-
neth salua-
tion.

We must despise of no man.
Note.

Whereby is certainty
of saluation
proued.

Cap. 10.

A Commentary vpon the length in him shall not be made ashamed. Agayne, Whosoever calleth vpon the name of the Lord shall be saved. This suffreth vs not to doubt of saluation, whatsoeuer our aduersaries object vnto vs.

But how shall they call vpon him, in whom they haue not beleued: and how shall they beleue in him of whome they haue not heard: and howe shall they heare without a preacher: And howe shall they preach except they be sent: as it is written, How beautefull are the feate of them which bring glad tidings of peace, and which bring glad tidings of good thinges.

The fruit of inuocati-
on cometh vnto vs by faith.

But how shall they call vpon him in whome they haue not beleued? That thou shouldest not thinke that by the worke of inuocation thou shalt haue saluation, the Apostle straight waye declareth vnto thee the roote whereby thou art made safe, namely, faith. None inuocateth, but he which beleueth: wherefore the fruit of inuocation cometh vnto vs through faith. Paul in this place maketh a certaine kinde of gradation, wherein he knitteth the causes together with their effectes. We must beginne at saluation, which is put for the last effect, saluation cometh of inuocation, inuocation is by faith, faith cometh of hearing: and hearing is by preachers: and they come by the sending of God. Wherefore it followeth that if the Gentiles ought to haue saluation as well as the Iewes, then God should send preachers vnto them also. Wherefore the Apostles are not to be blamed, in that they preached vnto the Gentiles, seeing that God sent them. This kind of argument is called Sorites, of heaping vp together, for the causes are gathered of the effectes, and of the first is inferred the last, or of the last is concluded the first.

The cer-
tainety of saluation
confirmed.

How shall they call vpon him, in whome they haue not beleued? No man imployeth the helpe of God, vnles he be perswaded with himselfe that God is at hand and ready to helpe him. And here againe thou hast an argument to confirme the certainty of saluation.

The ministers of the church are adorned with an excellent title

vnles
they preach the Gospel
they are not the ambassadors
of God.

How shall they beleue in him of whome they haue not heard? We must first heare the thinges that are to be beleued: for that which is beleued is the word of God, which is receaued by hearing. It is not lawfull that we should of our owne head deuise thinges to be beleued of vs, we must beleue God, in suche sorte as he hath reuealed hym selfe vnto vs.

God can without outward preaching
bring to sal-
uation.

But how shall they heare without a preacher? Χρησὶς κηρυξομενος. Behold with how excellent a title the ministers of the Church are adorned: they are called κηρυξες that is, the ambassadors of God. This is theyr chiefest worke to publishe abroad the wordes of God. But they haue utterly lost this dignity, which are of this minde that the highest and singulariest hono: is to consecrate (as they vse to speake) the sacrament, or to transubstantiate bread and wyne. They are not so described in the holie scriptures, but that they shoulde preach, and do the office of ambassadors.

How shall they preach vnles they be sent? For an ambassader can signifie nothing of the will of his prince, but so much as his prince shall befoze shew vnto him. Paul was not ignorant, but that it is possible, that God can by hym selfe worke without an outward minister, & he knew very well, that he which planteth, and which watreth is nothing, but it is god only which geneth the increase: But he here speaketh of the ordinary way which God vseth in the Church. For he ordeinieth the ministry, and vseth the voyce and wordes of the preachers to kindle faith by the holy ghost in the hartes of the hearers. Wherefore we ought to geue thanks vnto God for so singular a gift. But manye contemne and loth the ministers of the Church, and would (as I suppose) be instructed by Angells, & are ignorant that Christ would by his humanity minister vnto vs saluation. God delighteth in the loue and knitting together of the members in the Church, that we should hang one of an other: by this meanes loue is more entier, then if saluation should be ministred vnto vs by Angells. Howbeit thys we ought to know, that the efficacy of the worde of God, or of the sacramentes depēdeth not of h goodnes or holines of the minister. This moreouer is to be noted that the sending of God, is eyther by himselfe immediately or els by the calling of the Church, for the right ordering whereof, there ought not aregard to be had vnto money, affinity, frendshippe or such like, but vnto the worthines of them that are called. And Chyristians ought to be fully perswaded, that although they which chuse the ministers of the Church are sinners, yet is not that a let vnto theyr saluation: for vnto them is geuen eyther a good pastoz or an euill. If they haue a good pastoz, they haue cause to geue vnto God thanks, which hath not only prouided that saluation should be ministred vnto them, but also hath geuen vnto them an holy and good pastoz. But if he be an euill pastoz, let them also acknowledge the goodnes of God, which when as they deserued not a good pastoz, suffreth rather the worde and sacramentes of God to be ministred vnto them by such a one, then that he would forsake them. And yet they to whome it pertayneth to admitte the pastoz, let them not thinke that they commit a light offence, when they eyther aduance or tolerate vntwo:thy pastozs. And the people when they heare the word of God, and receaue the sacramentes ought most chiefly to weigh those thinges which are ministred vnto them: whether they be deliuered vnto the purely & sincerely, or corruptly, rather the to loke vpon h condicions or maners of theyr minister: although his saluation also is not to be neglected, neyther are offences to be tollerated more then must nedes. And although Paul in this place entreate of vocations and sending, which as I haue sayd is both ordinary and extraordinary: yet is it not to be doubted, but that he nowe speaketh of the extraordinary way, when as the Apostles were not chose by the iudgment of the priestes and bishoppes, but were sent thorough out the world at the commaundement of God only. Howbeit the thinges which are mencioned in the commendation and prayse of the ministry, pertayne also vnto the ordinary vocation of h ministers of h Church. There are two thinges which Paul thinketh are now remayning to be proued: namely, h the Apostles should be sent of God himself, to preach h Gospel: secondly, the it is not so much to be meruayled at, if but few beleued. For the confirmation of the first, he bringeth a place out of the prophet Esay in the 52. chap. How beautifull are the seete of them whiche bring glad tidinges of peace, and whiche bring glad tidings of good thinges. These thinges are spoken of h deliuey from h captiuitie of Babilon: but I haue oftentimes admonished, h those perticular deliueries, either fro Egypt or from the Assyrians & other oppzessors of the people of h Jewes, had to theyr roote & foundacio iustification from sinnes thorough Chyrist: for captiuities, oppzessions, and other misfortunes, sozasmuch as they are effects of sinne, when they are taken away, God is declared to be reconciled by the sozgeuenes of sinnes. And in that sence is Mathe to be vnderstanded, when he writeth, that in Chyrist, when he healed the sicke, was fulfilled that sentence of Esay, He hath borne our infirmities: Which although at the first sight it semeth not to agree, for that Esay speaketh of the death of Chyrist, wherein he suffered the punishmentes deu vnto our sinnes, and the hope is declared of the healing of diseases, yet in very dede it excellently well agreeth: for Mathe considered, that the infirmities which Chyrist drave away, entred in thorough sinne: and those infirmities being gone, signified that sinne the cause of them was taken away, namely, by Chyrist, whome it was necessary that he should be our reconciliatoz, and this argument may be taken a minori, that is, of the lesse: for if the messengers of the redemption from the captiuitie of the body were had in honoz and admiration, and were sent from God vnto the Jewes, how much more are the messengers and legates of eternal saluation to be had in honoz and admiration, which were sent not only vnto the Jewes, but also vnto the whole world: And that they were sent of God, it is be-
the

By the institution of the ministry is kept charity. God calleth me vnto the ministry two maner of wayes.

It is a greuous sinne to aduance or to tolerate vntwo:thy ministers.

Here is entreated of extraordinary vocation but it is rightly applied vnto the ordinary vocation.

The roots of the deliuey of the Jewes. A place of Mathe.

ry playne by the wordes of Esay. For before this sentence cited of Paul he maketh God complaining of the oppressors of his people, and promising, that forasmuch as they were so cruell agaynst his people, that thereby his name was layd forth vnto blasphemies and curtings, he would therefore deliuer his people. And the riding bringers of this his will he sayth should be very welcome, and receaued with great ioy and admiration. But the Hebrue veritie hath, Vpon the mountaines. The wordes of Esay in the 52. chap. are these. Mah gan al heharim ragle mebal her mashimaa shalom mebal her tob. Which place the Seventy interpreters haue thus turned: ἐπεμύω, ὥρα ἐπὶ τῶν ὀρέων: y is, I am at hand as a pleasantnes or beautifullnes vpon the mountaynes. But this particule Paul omitted, for that this worde chiefly hath a respect vnto the situation of the citie of Jerusalem, which was situated betwen mountaines. Therefore in the Psalme it is writtē, The mountaynes are in the circuite thereof. Yea verie oftentimes we reade in the

The situation of the citie of Jerusalem.

The disciples called out of Galilee.

Psalmes, that the eyes were lifted vp vnto the mountaynes. Seing therfore the messengers should come from the Assyrians or Persians, they could not come vnto the city vnles they were first sene vpon the mountaines. Howbeit this oracle may also easely be applied vnto the Apostles: for forasmuch as they were called out of Galilee, as it is playne by the history of the Gospell, whē they were sent to preach, they wēt hither & thither thorough the mountaynes and especially whē they came vnto Jerusalem: & hauing receaued the holy ghost preached the Gospell there.

The preaching of the Gospell was publike and not in corners.

Moreover by this metaphore is notablie described the condition or maner of the preaching of the Gospell. For it is not done secretly or in corners, but publikely as those thinges are which are sene in open places. Which kind of speech Christ also vled when he sayd, The things which ye haue heard of me in your eare, preach vpon the house toppe. Therefore it is necessary that the preaching of the Gospell be free, open and perspicuous, so that it be neither bound nor hidden, either through feare or through flattery. And by fete the Prophet by the figure Metonymia vnderstande coming. But in that he calleth them beautifull, he figuratiuely vnderstandeth, that preaching is excellent and pleasaunt. For they came to preache the Gospell, then which is nothing more beautifull. Therefore by that beautifullnes of the fete vnderstand the beautifull Gospell. And therfore the messengers thereof were worthy to be receaued with great reioysing, & much ioy of the godly. For if the Philosophers were had in estimation, for that they were thought to shew the ends of good and euill, although in very deede they performed not that, how much more worthy of honour are the Euangelistes, which openly set forth vnto the world sound felicity & eternall life: And that these men should be sent of God, not onely the wordes of the Prophet, as we haue before signified, declare, but also reason firmely proueth, for that no man could come to the knowledge of so greate a will of God towards his, which passeth the strength of nature, and farre goeth beyonde the capacitye of humane reason, vnles God himselfe made it knowne and reuealed it vnto him. And they which are not sent of God do lye and deceaue, so farre is it of that they preach the Gospell. Therefore in Jeremy the Prophet in the 14. 23. & 27. chap. the lord said: Behold I sent not them, and they ranne. The Prophet speaketh by way of admiration and demandeth. How beautifull are the feete? For the Apostles did not onely preach the pleasaunte worde of God, but also wroughte wonderfull miracles, by meanes wherof was worthely stirred by admiration both to the sēers & to the hearers. Moses was in such sorte furnished, that whē he said vnto God which sent him They will not beleue me, God gaue vnto him power miraculously to turne his rodde into a serpente, and also to do other other thinges, whiche farre passed all humane strengthes. And Christ also when he sent his Apostles to preache, adorned them with this power to worke miracles, thereby to confirme the truth of the doctrine. Not that miracles are of themselues thereunto sufficient (for we are admonished in Deut. not to beleue false prophets, though they also worke miracles And of Antichrist Paul hath foretold vnto the Thes. y he should come with lying wonders to deceaue) But this commodity onely they haue, to stirre by admiration, diligentlly

to Miracles are not sufficient to proue doctrine.

to consider the thinges which are taught: for we are so blockishe, that we woulde easely neglect them. Wherefore when we are stirred vp, we oughte by the consideration of the woorde of God to allow them, and to holde faste the thinges whiche are good.

What is the ble of miracles.

Of them whiche bring glad tidings of peace, and whiche bring glad tidings of good thinges.] The summe of the preaching of the Gospel is peace, and chiefly with God. For they which preach, as the Apostle teacheth in the latter to the Corinthians, bring with them the wordes of reconciliation, neither exhort they any thing els, but that we should be reconciled vnto God through Christ. God was before angry with mankind, he punished and condemned men, reiected they prayers, and contemned they workes, though they were notable, for that they were done of their enemies. And men on the other side were not onely miserable, but also hated euen God himself, they wished that there were no God, they cursed his iudgements, and fled from him, as from a tyranne, and cruell butcher, for that their owne conscience on euery side accused them. But the Gospel preacheth peace and reconciliation through Christ. This is it which the Angels sang at the birth of Christ: Glory on high, peace in earth, good will towarde men. The Angels extolled the acte of God, which had decreed by his sonne to redeme mankind, and this their praise and reioysing is the glory of God. Further forasmuch as we now through Christ reconciled vnto God, we obtaine peace inwardly as touching our mind, for being by grace and the spirite renewed, we leade an vprighte life, neither do wicked affectes any more rage in vs, our conscience reproveth vs not, nether are our harts by furious rages stirred vp to perturbations. Moreover we wish well, and do good vnto our neighbours as vnto our selues: and haue with them peace, & that a moste louing peace. Neither is this any let that Christe sayde, that he came not to sende peace vpon the earth, for that it is to be vnderstanded as touching the peace of the flesh and of the world. For with the peace of the Gospell whereof we now entreat are ioyned great daungers and discommodities of the flesh. Straight way after it, follow persecutions and losse of goods. But it is added.

The summe
of the preaching
of the Gospel is peace.

What is the peace of Christians.

What peace
Christ
came not to send.

And which bring gladde tidings of good thinges.] Goodnes is that as Philosophers say, which all things desire. And more largely or plainly to declare the nature therof, Good thinges are all such which in respect of vs, are either profitable, commodious, or pleasaunt to our vles. Wherefore by the power of the Gospel this benefite we obtaine, that all thinges are made to serue vs. All things (saith Paul) are yours, whether it be life or death, or Paul, or Cephas, & we are Christes, and Christ is Gods. Againe, To them that loue God all thinges worke to good. And this is to be noted, that Esay added, that these messengers should also preach deliuery: for although death, misfortunes, pouerty, diseases, and such other kinde of euils do stil bere vs: yet notwithstanding are we by Christ sayd to be deliuered from them: for that they haue not any longer the nature of punishments. For al these discommodities of the flesh hath God by his crosse and death sanctified, so that they haue not any longer the nature of punishment, but are made vnto vs enstrutions, fatherly chastisements, victories, triumphes, & notable actes. But to ouerpasse nothing, we ought not to be ignorant, that in the Hebrew tongue Shalom, that is, peace, signifieth, happy successe of thinges, so that whereas the Grecians say χαίρειν or εὐτυχεῖν, in the superscription of their letters, the Hebrewes vse to write Shalom, that is, peace. And so forasmuche as Euangelistes publishe abroad peace, they preache sound & true felicity. And if thou demanda, in what thing consisteth suche a peace, goodnes, and deliuery? We aunswere, that to speake in one worde, it consisteth in the kingdome of God. Therefore Christ when he sent his disciples to preache, willed them to preache, that the kingdome of heauen was at hand. This selfe thing Esay in this place saith, when he writeth, And they shall say vnto Sion, Thy God raig- neth. Hether to hath sinne raigned. Wherefore Paul in this Epistle said, Let not sin raigne in your mortall body. Death also hath raigned. For the same Apostle, Death hath raigned from Adam euen vnto Moses. The Deuill also hath raigned, whom the

What good is.

How we are
by Christ
deliuered
from euils.

What
peace in the Hebrew sig-nifieth.

This peace
consisteth
in the kingdom of god.

Cap. 10 A Commentarie vpon the

What manner of prince the Lord had.

Then shall we see in good estate why Christ reigneth in vs.

Wherein consisteth the kingdom of God.

At Rome they fall downe to kisse the fete of the Pope

The Pope as a sworn enemy of the Gospell & not a preacher thereof.

Of preaching both not alwayes follow the faith of the hearers.

Lord calleth the Prince of this world, and Paul the gouernour of this worlde and the God of this worlde. All these thinges haue hitherto miserably exercised their tyranny ouer vs: But now the Lord reigneth. For as touching outward kingdomes, the Jewes indeede had many iudges, and many kings, few good, some tolerable, but a greate many most wicked tyrannes. And they whiche were good, as Dauid, Ezechias, Iosias, and such like, were yet notwithstanding weake, neyther coulde they eyther defende the people from calamities, or make them good. Wherefore the Jewes were oftentimes oppressed of theyr enemies: led away into captiuitie, and being therout deliuered, were in reste for a while. But after Alexander the greate, came the Macedonians, and most grievously afflicted Jewry. After the came Pompeius, Crassus, Herode, and last of all Vespasianus and Titus, whych bitterly ouerthrew all. The church also of Christ had hys outward Princes, partly wicked, and partly good as touching ciuill righteousness, but yet very weake. Wherefore our estate can neuer be in good case, vnlesse Christ raygne in vs. Thys, as Daniel sayth in hys seconde chapter, is y kingdom of heauen which is neuer corrupted: in it is peace, not during for a tyme, but an euerlasting peace. For in the Psalme it is sayd, In his dayes shall arise righteousness, and abundance of peace, untill the moone be taken away. And in Esay, And of his peace there shall be no ende. But herein consisteth hys kingdom, that we be directed by the word and spirite of God. After these two maners Christ raygneth in vs. The word sheweth what is to be beleued, and what is to be done. The spirit impel- leth and moueth vs to doo these thinges. Thys is the euerlasting kyngdome of God, whereunto when he will adioyne any people or any nation, he visiteth them by hys ambassadours, whych are Preachers of the Gospell: and them wyll hee haue to be receaued cherefully: yea he sayth, He which receaueth you, receaueth me, and he which despiseth you, despiseth me. We haue now the iudgement of God touchyng Ministers, wherewith the beleuers ought very much to comfort them selues, although the world iudge otherwys, and count them for mad men, and outcastes, and esteeme them as paringes and chips: & so long as there is a world they shall be so iudged of. But for as much as the iudgement of the world is foolish, and vnderstandeth not the thinges that pertaine vnto God, therefore we must not leane vnto it, but rather embrace the most firme and most pleasant sentence of God. Nahum the Prophet in hys fyfth chapter, hath the lyke saying of the beutifull fete of such as preach the Gospell, so that that whych was foretolde of Esay, he also foresawe shoulde come to passe. But at Rome in our dayes men drawen by thys testimony of the Prophet, doe fall downe and kisse the fete of the Pope: as though he preached the Gospell, going about the whole worlde preaching peace: when as rather he is a sworn enemy of the Gospell, and maketh open warre agaynst the true doctrine thereof, neyther at anye tyme ceaseth to disturbe peace betwene Christian Princes.

But all obeye not the Gospell, for Esay sayth: lord, who hath beleued our hearing: vnto whom is the arme of the lord reuealed? Then faith is by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.

But all obeye not the Gospell. This seemed to be agaynst that so great dignitie of the Apostles (whych hath now bene proued, both by the authoritie of God which sent them, and also by theyr ambassadage) that very fewe, and especially of the Jewes beleued: which came to passe by no other meanes, but for that outward preaching is not alwayes of necessity ioyned wyth the faith of the hearers. For it is possible, that for as much as y power of God is not bound vnto instruments, a man may beleue wythout a Preacher, and on the other syde, a man may heare preaching, & yet not haue faith. As in thys selfe same epistle he ioyned foreknowledge together wyth predestination, although manye are foreknowen of God, which yet are not predestinated vnto eternall life: he ioyned vocation also together wyth iustification, although verie manye are called, whych yet are not iustified. The Apostle in thys place describeth faith by the name of obedience ence, and that not without iust cause, for in it is containd obedience kinde manner of wayes. For first it is necessary that the minde of humane reason do give place unto the reuelation of God, simply consenting therunto: wherby thing per taineth to a ready obedience: for otherwise there are many thinges, which let, and after a sort call vs an other way. There is also an other obedience, for they which truly beleue, endeuer themselves to obey the commaundementes of God: whiche thing before they neither did nor could do. The Apostle vsed this selfe same phrase in the first chapter of this epistle: By whome we haue receaued grace, and Apostleship to be obedient vnto sayth. In the Actes of the Apostles also it is declared, that many of the priestes were obedient vnto faith: and in this sence is faith sometimes called a law, not for that it bringeth with it blessing or cursing, but because that it likewise, as the law doth, requireth obedience, howbeit diuerse. For the law requireth obedience euen of them that will not: and yet in the meane tyme doth it not geue strengthes to performe it: but faith forasmuch as it most fully persuadeth piety, stirreth vs vp to liue according to the profession thereof. And for that thys doubt touching the fewnes of the beleuers chiefly moued the Jewes, therefore to quiet their mindes, he bringeth a testimony of Esay, whose doctrine they durst not reiect, whereby they mought vnderstand, that God had long tyme before prouided for this skarsity of the beleuers.

Faith is iustly called obedience.

Why faith is called a law.

For Esay sayth, who hath beleued our hearing? The Prophet before those wordes brought in God the father, which commaunded that his sonne should be preached, and that his reproches which he should suffer for the saluation of mankind should be tolde abroad: vnto whome the company of the Prophetes answered, who hath beleued our hearing? And to whome is the arme of the Lord reuealed? As if they should say, we indeede haue preached, and haue done our duty: but few haue beleued. Christ also sayde, Many are called, but few are elected. There was no nation, which had so diligent and often preaching of the worde of God as the Jewes had: And yet in it was alwayes a wonderfull multitude of vbeleuers. Wherefore there was no cause why they should so insolently boast that the promises were made vnto the seede of Abraham: for they ought to be contracted, both to the elect, as it was sayd in the 9. chapter, and also vnto the beleuers, as we haue now heard. The Prophet by way of admiration brought forth the sentence now alleaged. For forasmuch as mans reason knoweth not the cause, howe so greates an incredulity can withstand the word of God, and the holy ministry, it wondereth thereat. Which thing John also considered in the 12. chapter: for he writeth, that the Jewes beleued not, when yet Christ had wrought miracles, that that might be fulfilled which is written in Esay, Lord who hath beleued our hearing, and to whome is the arme of the Lord reuealed? The preaching of Christ and of the Apostles was most cleare and mighty, and was confirmed with miracles such as were neuer before sene: and therefore it was wonderfull, how so few shoulde beleue: yea so farre of were the Jewes from sayth, that they beleued that Christ was put to so cruell death for his wicked actes and blasphemyes. And therefore in this selfe same chapter Esay sayde, And he was counted with transgressors. And it is not to be meruailed at, that whereas in the Hebrew is not had this worde, Lord, Paul yet added it: for the 70. interpreters haue added it. And forasmuch as it corrupted not the sence, Paul also vsed it.

How the
promises of God are to be contracted.

Vnto whome is the arme of the Lord reueled. Here is not spoken of reuelation done by outward preaching, for that is preached vnto all men, but of the inward reuelation, and which is of efficacy. The Apostles were sent vnto all, but the inward reuelation had not place in all. By the arme we vnderstand the mighty power of God to saue. For so Paul defined the Gospell, that it is the power and might of God to saluation. Neither is there any cause, but that also by the arme of God we may well vnderstand Christ. For as euery man by the arme doth all the things he doth, so God by his word createth, gouerneth, and iustifieth, & therefore his word, which is Christ Iesus, is called his arme. Neither is this word arme

What is to be vndersta-
ded by the arme of God.

P.P.s.

applied

Cap. 10. A Commentarie vpon the

applied only to a man but also the long snout of an Elephant is called an hand or arme, for that by that instrument he worketh many thinges. And Cyrillus teacheth, how that place in John is to be vnderstanded, wherein it is sayd, That that might be fulfilled; which was spoken by Esay, Lord who hath beleued our hearing? namely, that that word, That, expreſſeth not a cause, but rather a consequence. For these men were not by the prophesy of Esay made vnbeleuers: but because they should be vnbeleuers, therfore the Prophet foretolde it. There is in deede in such kind of reasonings some necessity, but yet only of supposition or of consequence as they vse to speake, yet is not any such necessity there to be graunted, which byingeth violence or compelleth the will of man.

It is a word der that men do beleue.

To our hearing.] By hearing is ment words or preaching. It is an Hebrew phrase. The name of the sense is transferred to those things whereby the sense is moued. Schamaa, in Hebrew signifieth to heare. In Esay it is witten Lisch mi-thenu, After which selfe same maner Eli sayd vnto his children in the first booke of Samuell. It is no good fame that I heare of you: the Hebrew word is Hish miah, which signifieth, hearing. These words are deriued of hearing, for that by it talkes of fame and by words is stirred vp hearing. Although Ambrose vnderstand hearing passively, that the Apostles preached not but the things which they had heard of the Lord. But the first exposition is more simple, and most agreeth with the customeable speech of the Apostles: who although they wrote in Greke yet they euery where in a maner kept still the Hebrew phrases. But as touching the matter it seemeth no great meruaile, if men beleue not: but rather it is to be wondred at that they beleue: for therein God vseth his strength and his gracious and mercifull spirit. And they which are faithfull, when they see that others are left in their obstinacy and incredulity, may consider in them, what they had deserued, vnles they had bene ayded with the help of God. And if any man complayne, why the Lord through his grace geueth not one and the same thing vnto all men, we haue nothing els iustly to answer but this, Is thine eye euill, because I am good: take that which is thine and go thy wayes, it is lawfull for me to do with myne owne what I will, but vnto thee I do no injury. Neither in that these things were foretold of Esay the Prophet, is the cause of the Iewes any thing holpen, or their incredulity any thing excused. For as Cyrillus saith vpon John in the place now alleadged. These thinges came not to passe, for that they were foretold, but for that they should come to passe, therefore were they foretold. It was of necessity indeede that it should be so, but yet no coercion was thereby brought vnto the will of man. And doubtles God could if he would haue geuen faith vnto all men: but by his iust counsell, although vnto vs hidden, he would not: whereby we may know that faith commeth not of our owne strengths, but is in very deede the gift of God, as is sayd vnto the Ephesians and vnto the Phillippians. And although faith be indifferently preached vnto al men, yet is it not geuen vnto all men: for neither he which planteth is any thing, nor he which watreth, but God which geueth the encrease. And as it is said in John, He which shall heare of my father and which shall learne, he it is that shall come vnto me. But he which is not taught inwardly of God is ignoraunt. And because he hath in himselfe the causes of his ignoraunce he is without excuse. Wherefore we ought not to wonder at the fewnes of the beleuers. For the light shineth in the darkenes, and the darkenes comprehendeth it not. They which heare, are not after one and the selfe same maner prepared of God: for some are made good ground, some stony, some ouergrown with thornes, or ouerwoyne with much treading vpon. And although this sentence of the skarsity of beleuers may bee applied both vnto the Gentles and vnto the Iewes, yet in this place it rather pertaineth vnto the Iewes: for Esay preached vnto the Iewes, and had experience of their incredulity: and Paul here chiefly reproveth the Iewes. We may also hereby learne how farre we are of from the perfection of God. He suffereth, & long tyme beareth with men that will not beleue in him: but all men are high mynded and can not abide, that either their wordes or writings should be contemned.

God prepareth not all men after one and the selfe same
maner.

God is more patient then men.

Then

Then faith is by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. Here again is repeated the commendation of the ministry, that by it faith is divulged amongst men. Faith is by hearing, this sentence must be rightly and soundly taken, that is, when God will worke therewithall and put to his ayde. Some haue thought, that by hearing is here to be vnderstanded the inward word, so that in it is the full and perfect cause of faith. Which thing as I deny not, so also I see that Paul speaketh not of the inward hearing, that is, of the motion that is done by the holy ghost, but of the outward preaching, to the office whereof the Apostles were sent. And although faith can not after the ordinary and accustomed manner be without the word of God, yea and that without the outward word, yet the word of God abideth still, although faith be not geuen vnto it: for knowledge hath relation, as they vse to speake, to the thing knowen, but that which may be knowen is not on the other side referred to knowledge, when as there are many thinges which may be knowen, & are not knowen. After which selfe manner very many thinges are to be beleued, which yet are not beleued. Wherefore faith, forasmuch as it is an assent geuen vnto the word of God, although it take not his differences of the subiect or of his forme, yet taketh it them not either of the efficient cause or of the object, for it is occupied aboute those thinges which haue bene revealed by God, neither cometh it by the light of nature, but by the illustration of the holy ghost. But as touching the subiect, it is placed in the minde, as wisdom, prudence, and other sciences are, and the nature thereof is a quality, as other knowledges also are qualities. Furthermore, if hearing, whereof springeth faith, be by the word of God, it is manifest, that the foundation of faith is the word of God only. Wherefore the ministers of the Church and preachers ought hereby to learne, what is to be preached: namely, the word of God only, and not humane traditions: although now they are so bold to call them the word of God, which yet they are not by any meanes able to proue, when as they are vncertaine, and repugnant the one to the other, and are oftentimes abolished or renued, which in no wise agree with the word of God. Basilus in his sermon de confessione fidei, saith, that it is a falling away from faith, and a great pride, either not to admyte the thinges which are written in the holy scriptures, or to adde any thing vnto them. Which sentence he confirmeth by the testimony of Paul to the Galathians, where he saith, The testament although but of a man when it is once ratified, no man maketh voyde, or addeth any thing thereunto, which thing ought much more to be taken hede of in the testament of God set forth in the holy scriptures. But here ariseth a doubt. For if onely the worde of God is to be beleued, why sayd Christ, that if they would not beleue him, they shoulde yet at the least beleue his workes? For it seemeth by this sentence that we shoulde also beleue miracles. But we aunswere, that miracles are as testimonies by which men are the easelier brought to beleue, so that they are thinges by meanes whereof men beleue, not that sayth is directed vnto them, as vnto his object: although as touching the miracles of Christ and of the Apostles we must beleue, that they were done by God, and not by Belzebub, or by the deuill, as the Phariseis sclanderously reported: and this is conteyned in the worde of God, for it geueth testimony, that these miracles shoulde be wrought, and that they were wrought in their due time, namely, in the preaching of sound doctrine. The Sacramentes also are beleued: but they are nothing ells, but the visible wordes of God, wherunto also is adioyned the word of God which is heard, as Augustine sayth, The worde cometh vnto the element, and it is made a sacrament. Howbeit there is discretion and iudgemente to be had when we beleue the word of God, & we picke not thereout any wicked or corrupt sentence: there is also requisite good triall and examination to discerne miracles, and in the sacraments is to be considered, that they be orderly ministred, that is, as they were instituted of God. And by sound iudgment we must remoue away, and set aside the innovations of men: that we beleue not them as we would beleue the wordes of God. And when Basilus or other of the fathers doe say, that we must beleue with

P. P. Y.

Commendation of the ministry.

Here is en- treated of the outward worde. The worde of God abideth firme though it be not beleued.

Wherefore faith taketh his differences.

Onely the worde of God is the foundation of faith.

Humane traditions are not the worde of God.

Whether we must beleue miracles.

The Sacramentes are beleued

Whether we must beleue with iudgement, or without iudgement, out

Distinction
of iudgement.

The authority of the church hath not dominion ouer sayth.

How sayth is nourished.

A similitude of Chrysostome.

The diuinity of Christ pronounced.

The commendation of the ministry pertained not vnto the whole church but only to the name or title thereof.

out examination or iudgement, which seemeth to be taken out of that which Paul sayth in this epistle that Abraham beleued, neyther iudged he, that word in greke is, discrepans. To answer to this doubt, this is to be vnderstanded, that iudgement is of two sortes: The one is, when we take counsell of the senses and humane reason, and this is utterly to be remoued from sayth: for it alwayes resisteth the word of God. The other is the iudgement of the spirite, which is of necessity to be had: And this is it which Paul sayd, Proue all thinges, and that which is good hold fast. And vnto the Corinthians, Spiritual thinges are compared with spirituall thinges: and by this iudgement it is necessary, to conferre one place in the holy scriptures which is more obscure with an other which is more manifest. The authority of the Church hath not dominion ouer sayth, as some wickedly thinke. The office of it is to preach, to admonishe, to reprove, to testifie, & to lay the holy scriptures before mens eyes, neyther requirith it to be beleued, but so farre forth as it speaketh the wordes of God. Paul before he here made mention of the worde, by which sayth is brought forth, made mention of them that preach the Gospel, that is, of the ministers, which are sent of God, in whom he described the ministry of the Church, namely, that it consisteth in preaching of the Gospel. Whosoever if sayth as it is here written, come by hearing, that is, as it is added by the word of God, then followeth it of necessity, that there is nothing whereby sayth is more nourished, maintayned and confirmed, then by continuall reding and repeting of the word of God. This thing testified Tertullian in his Apology, when he sayth, that to this end holy assemblies are gathered together to heare the word of God. The Philosophers say, that we of the selfe same thinges both are, and are nourished: wherefore in like sorte is it, if sayth be by the word of God, then by the same also is it nourished. We knowe moreover that of wordes often repeated are confirmed habites or qualities: as contrariwise if a man cease of from actions they ware weake. Wherefore if a man cease to rede, to heare, or to repete the holy scriptures, sayth will ware feble in him. And they which thinke that a liuely and pure sayth may continue in Churches without otre preaching doo exceedingly erre. Chrysostome hath a very similitude of a light or lampe that burneth, which easely goeth out, vnles there be still oyle poured into it. By the lampe or light he vnderstandeth sayth, & by oyle the word of God: & this he there writeth, where he entreateth of the parable of the wise and foolish virgins. But now I haue made an end of interpreting the Apostles sentence, there resteth, that out of his sayings we gather things much profitable. When he had put a distinction betwene the righteousness of God, and the righteousness of men, and had taught that by the righteousness of God is to be vnderstanded sayth in Christ, to the end he would declare that sayth pertayned not onely vnto the Hebrues, he brought out of the prophet Esaie, Whosoener beleueth in him, shall not be made ashamed: And out of Iuell, Whosoener calleth vpon the name of the lord shall be saved. These thinges most manifestly proue the diuinity of Christ. For if sayth in him, and inuocation of his name haue saluation toynd with them, which thing is most true, it followeth of necessity, that he is God, when as it is not lawfull to put confidence in any creature, or to call vpon it. Yea these two thinges are so proper vnto God, that he communicateth them not vnto others, & he is pronounced cursed, which putteth his confidence in man, or maketh flesh his arme. An other thing worthy to be noted is, that so excellent commendation of the ministers of God, is to be referred vnto those only, which in very dede execute theyr office: for the prophet sayth, that the sene of them that preach the Gospel are beautifull, and not the sene of them which haue haue only the name or title thereof. It hath also bene declared, that the word of God is the instrument, which the holy ghost useth to inuill sayth into the beleuers, wherefore we may conclide, that no other thing might eether to be taught or preached in the Church. No man also ought to be moued with the fewenes or scarsety of the beleuers, so that alwayes euen from the beginning the number the saythful hath bene small. And Augustine if sometimes he vse this kind of reasoning agaynst the Donatistes when he sayth that they are very few in comparisō of the multitude of the catholikes, he reasoneth agaynst them as it were a probabili, that is, by probability, agaynst them I say whome he had befoze by other necessary reasons confuted. Moreover when he alledgeth the multitude of Churches, he reppoueth the erroz of the Donatistes, which had contracted the church of God only into a litle corner of Affrike as though it now had no where place but with them: which utterly ouerthroweth the propriety of the Church, namely, to be Catholike or vniuersall: for it is spread abrode thoroughout all places, although euery where be found an incredible smal number of them that beleue truly. Irenæus also and Tertullian for no other cause appealed to the testimonies of many Churches, but for that they had to deale agaynst those hereticks, which receaued not the holy scriptures, but vsed them, mapmed, vitiated and corrupted, as sowed good vnto them: and therefore to reproue theyr vanity, he referred them to the old Churches, where the scriptures had ben kept sincere and vncorrupt. Last of all is declared, what preachers ought to set forth vnto the people, if they wil nourish and maintaine the true faith now receaued.

But I say, haue they not heard? No doubt theyr sound went out thoroughout all the earth, and theyr woordes into the endes of the worlde.

But I say haue they not heard? ] When he had reppoued the Jewes of incredulity, and had shewed that messengers were sent vnto them, which brought vnto them glad tidings of peace whome they beleued not, he saw, that peradventure they would excuse them selues that they had not heard. Now, sayth he can ye so say, seing that the Gospell is now euery where published abrode? He had reppoued theyr ignozaunce, and the more to aggrauate it, he declareth that they could not pretend that they had not heard.

No doubt theyr sound wente out throughout all the earth. ] By these woordes is shewed that the Gospell was now euery where preached. But some thinke that Paul seemeth here to abuse Dauids woordes, when as in that place is entreated of the knowledge of God by creatures gotten by the lighte of nature: for therto seemeth the scope of the Psalme to tend as touching the first parte thereof. For in the other part it entreateth of that knowledge whiche is had by the law, or by the scripture: for straight waye at the beginning he saith, that the heauens declare the glozy of God, and the firmament or sky set forth the woordes of God. So that although in heauen are not words nor speeches, and albeit that those higher orbes seeme to be without voyce, yet notwithstanding is euery where heard theyr speach. The Chaldee Paraphrast aptly expresseth this trope or figure, for he saith, that they which loke vp into heauen do declare abroad the glozy of God, and they which loke vp vnto the sky do set forth his woordes, signifieng that these creatures indeede speake not, but allure vs to speake, and to confesse God. In Hebze is not wrytten, Theyr sound, The Seuenty haue thus turned it, φθογγος, but in Hebze is wrytten, Canam, and Can signifieth a line, a rule, or leuell. Neither any other thing can thereout be gathered, but y there is sene & noted euery where sure rule of the making of the celestiall orbes, and that their mouinges & succession of their reuolutions is regurall and infallible. Wherefore without all doubt the speach of the heauens setting forth their creatoz is most excellent, wherby men are instructed touching many most excellent and most honest sentences. Cicero in his oration for Milo mencioneth many thinges of the constante order of the celestiall motions, to confirme and amplify the law of nature.

And their words into the endes of the world. The latter part of this sentence repeateth the sense of the firste, and more fully expresseth it and with amplification. Howbeit Origen here reasoneth, that this word sound, in the firste parte is to be referred to the capacity of the rude and vnlearned sort. But words are to be referred to the knowledge of the wise and stronger sorte. But this curiositie of words is vaine, nether can it by any good reason be proued. But as touching Pauls meaning, some thinke that it is an allegory. And an allegory is, where the words are not transferred from their proper signification, but sounde one thinge, and covertly shew forth an other thing: as whē it is said, That perles are not to be geue vn-to swyne. Here euery word keepeth stil his proper signification, & in them is taught, that the precious doctrine of God ought not to be set forth vnto impudent and obstinate men. So Dauid saith, that the heauens declare the glory of God, but he vnderstood an other thing, namely, y<sup>e</sup> the Apostles and Prophets go about throughout y<sup>e</sup> whole world preaching and setting forth y<sup>e</sup> prayles of our most excellent creato<sup>r</sup>. This interpretation, Augustine and manye of the Fathers haue followed. But some say, if it be so, Paul then shall not confute y<sup>e</sup> Iewes, soasmuch as of an allegory is brought but a weake argument. But we aunswere, that an allegory is then profitable, when the matter is before proued by other firme testimonies: whiche thing Paul hath already done. First he shewed, that God had sent forth messengers which preached the Gospell. Wherefore the Iewes coulde not cauel, that they had not heard the Gospell. Further he againe proued the same by Moses and Esay the Prophet: wherefore if by the way he brought an argument taken of an allegory, it is not to be reproued. Moreover we must make a distinction of allegories, some are deuised by men, and those haue in the no weight at all: but those which haue bene by the holy ghost reuealed in the holy scriptures are moste firme. As that whiche Christ saide of Jonas, and of the serpente lifted vp in the deserte: and that whiche is written to the Galathians of the sonne of the bondmaide, and of the sonne of the free woman, that they are two testaments. We may also saye that Paul cited not the words of Dauid as a testimony to proue any thinge, but rather alluded to hys words, in replying against the Iewes, which made their excuse that they had not heard them that preached the Gospell, when as the sound of the went out throughout all the earth: not as though Dauid spake of them, but because his words are agreeable with the thinge, whereof is nowe entreated: as some sometimes vse the words of Homere or of Virgill to discribē thinges which they neuer entreated of. And we may easily thinke so, for that Paul when in reasoninge he citeth the holye scriptures, is wont to adde, As it is written, or Esay, or the scripture so saith, whiche is here omitted. And if we will not that it be an allusion, let it be a metaphoze, which draweth the words to a like signification, without adding the note of similitude. Of Bees, Virgill sayde, that they make themselues a king, and other little petty rulers: signifieng thereby that they<sup>r</sup> offspring are partly of the common sorte, and partly of the honorable sorte: As if he shoulde haue said adding a note of similitude, Their offsprings are as kinges or as counsellors. So Christ sayde, Ye are the salt of the earth, that is, as the salte of the earth: & the light of the world. And of John we reade, He is Helias, that is, as it were Helias. So Paul now to amplifie the publishing abroade of the Gospell, saith, How haue they not hearde the preachers of God, which are the heauens, that is, like the heauens, Whose sounde is heard throughout the whole earth, and they<sup>r</sup> words into the ends of the world? And so it shall neyther be an allegory, nor an allusion, but a metaphoze. And finallye if we will needes haue this argument to be taken out of Dauid, we must thus say: God as sayth the Psalme, would that his naturall knowledge should by the celestiall creatures be published abroad throughout the whole world: wherefore he hath in like sorte prouided, that the Gospell shoulde be euery where published abroad, how then can ye say that ye haue not heard? And the reason then shalbe taken a pari, that is, of y<sup>e</sup> like: for ether doctrine is profitable, and as God would haue that to be publikely set forth: so also woulde he not this to lye hidden. Or els it is taken a minori, that is, of the lesse: If this naturall knowledge being, of les value and not so profitable be published abroad, shall not the other, which is of the Gospell being much more healthfull and of much more profite not be published abroad? And doubtles there are very many places

Cap. 10. A Commentarie vpon the

What manner of argument is gathered out of allegories places in the scriptures, whereby may be proued that the doctrine of the Gospell should be published abroad throughout the whole worlde. As in Esay. 24. & 59. chapters, and in Malachy, and in a manner euery where in the Prophets. And if the Gospell were published abroade throughout the whole worlde, then coulde not the Iewes cauel, that they had not heard of it, especially when as preaching began at them, according to that saying, Out of Sion shal go the law, & the word of the Lord out of Ierusalem. Neither did the Apostles turne vnto the Gentiles, but when they now saw the obstinacye of the vnbeleuinge Iewes. For then they wente vnto the Gentils, which yet befoze also had ministers of the word of God, althoughe not so abundantly, and by ordinary succession, as the Iewes had. Amongst the Gentils liued Melchizedech, Balam, Job, and the Sibilles, whose testimonies touchinge Christe are recited of olde writers. Ioseph liued in Egipt; Jonas was sente vnto the Niniuites; Daniell and his companions preached in Babilon; Nehemias and Esdra liued amongst the Persians: all which me kindled some light of true piety amongst the Gentiles. But at the length was the doctrine by the Apostles made complete. The Iewes are confuted by an argument taken a minori, that is, of the lesse. If the Gentiles being farre of and in the endes of the worlde haue heard, how haue ye Iewes not heard? And this maner of exposition foloweth Chrysostome. Neither is it any meruaile that Paul now writeth, that the Gospell is euery where published abroade: for he writeth the selfe same thing vnto the Collossians in the first chapter, and that twise. First he saith: In the truth of the Gospell, which being preached throughout the whole world bringeth forth fruite. And towardes the ende of the same chapter he saith, The Gospell which is preached vnto euery creature vnder heauen. And in this epistle also the 15. chapter, he declareth, with how great diligence he had laboured to publish abroade the Gospell euery where. From Ierusalem (saith he) vnto Illyricum haue I filled all the countreyes round aboute with the Gospell. And now seeing I haue no more place in these quarters, as I go into Spayne, I will come vnto you. If one Apostle did so much, what do we thinke that the rest of the Apostles and Euangelistes did? Mathew preached vnto the Ethiopians which were in the furthest partes: and Thomas vnto the Indians, which thing they themselves euen to this day testifie. And in the first chapter of this epistle it is written, that the sayth of the Romanes was spoken of throughout the whole worlde. And this diligence of the Apostles ought to stirre by men of our time, by continually preaching to restore religion now fallen farre in decay. Wherefoze that commaundement of the Lord which he gaue vnto the Apostles, to go into the whole worlde and preach the Gospell to euery creature, ought also to be of force in our time, that euery man in his place which he is appointed vnto by preaching suffer not sound doctrine to be abolished. That the Gospell was in the Apostles time preached throughout the whole worlde, some expounde by the figure Synechdoche, namely, that it was now preached in the principal & chief prouinces, & from them went vnto the nations adioyning, at the least way the same and name of this doctrine. And this sentence followeth Ambrose, who vpon this place saith: Where wanted the person of the preacher, thither came it by fame. And this he proueth by a similitude. The wonderfull workes which God had wrought in Egipt to preserve the Israelites, were by fame knowne in Iericho, as Rahab testified to those messengers or spies whome Iosua sent. No nation as yet in the Apostles time publikely and by the authority of the Magistrates professed Christ. For this came to passe onely in the times of Constantine and of Theodosius, And hereby is easely perceaued what they ment which wrote, that certayne nations were newly conuerted vnto the Gospell: which thing they affirme of Englishe men, as though in Gregories time they came vnto Christ, by meanes of Augustine his legate and Bishoppe of Canterbury: and also of the Saxons, that they in the time of Carolus magnus receaued the sayth of the Gospell. This in dede mought be as touching publique confession of Cities and regions, when yet Christ was long time befoze preached in those places. And as touching England, it had preachers of the Gospell euen from

The Gentiles had some ministers althoughe not by ordinary succession.

In the Apostles tyme the Gospell was spred abroade a great way.

An example

Englishe Saxons.

Cap. 10. A Commentarie vpon the

the beginning, namely, in the time of Cleutherius the first: and in such sort had, that there remained Bishoppes in that region euen vnto the tyme of that Augustine which was sent by Gregory: and that Iland obserued as touching the feast of Easter the olde maner of the East Church, and especially of the Church of Ephesus. For they celebrated it the fourtenth day of the first moneth. So that that Augustine as I thinke rather brought in the tyrannicall subiection vnder the Pope, then pure Christian religion: and so may we iudge of the Saxons and of other such like nations. Augustine in his booke de natura & gratia, the 2. chap. affirmeth, that in hys tyme were some regions farre of, although very few, vnto whome the Gospell had not as yet bene preached. Which I thus vnderstand, that the word of God was not publiquely receaued and beleued. He writeth also of this matter in his epistle to Hesichius, which is in number the 80. But Chrysostome most manifestly maketh on my side in his 10. homily vpon Mathew, and also vpon the 24. chapter of Mathew when he enterpreteth these wordes, This Gospell of the kingdom shall be preached thoroughout the whole world for a testimony: and then shall be the consumation or end. The Gospell doubtles was preached before the destruction of Jerusalem, for consumation in that place ought to be referred vnto the publike wealth of the Iewes, which was destroyed in the time of the Apostles. For Iohn liued euen vnto the time of Traianus. Wherefore the Gospell was in that first time preached in a maner euery where, but was not euery where receaued: yea rather the preachers were euery where handled with most greuous persecutions, as Christ had foretolde: for, saith he, they shall deliuer you, and shall scourge you, in counsels and Synagogs, and ye shall be brought before kinges and rulers. Wherefore there were very few, or in a maner none, which either heard not the preaching of the Gospell, or at the least heard not of the noble and excellent name of Christ: although in successe of time it is possible, that the name of Christ was thorough negligence and incredulity abolished: as the Portingales report of places found out by them in their iorney wherein they sayled from the Cades into India: where some moue a curious question, what is to be thought of those which are borne either in wilde wooddes out of the company of men, or in those places where Christ is not preached, and his name not heard of. Vnto whome we may answer, that such men if there be any such, are in dede some what excused, neither shall their damnation be so greuous, as theirs shall be which haue heard the Gospell and contemned it: yet for all that, obtaine they not the benefite of saluation, when as they haue in themselves the causes of theyr damnation, namely, originall sinne, and many other sinnes which no doubt they also committe. That God can reueale them Christ without the outward ministry, we doubt not: and peradventure he so doth sometimes of his mercy, but not of desert, as the wicked Sophisters say, if they doo what lieth in them, as though they coulde merite it (as they say) of congruety. But thus much by the way touching this matter. And this is diligently to be considered that it was not a slight miracle but most wonderfull, that in so short a time the doctrine of Christ coulde be spread abroade thoroughout the whole world, when as it had so many aduersaries, the deuill, wicked men, and also tyrans, the high Bishoppes and priestes, the wise men both of the Iewes, and also of the Gentiles, and besides the simplicity and rudenes of the preachers was otherwise as touching humane artes very great. Within the space of 20. or 30. yeares the preaching of Christ was in a maner euery where heard, as Chrysostome writeth. But it was long first or euer the wise and learned Philosophers coulde spread abroade their doctrines farther then Grece. And in such sorte were they at the length spread abroade in some places, that yet very few either vnderstode the or gaue credite vnto them. The doctrine of Mahumeth may peradventure seme to haue bene wonderfull quickly published abroade: but we must consider, that y doctrine which he preached as touching y same therof, was not new. For he denieth not the creator of heauen and of earth, he beleueth that y soules are immortall, he commendeth Christ as a prophet, he affirmeth the resurrection of the dead, he setteth

The Gospell was euery where preached, but not euery where receaued.

New regions founde out by the Portingales. What becommeth of men which neuer heard any thing of Christ.

It was a miracle that the Gospell coulde so quickly be spread abroade

The doctrines of the Philosophers were long time or euer they could be published abroade.

The doctrine of Mahumeth why it was so quickly spread abroade

Epistle to the Romanes. 329

forth also eternall paines, and eternall felicity, and a great many other things which are contayned in the old and new testament. Wherefore it may iustly be called an heresy, and indeede they are remnantes of the Arrians. For he commendeth Christ, but yet as a creature. Wherefore he builded vpon an other mans foundation. But Christ & the Apostles whē they began to preach the Gospel, found all thinges utterly disagreeing from that which they taught. Therefore it was a wonderfull miracle that in so small a tyme the heavenly doctrine could be published abroad, and that it partly long remayned almost in all places for in all cities and prouinces there came vnto Christ some families which beleued. Seing therefore that the Gospel was so farre and wide spread abroad, how could the Jewes cauel, that they had not heard of it?

But I say, did not Israell know? First Moses sayth: I wil prouoke you to enuy by a nation that is not a nation, and by foolish nation, wil I stirre you vp to anger. And Esay is bold & saith, I was found of them that sought me not, and haue bene made manifeste to them that asked not after me. And vnto Israell he sayth, All the day long haue I stretched forth mine handes, vnto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

But I say, did not Israell know? First Moses sayth: I vill prouoke you to enuy by a nation that is not a nation, by a foolish nation vvill I stirre you vp to anger. Still he proueth that the Israelites were not ignorant of the Gospel, but had manifestly heard of it, not only for that they were the first that had messengers of peace, whose coming also was beautifull and pleasant, but also for that in as much as the Gospel was published abroad thoroughout the whole world euen vnto the endes of the earth, it could not be hidden from them. Now he addeth, that they had to theyr greate griefe and veracion felt the Gospel. Which thing Moses in the 32. chapter of Deut. foretold should come to passe, and that iustly: For y Jewes prouoked God to anger by Gods, which in very dede were not Gods, and reiected him for theyr idolles sake, So sayth the Lord I will cast you away, and will take to be my nation and my people the Ethnikes, whiche were not my nation, and which were a foolish people, and them will I adorne with my benefites. This was p̄natalionis, that is, like punishment. The Synagoge sought an other God, & God married an other wife. God was prouoked to zeale, for y his due worshiping was geue vnto idoles & these mē also were prouoked to zeale: for y they saw theyr priuiledges and ornaments transferred vnto the Gentiles. The scripture by the figure Anthropopathia bringeth in God after a sort trauelling with a zeale. And what zeale is, we described at the beginning of this present chapter, namely, to be a griefe, which louers take, when eyther they obteyne not the thinge which they lone, or for that others are admitted to be partakers in the possession thereof. This interpretation as touching the summe, Chrysostome followeth. But in that Paul sayth, First Moses sayth, By this word first he vnderstandeth the first in order. As though he should say the first witnes I alledge Moses, for afterward he citeth Esay. God prouoked the Jewes to anger, enuy, and zeale, for that he began to fauor the Gentiles, and to trāsferre vnto them the knowledge of the scriptures, the holy ghost, miracles, gracious giftes, and the participation of all spirituall giftes: this thing the Jewes saue, & were therewithall much displeased. Let vs here in the meane time note two thinges: First that Moses calleth the Ethnikes, not nations, and foolish, for in very dede this is the nature of men befoze they are receaued of God, Wherefore of the Jewes also Ezechiel excellently wel wisteth, describing what maner ones they were befoze y God adopted the into his people. The prophet counteth y nation to a most filthy mayden, abiect, and forsaken of all men, which lay ouerwhelmed in durt and in her blood, so that all men in a maner despised her, and trode her vnder foote. I passed by (sayth the Lord) and had compassion of thee. The second thing which is to be noted

P̄natalionis.

Wherin God prouoked the Jewes.

What maner ones we be befoze God adopted vs.

Sound doctrine is the fountain of the giftes of God.

The doctrine of pure religion maketh the barbarous milde.

What thinges prouoked the Jewes to enuy.

God was the author of this as it was a punishment.

By what manner of means God prouoked the Jewes. These thinges are to be vnderstanded of the last captiuitie.

The morall workes of the Ethnikes ouerthrowen.

is, that the chiefeft and excellentest gift which God beginneth to bestow vpon any nation which he fauoreth, is sound doctrine and piety. For thereby are men made gentle, and of men barbarous are made meke, mild, and modest, and all good thinges in a maner follow them. For it is written. First seeke the kingdome of God, and all these thinges shall be cast vnto you. For Christ commeth not naked, but adorned with all good thinges. And it is not to be doubted, but that if any common wealth abide in sound religion, and continew in the confession of Christ, it shall obteyne many and excellent good thinges. For that it shall alwayes be prosperous in the good fortunes of this world and in ciuill felicity, for it oftentimes commeth to passe that men haue neede of fatherly chastisement, and exercise of discipline: but it shall not be destitute of good lawes, holy maners, and religious conuersation. Neyther did the Jewes in Pauls time enuy the Church of Christ, because of theyr ciuill good fortunes: for at y time the christians had neither magistrates, nor kinges, which publicquely professed Christ: but theyr spirituall giftes stirred by enuy: in all which giftes the Gentiles most plentifully abounded: when as contrariwise the Jewes euen as touching ciuill ornaments were defeated, for the Romanes bare dominion ouer them, and as touching giftes of the spirit they were utterly destitute, for they wanted miracles and prophesying, and afterward vnder Titus and Vespasian were like most vile bondclaues dispersed throughout the whole world. This griefe, zeale, and enuy they began to haue experience of, so sone as the Gospell of Christ was preached: wherefore they could not say that they were ignozant: and so much the moze was theyr griefe, how much they thought the Gentiles vntwoorthy such a benefite of God, for they alwayes counted the Ethnikes for brute beastes, and fooles. Ambrose vpon this place very well noteth, that God bled this griefe and enuy for a tormenter, whereby to auenge the sinne and idolatry of the Jewes. This enuy doubtles was sinne, but God was not the author thereof, but as it was a punishment. And it hath oftentimes bene declared, that he punisheth sinnes by other sinnes, and as sinnes come from him, they haue the nature of god and not of ill. But how he prouoked them to enuy or zeale, may thus be declared. First he did set outwardly befoze the things, wherby he knew they would be moued and prouoked. After y peradventure, according to Augustines minde, he moued theyr hartes, as they had deserued, vnto such an affect, not that he potored in the that affect of new, but stirred it vp, which peradventure otherwise had lyen stil. But this his prouoking, if the Hebrewes had bene wise men, mought haue bene vnto the in steede of a monition or warning to retorne vnto God, and to embrace the Gospell, which they despised. Neyther was the refection of the Jewes the whole and proper cause of our saluation, but only ministred an occasion there vnto. The only and perfect cause of our saluation, is the mercy of God thorough Christ. And although the Jewes were oftentimes afflicted with greuous captiuitie, yet are not these wordes of Moses to be vnderstanded, but of this last captiuitie: for in the other captiuities God tooke not to be his people the oppressors of the Jewes, neyther adorned he them with those spirituall giftes wherewith the Jewes were befoze endewed, yea rather deliuering the Jewes he left those nations in theyr blindnes and idolatry. But now the Hebrewes are turned out of all, & wander abroad naked, & the Christians haue succeeded into the adoption of God, and are enriched with spirituall giftes. Whereouer their other captiuities were very short, but of this is neither measure nor end. He calleth the Ethnikes not a nation, as a people most vile, which deserued not so much as the name of a nation. And in very dede, there can be no societie ioyned together and firmly knitte, which is framed together without God and Christe, for there want the sinnes and bounds of charity: and the farther a city of common wealth is from vnitie, so much the weaker and febler alwayes becommeth it. This place not a little ouerthroweth the opinion which the common people haue of morall workes, and of the philosophy and wisdom of the Ethnikes. We wonder at the knowledge ledge of the Grecians, and at the gravity of the Romanes, when we reade their histories. But God calleth these men, not a nation, or, a foolish nation: what greater foolishness could there be, then for a man to make an Image of wood, stones, or metall, and to worship it for God. Or who will deny, but that foolishness is privation of true wisdom: Seeing therefore that the Ethnikes wanted the wisdom renewed of God, which is the true wisdom, they were in deed fools. Neither intend I here to reason with Origen, who sayth, that it may peradventure seeme to be contumelious agaynst the nation, who God elected through merite of their faith and deuotion, when as he disdaineth to call it a nation, and most manifestly nameth it, a foolish nation. And he answereth, that these thinges are thus to be vnderstanded, that the Church is not one nation, as are the Egyptians, Scythians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, &c. For it consisteth of all nations, neither is it particularly any one nation. Further, it is called foolish, for that it would not be made wise: but he which will be made wise in the Lord, must first be made a fool. This is wide from the sense of the Apostle, for as it is manifest, he speaketh not of the Church now established, but speaketh of it as it was before it was receaued of Christ, and made the Church: and then it is sayd, not to haue bene a people, as it is written in the 2. chapter of Osea: And it shall be in the place where it was sayd, ye are not the people of God, there ye shall all be called the sonnes of the liuing God: and verely they which are not the people of God are not a people: and the Ethnikes were fools in asmuch as they wanted the true wisdom which is Christe. Let vs see what the same Paul pronounceth of the Church, before it was conuerted vnto Christ. In the epistle to the Ephesians he sayth, Ye were somtymes without Christe, strangers from the publique wealth of Israell, aleants from the promises, without hope and without God in the world. And vnto the Corinthians, when he had mencioned, that drunkards, euil speakers, thieues, idolaters, and abusers of mankind shall not enter into the kingdome of God, he added, and such were ye once, but now ye are washed, ye are sanctified. But whē by the sentence which he alleadgeth out of Moses he reproveth y<sup>e</sup> idolatrous Hebrewes which prouoked God by reaso of those idols which were no Gods, it may seeme not to touche the Iewes, which liued in hys tyme and in Christes tyme, for at that tyme idolatry was not in vze in Israell. Vnto this obiection we answer, that the Iewes of that tyme most manifestly prouoked and reiecte God, when they reiecte his sonne Christ, and did put him to death vpon the crosse. For so great is the coniunction betwene the Father and the Sonne, that they which reiect the Sonne, can not keepe still the father. Moreouer as touching idolatry, for asmuch as they offered vnto him sacrifices without faith and repentance: God detested their oblations, as the scriptures euery where testifie. And so farre had their impiety proceeded, that they more esteemed their owne traditions, then they did the commandments of God. But no God will so be worshipped. And for asmuch as the true God is not in such sort worshipped, and yet notwithstanding they worshipped somewhat, it followeth that that was an idoll, which they fained to be their God, which delighted in these rites and worshippings. Neither skilleth it, whether such an idoll be in the minde, or in stone or in wood. Wherefore the Iewes, agaynst whome Paul dealt, are no les comprehended and reproved in this sentence of Moses, then their fathers were. Yea rather if we shall brightly weigh the matter, the more couert this idolatrie of the Iewes was, the more hurtfull it was: for they counted themselves godly and iust, for that they were not infected with outward grosse idolatry: but God who beholdeth all things, and seeth the secrets of the hart, by reiecting them, most manifestly declared what he iudged of their hypocrisy. By these thinges we maye now perceauē, in what state common wealth, empires, and folloshippes of men are without Christ. And when we shall consider this, let vs remember y<sup>e</sup> we were once euery one such, which doubles in my iudgement is of great force both to pluck away our pride, and also to restrayne our anger agaynst those which yet lye oppressed vnder impiety and superstitions. And let vs with as much diligence as we can, beware, that that thing which happened vnto the Iewes happen not vnto vs also. For as God tooke away from them his kingdome, so also wil he take it away from

The Ethnikes were in very deede fooles.

In what state the church was before it was taken of God.

The Iewes both in the latter tyme were, & also at this day are idolaters.

Hidden idolatry is oftentimes more hurtful then open idolatry.

Cap. 10. A Commentarie vpon the

from vs, if we only counterfeite our selues to be Christians, and doe not in very dede performe the things, which the religion which we professe requireth.

Liberty of speech is necessary for the ministers of the word of God.

The prophets were of a sound and perfect
mynde.

And Esay is bold and saith.] Therefore is Esay saide to be bold, for that he speaketh very plainly. And doubtles this boldnes declared a skoute man, when as by speaking the truth, he put hymselfe in daunger. By this phrase of speaking is expessed that freedom of speache which is necessary for preachers, and the that prophesie. The truth got vnto them wonderfull greate hatred, and deadly enimityes: which thinges although vnto the flesh they were most hard, yet the men of God contemned them in respect of the truth, which was committed to their charge: when it was told Paul that he should be in daunger of death if he went vnto Ierusalem, he saide, I know that prisons and bondes doo abide for me, but I esteeme not my life more precious then my selfe. And how the Iewes had persecuted all those which had truly and sincerely foretold Christ, Stephen declareth in the Actes of the Apostles: Whome haue they not persecuted which foretold the comming of the righteous? Origen vpon this place very wel noteth, that hereout we may manifestly gather, that the Prophets when they prophesied, had not such an astonished and troubled mind, as though they vnderstode not the thinges which they foretold. Euery one of them without doubt saue that the Prophets were ill delt with, which had signified the ouerthrow of the publique wealth of the Iewes, and yet notwithstanding durst they also to set it forth when God commaunded them to do it. This testimony which he bringeth is written in the 65. chapter of Esay.

I was found of them, sayth Paul, that sought me not, and haue bene made manifest vnto them that asked not after me.] He folloiweth the translation of the 70. interpreters, whiche as touching the sense differeth not from the Hebrue herity. The wordes in Hebrue are thus, Nidrashti lelo schaalu nimtsethi lelo bieschumi, amarti hinnenin hinnenin el goi locora bischim. In these wordes at the first sight seemeth to be some contradictio, for he sayth: I was sought of them which asked not after me? if they asked not, howe sought they? But the answer is easy: eyther we may say that they afterwarde sought, which befoze had not asked, or we may say that y<sup>e</sup> verbe Nedaresch, as Rabbi David writeth in his booke of words, is to be expounded by Hidzamin, deriued of the verbe Zaman, which signifieth to be redy, to come agaynst, to go to meeete, to prepare, and to inuite. As if it should haue bene sayd, I offered my self, and went to meeete those which asked not after me. And Paul with the 70. interpreters turneth that verbe by εὐρεθην eye-reuon, that is, I haue bene made manifest, or haue manifestly appeared. And this is to be noted, that in Esay befoze these wordes, I haue stretched out mine hands all the day long, are put, I haue sayd, Behold me, behold me, vnto a nation, which called not vpon my name, or ouer whom my name is not called. Which wordes also manifestly declare, that he speaketh of the Gentles, which were not called by the name of God, neither called they vpon him in their prayers: which thing can not be applied to the Iewes. And when he addeth:

I haue stretched out my handes all the day long.] The person is here covertly chaunged, and he here beginneth to speake of the Iewes. Wherefoze Paul manifestly putteth the distinction saying, And agaynst Israell he sayth, Neither doubtles do the Rabines deny, but that these thinges are to be vnderstanded of the Iewes, but herein only they disagree, for that they thinke that the former wordes which are put in the beginning of the chapter pertayne also vnto their nacion. But as we haue saide, this sentence will not stand well which the text, when as in the people of Israell God was both sought for and asked after: and there the name of God was called vpon, and they were called by the name of God: for euery where in the scriptures they were called the people of God. And according to the sentence of Paul, the other part wherein the Prophet sayth, I haue stretched out myne handes all the day long vnto a people, is added as a cause of the first, wherein God saith that therefore he had shewed himselfe manifestly vnto the Gentles, and therefore had offered himselfe vnto them, although they ment nothing les, for that he was now wery with the to great obstinacy and incredulity of the Iewes. But in what thinges the Iewes were rebellious against him the Prophet declareth.

for he addeth that they walked in a way that was not good, euen after their owne imaginations. They prouoke me (saith he) to anger to my face, sacrificing alwayes in gardens, and burning incense vpon brikes: which sitte in the graues, and lodge in the desertes, eating swynes fleshe. Which say, stand apart, come not nere to me: For I am holier then thou. These wordes doubtles declare, what things make vs to depart from our God: namely, when men follow their owne imaginations, and wil not as touching religion obey that which is prescribed them of God. This is to prouoke God to his face. They had a delight in the pleasantnes of gardens, and therefore contemning the word of God, they thought that God delighted in that pleasantnes, and contemning an alter made of earth, or of rough and vnhelwed stones, as the law commaunded, they built it with bryckes: they contrary to the commaundement of God did eate swines fleshe: and did sit in graues, paraduenture wayting for answers from the dead: or as our men do, worshipping the reliques of their deade carcases: or with obsequies and vigils praying for the dead, that they might be deliuered out of purgatory. They dwell in the wilbernes, either there seeking acquaintace with deuils, or els as our Heremites do, thinking it holines to liue in a solitary life. These thinges a certaine Rabbine witty as it seemeth (as Dunster mencioneth) laboureth to wrest against the Christians, for they (saith he) sacrifice in gardens, for they haue their grene enclosed places hard by their temples, wherein whilest they are abiding, they boast that they there worship God: they burne incense also vpon bryckes, for they haue their alters whereupon they saye they do sacrifice: and they dwell in graues, for they runne from place to place to dead carcases, and such other like thinges he objecteth vnto vs. This Jew doubtles in my iudgement is to be commended, not for that he wrongly interpreteth Esay, and wresteth to the Gentiles those thinges which are spoken against the Jewes: but for that he saw, that those thinges are superstitious, which are retained still in the Papacy for a singular worshipping of God, and perceaued that those thinges are in the scriptures reprobued in his brethren the Jewes, which our religious men and sacrificing priests count for most high holynes. For they say, come not nere to me, I am holier then thou art. For if a man come vnto them, to admonish them out of the word of God, they make him ascard, and utterly drive him away, neither wil they heare him. This Hebrew word Sodar, that is, rebellious, the 70. interpreters, and Paul agreeing with them haue turned by two wordes, namely, by ἀπειθεῖν and ἀντιθέων, that is, vnbelying, and gainsaying. For these two thinges are proper vnto them that fall from God, not to beleue, and to gainsay his commaundementes: as contrariwise they come vnto God, and geue themselves vnto him, which beleue his wordes, and obey his commaundementes. In these two wordes is comprehended the summe of all impiety. With which although the fathers of the Jewes were infected, yet their childer when they crucified Christ filled it by vnto the toppe, for which cause they are most greuously punished & long time haue ben punished, so Christ said truly: That vpon you may come all the righteous blood, which hath bene shed from the blood of Abell, vnto the blood of Zacharie the son of Barachias. This place most manifestly teacheth, that it is vtterly necessary, that the grace of God do preuent vs, forasmuch as of our owne strenghts we are not first able to seke to recouer saluation lost. First we are sought of God, who offereth himselfe vnto the which are in hand wth other matters, & not only with other matters, but also cleane contrary matters, yea and to such which vtterly resist him. Neither is it possible that of vs being corrupt should spring forth the beginninges of goodnes. The shepherd seeketh the shepe gone astraye, and not the shepe the shepherd. The woman seeketh the grote, and not the grote the woman. We are fallen into so deepe a pit, that of our selues we can by no meanes get thereout. And forasmuch as by reason of sinne we are now dead, we are not able to rayse by our selues. I would gladly therefore demaunde of those which defend workes preparatory, whether they will confesse that men by reason of sinne are dead, or no? If they wil not confesse this, they haue Paul against them, who saith, that the stipend of sinne is

In what
thinges we depart from
God.

In apt sentence of a certaine Rabbine.

The summe
of impiety.

It is necessary that the grace of God do pre-
uent vs.

Examples.

Against
workes of preparation

death, and they shalbe thought to be of this iudgement, that sinne is not so greuous an euil, that it bringeth with it bitter destruction. And if they confesse that they which sinne are dead before God, then must there be looked for some strength from els where, whereby they may rise agayne and reuiue. I woulde know of them also, whether Abraham were moued of himselfe, to depart out of his owne contrey and to forsake idolatry? And whether the Israelites deliuered themselves out of Egypt or no? And if the efficacy and goodnes of God were of force in all these, why contend they that a man being now dead through sinne, can prepare himselfe to grace: he prepareth himselfe rather to greater corruptiō, then to saluation. But what nede we so many wordes in a matter not doubtful: howbeit this I say, that they which defend woordes of preparation, haue their feete so fast tied with testimonies of the scriptures, that the more they stirre themselves the faster are they bound, and lesse able are they to escape away. Moreover hereby it is manifest, why the Ethnikes, so long as they were strangers from God were called, not a nation, and soles: for that they sought not God, nor asked after God. The first and principall steppe to saluation is, that God do declare himselfe vnto vs, and that manifestly, for vnles he manifestly and plainly reuele himself vnto vs, our mind wil alwayes leape backe, for that by reason of of the corruption grafted in it, it abhorreth from things diuine. If God be found of him that seeke hym not, and do appeare vnto them that aske not after him, saluation then commeth vnto them by chance, not that there is any fortune or chance, as touching God, but as touching them. For they are in hand with other deuises, their purposes and ententes be farre diuers, when they lighte vpon saluation, yea oftentimes they manifestly labour to bring themselves to destruction. For Paul when he was taken, persecuted the members of Christ, and entended to put in prison and in bounds as many as he found addicted to that way. Wherefore let vs acknowledge those thinges which are of God so hee Gods, neither let vs attribute his gistes to our preparations.

But vnto Israell he sayth. ] This proposition, προς, which signifieth vnto, may also aptly signifie agaynst, and peraduenture also περι, that is, touching: but this is not of much waight. Paule useth here manifestly the figure Apostrophe, which is, when a man turneth his speech to an other person: when as in Esay, as we haue sayd, the person is couertly chaunged. I haue stretched out myne handes all the day long. By the gesture of the handes, he declareth the beneuolence of God, in what sorte it was euer towarde the Iewes. They which call any man vnto the, do vse to stretch out theyr hand vnto hym; and they also which doe allure by gistes, oftentimes shewe them forth in theyr handes. Wherefore to stretch out the handes, is by an allegorize nothyng els, then to call & to allure by gistes: although God also be sayd to stretch forth his handes to worke miracles and wonders, as it is wrytten in the Actes: Stretch forth thine hand to this end, that healynges, wonders, and signes may be wrought through the name of thy holy sonne Iesus. Wherefore, if after this maner also we shoulde vnderstand that sentence, the Apostle spake most aptly, for there was neuer any tyme wherin God did not with great miracles and wonderfull woordes call vnto hym the Iewes. Origene and Ambrose vnderstand this of the maner, whereby Christ being vpon the crosse, had his handes extended abroad: but this seemeth not to serue to the meanyng of this place. For the Prophet entreateth of the earnest care of God, whereby he euen at the beginning called the Iewes vnto hym. Yea Christ before he suffered vpon the crosse, sayd: How often would I haue gathered together thy children, as a henne doth her chickens vnder her winges, and thou wouldest not? Whereby he declareth, that before he was crucified he had his handes stretched abroad to call. By this is taken away from the Iewes all excuse, neyther could they say that they had not heard. For as Chrysostome very well noteth, vnto these callinges and gistes he at the length added an irritation, which affecte is wont to moue many, which yet through blockishnes or contempt, other wyse would not be moued. Which thing we may perceauie euen in children: for sometymes it cometh to sinners

prepare the selves to greater cor-ruptiō, and not to salua-
tion.

The princpall step to saluation.

What to stretche out
the hande
signifieth.

pasce

pasle, that a litle childe when hys father calleth hym, of a certayne stubborne stomacke refuseth to come: but if he see an other childe made much of, of hys father, and lovingly embraced of hym, straight way being moued of zeale or enuie, he also runneth to hys father: so great is the affecte of zeale or enuie. Wherefore God beganne to adorne the Gentiles with hys benefites, that the Jewes being therewithall prouoked, myght at the least through emulation or enuie, retorne vnto hym. Thys diligent and earnest goodnes of God in calling the Jewes, is expressed vnto vs in Jeremie the 7. and 11. chapters, where God testifieth, that he had risen by early and sent Prophets to styrre by the people. Which thyng Christ also in the parable of hys vineyarde, very evidently declared. Neyther wanted the people of God euer at any tyme, euen fro the first father Abraham, preachers and ministers of saluation sent from God: but they allwayes continued vnbelieving and gainsaying. They sayd vnto Christ, that in Belzebub he did cast out devils. And in Moses tyme they most manifestly resisted the wordes of God: wherefore Moses in Deut. sayd to theyr faces: Ye haue alwayes delt contentiously. We see now that in Esay is contayned that which the Apostle before sayd, that the Gentiles which followed not after righteousness, attayned vnto the lawe of righteousness, but Israell which aspired vnto it, could not attayne vnto it. Wherefore the Jewes ought not to be offended, if they heare that spoken of the Apostle which Esay had before prophesied. Chrysostome bypon thys place first sayth, that Paule woulde not say, that the Gentiles byelwe God vnto them, namely, by theyr sayth, or godly affecte, for that all whole is of God, and he woulde not that they shoulde puffe by them selues with pride. But straight way he sayth, that yet notwithstanding the Ethnickes were not emptye, for of them selues they brought to take helpe and to know. It is wonderfull, how he shoulde speake such contradictions in one and the same place, that all whole is of God, and that they brought sayth of themselves. For God is not by any other thing either taken hold of or known, but by sayth. Wherefore the first part of his sentence is without any doubt to be allowed: namely, that all is of God. But that which followeth, is to be reiected, namely, that we of our selues bring sayth.

The eleuenth Chapter.

I Demaund then, hath God cast away his people: God forbidde. For I also am an Israelite of the seide of Abraham, of the tribe of Beniamin. Wherefore God hath not cast away his people whom he foreknew. Know ye not what the scripture saith of Nehias, howe he maketh request vnto God against Israell: saying, Lord they haue killed thy Prophets, and digged downe thine Altars: and I am left alone, & they seke my life: But what sayth the aunswere of God vnto hym: I haue reserued vnto my self seuen thousand men which haue not bowed the knee to Baal.

I demaund then, hath God cast away his people? The summe of the doctrine of this Chapter may thus briefly be set forth. The Jewes haue not utterly in such sort perished, that there is no hope remanuing of their saluation. There yet remayne remnants whiche attayne to saluation which now in dede are but few in number: but yet they are the salt of the worlde, and in tyme to come they shal be a great multitude, and ymanifestly. At the meane tyme certayne of the Jewes remayne blinde, which thing they both deserue, and also was foretold of them. But by these fewe remnants which are saued, shall saluation be communicated vnto the whole worlde, for the Apostles and the other Euangelistes which come of the Jewes shall go thoroughout all the borders of the earth and preache Christe. And that blinding of the Jewes shall be an occasion of saluation to the Gentiles.

¶¶¶.

And

The me-thode of this chapter.

And when the fulnes of the Gentiles shalbe conuerted vnto Christ, then also shall the Israelites come. But God by his hidden and wonderfull counsell would haue all men for a tyme shut by vnder sinne, that he might haue mercy of all men. The Gentiles all the whole tyme before the preaching of the Apostles lay in darkenes, a few only excepted. But as soone as the Gospell was preached, the Jewes were forsaken. And for that the reason of the purpose of God can not be comprehended of vs, with a certayne religious exclamation he concludeth his doctrine, saying, Oh the depth of the riches, &c. Affirming that no man is of Gods counsell touching these thinges. Wherefore now that we haue declared the summe of the doctrine, let vs seeke out the principall proposition of the first part of this Chapter: and the plainlier this to do, let vs somewhat more deapely repete the thinges which haue bene before spoken. Paul affirmed that the promises were made vnto the Jewes, but not in such sort that they pertayned to all of them, but only vnto the elect and predestinate. And therfore for asmuch as many of the Jewes are not of the number of the elect, (which thing he proued in Esay and Ismaell) there are manye therfore vnto whome the promises of God pertayne not, and many haue perished in their incredulity. Now he declareth, that their fall is not vniuersal, and he leneth & mollifieth the thinges which before might haue offended, namely, that a number of the Jewes which beleued is so small, that Esay sayd, Lord who hath beleued our report? And Moses sayth that the Jewes were stirred by to enuy against a nation foolish, and a nation that was not a nation: and finally that God had stretched out his hands to a rebellious people, not beleuing, but gayne saying. Unless he had after this maner tempzed his speache he mought haue seemed to haue spoken thele thinges of hatred against his nation. He putteth it by the waye of interrogation, the more thorowly to moue them, & to make them attentive. And saith, Hath God cast away his people? As if it should be objected, it is a thing vniuersally, that God should be changed, and that he should forget his couenaunt. Wherefore the proposition is, God hath not cast away all the Jewes, but wil saue as many of them as he foreknew, that is, whome he hath predestinated. This sentence consisteth of two parts. First is sayd, that God hath not cast awaye all the Jewes contrary to his couenaunt. Secondly, that not all the Jewes are comprehended in this couenaunt, but only the predestinate.

For I my selfe am an Israelite of the seede of Abraham. His firste profe is of the election of himselfe. And it may thus be reduced into a syllogisme whiche is commonly called expositoryus. This man is not reiected. This man is an Israelite: wherefore not all the Israelites are reiected. And by the pronounce demonstratiue he sheweth himselfe. And that he is a Jew, he first declareth generally, calling himselfe an Israelite. And that we should not thinke that he was a proselite, he addeth of the seede of Abraham. Afterwarde he addeth also of the Tribe of Benjamin whereby he proueth that he was not of a base stocke. For the Tribe of Benjamin was counted noble, which came not of the handmaidens, but of Rachel, Jacobs best beloued wife. Furthermore the firste king, namelye Saul came of that Tribe, and the temple of the Lord was built in the lot or inheritance of that Tribe. This selfe thinge also he mencioneth to the Philippians. And vnto the Corinthians in the latter Epistle he affirmeth that he was an Israelite, and of the seede of Abraham. And seeinge that it was no hinderance vnto me to be a Jew, neyther also shall it be an hynderance vnto you: wherefore be ye of good comforte. And hence may bee gathered an argumente negative taken a maiori, that is, of the greater. For it seemed that the Jewish religion oughte much more to haue bene a let vnto Paul, when as towards it he had a wonderful great zeale, for with great rage he persecuted the Christians, and yet notwithstanding he was in suche sorte receaued, that the preaching of the Gospell was committed vnto him, and he was ordeined a maister of the whole world, and had all the misteries of Christian religion committed to his charge.

Wherefore God hath not cast away his people whome he foreknew. He saith, His, by reason of the peculier name, wherewith Israel is euery where in the scriptures adorne, and because of the couenat which God publikely made with

The tribe of Benjamin was noble.

The Jewish religion
was not a hinderance vnto Paul

with them: and which covenant all men confessed to be made betwene them and God. He which was in times past fauorable vnto the Iewes, is not now become hatefull towarde them: and that which was at other times counted to be of a speciall grace, namely, to be borne a Iewe, is not now counted hatefull. Neither are the Iewes therfore odious vnto God, for y they are Iewes: For how could it be, when as they were illustrated with so manye and so greate giftes, so that they were the adoption, the gloze, the testaments, the constitution of the lawe, the worshipping, the fathers, and Christe as touching the fleshe, as was before in this Epistle declared: Wherefore if God hath not relected me, he hath not then cast away his people whome he foreknew. Here the kinred and stocke is appointed by the election of God. Kinred is not inough vnles therunto come predestination. Neyther is kinred a thing of such necessity, for without it also election hath place (for the Gentils were not as touching the flesh borne of Abraham, neither do as manye as are borne of him pertaine vnto election) yet is it no small matter to be borne of holys parents. Yea rather forasmuch as vnto them is made the promise, that oughte to be vnto the parentes no smale pricking forward to bying by their children godlye and vertuously.

Whome he foreknew.] This is not to be vnderstanded of a bare and simple knowledge, for they also which are damned are not vnknewen vnto God: But this knowledge hath ioyned with it an allowinge: and they are saide to be foreknowne, which are embased of God, and whome he hath put a part from the rest as his, to attaine saluation. Wherefore Augustine in his booke de bono perseuerantia, turneth this word, he foreknew, by this worde, he predestinated. They whiche will haue election to consist of workes foreseene, saye, that they are chosen out, whome God foreknew should beleue, and liue godly and holyly. But this opinion we haue before at large confuted, wherefore let vs rather hold fast the contrary sentence, and beleue that therfore we assent vnto God, and liue godlye, for that we are elected, and not that we are elected for that we shall beleue: it is necessary that our saluation deped of God, and haue not his beginning of our selues. Christ said, as it is wrytten in John. Whome thou hast geuen vnto me haue I not lost. That is, if any beare me not, if any pearthe, they are none of them whome thou hast geuen vnto me.

Know ye not what the scripture sayth of Helias? Howe he maketh intercession against Israell? We addeth an other reason taken of an example of Helias time, and that as Chrysostome noteth, of necessity. For the Iewes mought easily obiect, what? Dost thou thinke that the promise of God is fulfilled in thy selfe alone, or in a few other such like as thou art, when as in it is foretolde, that thou shalt see Christ our seede shall be blessed in great number, so that it may be compared with the starres, and with the sande of the sea? Wherefore the Apostle woulde declare that the multitude of the Hebzees whome God by his election hath preserved vnto himselfe, is very great, although it be hidden from the vnbeleuing Iewes, as Helias was ignorant that a great many were preserved of God, from worshippinge of Baal. To bringe examples out of the scriptures for confirmation of thinges is very profitable, so that men beware, that the comparison be made as touching like partes, whiche thing the Apostle in this place very well obserueth, as we shall afterward declare. Moreover in them is to be obserued, that they be not repugnant vnto the common lawes, for then are the factes of the godly rather to be wondred at, then to be imitated. For our parte is to liue according to lawes, and not according to certayne peculiar actes of the fathers. Helias thought that religion had bene utterly gone, and that all the godly had bene rooted out of the land of Israell: But he was deceaued, when as God had reserved vnto himselfe seuen thousand. So also those were deceaued, which supposed that so fewe of the Iewes shoulde receaue Christ and his Gospell. But euen as at that time many were preserved from idolatry by the godnes of God, so now also by his grace manye are deliuered from incredulity, and many more shalbe deliuered towarde the end of the worlde. This

The Iewes as touching their kinde are not euē at this day odious vnto God.

Kinred is not sufficient vnles therunto come predestination. Predestination may be out of the seede of Abraham, but kinred without predestination is not sufficient.

What is to be obserued in examples taken out of the scriptures.

In history of Helias.

history is written in the first booke of kinges the. 19. chapter. Although the history of Helias actes begin in the. 17. chapter. Where Helias foze folde vnto Achab, that because of idolatry and impiety which was dayly encreased, heauen should be shut vp. When he had declared this great euill to come, he departed, and God hid him by the brooke Cherith. For Achab went about to seeke him, to the end to kil him. A rauen euery day by his ministry fed him, whereby was declared, that the seruantes of God, when neede is, haue all thinges to do them seruice, yea euen those creatures whiche otherwise seme vtterlye vnprofitable. The brooke was dried vp by reason of want of rayne. God coulde haue filled it with water againe, that the Prophet mought thereout haue dronke, but he woulde not, yea rather God sente him to Sarepta, to succor a faythfull and godlye widow, and her sonne, who, as the Hebrenes thinke was Jonas. After thre yeaeres he was commaunded to returne to the kingdome of Israell, and to geue raine. But he thought that fertility could not conueniently be restozed againe, vnles he should first purge the land of idolaters. He therfore comaunded that the Prophets should be gathered together in mount Carmell, where they coulde not obtaine of theyr God fire from heauen for their sacrifice. Which thing Helias by a wonderfull great miracle obteyned. Whiche acte forasmuch as it coulde not but be allowed of all men, caused him to take the Prophets, and to slay them at the brooke Cison, and after the iust execution of this death he obtayned of God greate aboundance of raine. Neither is he to be condemned as a murtherer, in that he slew so many Prophets. For they by reason of theyr idolatry were iustly according to the lawe of God guilty of death. And forasmuch as the ordinary power ceased, it was lawfull for the Prophet to punishe them, when as God had committed vnto him an extraordinary power. Iesabell that wicked woman as soone as she heard of these thinges, swaue, that she would the nexte day kill Helias, by occasion, whereof he fled, and being wery in his iorney, and considering with himselfe the vngodlines which at that time raigned, he was wery of his life and desired of God to die. And the Angell was present with him, and set by him breade baked on the coales and water, and twise bad him to eate: and from thence he came to mounte Horeb, and lodged in a caue, waytyng to talke wyth God. And being demaunded what he did, he answered this which Pau now citeth. And streight way was stirred by a strong mighty wind, and in the wind was heard a voyce, & the lord was not in & wind: after & wind came a mighty earthquake after the earthquake a belement fire, but God was neyther in the earthquake nor in the fire, after that followeth a soft thynne breath, as it were an hysinge, & there was the lord who asked Helias what he did. And he answered, I am very zelous for God, because the chyldren of Israell haue forsaaken the couenant, and slayne the prophets cast downe the alters, and now also they seeke my life. What these thinges ment I will bylesely declare, according to the enterpretacion of Rabby Leuy the sonne of Gerischon, the wind, the earthquake, and the fire represented the zeale and belement affect of Helias, who would haue had God streight way to be angry, to auenge, and to destroy the wicked: there was not the Lord, for he had not decreed so to deale, but would gently and by litle and litle correct & punishe them, moderately I say by leasure & in continuance of the: therfore the Lord was in the soft and thyn breath and noyce wherfore when he had heard Helias complaynt, he sayd, I will doubtles punishe them whē I se time, not after thy pleasure, but as I shall thinke good. Anoynt Azazel to be king ouer Sicia: he when the time cometh shalbe the minister of my vengeance. Anoynt also Iehu to be king of Samarita: and he shall punishe the Baalites: Anoynt also Helizeus to be prophet in thy place for he also shal correct the wicked sinnes of & people. But whereas thou thinkest that thou alone art left it is not true: for I haue reserued vnto me seven thousand men which haue not bowed theyr knees before Baal. So oftentimes cometh it to passe with the godly, & thorough to much zeale they expostulate with God for the good successe of the wicked, as though he should seme to neglect his owne cause. The same thing also happeneth vnto

Rabby Leuy.
A place of the booke of kinges declared.

The godly thorough to much zeale expostulate with God.

unto vs in our dayes, for we thinke that we alone are left, when as all Italy, France, and Spayne are bondslaues to superstitions, and to Antichrist: But it is not so indeede. The Church is not cut of, although it be oppressed with great stranny, and in those places are many thousandes of good men, which in theyr oppressions and anguishes most chastyly kepe theyr sayth vnto God. Senen thousand is not here to be taken for a certayne and definite number, but for a very greate number. The multitude of them that shalbe saued is not to be measured by the capacity of our vnderstanding, and by the discretio of mans iudgement. God alwayes pserueth vnto himselfe many both in the Papacy, and vnder the Turke, and in Counsellers, whome we know not: but vnto him vnto whome it belongeth they are perfectly known. The expostulatio of good men with God may come two maner of wayes, epyther that they are only soyy and complayne vnto him of sinnes, of impiety, idolatry, and such like wickednes, and expresse vnto him, what a grieve it is vnto them to se such thinges: and this acte is godly and laudable, and vled in the prophetes and in the Psalmes. Sometimes it is done as though they would accuse God of negligence, as which looketh not to his owne cause, and they will prescribe vnto him a way, as though if they were in his come, they would handle the matter a greate deale better, which without doubt is sinne, and that no light sinne. The thinges which happened at that time were very like vnto those thinges which Paul had experience of in his tyme. For all the whole kingdome of the ten tribes had gone astray, and in the kingdome of Iuda, there remayned very few which were desirous and zelous of true piety, as in the first times of the Apostles all in a maner mought seme to haue bene strange from Christ. Helias without doubt desired to dye, and euen so are oftentimes found many such ministers, which by reason of the greate burthen of theyr vocation, and bycause of the malitiousnes and incredulity of the people, desire to forsake theyr ministeries, hauing y selfe same infirmity, where with this our Prophet semeth to haue bene after a sorte overcome, when he desired to dye. But let ministers this know, that they must abide in theyr vocation, so long as the strengths of the body will suffer them, and that they be not thrust out by force. For the men and people committed to theyr charge ought neuer to be forsaken so long as they can abide to heare the word of God. And if they be all together condemners of the word of the lord, and will not suffer it to be preached, then as Christ commaunded his Apostles, let them shake of agaynst them the dust of theyr fete, and depart. But so long as there are any amongst them which will suffer the passio to preach, and to entreate of the word of God, he ought not to geue ouer his ministry. Wherefore I know not whether Melitius did well or no, of whome Theodoritus maketh mention in his 2. booke and 31. chap. that he forsooke the bishopricke of a certayne Church in Armenia being offended with the ouer greate disobedience of his flocke. But the same man afterward being chosen bishoppe of Antioche, was for defending the catholike sayth agaynst the Arrians thrust into exile. In which fact God paradieture declared, that he was not well pleased, that he had departed from his first vocation. By the example of this Prophete we may know, how many troubles ministers haue to passe thorough in gouerning y Church, and those no small or common troubles, but such as in comparison of the which, death is rather to be chosen. With how greate a grieve and zeale doo we thinke Christ sayd, O vnbeleuing nation, how long shall I suffer you.

The expostulation of men with God is of two sortes.

Ministers ought not to forsake their vocation.

In history of Melitius

Ministers haue a great many troubles to passe thorough.

Agaynst the Nicodemites.

Which haue not bowed the knees to Baall. In Hebrewe is added, and haue not kissed him. Although the nature of idolatry be placed in the mind, yet by these signes it sheweth forth it selfe outwardly. The wicked bowed theyr knees to idols, and kissed them. And here are manifestly reprobued y Nicodemites of our time. For the Lord sayth, that those whome he had reserved vnto him selfe, dyd not these thinges, how then should they thinke it to be lawfull for them in time of persecution? Baall is deriued of this Hebrewe word Baal, & signifieth to beare

Cap. 11. A Commentarie vpon the

What Baal
signifieth &
how that word agree-
th with idols.

dominion, and to be an husbande. For they chose these made Gods to be theyr Lords & patrones, as our men had their peculiar saintes to be their defenders, whome they worshipped. Neither is the name of an husband, vnapt for idolatry, for in steede of the true God, which is the only husband of the Church, they brought in other Gods as husbandes. Wherefore the Prophetes called idolatry by the name of fornication, whoredome, and adultery, which yet the vngodly, as I suppose, sought to adorne with the title of matrimony. God was angry with this heynous wicked crime, & that not without iuste cause, for they went about to parte and to deuide amongst many Gods, that worshippinge which was deu into one God only: and that which they gaue vnto theyr owne imaginations, was taken away from the true God. And there could nothing haue bene deuised more contrary to the first and greatest commaundement, wherein we are commaunded to loue God with all our hart, with all our soule, and with all our strengthes. And so much God detested this worshippinge of Baal that in Osee the prophet in the 2. chapter he sayd: Thou shalt call me Ishi, that is, my man and not Baali, that is, my husband. For although God were the husband of the Church, yet would he not so be called of it, lest he should by any maner of meanes to communicate in name with idoles. Wherefore I haue oftentimes meruailed, how the Christians in the old time when the Church first began, suffered the names of the dayes (as Dies Solis, which we call Sunday, Dies Lune called Monday, Dies Martis, called Tuesday, Dies Mercurij, called Wednesday, Dies Iouis, called Thursday, Dies veneris, called Friday, and Dies Saturni, called Saturday) to take place, & would also by the selfe same names name the planets.
Merely soasmuch as these names were at that time the names of idoles, it had bene better to haue abolished them: and it was more dangerous at that tyme, then it is now. For there are now none left which worshipsuch idoles, as they then did, although I see that in the Church many vsed to say prima, secunda, tercia, & quarta feria, that is, as it were the first, second, third, or fourth day of the weeke, as the Jewes vsed to say the first, second or third day of the sabaoth.
And in like sorte may it seme wonderfull touching the monthes, as Ianuary Marche and Iuche like, in steede of whiche the godlye named them accordinge to the order of numbers,

How Hel-ias prayed against Israell.

It is law-
full for the saintes to pray against the wicked.

Helias maketh intercession against Israell.] It may seme that the disposition of Prophetes ought rather to be enclined to mercy. Samuel being offended with the Israelites sayd: far be it from me, that I should cease to pray for you. Now the doth Helias now make intercession against Israell? Some say that this was only a complaint made in familiar talke before God: but Paul saith manifestly, κατα τὴν ἰσχυράν, that is, against Israell. And his vision touching the wynd, earthquake, and fire declareth, that he being moued with a great zeale desired that God would auenge the wickednes of the Israelites. Wherefore Paul rightly interpreted his prayers, that they were made against Israell. But this ought not to be counted a fault in the Prophetes & in the godly, when as they intueigh not against the men, but against vices and sinnes, them would they haue destroyed, them would they haue punished: and soasmuch as those sinnes can not be seperated from men, therefore their prayers describe them in such sort as they are, namely, with men. More-ouer oftentimes it is to be sene, that they frame themselves vnto the will of God, which by the impulsion of the spirite they know, and do to the vttermost of their power allowe, and therefore as they know any to be punished, they seme in their prayers to pray that way even agaynst them. And the things which they seme oftentimes in their prayers to speake, they to this end only speake them, to foretell vnto them of their time things which they knew should after ward come to passe. Lord (saith he) they haue transgressed thy couenant, and haue slayne thy Prophetes, so great an enemy was Iezabell vnto piety, and vnto the true worshippinge of God, y she sought vtterly to destroy all the Prophetes. Whose fury yet the piety of Abdias at that time resisted, and hid an hundred and forty Prophets in caues, fifty in one caue came and fifty in an other.

They seeke (saith he) my lyfe.] For at what time he died, Iesabell had threasured to kill him the next day.

I haue reserved vnto my selfe.] When God thus maketh answer, he manifestly declareth, that others which had bowed their knees vnto Baal had killed him, pertayned not vnto him. And in that he saith, I haue reserved vnto my selfe, he declareth, that that was his gift, that these men also went not astray. Neither sayth he, y<sup>e</sup> his helpe was the chiefest part of their staying from idolatry, but plainly saith, I haue reserved them vnto my selfe. Hereof Paul concludeth that not all the people of the Iewes are reiecte, neither yet are all chosen. And in that example which he bringeth, when he so plainly and largely handleth it, he most sharply accuseth the Iewes. For by the doings of their elders he declareth, what manners ones they also presently were. For, if they had said, we crucified Christ as a deceauer, and we persecute his Apostles as seducers. What did your fathers (saith he) vnto Helias? What did they to the Prophetes? This place declareth, in what sort the Iewes alwayes behaued themselves against the messengers of God. The accusation, as saith Chrysostome, is after a sort transferred, & is, as if he should haue said, Now Paul accuseth you not, nor Peter, nor James, nor John, but Helias, who shut vp heauen, whom the rauen fed, who slew the Balites, and obtayned fire from heauen, with whom the Lord as ye haue heard, spake so familiarly.

In whole is of God.

They haue cut downe thine alters.] These were the high places in which the Fathers Abraham, Isaacke, and Iacob, in the old time offered sacrifices: their alters erected in the name of the Lord were yet remayning, and it was lawfull to sacrifice on them vntill the temple was built. But the Israelites, namely, the ten tribes, were such enemies vnto the name of God, that they could not abide so much as his alters to remayne: for they would haue no sacrifices done but vnto their golden calves, or to Baal and to other idols, and could not abide that any monuments of the true God should be left remayning. But as touching alters they haue no place in the tyme of the Gospel: for soasmuch as the only sacrifice of our saluation is accomplished by the death of Christ Iesus our sauior vpon the alter of the crosse, and the oblations of sacrifices are utterly taken away, therefore alters also haue ceased. But we erect a table in the congregation of the faithful, vpon which we celebrate the supper of the Lord. And now at the length to make an end of this place, I thought it good to admonish, that we in examining of the scriptures, vse the like diligence that Paul did: for vnles he had with great attentiuenes red these thinges, he could not with such dexterity haue entreated of them.

High places.

Alters
ought not to be used in this time.

Euen so at this present tyme is there a remnaunt according to the election of grace. And if thorough grace, then not of works. Or els were grace now no more grace. But if it be of workes, it is no more grace, or els were worke no more worke.

Euen so also at this present time is there a remnaunt according to the election of grace.] He applieth the example which he hath now entreated of to the state of his time. When he sayth a remnaunt, he thereby signifieth, that that part which perisheth is farre greater, as he befoze had sayd, Though the multitude of the children of Israell be as the sand of the sea, a remnaunt only shalbe saved. Again, Vnles God had left vnto vs seede, we had bene as Sodom, and had ben like to Gomorrah. Wherefoze if in Helias time, when the lesse part was saued, the promises fell not away, so now also in so great a blindness of Israell they are not made voyde. And the more to abate the Iewes pride, he saith, that this remnaunt is remayning vnto vs not of merite, or of workes, but of grace. Wherefoze we haue here a new proposition, whose first part is not proued, namely, that they which are saued, are saued by grace, for that thing all men graunt: but this he declareth, that

They that haue been are called a remnaunt
for that they are few.

this

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

Merits can not be mingled with
grace.
Election is the chiefest
grace.
What election of grace
is.

Here is not
entreated of ceremoniall
workes.

this saluation is not of workes, which needed a demonstration of proofe. The Jewes would not denie the first part, as our Sophisters also at this day deny it not, but either of them haue alwayes gone aboute to mingle therewithall the merites of men. The Apostle expreſſeth what he chiefly ment by grace, namely, the election of God: for that is the first & chiefest of all graces & giftes. Election of grace in y<sup>e</sup> Hebrue phrase is a gracious or free election, which is not of merites. Wherbeit Chrysostome and the Greke Scholles thought that by this word election, is after a sort corrected or contracted the name of grace, that wher- soeuer election is added we should vnderstand that grace is geuen according to approbation. But what they vnderstand by approbation it is not so playne, but that one of these two wayes we se it must of necessity be vnderstanded, namely, that they take approbation either actiuelly, or passiuelly. Actiuelly, that the rem- nauntes haue grace, for that they elect and approue the thinges which are vpright, sound, and iust. Or passiuelly, that they are approued of God as men goodly, iust, and beleuing. The first way can not be admitted, for it is manifest that here is not entreated of the election of men, wherby as it pleaseth them they elect good or euill thinges, but of the election of God: for Paul manifestly saith, that God had not cast away his people, whome he foreknew or, as Augustine saith, predestinated. Neither can the other be graunted, for election dependeth not of our workes foreseene, as we haue before declared. Origen hath in a maner the selfe same sentence, for he saith, that all in dede are saued by grace, but when election is added, thereby are signified perfecter soules, which vnto pure- nes and holynes of workes added a singular endeuor and diligence. Moreover he would sayne haue the workes which are here excluded of Paul to be vnder- standed only of ceremoniall workes, which can not be, when as Paul as we shal se, addeth an vniuersall reason: that vnto the nature of grace it is repugnant to be of workes, and this is true what kinde of workes soeuer we put. But it seemeth that he therfore taketh such great paynes in this matter, for that he is aserid least if workes should be excluded from the cause of our saluation, they should haue no place at all left. Wherbeit after ward when he after a sort saue that he needed not so much to be aserid of this matter he saith, workes in dede are not required, but yet they are to bee had that grace be not in bayne. For Paul saith, And his grace was not in bayne in me. Wherfore good workes (saith he) are to be had, that we be not ingrate to the grace of God.

And if thorough grace, it is not of workes. Or els were grace now no grace. Chrysostome not vnaptly knitteth this parte together with that whiche went before. The Jewes saith he mought haue said vnto Paul: It is true in dede that we haue bene called of God, not only by his word, but by benefites, miracles, & irritacion: but so greuous and hard thinges were required at our hands that we were not able to beare the: and therfore we folowed him not when he called vs. Not so, saith Paul, Grace was set forth vnto you without workes, and to seeke workes to the ende to attaine vnto grace, had bene to darken it. But God suffereth not, nether at any time hath suffered his gifts so to be darkened. Wherfore workes are not required of you. After that he moueth this question. Why then are not all men saued? Bicause (saith he) all men will not, neither are anye saued but onely those whiche will. These thinges in dede are true if they be warely vnder- standed, otherwise they may deceaue the Reader. It is true that they whiche repell the Gospell, will not beleue it, and will not geue assente vnto the truth offered vnto them, but yet muste we not therfore imagine, that it lieth in their hand to will and to assent. They will and beleue, whose minde God boweth, and whose hart he softeneth: Neither muste we thinke that grace is common vnto all men. Farther when it is sayd, that they are saued whiche will, two thinges are to be taken herde of. The one is that we thinke not that this will is the cause, why we are made partakers of grace: when as rather that assente of the will commeth of grace. Again we must beware, that we ascribe it not vnto humane strengthes

It lieth not
in our power to assent
vnto the Gospell.

Grace is not commo
vnto all me.
How none are saued
but they
that will,

and

and vnto free will, as they call it: and these two errors being excluded we graunte that none are saued, but such as will: for no man beleueth against his will, nor is compelled by any violence to receaue the Gospell. The second part of the proposition, namely, that woorkes are to be excluded from being causes of saluation, Paul proueth by an argument taken of opposites. And for that the nature of opposites is manifold, he vseth those kindes of opposites which are called contradictories, which can by no meanes be true both at one time. For then, saith he, grace shoulde not be grace, and woorkes should not be woorkes: But who seeth not, y it is impossible, y one and the self same thing should at one and the same time, and in respect of one and the self same thing, be called grace, and not grace, woorkes and not woorkes? Doubtles this is the nature of contradictories, that the one being put, the other is destroyed, the one being taken away, the other followeth. Paul also before proued this self thinge, although not so manifestly, when he sayd, Being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and seeking to stablish their owne righteousness, they are not subiecte vnto the righteousness of God. In which wordes also we were then taught, that they which went about to be saued by theyr owne righteousness, that is, by woorkes fell away from the righteousness of God, which is the perfect and true saluation. Moreouer by this reason of Paul is most strongly proued, that that moste high grace of the election of God consisteth not of woorkes, which God from eternally foresaw: for, that knowledge of God, or (as they call it) foresight, causeth not, but that a woork is a woork. And Paul when he here maketh mencion of election, in plaine wordes declareth and testifieth, that it is not had by woorkes. Which being true, as in very dede it must needs be true, neither can iustification be of woorkes: when as the rule of the Logicians which euen children knowe, is this, That whatsoeuer followeth of the consequente, followeth also of the antecedente. Wherefore if election should depend of woorkes, soasmuch as vocation and iustification depend of electio, it should of necessity followe that iustification commeth also of woorkes. Neyther doth the difference of the time anye thinge helpe our aduersaries: yea rather the profe may be made a maiori, that is, of the greater. If woorkes whilest they are extant and present haue not the power to merite either iustification or election, much les can they do it, when they are not yet extant, but are onely foresene. For who can deny, but that a thing which is, is of more efficacy to bring forth a woork, then when yet it is not? Peraduenture vnto Ethnikes it is lawfull by woorkes to seeke righteousness, and by them to establish the fauor and election of God: and so is it also for these Sophisters, which as touching this doctrine little or nothing at all differ from Ethnikes. But we which follow the oracles of the scriptures, and wil cleaue fast vnto them, ought by no meanes to graunte that the election of God dependeth of our woorkes. The foundation of the Apostles reason is: Things which are rendred vnto woorkes, are rendred of duety, but things which are of grace, are not of duety: where we plainly see that duety and not duety haue manifest contradiction. And this roote of this argumente the Apostle before declared vnto vs in the .4. chapter, when he said, If Abraham were iustified by works, he hath in dede glory, but not with God: for vnto him which worketh reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt. But of Abraham it is written, that he beleued, and it was imputed vnto him to righteousness. Wherefore Pauls argument leadeth to an absurdity, or as they vse to say, to an impossibility. And doubtles they sinne grievously which acknowledge not the grace of God, and they more grievously which seeke to obscure it, but they intollerably and most grievously of all, which vtterlye ouerthrow it. Of this it followeth not, but y God rewardeth good woorkes, which are done of his faithfull: but hereby followeth that merite is taken awaye, & is denied that the things which are geuen are due by the force of the woork. Wherefore eternall life may indeede be called a rewarde, but not that it is due throughe the woorthines of the good woork, but because it followeth good woorkes by a disposition and order instituted of God. And after good woorkes followeth the rewarde of felicity, and after euill the rewarde of eternall death, although the hell fire be in very dede Woorkes as not to be counted as causes of saluation. An argument taken of contradictories.

A rule of the Logicians. If election were of woorkes we should by them also be iustified. An argument taken a maiori.

The foundation of the reason now brought.

How felicity may be called a rewarde.

deede due to the desertes of sinnes.

The sacramentes do not thoroꝝ the woꝝke wrought co ferre grace. Wherunto the recea-ving of the sacraments is an helpe.

In other caualiation.

Grace (saith he) is not grace. For that it is turned into a recompense due to woꝝkes. And woꝝke should not be woꝝke, if that which is geuen and rendred vn to woꝝkes, should be counted to be geuen by grace: for it is the nature of woꝝke, to claime the ende, of duetye and not freelye. Some cauell that we are not saued and iustified by the woꝝkes which we our selues haue done, but if they be the woꝝkes of God which are done in vs, by them we are iustified: herebye entendinge that by the receiuing of the sacramentes is conferred grace, as the terme it: but they are farre deceaued. For no man in receiuinge the sacramentes receaueth any grace, but that which he receiued by faith. When as we receaue the sacramentes as sealinges of grace, and of the giftes already obteyned: neither is any thing gotten by them by vertue and strength of the woꝝke wrought, as they vse to speake. For he which receaueth the sacramentes, commeth either woꝝthely or vnwoꝝthely, if vnwoꝝthely he thereby getteth nothing but hurt and losse: if woꝝthely, then bringeth he a liuely faith, wherby he receaueth grace represented by the woꝝdes of God, and the sacramentes. The woꝝke it selfe, is an helpe, whereby faith being somewhat weake is thoroꝝgh the holy ghost stirred vp, and sozasmuch as there is celebrated the memoꝝy of the Lord, and his name is called vpon, therfoze many good things are obtained, and by those obsignations and seales the mindes of the beleuers are confirmed: but that the woꝝke it selfe conferreth grace, we can in no wise graunt.

They say also, that woꝝkes which follow iustification, sozasmuche as they are not ours, but come of grace, do merite many thinges. But althoughe that the grace of God do helpe vs in doing good woꝝkes, and the thinges which we do are therfoze acceptable vnto God, and that he will reward those woꝝkes, yet notwithstanding therein is neither duety nor merite, as we haue fought, but onely an order, and a certaine consequence by the institution and goodnes of God. And in summe according to Pauls doctrine, where mencion is of grace, there muste woꝝkes needes be banished, as touching that they should be causes eyther of saluation or of iustification. And although the proposition which is now proued do pertaine as well vnto the Gentils as vnto the Jewes, yet notwithstanding therein are chiefly repro- ued the Jewes: who peradventure would easely haue graunted, that the Gentils grafted into Christ were saued by grace, when as befoze they had liued wickedly and in ydolatry. But they which were Israelites, and were as they boasted obser- uers of the lawe, craked that saluation came vnto them throughe the merite of woꝝkes. Which opinion as it was erroneous and iniurious vnto Christ, so is it e- uery where confuted by the Apostle.

What then? Israell hath not obtained that he sought: but electi- on hath obtained it: and the rest haue bene made blinde: According as it is wꝝtten: God hath geuen vnto them the spirite of pricking that when they see they shoulde not see, and when they heare they should not heare vnto this day. And Dauid saith, let theyꝝ table be made a snare, and a net, and a stomblinge blocke euen for a recom- pense vnto them. Let theyꝝ eyes be darkened, that they see not, and bow downe theyꝝ backe alwayes.

The Jewes sought not rightly.

What then? Israel hath not obteyned that he sought: but the election hath obteyned it. He concludeth his argument thus, that not all the Jewes are saued, but those onely whome God sozeknew, the elect I meane. If they sought, how found they not? because they sought not rightly. They sought a Messias, which in gloꝝy and pounpe should raigne ouer the whole woꝝld, which should en- riche them, and subdue all nations vnto their Empire. They sought their owne aduantages, namely, to be feede with bread at Christs hand. They sought to woꝝshippe Messias and God otherwise then was prescribed in the holy scriptures. They sought Christ to kill him, as it is wꝝtten in Iohn the 7. chapter: Yet a litle while

While I am with you, and I go unto my Father, ye shall seeke me, and shall not finde me. Wherefore seeing that they sought not rightly, it is no meruaile if they found not. Wherefore Christ also when he sayth: Seke & ye shall finde, aske and ye shall receaue, knocke and it shall be opened vnto you, we must adde thereunto this aduerbe, rightly, namely, that we aske rightly, that we seke rightly, that we knock rightly, otherwise we shall do all in vayne. The Iewes sought saluation preposterously when as they sought to get it by workes. That they sought saluation it is not to be doubted, when as Paul attributeth vnto them zeale, although he take away from them, by right iudgement and true knowledge. They applied them selues to sacrifices and ceremonies for no other cause, but by them to be saued: But forasmuch as that was not to seke a right, they attayned not to their purpose. Chrysostome truly saith, that they therefore were frustrated for that they strove against them selues: For in seeking of saluation they repelled it being offered vnto them freely by Christ: but to seke a thing, and to reject it when it is offered, is manifestly for a man to resist that which he purposeth.

Election (sayth he) hath obteined it. Here he toucheth the true cause, yea and the chiefest and the assured cause of saluation: otherwise they which are saued had by nature nothing of more excellency or worthines then those which perish. Election according to the Hebrew phrase signifieth the elect, as circumcision doth the circumcised. And Israel is called the sanctification of God, for that it was sanctified by him. They are also called Gods possession, for that he possesseth them. And this kind of speache not a little furthereth the purpose of Paul: for he ment to draw vs agayne to the consideration of the very cause, that we might with the more attentiuenes consider of it.

But the rest are made blind. Here he deuidenth Israel into two partes, into the elect (I say) and into the reprobate. And affirmeth that the promises are accomplished in the elect, which were indefinitely set forth vnto all men. Wherefore this proposition is to be proued: that the rest which are not comprehended vnder election are by God made blind, the cause of which blinding if a man enquire, some answeres, wickednes or sinne. But thereby is not the question dissolved, for sinne or wickednesse, are eyther ignorance & blindness, or els they bring with them and comprehend ignorance & blindness. Wherefore as touching the efficient cause, some saye, that it is the deuill: which sentence is true, and is written of Paul, in the 4. chapter of the second to the Corinthians: The God of this worlde hath made blind the mindes of the vnbeleuers. Neither let vs regard, that the Fathers, as Hilary, Chrysostome, Augustine, and Ambrose haue interpreted that place not of the deuill, but of the true God: as though this were the sense: God hath made blinde the minds of the vnbeleuers of this worlde. But this transposing of words, the order of the Greke tonge will not suffer. Neyther is it an hard matter to see, wherunto they had a respect in that their violent interpretation. They had to doe agaynst the Arrians, and agaynst the Maniches, bothe which vsurped the words of the Apostle, as though they made on their syde. The Arrians went about to proue, that the name of God mought be attributed vnto Christe although he were a creature, when as the deuill is here called God. And the Maniches taught there are two beginnings of things, a good and an euil. God the maker of this worlde, and God the father of our Lord Iesus Christe aboue the worlde: and they sayd, that the Apostle in this place calleth the euil beginning, the God of this worlde, as though he ought to be called the author of the worlde. But we must not, because of heretikes decline from the true sense of the scriptures. Neither is it to be denyed vnto the Arrians, that the deuill is called God, when thereunto is added this particule of this worlde. For this particule declareth, that he is not the true God, but is of the worldlings and men of this worlde both counted and worshipped for God. As Dauid also sayd: the Gods of the nations, but straight way as it were by way of correction he addeth, Demils. And vnto the Corinthians in the first epistle: There are many Gods, and many Lords: namely, according to the iudgement of men corrupted. And of some he sayth, whose God is the beuly. And Helias sayd vnto the false prophetes, touching Baal: Crye yet louder, for your God is peradventure in his cause, or he is busy talking, so that he can not heare. And so he calleth Baal God, because he

The chiefest cause of saluation.

What election is after the Hebrew phrase.

Israel is deuident into two partes.

What is the efficient cause of creation.

A place in the 2. to the Corinthians

The Maniches made two beginnings.

We must not for heretikes decline from the true sense of the scriptures.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

Christ is not called with any terme diminitive, for he is in very deede god

How the deuill is called prince of this world.

Excecation
cometh both
from God,
and fro the Deuill.

Sinne is the inward
cause of ex-
cecation.
Excecation
cometh of want of Grace.

was so comted of men. But when Christ is called God, he is sayd to be blessed e-uer al, and world without end. Which conditions added plainly declare the nature of the true God. Whereouer we are admonished, to put our confidence in him, to call vpon him, & to worship him: which things without al doubt are to be attributed vnto the true God onely and to none other. Neither will we so be agaynst the Maniches, to deny, but that the deuill hath genen him of God a certayne dominio or preheminence in the world, when as in the Gospell he is called the Prince of this world, and Paul calleth him κοσμοκράτης, that is, the gouernour of the world, and called him also principality and power. But these things he to this end hath to do seruice vnto God, and therfore he can do nothing more or les then is permitted him of God. He in deede exerciseth power, but yet that power which he receaueth of God: and therfore he is sometyms called the spirite of the Lord: but yet the euill spirite, for so is he described in the booke of Samuell, to haue inuaded Saul. Therfore excecation or making blind is a work common both to God and to the deuill. God maketh blind as commaunding, as a iudge, as the chief and principall authoz: but the deuill as the minister and hangman of God, in which worke doubtles he is redy at hand, and willingly offreth himself, and yet can he do nothing vnles, God commaunded him. Hereby now is declared, that sinne is the inward cause of excecation, yea, that it hath alwayes ioyned with it ignorance, and that the deuill is the instrument thereof, and the true God as a iudge is the cause efficient. But how excecation cometh may thus be shewed: Men by reason of sinnes are thorough Gods hidden iudgement, whiche is yet notwithstanding euer iust left destitute of his grace, spirite, fauour, and light: and being thus miserably destitute they must needs, still more and more stamble, and more grea-uously fall: especially then when they be deliuered by vnto sathan to be deceaued, and to be throwne downe hedlonge. That which the Apostle before sayd of Ismael and Esau, and Pharao, he now most manifestly affirmeth of the Jewes, and that as it is most likely not without their great hatred and grieve. Chrysostome sayth, that they were made blind thorough their euill and contentions mynd. But the commentaries ascribed vnto Ierome, adde thereto, God, whereof Chrysostome speakeith not. And doubtles we can not deny, but that God doth with euery one of vs what soener seemeth good vnto him, but yet so iustly that no man can excuse his sinnes, or weaist the fault vpon him. It is meete without doubt, that we thinke the best of God, and that we speake most reuerently of him, but yet not in such sort, that we be agaynst the scriptures, or plucke away any thing from his mighty power. Paul had absolutely pronounced, that the rest of the Jewes are made blind, but he left vnmencioned the efficient cause thereof, but now in the oracles whiche he citeth, he expresseth it, saying:

As it is vwritten: God hath geuen vnto them the spirite of pricking, that when they se they should not se, and whe they heare they should not heare. ] Here now we ought not to doubt, but that also the excecation of the wicked cometh fro God and that by his iust iudgement. Origen sayth, that he had in no part of the scriptures red, that God gaue the spirite of pricking, and he thinketh that it may be, that Paul added that of his owne for explication sake, as also at the end, he of him selfe adderth, euen to this day. Which thing he also before did, for when he had sayd, Who shall ascend vp into heauen? he added, to fetch downe Christ, And after that he had sayd, Who shall go downe into hell? he added, that is, to fetch agayne Christ from the dead. But although Origenes surmise be not vnlikely to be true: yet in the 51. chapter of Esay we rede, that the Israelites had geuen them of God to drinke the cuppe of fury, and Hithraalah that is, of madnes or of poyson. And the selfe thing is witten in the 60. Psalm, and also in the 19. and 29. chapters of Esay, God is sayd to haue sent the spirite of Teradmah, which is of disines, and the spirite of Oum, which is of errors. Whereby it is manifest that the A-postle added nothing, which he had not out of scriptures. The metaphore is taken of those, which allure men to drinke and labour to make them dronke, and if the drinke be tempred with medicine to bzing them to madnes. But herein only

Paul added
nothing whiche he had not out of the scriptures.

ly is the difference, for that when men so do they do it vnwillingly, but when God so doth he doth it most lustily. That which the Hebrewes say Teraalah the 70. interpreters haue turned καταύγειν, and the latines Compunctionem. And that greke word may be expounded two manner of wayes: first to signify griefe, hatred, and vexation: for when the word of God and saluation is set befoze them, it aight way they are pricked with griefe of hart, they are beread, they burne in hatred, and most earnestly resist, as it is sayd of the Jewes, When they heard Stephen, theyr harts were rent a sonder, and they gnashed with theyr teth. But contrariwise the spirite of God whiche is genen vnto the godly, maketh appeased, contented, and quiet, and bringeth a wonderful consolation vnto those y are with it inspired. The other interpretation according to Chrysostome is by καταύγειν, to vnderstand steadfastnes, for that they were so addicted, fixed, and fastened vnto wicked affectes, and vnto incredulity, that they could therehence by no meanes be plucked away, although they wanted not exhortacions vnto piety. Doubles this is a most greate infelicity, when in steede of that sweete cuppe of mercy is genen vs to drinke the cuppe of fury, in steede of the cupps of truth, the cuppe of error, in steede of the cuppe of brightnes and sound doctrine, the cuppe of madnes and blindnes, and that by God him selfe. Wherefoze let them take hede which ether teach or heare the holy scriptures, that thorough theyr owne default, that thing which is vnto others life and saluation, be not made vnto them perdition, and present destruction. God indebe powreth not into any man any new malice, but stirreth vp that which befoze lay hidden. They had eyes, to se miracles, they had also eares, wherewith they heard both the prophesses of the prophets, and also the preachers, but it nothing preuayled with them. The Apostles argumente is, Thus was it foretold, thus hath God appoynted, wherefoze I bring nothing that is new: We must not consider what the Jewes claymed vnto them selues, but what the scriptures gaue vnto them. There was no cause why they should so highly be offended with Paul, when as he spake nothing, but such thinges as had happened in the time of Helias, and Esay had foretold should come to passe as touching them also. He addeth,

What the word of God worketh in the wicked, and what in the elect.

God maketh not blinde by pouring in of new malice.

Vnto this Day, ] For that towarde the end of the world they shal beleue. So also he wrote vnto the Corinthians, That there is a vaile put ouer the harte of the Iewes, whē the scripture is red, which abideth also enen to this day. And that which Esay speaketh indefinitely of the Jewes, is to be vnderstanded as touching the greater part. The Prophet there asked, How long Lord? and answer is made vnto him, even vnto destruction. So afterwarde also in this epistle it is sayd, Vnto the entrance of the fullnes of the Gentiles. But for the better vnderstanding of that place of Esay taken out of the 6. chapter, there are certayne thinges worthy to be noted. First that the Prophet saw God sitting vpon an high seate, and the skirtses eyther of the garments of God, or of his throne filled the temple. And y for me wherein God shewed him selfe was like vnto a iudge. By him stood his ministers the Seraphims, and he would pronounce a sentence agaynst the Jewes and that a definite sentence, which should be past remedy, as Aben Ezra writeth vpon that place: who sayth, that after God hath once genen sentence, it is not possible but that it shalbe put in execution, yea although repentance come in the meane time, as though the sentences of Ezechiel and Jeremy entreate only of threatninges. Whome shall we send, sayth the Lord? Rabby Solomō saith that these be the wordes of one being somewhat in a doubt: for he had sent Amos and they had derided him saying, This man is a flammer neyther can he bring forth his wordes playnty, and shall we beleue that God hath sent him? When Esay had offered him selfe, Go thy wayes sayth the Lord, as if he should haue sayd, Resist not my sentence as did Moses, which would haue bene blotted out of the booke of life? Nor as did Ionas, which refused to denounce vnto the Nininites destruction. Go not about to praye, as Jeremy did in the 7. chapter, for I haue sayd that I will not heare. Tell vnto this people, which was once mine, but now not mine, that was once wise, but now more foolish then

A place of Esay in the 6. chapter.

When God hath once genen sentence it is not letted by repentance.

an asse and an oxe which acknowledge theyr Lordes, and know the way to theyr mangere vnto this people I say worse then Sodoma and Gomorha which call good euil, & euill good and honor me with theyr lippes only. In hearing heare ye. Rabby David Kimby sayth, that that place is red in the imparatiue mode, but is of some expounded by the future temps of the indicatiue mode as though it were a foretelling. And some are moued, not to vnderstand it by the imparatiue mode, for that this seemeth to be agaynst the goodnes of God to commaund sinne and the deatch of the soule. For in an other place he sayth, I will not the death of a sinner: but will haue all men to be saued. Wherefore (say they) these thinges are not to be taught: for they open

There is nothing in the scriptures which edifieth not.

If God punissh sinners by sinnes, he wrought to abstaine frō sinne.

a way vnto sinnes: which sinnes if God commaund the can not displease him: but this is, as though y<sup>e</sup> holy gost should speake thinges which serue not to edificatio. There is nothing in the scriptures which being aptly and rightly declared may not be taught, and so farr is it of that by this doctrine a way is opened vnto sins, that vnto them which haue but euen a cromme of piety and of wisdom hereby is set forth a doctrine to expell sinnes. For if for the punishment of sinne God do in such sorte deliuer by men to wicked affectes and to madnes to be thereby punished, who will not fly from sinne? When as it is a thing farre more greauous to fall into these euills, then to fall into pouerty or into the deatch of the body. Euen the Ethnike vnderstoode the truth of this matter. Pallas in Sophocles sheweth how that Alix being in a greate rage agaynst Visse was so farre besides him selfe that he slew oren, thepe, and such like cattayle in stede of the Erecians and also in stede of Agamenon, Menelaus, and of Visse, and in this sorte sayth he was he smitten of God bycause of his blasphemy. But the holy scripture where so we cleaue, teach this thing also in other places most manifestly: *He deliuered them vp (sayth Paul) into a reprobate sence: he hath mercy on whome he wil, and whome he will he hardneth: It is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth but of God that hath mercy. Esau was bated, Ismaell was not counted for the sede: Pharao was hardened: The potter maketh vessels some to honor, and some to contumely, Wea & Rabby Kimby saw this, and sayth, that of the sonnes of Hely the priest it is sayd, that they harkned not vnto theyr father, for that God would slay the. And king Roboam harkned not vnto y<sup>e</sup> people, for that God was agaynst him, as he had foretold by Abiam the Silomite. Moreover although these thinges should be spoken by the future tempe of the indicatiue mode, yet for all that is not the minde quieted: for if in seeing they shall see, and shall not vnderstand, and if in hearing they shall heare, and not know, it may be enquired what is the efficient cause of this excecration. Men eschew to say that God is the cause: for that they haue theyr eyes drownd in the fleshe, and are aserd, lest they shoulde make God a sinner. For they can not seduce, make blind, or impell others vnto sinne, vnles they themselues should sin: & they thinke y<sup>e</sup> we should so imagine of god, if we should so make answer. But an argument taken a simili, y<sup>e</sup> is, of the like in these matters is dangerous whē we trasferre vnto God thinges pertaining vnto vs. The deuill which is the father of Sophisters, after that sort reasoneth a simili whē he transfozmeth himselfe into an Angell of light: and a simili seeketh to deceaue vs, to the end we should worship him. Aben Ezra affirmeth that the Prophet had not the power to make blind, but the word of God, the burning cole that was taken out of the alter had this power: and doubtles that this should come to passe by the power of the word, the Prophet before saw. For when the Seraphines cried, the thresholds and postes of the temple were moued, to declare that the wordes of God pronounced by his Angels, by the Prophetes (I say) and the Apostles, should so irritate and moue the Jewes vnto impiety, and hatred of God, that at the last by his iust iudgement they should be caried away out of their owne land into captivity and be despered abroade. Moreover y<sup>e</sup> house was filled with smoke where with the Jewes were made blind. Wherefore let this be a sure and a constant doctrine that God punisheth not men by sinne, vnles before by them hath bene committed some sinne deseruing the same and contrariwise that no man is sa*

The Prophet could not make blinde.

God punisheth vs not by sinne, vnles sinne haue bene before committed.

ned

ned, but through his rich and plentiful mercy, which also shineth forth, even when men are in such sort iustly punished. For when it is sayd, that hearing they heare not thereby is declared, that the power of hearing is not taken away from them, but rather that the word of GOD is abundantly offered vnto them. There were also miracles shewed vnto the, which they might haue sene, and in their hart was grafted some light, and iudgement of conscience, which thinges who will euer deny but that they are singular giftes of God: But thou wilt say: they profited them not: I graunt that also, but yet are not these thinges therefore to be depriued of their dignity and of their due prayse. If a wound were to the death, and yet notwithstanding vnto it be laid good playsters and oymments which nothing preuaile, should therefore those playsters and oymments be depriued of their valew and strength? Who euer doubted, but that the gracious giftes which serued to worke miracles are the giftes of God, and those most excellent, although sometimes they nothing profited them that had them: And we may yet more plainly in them see the plentifulnes of the godnes of God, if we consider wel the Hebrew phrase. For as often as a verbe is put before, and thereunto is added an infinitiue mode, the same verbe which we turne by Secunde, thereby is signified an often and vehement action: Wherefore in hearing to heare, is oftentimes to heare, and that not after a common sort. In seeing to see, is both oftentimes to see, and also to behold excellent and wonderfull thinges. What other thing els was this, then, as it is sayd of Tantalus, to dye for thirst, being by to the chine in water: and to starue for hunger, hauing all kinds of delicate meates before him: So did God punish the Jewes, that in so great an abundance of spirituall giftes they are smitten with an extreme blindness and madness. They were wicked, and therefore they were iustly smitten of God with these plagues: when as dayly they were made an earth more full of stones, ouergrown with thornes, & a way ouertreden & to much woyn, so y<sup>e</sup> the side of God fell amongst the without fruit. They which sinne against y<sup>e</sup> holy ghost are punished wth his horrible blindness. Neither is this sentence now alleadged any thing hindered by that which was objected, that some will say, let vs commit sinnes seeing that God seemeth to commaund them: for whosoever pretendeth this, let him looke vpon the lawe of God set forth vnto all men, and there let him diligently serch, whether that he can find that God hath commaunded any thing that is sinne: Wherefore our part is to obey the lawe of God, and not to haue a regard vnto his hidden will. God, say they, would haue all men to be saued: I deny not this: For in the promises I heare of none that are by name excluded: they are generally both set forth and preached vnto all men. Wherefore as farre as appeareth by them, he would haue all men to be saued. Which sentence may also be expounded, as we haue before many times interpreted it. And that which is written in Ezechiell: I will not the death of a sinner, is both true, and maketh nothing against vs. For if thou speake of a sinner that abideth in his sinne, and alloweth his wickednes, his death he willet, for by his lawes he commaundeth him to be punished, and he condemneth him to hell fire, and vtter destruction. But if thou speake of a sinner which is sorry for his sinnes, which repenteth, and which detesteth his sinnes, his death he willet not. And without doubt God is most gentle, and most plentiful of mercy: but he is also most iust, and therefore it is not to be meruailed at, if sometimes he punish with this kind of punishment. Pigghius that most trifling Sophister laboureth to inuert this place cited of all the Euangelistes, to the end to proue that God is by no manner of meanes the cause of sinne. But how farre wide he is from the doctrine of Paul, hereby it may plainly be proued, in that he maketh election common vnto all men, and affirmeth that God hath a like appointed all men vnto eternall life, when as Paul not only in very many other places, but also here chiefly denieth the Israelites into chosen, and into not chosen: and saith that others were made blind, and that onely election obtained saluation. The first place he bringeth out of the 4. chapter of Marke, when Christ was asked why he spake in parables, he answered, Vnto you it is geuen to know the mystery of the kingdome of God, but vn-

A certaine Hebrew phrase declared.

God in his lawe comma-
mandeth
not sinners.

Who are to be counted
to be in the Church.

By what meanes
Christ
saith to make blind.

How vnto
them that haue is geuen, and fro
them that haue not, is take away.

to them which are without all things are shewed by parables. Here, by an vntimely allegory he reproveth vs as though we are without, and the flocke of the Papists are within. And therefore he saith that we vnderstand not the scriptures. But I would gladly know of this man whether they are to be counted out of the church, which embrace the holy scriptures: which obserue the sacraments, and rightly administer them: which deny not the holy ghost, wherby the life of the body of the Church is nourished: and which confesse the selfe same articles of faith which all Christians confesse: What I pray you claymeth he vnto himselfe that we haue not, but only mere superstitions, and bondage, wherin he flattereth the Antichrist of Rome: Merely that we are without these things and haue escaped them, we are exceeding ioyfull: and he, if he had any witte would much lament that he is within and abiding in them. Marke sayth: That seeing they should see, and not perceive. These words are most playne, and vnles he had thornes in his eyes, without any doubt. God because of the wicked desertes of the Iewes would make them blind: thereto he vled these meanes: namely the foreshewings of the Prophetes, the preachings of Christ and of the Apostles, which when they heard, they were moze irritated, and skipt backe from the truth. And therefore Christ sayth: Vnto the I speak in parables, that thereby they may receaue for their sinnes the iust reward of obstinacy, and pricking. But saith he, the obscurenes which is in the words of Mark touching this may be explained by the brightnes and light which shineth in the words of Mathew. For he in the 13. chapter saith, Therefore do I speake vnto them in parables, for that seeing they see not, and hearing they heare not. But he willingly overhippeth that which was before said: Vnto you it is geuen to knowe the mystery of the kingdome of heauen, but vnto them it is not geuen: for in these words is manifest y inequality of the grace & gifts of God. Vnto him that hath (saith he) it shalbe geue: but he which hath not; euen that which he hath shalbe taken away fro him. They are sayd to haue, vnto whom is graunted election vnto saluation, and of election cometh saith, vnto those I say are continually many heavenly giftes aboundantly geuen. They are sayd not to haue, which are reprobate, and which are destitute of faith, and lose also euen y which they haue: for the natural gifts, wherewith they were sometimes excellently adorne are made vnto them vnprofitable, and the wordes of God and miracles which are offred vnto them bying forth no fruite in their minds. Therefore vnto them I speake by parables, for y seeing they see not. Now sayth Pighius, thou seest the cause, why Christe spake in parables, for that they were blinde and obstinate, not that they were such, because that Christe so spake, but for that they were such, therefore Christe spake vnto them in parables, and so neyther in Christ nor in God is there any cause of execration. But this man is farre deceaued, for that word quia, that is, for that, or because, alwayes signifieth not the cause of a thing to make it to be, but rendreth a cause of y knowledge that it may be, and that by the effect. As in Luke it is writ ten of the sinfull woman, Many sinnes are forgiven her, because she hath loued much. This vehement & aboundant loue was the effect, and did set open the remission of sinnes, which lay before hidden. So also is it in the parable of the debtors, He loueth more, vnto whom more is forgiven. So here also when the Apostles demaund, Why speakest thou in parables? The reason is geuen by the effect, because that they seeing, see not: Here of cometh the execration of these men. Do ye not see what here followeth? I shewe the effect, I declare the euent, which is, that these men in seeing see not, in hearing heare not, and are made blind. And that Pighius expositio aptly agreeth not, I will proue by two reasons. First for that this sentence of Esay, where as in the Hebrue is written, God commaunding. In Paul is not exprested the name God, as the efficiēt cause of this madness, and obstinacy: but in other places of the scripture it is put, and especially as we shall see, it is most plainly set forth in Iohn. Secondly, for that it agreeth not with the question of the Disciples. They asked, Why speakest thou in parables? If Christ had answered that their blindness was the cause therof, it mought be thought, that therefore he ought not to haue spoken vnto them in parables, but ought rather to haue spoken vnto them moze manifestly and and moze plainly, to overcome their blindness with the brightnes of his doctrine. But for that he would punish them for their rebellion against God, to the ende they should be made blind, such a doctrine was sette forth unto them, whiche for that they vnderstood not, they hated, and fled away from it. If one man to an other would speake obscurely, that they which stand by should not vnderstand hym, & should afterward be asked, why speakest thou so obscurely? would he say, thinke you, for y they which stand by are blockes, & vnderstand not? Doubtles this should be a ridiculous answer. But he would answer, if he would answer with reason: Therfore spake I obscurely, that they which stand by should not vnderstand. The Apostles asked not, why those men beleued not? whiche if they had, then mought this cause haue bene geuen, because that they are blind, and heare not the thinges which are spoken. But they asked, why dost thou speake vnto them in parables? and then can not their blockishnes and blindness be rendred as a cause: for that then Christ ought rather to haue holpen them by speaking plainly, and not darkely vnto them. But whereas the thing is spoken in the future tense of the indicative mode, that nothing helpeth their case: for we also affirme, that that then was to come, which now we know to be done: but we say that it was done by the commaundement of the Lord, as Esay expretheth, & as Paul also declareth. Moreover sayth Pigghius, it is a foretelling, and therfore it is not a cause. This is a weake pofe: for, that which Esay foretold, his words I say and preaching irritated the Iewes, and stirred vp in them the affect of incredulity. Is not the doctrine of the law sayd to encrease sinne? for that by it are stirred by lustes? But this (sayth he) commeth not thorough the default of the law, we graunt that: neyther also say we, that this commeth to passe thorough the default of sinne of God, or of the prophets & preachers: when yet notwithstanding they are after a sort causes therof: but let vs looke vpon originall sinne, which is the foundation of all the evils that come vnto mankind. There doubtles after the first fall, Adam with all his posterity was spoiled of grace and the spirite: from the mind was taken away light, that it should not vnderstand the things that pertayne to God: from reason was taken away the power to keepe vnder wicked appetites: and on the other syde, the affects were corrupted, to rebell with greate violence agaynst reason and honesty. These thinges thou wilt say are punishments, yea they are also sinnes. And who inflicted them? God inflicted them: which thing no man can deny. For it is his ordinaunce, & that iust, that he which departeth from him should incur & suffer these thinges. But of this matter I will cesse now to speake any moze, for that I haue before at large fully discoursed it. But (sayth he) men are not compelled to sinne. Is this most sharpe sighted Sophister yet so dull, that he knoweth not how to distinguish necessity from violence? This particle ut, that is, that, sayth he, in Marke signifieth a consequence, and not a cause: yea it also signifieth a cause, for the words of God spoken and preached by Esay, by Christ, and by the Apostles were instruments wherby they were irritated. This may be perceaued by a similitude very manifest and playne. Suppose that there were a body full of choler, which choler notwithstanding as yet bursteth not forth, when sommer is com, then by reason of heate, if vnto him be geuen cold frutes, and also cold drinke, whereof he excessiue taketh, these thinges are corrupted in his stomack, the choler is encreased, and is poured abroad thoroughout the bodye, whereof springe perillous flices, and gripinges in the inward partes. Who can deny, but that the heate of the sommer, the frutes and drinke, were the cause of this disease: at the least, the cause called πρὸς αὐτὴν, although it were not the principall cause, or as they call it πρὸς ἑαυτὴν? He supposeth, that this particle, That, in Marke signifieth a cause efficient and not finall. So that the sense is, Therfore I speake in parables, for that seeing they see not. He chaungeth the coniunctiue mode into the indicative mode, and transformeth the whole in suche sort, that he turneth the words of Marke into the words of Mathew, when yet the holy ghost of purpose caused this diuersity of words to be. And Pigghius seemeth to obtrude these thinges, as though we should deny Mathew, which thing is not true. Onely we are displeased with Pigghius exposition: but the Gospel of Mathew we both Men are not made blind thorough the default of the doctrine or preaching of the Gospel.

The word of God and preaching are instruments, wherby they which shalbe made blind are irritated.

In controuersies pertaining to the old testament,
we must go to the Hebrew verity

Luke had more skill in the Greeke tongue then in the Hebrew.

The text of the old testament is not corrup-
ted of the Jewes.

reuerence. Moreover he declareth himself not to haue bene very diligent in the Popes decrees, although he vable of them continually. In them is comanded, that if any controuersy arise about any part of the scripture of the old Testament, we should go vnto the Hebrew verity: And it is Augustines rule in his booke, De doctrina Christiana. Being therfore that the Euangelists expresse not this place of Esay, with one and the self same words, why goeth he not to the fountayne of the Hebrew verity. Neyther is there any reason why he should be offended if this particle, That, do signify a finall cause, as though Christ to this end spake in parables, that they shoulde be made blind. Doth not the Lorde say of Pharao, to this end haue I rayssed thee vp, that I might in thee shew forth my power? And is not the potters sayd to make some vessels to honoz, and some to contumely? After whose maner God is sayd to haue ordeyned vessels of mercy, and vessels of wrath, to declare both the riches of his glozy, and the seuerity of his iustice. When the scripture plainly setteth forth vnto vs such ends of the workes of God, they ought neyther to be obscured nor to be denied. Mathe w turneth this place of Esay by the indicatiue mode, and by the future tense, followinge the edition of the Seventy, which thing he mought lawfully do, when as these interpreters disagreed not from the Hebrew verity as touching the sense, but onely as touching words. And that this might lawfully be done, Rabbi David Kimhi, one of the He-brewes vnderstande: only in that edition wanteth the efficient cause of their blind-nes: which cause both Paul and John haue expresse. And in the Hebrew it is plainly declared by the imperative mode, which is in that place not in bayne put.
But it shalbe good to heare what Jerome sayth touching this matter, who in his Commentary vpon the first chapter of Esay, at the first doubteth, why Luke, as it is read in the Actes of the Apostles in the 28. chapter, citing this place followeth the 70. and not the Hebrew verity. And he answereth, y<sup>e</sup> the Ecclesiastical writers write y<sup>e</sup> Luke was expert in the arte of Philosophie, & was more skillfull in the Greeke tongue then in the Hebrew, & therfore it is no meruaile if in citing testimonies of y<sup>e</sup> old testamēt he followed y<sup>e</sup> terte which he was best acquainted with. But in stead of this answer I would rather thus make answer, That the holy ghost had so instructed Luke and the rest of the Euangelists, that they mought redily haue cited testimonies out of the Hebrew verity, if they had would: but of purpose when they might conueniently, they followed the 70. that the Gentiles, vnto whose vles they writings shoulde chiefly serue, might by that edition of the 70. which only they had, vnderstand the thinges which were by them cited. Jerome moreover reponeth those which in his time sayd, that we ought not to looke vpon the Hebrew booke for that the Jewes had corrupted them. Origen saith he, in his interpretacion vpon Esay denieth that it is so, and that by thys reason, for that Christ and the Apostles, would not haue passed ouer in silence so heynous a crime. For if the lord manifestly reproveth the bayne and false interpretacions of the Pharises and Scribes, what would he haue sayd, if they had presumed with rash handes to corrupt the holy booke? But they say that the bookes of the scripture were by them conterfeited, after the ascension of Christ, and after that the Apostles had set forth the Gospells. Heare (saith Jerome) I am not able to withhold my selfe from laughter, as though the Apostles, which oftentimes in theyr writings alledge sentences of the old testament would not cite the places according to the 70. but according to the Hebrew verity, as the booke shoulde be afterward falsified of the Iewes. What then sayth he? shall we here go from the Hebrew verity, and follow the 70. lest we should seme blasphemous, in attributing vnto God so greateseuerity, that he will not haue the Iewes to se or to heare, that he shoulde make them blynde & harden the? But thereby we shall nothing preuaile, for the 70. haue not alwayes in their translatiō annoyded such kinde of speeches. For in them we finde, To this end haue I rayssed thee vp to declare in thee my might & power. Agayne, God hardened the hart of Pharao.
Like wise: let theyr table be made vnto them a snare, and an offence. Make dimme theyr eyes, that they se not, and alwayes make crooked theyr backe. When we come to this, whether shall we fly? Therfore he concludeth, that here is no blasphemy. For Paul saith that God hath shut vp all vnder infidelity, that he might haue mercy vpon all men. And forasmuch

forasmuch as this pitte is very deape, in which we are neyther able to wade, nor yet to passe ouer it, the Apostle cried out, O the deapth of the riches of Gods wisdom and knowledge. And he sayth, that the Iewes were therefore made blind, that the Gentiles might beleue, neyther is that to be counted any cruelty that one litle part of the world was made blinde, that all the other partes thereof might be illustrated, and it pleased God with the conuersion of the Gentiles to make amendes for the losse which came thorough the fall of the Iewes. Christ in Iohn sayth of him selfe. I came for iudgment sake into this worlde that they which se should not se, and that they which saw not should se. Esay also foretelleth of him, that he should be a stone of offence, and a stumbling block. And Simeon said, that he is put to the fall and rising of many. These thinges alledgeth Ierome making altogether on our side. But in Iohn this place is most manifestly cited in the 12. chapter, that it can not be denied but that the Iewes were made blind by God: yea it is added, that they could not beleue, which thing Piggbins will not grant, when yet notwithstanding it is most true. For how can a man beleue, which is void of the spirite and grace of God, and left in the corruption of his owne nature wherein we are all bozne? Doubtles his incredulity is of necessity, not indeede absolutely, but by supposition. And he addeth, that if that were impossible, it should not vndoubtedly be impossible by reason of the foretelling of the prophet. Unto this we answer that here also is impossibility by supposition: for, that which Esay had foretold must nedes be verified, and moreover the prophet when he foretold and preached these thinges, could not but make blind these which were forsaken of God. For of necessity they were more and more incensed, and they more and more hated the worde of God, and as men blind leped backe from it, when as they were destitute of the grace and spirite of God. But these reasons of necessity Piggbins weigheth not, but addeth, that Esay saith not, that God made blind the Iewes. But is not in that place the excecation of the Iewes commaunded of God? For it is all one. That which is done by his commaundement is sayd to be done by him. When he commaundeth the Prophet, Make blinde the harte of the people: nothing els sayth Piggbins is thereby signified, but preach, namely, that the people shalbe made blind. Here I se a new trope or figure, that to make blind signifieth to preach. These are they which so sharply reprove vs, if in the matter of the sacrament we vse as it is necessary a trope, and that a trope commonly vsed: when yet they without any necessity bring a trope, and that such a one as was neuer hard of before. Neither is y true which he alwayes taketh as graunted, that the cause of excecation was in such sort in the people, that God can by no meanes be sayd to be the cause thereof. But let vs heare, how he vnderstand of this place of Iohn, that it was impossible that they should beleue. Impossible sayth he, signifieth, difficult or hard. A new diuinity: to affirme that a man destitute of the spirite and of grace, and cleansing only vnto his owne corrupt strengths can beleue, althoughe with difficulty? What could Pelagius say more in his owne defence if he were nowe on line agayne? But sayth he, Impossible, sometimes signifieth so, as when we commonly say, I can not loue that man, that is, I can not but with much difficulty be brought to loue that man. But is this a good consequence, that if we sometimes so speake, that therefore we should straight way graunt that it is so to be taken in this place of Iohn? If I should graunt vnto thee that this worde sometimes so signifieth, canst thou thereby proue, that such a signification is here to be vsed? I will not speake, how the similitude which thou bringest hath not that force which thou thinkest it hath. For when the Lord sayd vnto his brethren, The world can not hate you. He ment not, as thou imaginest, that this is a hard matter, but that it is by no meanes possible. For that it is in very dede impossible, that a carnall and worldly man, in as much as he is such a one, should be hated of carnall and worldly men. He may peraduenture for other causes be hated, as for his riches, or for his great power, & a thousand such like things but for that he is a carnall and worldly man he shall not displease men that are of the same sorte. Which thing yet I doe not therefore speake, as though I will deny God was not cruel in making blinde the Iewes.

Iohn affirmeth that the Iewes could not beleue.

That which is done by the commaundement of God, is said to be done of God. Agaynst those which where no neede was, bring in tropes or figures, but repell them where they are necessary.

Whether impossibility signifieth difficulty.

Cap.ii. A Commentarie vpon the deny but that impossibilitie sometimes is al one with difficultie or hardnes. For I am not ignorant what Gregorius Nazianzenus in his 4. booke of his theologie hath writte as touching this matter, vnto whome whiche I may in all things assent, I mind not at this present to debate. And when as Pigghius can not deny: but that Ihon sayth that God made blind the Iewes, he sayth, that although vnbeleuers haue in themselves the cause why they are made blind, yet not withstanding the scripture so speaketh, as if God should make them blind. Doth the scripture so speake? and doth it that without reason: would it so speake, as though God herein doth nothing? I suppose not. But it shall not be amisse to examine an notable similitude which he bringeth. A man (sayth he) that is poore blinde, or that hath soze eyes if he looke vpon the Sunne shall thereby be blind. Shall we say that the beames of the Sunne haue made him blind, when as he had in hym selfe the ground and beginning of that disease? How will he him selfe auoyde the sharpnes of this his similitude. I graunt that the beginning of disease was in the eyes, but the disease was not so greate that he which was poore blinde could see nothing at all: for although he were dull sighted, yet was he not blind. In that he is now utterly made blind, who will not say but that the Sunne according to his nature and manner of working is the cause thereof. The dew also or raine saith he, is not the cause, that ground vntilled bringeth forth thornes, who would euer so say? and that the raine causeth fertlenes, in bringing forth thornes, who will deny that hath but one ounce of witte? But he hath neuer his fill of similitudes, but at the last he addeth suche a one as Pelagius neuer durste vse. Imagine (saith he) that a soule were shut vp in a chamber together with two counsellors, with the spirite (I say) and the flesh: and without on the one side let Christ stande, hauing with him a compaignie of all vertues and spirituall giftes: on the other side let stand the Deuill with his whole route of wicked sinnes: both these waite with out to see which of them the soule will let in: within the spirite geueth counsell to receaue Christ: and the flesh to receaue the deuill: the soule being as it were in the middest inclineth freely to wheter parte it will: if it receaue Christ, the deuill is utterly diuened away: but if it entertaine the deuill: Christ departeth away: Pelagius

Similitudes which Pigghius
bringeth.

The soule of him that is not regenerate,
can not be sayd
to be in the middest betweene
the spirite and
the flesh.

Without
blame and without cause or not alone.

for his opinion could say no more. He putteth the soule in the middest, whiche yet without Christ is a bondslawe of the flesh. That the will ought to be chaunged by the inspiration Christ, he speaketh not so much as one word. That we must haue geuen vs a fleshy hart, and our stony hart taken away, he utterly keepeth in silence: onely peruations are set before vs. So saide Pelagius that men are moued by the lawes and scriptures, but he also neuer spake one woorde of the chaunginge of the hart. And Pigghius fearing least in this sayned declaration we shoulde not vnderstand him, addeth, that free will is a weake eye, in whose power yet it lieth to be healed. What sounde diuine woulde euer speake this, that it lieth in the power of the will or of humane strengthes, that a man shoulde be saued? He laboureth yet more plainely to declare his sentence. We are (sayth he) the good odor of Christe, vnto some indeede vnto life, and to other some vnto death. A good odor (saith he) killeth no man: but it is not so: for a man may instepe say that serpentes are killed with good odors, and with the sweete smell of spices? So also incredulitie may be stirred vp by sound doctrine, and preaching of the word of God. But not through the default of the doctrine or preaching I say. But yet may we not say, that it is not the cause thereof, as it is not by the default thereof. God also without any his fault maketh blind, yet notwithstanding maketh he blinde as the scripture testifieth. But now let vs leaue this Sophister in whose sayinges there is much more absurdity, then difficultie in answering. But as touchinge the matter whiche we were in hand with, it was as I before sayde, a greuous offence, to see that Christ being the true Messias, and shewed in the scriptures was receaued of so few of the Iewes, yea rather he was hated in a manner of them all, who yet were verie studious in the scriptures. And in our dayes this self offence troubleth many, for that wher as it seemeth that vnto Christ were promised all nations, yet notwithstanding there is so is so great plenty of Epicures, so great filthines of Turkes, and so great a wicked heape of Papistes, which utterly resist the Gospell. But againste this kinde of offence the holy Choise hath before armed vs. First Moses saide, that the Jewes should be irritated against a nation that is not an nation. Esay sayth: Though the number of the children of Israell be as the sand of the sea, onely a remnant shall be saued. Vntill the Lorde had lefte vnto vs seed, we had bene like vnto Sodoma, and Gomorrha. Christe the stone of offence and stumblinge blocke is set for the risinge and fall of manye. Lord who hath beleued our report? Many are called, but fewe are elected. And there are infinite other suchlike testimonies, whereby the holy scripture confirmeth vs not to be moued with this small number. They which receaued not Christ, when Chochalus, and Theudas, came, followed after those false Christs, and counterfeited Messias: and they which renounce Christ follow Mahumeth, shall we therefore say, that Chochalus, Theudas, & Mahumeth is Christ: we shoulde be farre besides our selues if we should so say, when as Christ himselfe fogetold that this thing should come to passe. Me (saith he) ye receaue not: but if an other come in my name him ye will receaue. Yea rather this ought to be vnto vs a manifest proufe, that Jesus of Nazareth is the true Messias, when as we see, that in him this oracle together with other oracles is fulfilled, namely, to be receaued of fewe. He indeede prayed vnto the father, but not for the world, but for them, whome the father had geue vnto him, other wise the whole worlde is set on mischief. There is yet an other doubt which stayeth vs, for that the wordes of Esay seme to pertain vnto his time onely, and not vnto Christs and the Apostles time, and vnto our time. I graunte that that blinding was in the time of the prophet, which yet should continue euen vnto the ende of the worlde. The Prophet when the Lorde had commanded him the thinges which we haue now heard sayd. How long Lord: and vnto him was answered, Vntill the cities be destroyed, and brought to desolation and to waste: whiche thing without doubt was partly accomplished, when the Israelites were led away captiues into Babylon but not perfectly: at this day that desolation is fullye accomplished, namely from the time of Vespasian euen vnto the ende of worlde. Moreouer experience it selfe teacheth vs y they are euen to this day blind. Furthermore the argument of the Apostle is yet not withstanding of efficacy, although the Prophet should speake of his time: for the Jewes seemed to be exceedinglye offended, for that Paul preached that they were made blinde: whereas they oughte not to haue taken that in so ill parte, seeing that the Prophet had long time before fogetold vnto their fathers that this punishment should be inflicted vpon them. Wherefore thereby is proued, that Paul had spoken no new reproches against them, nor had deuised any contumely of which they had not before heard. And as it was shewed that in Helias time some were secretly preserued, whereas all the rest perished, to proue that the same thinge had happened vnto the Jewes in the time of Paul: so now is mencioned that the Jewes were in the time of Esay made blinde, that it should not seme incredible, but that they mought now also be infected with the same disease. But the first interpretation is both truer and plainer: wherefore whosoever attentiuely readeth the wordes of Iohn, may easily perceaue that Esay the prophet in that high iudge, whome he testifieth was God, saue Christ. These things (saith Iohn) spake he, when he saw his glory & talked with him. That pronoun, His, hath a relation vnto Christ, for of him was the whole course of his talke. Wherefore this place is not to be forgotten, when we shall proue the diuinitie of Christ: for the Prophet calleth him whome he saw, the God of hostes, and is not afeard to attribute vnto him the name of Iehouah. Wherefore we see both out of Paul, and out of the Prophet, that we ought to graunte that God is the efficiente cause of the blinding of the Jewes, whose principall ende is not, that they shoulde sinne, but that in theyr punishment should be declared his iustice: as it is written vnto the Thessalonians of the time of Antichrist. Wherefore forasmuch as they haue not receaued the loue of the truth, therefore hath God sente vpon them the spirite of error. And in Deut. the. 28. chap., Moses threatened in the name of God, that the Jewes

They whiche receaue not Christ, receiue falses Christs.

Whether things which the Jewes suffered in times past, it is no meruaile if they now suffer. It was Christ whome Esay saw in the person of a iudge. What is the purpose of God in making blinde the Jewes.

should

The things
which are spoken of the Jewes
haue happened also vnto
the papists.

Our corrupt nature
when it is left vnto it selfe is by preaching, & miracles
made blind.

An allegory of the table.

should be smitten of him with furiousnes, madnes, and blockishnes of hart if they hearkned not vnto his wordes. And in Ezechiell God saith, y for the punishment of y wicked sinnes both of the euill Propheets and also of them which asked counsel at their handes, he would seduce the Propbet. These selfe thinges in a maner, which happened vnto y Jewes, we see also to haue happened vnto y Papists: for they hauing bene oftentimes admonished, now at the length to cease of from wicked supersti-cions, and continuall corrupting of the church, not onely woulde not heare, but dayly throve themselves downe hedlong into greater darkenes, and are smittē wyth greater blindness. Whome when we see in thys case, we ought to pity, and to thinke with our selues, that we also should be in the selfe same daunger, if we were not contynually holpen by the sauoure of God. In Marke the eyght chapiter we reade, that when the Apostles muttered amongst themselves, that they had forgotten to take bread with them, and had miserably let slip out of their memory that great miracle wherin Christ had with a few loues fed many thousands of men, the Lord said vnto them: Doye not yet perceaue, nor understand? is your hart still blinded? haue ye eyes and see not? and eares and heare not? And doye not remember? This is the state and condition of our corrupt nature, that if it be left vnto it selfe, it is by preaching and miracles made blind: but God is present with his elect, and when the wordes of God, or sacraments or miracles are set forth vnto them, he openeth their harts, as in the Actes of the Apostles we reade of the woman that sold silke. Whereouer this blindness in some dureth but only for a time: for when it semeth good vnto God, it is by the spirit of Christ taken away, in others it is perpetuall and is euery day more and more encreased: namely, in those whome God by his hidden iudgement, but yet most iust iudgement, utterly forsaketh, and hath euen from eternally reiected. And David sayth, Let their table be tur- ned into a snare, and a net for a stumbling blocke, and a recompence vnto them. This is written in the 59. Psalm, where David complayneth of the calamities and oppressions, wherewith he was bered, and in himself as in a type or figure he hath a respect vnto Christ, and vnto all his members, which he saw are obnoxious vnto the selfe same crosse: he maketh vehement prayers for his deliuey, he curieth and banneth these enemies of God: straight way he addeth ioyfull prayles of the godnes of God, which had heard his prayers, and therewithal ioyneth comfortable sentences. Whereout Paul aptely gathered this testimony. The wordes in Hebreu are thus. Iehi Schulchanam liphnehom lephach velischlomin lemocesch. Tech-schachnah enehem maroth vmothnehem tamid hamad. Which sentence the 70. haue so turned, that as touching wordes they somewhat differ from the He-breu verity, although in the sence they nothing at all disagree from it. Paul alludeth vnto the Seuenthy, from whome yet (as we shall after ward declare) he somewhat varieth. The greatest difference betwene the 70. and the Hebreu verity herein is, that they wheras in the Hebreu is red, peace making, or such things which serue to peace, haue ἀνταπόδοσις, that is, a recompensation. But the error hereof springeth, for that the wordes if they be red without prickles may seeme to be in a maner all one. For Schalam signifieth to be at peace, & Schalom signifieth peace: But Schelem signifieth to recompence, & Schelom signifieth a recompēce, & Schelolim in the plurall number signifieth recompenses. But the sence is: The things which of their owne nature should be pleasant, ioyfull, and prosperous, let them be made vnto these wicked men hurtfull & pernicious. Let their frendes also be vnto them an offence, and become vnto them vnfaithfull and traytors. Where-ouer let their eyes or minde be spoiled of sound iudgement, that they may not see the thynges whiche are to bee desired, and if they see and desyre them, let their strengthes so be weakened, that they may not be able to attaine vnto them.
But let vs diligently consider and weigh all the partes of this execration: And that which is first spoken of the table expresseth a goodly allegory: for by the table is signified vnto vs, whatsoeuer is pleasaunt, acceptable, and delighting, or wher-in we content our selues, as in a good thing which recreateth and refresheth vs: as we know the table to be: for vnto it we come, to be refreshed with meate and drink

drinke, and to be mery, yea and in feastes are knitte amities, and mutuall friendshippes, which are made moze firme. For Mensa, that is, a table, as Varro saith, is as it were Mesa that is to say, a meane: for it is an arbitrer and mediator betwene two or moze. But saith Dauid, vnto these wicked men let it chaunge his proprieties, let it be boide of his end, let it not be vnto them pleasaunt, nor ioyfull, nor swete, but pernicious, hurtfull and a snare: let them euen there be taken and be destroyed. Origen against Celsus maketh mencion of a certaine Poet, who wrote a kind of verses called Iambica, against Licambes, for that he had transgressed against the table and salt, and had bene vnfaithfull and cruell against him, with whom he had vsed ordinarily to be at table and to eate with: and he aptly applieth that vnto Iudas Iscariot, who betrayed the Lord with whome together he had eaten. And our sauioz instituted the holy table, wherewith the faithfull receaue the Eucharist, that there should not only be celebrated the memozy of his death, but also that in the holy banquet, should be welded out all maner of hatred and displeasure growen betwene Christians. Pithagoras in his banquets and meates would not suffer that bread should be deuided with a knife: by bread signifieng y<sup>e</sup> bond of humane society. And the Macedonians were wont to make leagues and couenants at their feastes and banquets. Plutarch also in his problems telleth, how that the table is an holy thing, and therefore the elders were careful, that in presence of the guests it should neuer be empty or voyde, for that, that is not seemely for thinges consecrated vnto God. Wherefore the Prophet prayeth, yea he prayeth against the wicked, that all prosperous and happy things should be turned vnto them into misery, which thing we reade in the histories came oftentimes to passe: for worldly men in those things very often came to destruction, wherein they both most delighted themselves, and placed all their felicity. When Pompey was ouercome in Pharsalia, Egypt and Ptolome were his table: for he hoped that there he might be recreated, and be at rest: howbeit there he miserably lost his head. Cesars table seemed to be aboue all others in the publike wealth of Rome, when as he was the chiefe of the Senate house, and as Dictator out of his regall seate gaue lawes and bare dominion: but whilest he settled himselfe in these things he was mirably slayne. The table of the Iewes was in the time of Christ, to keepe still their dignity, place, nation, and priesthod: and whilest they with a blind zeale too much gaue themselves to these things, they slew Christ, and therefore they were thowen down headlong into vtter destruction. Neither let vs looke for any other ende of the Pope & of his kingdome, whose table is, the name of the Church, counsels, fathers, customes longtime receaued, the pompe and shew of outward ceremonies, and such other like things: for the defence wherof, so much as he together with his fighteth against the truth, and that plainly set abroad, he shall fall into a snare and into destruction. This self thing did the Iewes in the time Jeremy, when they cried: The temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord: boasting that they were the sonnes of Abraham, and free men, and the children of promise: but yet they were with great miseries brought to destruction. And how euen the outward table hath brought vnto some destruction, the holy history setteth forth vnto vs in the eldest sonne of Dauid. For he was slaine of his brother Abshalon, for defiling his sister Thamar. And the like chaunce happened vnto Simon the high priest, as we rede in the first booke of the Machabes, who being bid den by his sonne in law to a feast, was by him slaine. Dauid by an antithesis aptly maketh a snare to be contrary vnto a table. For the table ought to be free, where we may safelye refreshe the minde: and if any snares bee there laide, a man can not well auoyde them. There is added an other curse, which according to the Hebrew verity is of quiet men, that is, of friends and such as are ioyned by any familiarity or acquaintance. There is no man but vnderstandeth that friendship is a necessary thing: which neither euen great princes, nor Emperors can want: for if they be destitute of friends by whom shall they gouerne their dominions & kingdomes? And howe meete and profitable conoord is in aduersities, we neede

The table of the Eucharist.

In vsage of the Macedonians.

Friendship is a necessary
thing.

Friendship
better then iustice.

An example of traitry.

Here is declared that free will is in the wicked over-
throwen.

It is proued that this psalme
pertaineth
vnto Christ

not many wordes to declare, for that it is to all men most manifeste. It is also as a thing most to be desired, and most pleasant grafted in vs by nature, or rather by God, and as Aristotle in his Ethikes sayth of it; it is more conuenient then iustice: for if we were all truly frendes betwene our selues, there should be no nede of iustice: for no man would hurte one an other: but if we were all iust, yet still should we nede friendship, for that it is a thing of hys owne nature and of it selfe good. Of so greate a commodity both Dauid in hys recreation desire that the wicked might be depriued, and prayeth, that those whome they thought to be theyr frendes mought be vnto them traytors: which how detestable and hurtfull a thing it is, the hystory of Samuell declareth: where it is written that Ioab slew Abner and Amasa two notable captaynes fraudulently, namely, pretending friendship vnto them, and kissing them. Our Lord also, who for our sakes would suffer all kinde of greues, suffered also this kind of mishappe: touching which thing we haue in the Psalme a wonderfull complaint, for vnder the person of Christ it is sayd, My quiet frend, which did eate meate together with me, hath lifted vp his bele agaynst me. Thus haue we now declared the Hebzeu verity. But bycause Paul and the Seuentye haue turned it retribution or recompence, let vs se how theyr phrase of speach agreeth with this sence. In my iudgement it signifieth, that Dauid prayed, that in the table, where they were wont to refresh theyr mindes, and to haue all thinges in safety and security, there should happen vnto them a recompence, and y there they mought be punished for all the wicked actes which they had before committed, that whereas the severity of God seemed before to winke at theyr sinnes, it might there take vengeance of them. Let theyr eyes be made dimme, that they see not, and theyr backe or loynes or raynes alwayes make crooked, or make it to consume or to waste away. As it is had in the Hebzeu. That which is now spoken of the eyes pertaineth vnto the mind, and the sence is, let them be spoyled of iudgement and vnderstanding, that they may not vnderstand what thinges are to be wished for, and what thinges are for them profitable. And by the loynes, backe or raynes, we must vnderstand the strengths, which he prayeth, might be taken away fro the, y they might not be able to obteyne any good thing, if peradventure they had choyce of it. Neither here let vs of this be ignorant, that in this place is shewed that in the wicked and in them that are forsaken of God free wil is taken away, whose roote and beginning, as we haue ells where taught is vnderstanding. For the will, soasmuch as it is blind, can not chuse that which reason offreth vnto it. And if they which are releded of God can not vnderstand thinges spiritual and in very dede good, for as much as they are men naturall, then also shall they not be able to chuse them. And though sometimes they be so illuminated with some slender light, that they can iudge somewhat of brightness, yet notwithstanding theyr strengths are so made crooked, and consumed, that they can not follow the better thinges which they allow, but cleane and sticke fast vnto the worse. Pauls argument agaynst the Iewes is in this maner. That ye are made blind and therefore receaue not Christ and his Gospell, ought not to seme vnto you a thing so incredible, when as both Esay foretold it, and holy Dauid also hath spoken of it: neither is it to be doubted, but that the thinges which are now cited touching the Iewes pertaine also vnto Christes time and also vnto ours: for in this psalme it is writte, The zeale of thy house hath eaten me vp. Which sentence Christ vled, when he censed the temple of biers and sellers: yea there was none which was more moued with this kinde of zeale then he was, and for that cause chiefly was he slaine of the Iewes. Whereouer in the selfe same psalme we rede. They gaue me to eate galle, and in my thirst they gaue me vinegar to drinke, which thinges we no where rede happened vnto Dauid. But that Christ had at his death, such meate to eate, & drinke to drinke, the Euangelists most manifestly testify. And in this place we may se an excellent amplification by steps or degrees. First is sayd, Let the good thinges, namely, which they now haue and possesse, at the table and frendes be turned vnto them into destruction. And such thinges which are to be wisbed and desired, let them not se them; and if hereafter they shal paraduenteure se them, yet let not them attayne vnto them. Neither is only this execration red in y<sup>e</sup> psalme of Dauid, but also other moze greauous then this, Poure vpon them thy wrath. Lay iniquity vpon iniquity, and let them not enter into thy righteousnesses. Let the be put out of the booke of the lining, and let them not be written with the iust. But Paul picked out that part only which serued best to his purpose, and chiefly as touching execration, for he would not irritate the Iewes moze then was neede, lest paraduenteure he should bitterly haue discouraged them all. But forasmuch as these horrible and bitter thinges are applied vnto the wicked, it followeth, that the godly and faythfull may by a contrary kind of reasoning gather thereout no small consolation vnto themselves. For euen as vnto them thinges pleasant and prosperous are turned into misery and calamities, so vnto the godly, the thinges which of theyr owne nature, are dolefull, hard, and miserable, are made healtful, pleasant and glorious: as persecution, hunger, banishment, ignominie, and euen death it selfe, for Christ hath sanctified vnto vs the crosse, and therefore hath pronounced them blessed which suffer persecution, and those also blessed which mourne and likewise those blessed which are afflicted with contumelies & reproches: for there is not one of those euilles which in the elect of God haue not a most happy end. The cruell dealing of the brethren of Ioseph aduanced hym in a maner to the kingdome of Egypt. By the calamities and afflictions where with Pharaos oppressed the Israelites, they obteyned liberty: and in the horrible and vnpleasant wildernes they had in a maner a paradise: when as by the conuite of Moses, yea rather of God they were brought vnto the land of Chanaan: the battailes which the Amalikites, Chananites, and Amozites made agaynst them were turned vnto them into victories and triumphes. The death of Christ although it was ignominious vnto hym, in respect that he was a man, brought vnto hym resurrection, an heauenly seate, and a kingdome lasting world without end. And by most cruel martirdomes both the Apostles and also many other of the faythfull are brought vnto eternall felicity, so that the Apostle sayd truly, vnto them that loue God all thinges worke to good. Now that we haue expounded the wordes of Paul we will se what is to be gathered out of the expositions of other men. Chrysostome by the table vnderstanderly as we doo the pleasures of the Iewes: and maketh these thinges so playne, that they neede no exposition at all: for experience it selfe teacheth with what calamities both of soule and body the Iewes are tormeted. He diligently noted also the aduerbe of time, which in Hebrew is Hamid, that is, alwayes, whereby he sayth is signified the perpetuity of this misery, so that the Iewes can not hope that it shall haue an end. It seemed vnto hym wonderfull, that it had now in his time dured aboue 300. yeares: but what would he now say whē as now it hath lasted fiftene hundred yeares? Theyr captiuitie in Babilon continued 70. yeares. Howbeit in it they were not bitterly destitute of the fauor of God: for they had with them Daniell and his fellowes, and Esdras also, Nehemias, Zorobabell, Iesus the priest of the sonne of Sadoch, Zachary, Aggeus, and befoze all these Ezechiell, and Jeremy, although Jeremy went downe with the runnagate Israelites, ino into Babilon, but into Egypt, howbeit for all that he wrote vnto them. And after the 70. yeares were expired they returned home agayne and possessed theyr owne auncient dominion vntil the time of the Macedonians. Pert after that they were for a while veyed by Antiochus: but the Assamonites did set them agayne at liberty. But now they are without end and measure oppressed although they be not enfeated with that outward and grosse idolatry, wherfoze of their dispersion & misery ca no other cause be geue, but y<sup>e</sup> Christ is now come whome they haue reled. And therfoze in stede of a flourishing kingdome they are compelled to be in bondage: in stede of a famous temple, they haue contemptuous Synagoges: in stede of offrings and sacrifices, they are wazzapped with absurd superstitions: in stede of honoz and dignity wherein they wers befoze, they are now odious and hatefull vnto all men.

R. y.

And

Why Paul rather took this part of the psalme then any other.

What consolation is here hence derived vnto the godly?

Things dolefull are to the godly turned into things ioyfull and pleasaunt.

The calamity of the Iewes perpetual.

The captiuitie of Babilon was much moze tollerable then this.

The Iewes were not infected with outward idolatry, when they were at the last afflicted of the Romanes

Two
kinds of excecation,

Blindnes
of the mind
goeth before
re incredulity
and is the cause
thereof.

Howe the table of the Scriptures
is vnto the Iewes turned into a snare.

And which is most greuous of all, they will not acknowledge the cause of these so greate evils. Ambrose entreating of this matter deuidenth this excecation into two kinds: one kind he maketh curable, vnto which sentence also agreeth the commentaries, which are ascribed vnto Ierome: for in them it is written, Make crooked their backe alwayes, untill they beleue, and be conuerted. And, that as touching manye there still remaineth remedy, Peter declareth in the Actes of the Apostles, when he sayth, And now I know that ye dyd it of ignorance, wherefore repent and be baptized euery one of you. Paul also sayth, that the branches of the Iewes are so cut of, that yet they may agayne be grafted into Christ. The other kind of excecation, he sayth, is past all remedy, and vpon them is this inflicted which haue reiected the truth once knowen, and do strue against it. And he addeth, that Paul at this present meaneth of either kind of excecation. But y Greke scholies referre the bolwing of the backe to the perpetuall bondage, wherewith the Iewes are oppressed of outward nations: which in my iudgement is not so apt, for that I see that Paul writeth onely of the euills and calamities of the mynde. For he neuer vpbayded vnto the Iewes any outward infelicite. But this is woorthye of noting, that some interpreters affirme, that the cause of this excecation was incredulity. But I, as I graunt, that by incredulity is encreased darkenes, so also affirme, that blindnes of the mind goeth before incredulity: for holwe commeth it to passe, that wicked men beleue not the wordes of GOD, but because they are blinded and see not, as they ought to see, the thinges which conduce vnto saluation? I will not speake, how Paul putteth blindnes as the cause of incredulity: for this was in controuerse, how the true Christ should be preached, when as so fewe beleued in hym. Which thing Paul affirmeth therfore came to passe, for that election obteyneth sayth, and the rest are made blind. Now at the last come we vnto Origen, who at the beginning writeth, that Paul hath left out, before them, which both the Hebrue herity, and also the 70. haue. But of his owne hath added this word, Snare: which word is neyther had in the translation of the 70. nor also in the veritie of the Hebrue. But this is of small waight: neyther doth it any whit alter the sense. He mozeouer sheweth, that the testimony of Dauid is very nighe and agreable vnto these thinges which Esay foretold. For euen as there were eyes geuen, that they should not see, & eares that they should not heare: so is it here sayd, Let their eyes be made dimme that they see not. Straight way for that he thinketh it absurd, that vnder the person of Dauid, or of Christ should be made any excecation or cursing, he deuiseeth a wonderfull strang sense. For as (sayth he) our eye can looke vpon the light, and see thinges profitable and which are expedient, and contrariwise can behold thinges noysome and hurtfull, so the sight of the mynd turneth it self sometymes to thinges heavenly and spirituall, and sometymes to thinges earthly and wicked. But now if a man should pray, that the vnderstanding of certayne men should not looke vpon, or beholde wicked and peruerse doctrines, this man should not pray against them, but for them. After that he addeth, I would to God Marcion, Valentinus, Basilides, and such like pestilences, had neuer sene the wicked and pernicious doctrines which they deuised. Wherefore (sayth he) these are not excecations, but rather medicines. But touching this woord table, he thus writeth (by this place to defend his allegories, for as farre as we can coniecture by this wordes, all men did not like wel of them) Let one of those (sayth he) come, which deride the, and let him without an allegory interpret the thinges which the Prophet now speaketh: Then goeth he on in his exposition, and affirmeth, that the table is the holy scripture: for wisdome hath set her table, and mingled wyne. This table he proueth is turned vnto the Iewes into a snare. For when the Iewes read that Christ should deliuer Israell, and should reigne with greate honour and might: they saw that Iesus of Nazareth liued here on the earth in a base and abiekt forme, and they sawe that they were still oppressed with the yoke of the Romaines: therefore the table was vnto them a snare: which thing doubtles had not comme to passe, if that they had vnderstoode, that the deliuey which should be accomplished by the Messias, should be from sinne, from the deuill, death, and hell: and that the kingdome of Christe, should be no worldly kingdome, but wherein he should by the woord and the spirite raigne in the harts of men, then I say, had they not suffred so great miserie. Christ longe since asked them, Whose sonne is the Messias? They sayd, Dauids sonne, as they had read in their table: Christ

Christ answered, But howe doth David call him his Lord? When he songe, The Lords sayd vnto my Lord. Now here the table is turned vnto them into a snare, neyther were they able to aunswere one woord. In Iohn also he sayd: Do not ye thinke that I came to accuse you, there is an other which accuseth you, namely Moses. Here agayne also they are shamed: for the law wherof they so much boasted is made both their accuser and condemner. Lastly, they were taught that Christ should abide eternally, and they sawe that our Lord died & was buryed: so that their table was vnto the an offence. As touching the holy scriptures, that they were turned vnto the Iewes into destruction I am not against him, but that he thereby obtrudeth vnto vs his allegories, I in no wise allow. For there are two kinds of allegories: for some are set for the vnto vs by the holie Scriptures: as that Christ is Jonas, who was in the hart of the earth thre dayes, as he was in the bealy of the whale. Againe that he is Salomon, or the serpent hanged vp in the desert, or the lambe. And that the two sonnes of Abraham are two testaments. These I say, forasmuch as they are found in the holy scriptures, may in no wise be reiected: but are firme places, wherby when nede requireth may be proued doctrines. There are other allegories, which men through their owne iudgement and reason find out, whō indeede we confesse, y they may follow their owne fantasie, so that they beware of two things: First, that they deuise nothing that is repugnant vnto sound doctrine: secondly y they obtrude not those their deuises as naturall & proper senses of the holy scripture. There is also a third kind of allegories, which is when the scripture vseth a trope or figure: neither hath any other sence but that allegoricall sence, as we now graunt is in the words of David. And then the allegory is the only sence of the words: as Cicero in his oration for Marcus Celi, called Clodia by the name of Medea Palatina. But what I beseech you hath this kinde of allegories common with Origens allegories? And whereas he interpreteth the imprecation of David, as though he should pray, that the Iewes should not see that things which are euill and hurtfull, it is most farre of from the purpose of Paul: for he entreated of incredulity, and said that the cause thereof is, for that the Hebryes were made blind, and then he cited the words of David. Now there is none which seeth not, that saith hath a respect vnto good & sound doctrine, and if he pray that they might not see such sound doctrine, then doubtles, he wished not vnto them good thinges but euill. And I wonder that Augustine should fall in a maner into the like interpretation, when he entreateth of a place in the 1. chapter to the Galathians in his 16. booke and 22. chapter against Faustus. The place is, I would to God they which trouble you were cut of. The sence whereof he saith is, utinam euirentur, y is, I would to God they were gelded for the kingdom of heauens sake. These mē without doubt were moued to those expositions, for that they thought it a thing not mete for David or the Prophetes or Christ, to pray for the euill thinges against any man: for that semeth straunge from the gentleness and lenity which we are in the scriptures commaunded to shew euē towards our enemies. But forasmuch as we are fallen into such matter, it shall not be amisse somewhat to speake of imprecations and cursings. This maner of execration and euill speaking is in the scriptures a thing tyme out of mynd vled. Nohe cursed his nephew Chanaan: Cursed be Chanaan, let hym be a seruaunt to his brethern. Baalake also the sonne of Zippor called Balam to curse Israel. In Deut: we rede: Cursed shalt thou be in the town. and in the field, in the barne, and in all other thinges, cursed be the fruite of thy body. These execrations were recited vpon mount Heball. The law of Isolasy hath also in the booke of numbers his imprecations, that the wombe should swell, and rent in sonder, and the thighes rotte: all which thinges could not hurt the woman if she were innocent, but vnto an adulteresse they were not without vertue and efficacy recited. Iosua cursed him which should reedifie Iericho, namely, that he should do it with the death of his chyldren, which thinge happened vnder Achab, as the hystorie of the kinges mencioneth. And Nehemias saith, that he not onelye reproveth them, which had married straunge wiues, but also cursed them. In the newe testamente

Two kinds of allego-ries.

Of imprecations and cursings.

Execrations much vled in the scriptures.

Exercitatio
in the 120
phases are foretelling

It is lawful to pray for punishments
to light vpon
some men, to the end they may be corrected.
A place of Apocalips.
Sinne may be destroyed
two maner
of wayes.
The soules
of the martyrs pray for the ende
of the world

Tertullian thought that we should pray for the prolonging
of the end of the world.
Why they prayed for the prolonging of the ende of the world.

also there wante not examples, whiche we will hereafter bring, yea and the Ethnikes also vsed cursinges. Atteius a Tribune of the people of Rome, as Plutarche declareth in the life of M. Crassus, whē he could by no other meanes dissuade Cras- sus from his expedition into Parthia, at the length in the way which Crassus should go forth at, he set on fire the city of Crates, and there with horrible and bitter curses he cursed the Generall Captaine and his host: and that these execrations were not vaine, the euent plainely and manifestly declareth. Oedipus also, as the Poets tell, with bannings cursed his Sonnes Adraestes and Polynices, namely, that they might be without citie, and house, that they might be beggers, and wanderers abroad, and haue such discorde betwene themselves, that the one shoulde kill the other, whiche thinges according to his wishe came to passe. And Horace saith: I will banne you, and let not my banning be put away or purged by any sacrifice. Neither is that to be passed ouer which Augustine mencioneth of Paulus and Palladia for they being cursed of their mother, miserably wandred about from country to country, vntill at the last they were deliuered at the tombe of Sainte Stephan. Wherefore seeing that alwayes both amongst the Jewes, and amongst the Gentils there hath bene so great plenty of cursinges and bannings, is it possible, that it should vtterly be vniust, and sinne to curse or to wish euill vnto any man, so that at no time it should be lawfull? Augustine without doubt was of this minde, y it is not lawful, and entreateth of this matter towardes the ende of his first booke de sermone Domini in monte: and writeth: that those imprecations which are red in the Prophetes pertayne onely to propheties, so that vnder that forme of prayer they onely foretolde the thinges which they saw should come to passe. And whereas they vse the optatine moode in steade of the indicatine moode, that he sayth amongst the Hebrues is not to be wondred at: when as they oftentimes vse such figures in theyr speache, for manye times they vse one tempe or an other, whē they put the time past for the time to come. Why haue the Gentils sinned, & the people imagined vayne thinges? Againe, They deuised my garments These thinges were to come, and were forespoken of Christ, when yet they are written as already paste. Howbeit he confesseth, that sometimes men praye for punishments and chastisements to come vnto some, that they may be corrected, whiche is not (saith he) to pray against them, but for them. And he citeth a place out of the Apocalipse in the 6. chapter where the Martyrs cry vnder the alter. Take vengeance vpon the earth for our blood which is shed: and he thinketh, that thereby is mente, that these martyrs pray against the kingdome of sinne. And sinne may be destroyed two maner of wayes: First, by bringing in a contrary qualitee, so that sinne beinge excluded, do succede mortification of lustes, and do followe righteousness, honesty, and all kindes of vertues. Againe sinne is subdued vnto GOD, when vpon it is inflicted punishment: for so longe as it is unpunished, it hath nothing in it that is good, but so soone as punishment is inflicted vpon it, soasmuch as that punishment is a parte of iustice, sinne is thereby at the least somewhat restrained and brydeled from ranging any farther abroad, whiche thing also is profitable vnto wretched sinners: Wherefore if we will iudge by righte, the martyrs in so prayinge, prayed rather for them, then againste them. Neither also were it absurde if they shoulde pray for the end of the world, wherein they had suffred such great euils, that impiety may once at the length haue an ende. Althoughe I thinke not that all the elders are of this mind, that we should pray for the end of the world: when as rather contrariwise Tertullian in his apology saith, that Christians in theyr congregations praye for the prolonging of the end of the world. And in the same place he writeth, that our men by the prescript of the holy scriptures prayed not only for Emperors, but also for the long preseruatiō of the the world. For after this monarchy of the Romanes, as Paul writeth vnto the Thessalonians shall come Antichrist, and the end. Wherefore some of the saintes prayed that the time might be prolonged, partly that the tribulatiō which should come through Antichrist might be differred, and partly that the Children of election might be gathered together. The Greeke Scholies write that those holy martyrs prayed against the deuill, that his power might at the length be brydeled,

led, or brought to an ende. And thus much touching Augustines opiniō, who was also of the same minde against Faustus, where he sayth, These things which we read in the Prophets seeme to be wordes of execration of such as foretell or forespeake, and not the desires of such as pray. But as touching this thinge I thinke this to be true: that when there is an enemy whiche both wilbeth euell vnto vs, and also to the vttermost of his power worketh euell against vs, we firste of all make a distinction of the cause, wherfore he hateth vs. For either it is our proper cause, humane, and ciuill, or els it is because he hateth God and his truth. Secondly that we make a distinction of the men: for some are led by an accustomed affection of theyr owne, and other some are moued of God, who reuealeth vnto them both what he wil do, & in what state the wicked are, & stirreth the vp to speake the things which they speak: nether is this in the meane time to be passed ouer, y the euils which we praye for are ether tēporal or eternal. These distinctions considered, this we say, y if it be our owne cause only, therein we ought to be patient, long suffering, & mild. Blesse & curse not, the scripture commaundeth vs. We ought also to praye for them that persecute vs. God hath created vs men, let vs not spit out the venome of serpentes: and forasmuch as we are mē, let vs not suffer our selues to be changed into wild beasts. They which hurt vs are madde, and are moued with furies, and therfore are worthy rather of compassion then vengeance, or imprecations. The mouth is geuen vnto vs to helpe and remedy things, and not that we shoulde with it curse & ban. Otherwise God will say, vnto such execrations, I haue commaunded thee to praye for thine enemies, why dost thou now then irritate me against them? Wilt thou haue me to be a helper to thee to transgresse my lawes, and to be thine hangman? A certaine woman priest of Athens coulde not be perswaded to curse Alcibiades, for she said that she was placed in the priesthooe to praye for men, and not to curse them. And amongst the Romanes it was not lawfull for the high priest of Iupiter to sweare, for that oftentimes the ende and conclusion of an othe is execration: for they say, let this or that fall vpon me, vnles I perforce this or that. And seeing it was not lawfull for the priest to curse himselfe, muche les was it lawfull for him to curse others. Wherfore if the cause be our owne, we ought not to vse execrations, but rather prayers, compassion, and blessing: but whē Gods cause is in hand, and that this our anger cometh by reason of sinnes and wicked actes, there is no thing to let but that the godly may sometimes vse imprecations in such manner as we shall expresse. And it oftentimes happeneth, that our cause is ioyned wyth the glory of God and is so ioyned, that it cannot be disshened therefro but onely by diligent and attentiu consideration. As if a minister of the church see himselfe contemned, and derided, although oftentimes he contemne his owne dignity yet notwithstanding neither can he nor ought he quietly to suffer y worde of God (which he ministrerh) to be contemned. For which cause the prophets semed many times to be very wroth, for that theyr messages and prophesies were derided. Wherfore I graunte that in this case both imprecations and cursinges maye iustly be bled. Howbeit this I thinke good to admonish you of, that here we go warely to worke: for our flesh is wonte oftentimes vnder the pretence of Gods glozve and honoz, to fight and to braule for our owne honoz and estimation. Whereouer this is not to be neglected, that we very diligentlve seiourne sinnes from nature, and that in any wise we with well vnto nature it selfe, that is vnto men, but let vs curse and hate sinnes. And forasmuch as it oftentimes happeneth, that men, after that they haue bene by some afflictions and punishmentes corrected, do repente, therfore if vnto wicked men beinge straungers from God, and transgressors of hys lawes, we sometimes wishe some discommodities and aduersities of the fleshe, to the ende they maye fee the wroth of God, I see nothyng but that we maye so doe. This thing without doubte we maye sometime wishe vnto our selues, and that iustly, that God should rather afflict and scourge vs, then to suffer vs to fall into sinnes or if we sinne, that he would at the least by these meanes call vs home againe. And if we may with these and such like things vnto our selues, why should we

We must make a distinction of the cause why our enemies hate vs. Distinction of persons which vse imprecations Distinction of the euils which we pray for. In our own cause we ought to be patient.

An example of a priest of Athens.

In our own cause we must vse prayers, & not execrations.

In Gods cause it is lawfull sometimes to vse imprecations.

Our cause is sometimes merely ioyned & gods cause.

In imprecations we must beware of the incitation of the flesh.

We must seiourne sinne from the nature of him that sinneth

How it is lawfull to wishe temporal afflictions vnto sinners.

A mā may sometimes wishe temporal euill things vnto himselfe,

In this matter we must go discretely
ly & warily
to worke.

Why it is lawfull for prophets to curse.

What consolation is gathered out of the curlings of the Pro-
phetes.

They
which will imitate the Prophetes
must take hede that they haue
their spirit.
The sword of vengeance
and execration compared
together.

not wish them vnto others, seing that we are commaunded to loue our neighbours as our selues: So Helias shut vp heauen. So God brought home againe some of his elect which went astray: for there are some kind of men so blockish, y they can not be brought home againe but by this meanes. Wherefore the Psalme saith: Fill their faces with ignominy and they will seeke after thy name. And therefore we may wish the crosse and affliction both vnto our selues and also vnto others for amendment and correction sake. In which cause yet nothing ought to be done rashly, for oftentimes it happeneth, that some by afflictions are not amended, but rather made worse. Wherefore the better way were to pray vnto God to correct them, and not to wish vnto them aduersities, except it be with this condition to conuert them, or that the glory of God should thereof ensew. And so as saith Aug- ustine we should not pray against them, but for them. But this is to be knowen that amongst men there are some, which are the ambassadoys of God, which are not as priuate men, but execute an extraordinary ministry. And they by the spi-rite of prophesying doubt not of the will of God: for in their prayers they talke together with God: and in that talke they see and vnderstand many thinges as touching the mind, and are wonderfully affected. Wherefore seing that God sheweth vnto them, that sinners shall be brought to amendment by some kinde of punishmentes, and that he hath appointed to punish them, or that some are now past all hope of saluation, and shall without all doubt be punished with e-ternall misery, seing I say, that God sheweth vnto such holy men such thinges, and they in no wise doubt, but that such thinges are decreed of the most mighty God, which forasmuch as he appointeth them, must of necessity be good, how can they not but allow them: how can they not but wishe them? when as they continually pray, thy will be done. Wherefore when they see those thinges, they pray, they make imprecations, they poure out such execrations and curlings, as we reade in the Prophetes, and in the holy histories. Whereout the godly take consolation, which thereby vnderstand, in what sort wicked men shall at the length be handled, and the weaker sort and they which go astray which pertaine vnto the flocke of God, are by these thinges corrected, and take hede vnto themselves, that they deserue not the like. Wherefore Gregory vpon those words of Iob, wherein he cursed the day of his birth, warily wrote, that the execrations of the Saintes procede not of rancor, that is, of the affect of the flesh and hate of the world, but of good consideration, namely, whereby they see that these thinges are allowed through the will of God. But saith he, they pray not for those thinges of a desire and an affect:
vnto which his last saying I can not assent: for as I haue now sayd, the saints can not but allow, and earnestly wishe those thinges which they see God willet, so that they be assured that God hath thus firmly decreed. In this maner Paul made blinde Elimas y sorcerer: Peter slew Ananias and Saphira: so also the same Peter said vnto Simon the sorcerer, thy mony and thou be destroyed together. Paul de-liuered vnto Satan him that had committed incest, and said also, I would to God they were cut of which trouble you. And in the same sort also Helias commaunded fire to come downe from heauen, which deuoured the captains ouer fifty, with their fifty souldiers. Helisens also cursed the children which derided him, & they were rent in sonder of beares. What difference is there, whether God doo a thing by himselfe, or by others, whome he hath appointed out to be his ministers? Wherefore that which he doth by himselfe, he can in like sorte do by the Saintes and Prophetes. Farthermore if any man be moued to curse others, and do pretend the imitation of the Prophetes and of the Apostles, let them first well consider, whether he haue their spirit or no. For enē as no man ought to vse the sword, but only the magistrate, so let none vse these execrations but they which are most fully assured of the will of God, and which are moued by the spirit to inflict them. This place is of nigh affinity, yea rather all one with that place which is of vengeance. Priuate vengeance is forbidden, but so is not publique vengeance, and that which is done by Princes: so they which are
of

of the common sort, let them abstaine from execrations, especially let them not wishe any crosse vnto any man as touching eternall condemnation, vnles it be of condition that it may do good, and let them assuredly knowe that they are bound to obey this common rule, blesse and curse not: agayne. pray for them which persecute you. And they which by the impulsion of God vse any execrations or imprecations, let them alwayes haue befoze their eyes the amendment of sinne: or at the least way the diminishing of the maliciousnes thereof by paynes and punishments, that the righteous may not be hindred from the woorthipping of God, and also may not extend their handes vnto iniquities: and finally let them seeke onely that the will of God may haue place, and let them not be desirous of their owne commodities. Neither ought it to seme vnto any man wonderfull, that that common rule wherein is prescribed vs, to blesse and not to curse, and to wishe well vnto them that persecute vs, admitteth any exceptions, for, that thing happeneth also in other commaundementes. Are we not in an other place commaunded to pray for all men? And vnto Timothe a reason is added, for that God will haue all men to be saued. And yet Iohn saith, that some sin vnto the death, and for them he saith, we ought not to pray: which yet we ought to vnderstand, when we are fully assured that they haue sinned vnto the death. Wherefoze as touching that trope or figure of Augustin, wherein he saith that these imprecations of the Saints, were predictions or foretellings, as we vterly reiect it not, so also do we say that it is not of necessity. Neither do we graunt that in the execrations of the Prophetes and of the Apostles were not earnest requests and desires: for how could they not desire that which they saw God had willed and decreed: vnles peraduenture by request or desire he ment the sence of the flesh or of reason, as it is led by humane counsels. Last of all this is to be noted, that it is not absurd, that in one and the selfe same will of godly men are contrary motions, when as they happen not in respect of one and the selfe same thing, but in respect of diuers. For in that they loke vpon the will and decre of God, and the destruction of sinne, and such like, they can not but reioyce in the punishments of the wicked. But in that they loke vpon them as men, being ioyned vnto them by nature, of one and the same flesh and lombe, they are exceedingly soze for their destruction, as Samuell mourned for Saul, for that he was reiecte of God, as it is written in the 15. chapter of the first booke of kings. And this shall suffice touching this matter. Wherefoze I will now retorne vnto the words of Paul. For that it was to be feared, least the Gentiles, hearing these so horrible things of the reiecti- on and blindness of the Iewes, should be puffed by with arrogancy and contemne the Iewes as people vtterly reiecte of God: and also it was to be feared least the nation of I Iewes should vtterly be in dispaire of their saluatiō, and should thinke that a way vnto Christ is vtterly cut of from them, when as the Gentiles were now called to supply their roome. It is not so (saith Paul.) And he bringeth an argument taken of the finall cause: Wherefoze are the Gentiles called, that the Iewes should be prouoked to emulation. Wherefoze their saluation is not past all hope. And we must cal to memozy that which was said at the beginning of this cha- piter: namely, Paul, here entred to proue two things: first the fall of I Iewes was not vniuersal: which he hereby proueth, for the electiō obtaineth saluatiō in ma- ny of the nation of the Iewes, as Paul befoze plainly declared in himself although o- thers are left in their blindness. The second thing which is to be proued, is now set forth, namely, that the fall of the Iewes is not vnprofitable, when as of it follo- wed the saluation of the Gentiles. This is it which he at this present saith:

I say then, Haue they therefore stumbled that they should fall: God forbid. But thorough they fall saluation hath come vnto the Gentiles to this end to prouoke them to emulation. Wherefoze if the fall of them be the riches of the world, & the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, howe muche more shal they fullnes be?

We must not alwaies pray for our enemies.

We must not pray for them that sinne vnto the death.

Contrary motions may be in the will of man.

An exam- ple of Samuel.

An argu- ment taken of the finall cause.

Cap. II.

A Commentarie vpon the

I say then, haue they therefore stombled that they should fall? God forbid. But thorough theyr fall, saluation hath come vnto the Gentiles. ] The meaning is: God hath not therefore made blind and forsaken the Jewes, that they should fall, as though the purpose of God should stay there, nor like any farther commodity: it sought doubtles farther commodity, and that was the conversion of the Gentiles: whose end also is the saluation of the Jewes: wherefore that nation ought not bitterly to despayre of repentaunce, neither shall they fall be perpetuall. Augustine in his Enchiridion sayth that God is so good, that he suffreth nothing that is euill to happen, but that thereof come some good things. And the same Augustine interpreting this place sayth, that the Apostle denieth not: but that the Jewes fell, but he sayth, that theyr fall was not in vayne, nor utterly without fruite. But this is not to be passed ouer with silence that the thinges which the Apostle speaketh are not to be vnderstanded of all the Jewes particularly, for some of them were in state to be holpen, and were conuerted vnto Christ: but others thorough theyr incurable obstinacy and blindness perished. Wherefore these thinges are to be referred vnto the nation of the Jewes generally, which so fell away from the grace, fauor, and giftes of God, that yet notwithstanding there still remaineth in it precious seede, & still hath remnantes which shalbe saved, and the roote is not utterly so dead, but that God in due time commeth and when it shal seme vnto him good, can make it to spring forth agayne. For the promises of God, although they are not bound vnto the stocke of the Jewes, yet are they alwayes fulfilled in them as touching the elect. Neither is it of necessity, that whē a Jew is borne, his plague should therefore for that he is a Jew, be incurable, or utterly past all hope. And as touching the wordes Paul sayth intraion and manu significeth nothing els but to stamble and to fall. The Latine interpreter hath added this word, So: But in the Greke is not red that particle. And it sheweth itself well, when as Paul entreateth not here of the greauousnes of the fall of the Jewes, but rather lenieth it by the end, namely, for that it was not vnprofitable. For if it followed the saluation of the Gentiles: and therefore it is to be thought that it shall dure but for a time. For the Jewes gaue place for a time, to make roome for the Gentiles to enter in. And this is referred vnto God, who suffered the Jewes therefore to be reiecte, that the Gentiles which were vnbelievers might be called. But this is to be knowen, that the fall of the Jewes, if we will speake properly, was not the cause of the saluation of the Gentiles, but rather an occasion. For this is a constant and most firme rule, that the effect can not in dignity excel & cause, if we consider it as the full and true cause. Wherefore it is of necessity, that good thinges, in as much as they are good, doe spring from ells where, then of the euill thinges. And if after sinnes follow some spirituall commodities, that is in no wise to be ascribed vnto them, but vnto the goodnes and prouidence of God, which hath a perpetuall care for the gouernment of the world and rule of the Church. And euen as of false propositions sometimes followeth a true proposition by the force and order of the sillogisme, but yet not by the efficacy of the false and lieng proposition: so by this order which God bleseth in the administration of thinges, out of euill thinges commeth some good. And as in naturall transmutacions we perpetually see, that the generation of one thing is the corruption of an other: for this commeth not, for that corruption of his owne nature helpeth forward generation: but bycause that efficiēt cause, which expelleth out of the subiect the first forme, bringeth in a new. And that the elect succede those which haue fallen, we rede in the Apocalipse. Hold faste that which thou hast, least an other man receaue thy crowne. This is therefore spoken that we should not glory in sinne, for that the nature of it is not to helpe vs forward to good thinges, neyther lieth it in our power, to make the euente thereof happy, for whēsoener that happeneth, it commeth thorough Gods helpe, and not thorough the desert of them that sinne. For God oftentimes bleseth the wickednes of the vngodly, to bring thinges to passe farre other wise then they thought

Many ends are pointed out vnder an other.

The thinges which are here spoken are not to be vnderstanded of all men particularly.

As touching saluation it is no hindraunce to a Jewe that he is borne a Jewe.

The Jewes by their fall made roome for the Gentiles to enter in.

The fall of the Jewes was an occasion and not a cause that the Gentiles were called.

A simililitude.

In other similitude.

God bleseth the wickednes of the vngodly.

for: as we manifestly se came to passe in vs. For that the Jewes releded the Gospell, and would not admitter it, and by that meanes contemned the preaching of the Apostles, the Apostles turned to the Gentiles. God could vnderstandably together with the saluation of the Jewes haue called the Gentiles also vnto Christ, but he would not: yea rather he would follow this order in bringing the gentils to saluation. Wherefore in this connerion of the blindness and refection of the Jewes, with the saluation of the Gentiles, there is not any absolute necessity, but only by supposition, namely, that God by his eternal counsell had so appointed: and this thing is not only now at this present declared, but also els where in many places. In the Actes Paul and Barnabas sayd vnto the Jewes, Vnto you ought the kingdome of God first to be preached, but because ye reiect it, behold we now we turne vnto the Gentiles. Christ himselfe also in the Gospell vnder the parable of the vineyard taught the same, when he testified, that the vineyard should be transferred and let out vnto other husbandmen, which should render fruite: and that doubtles in such sort y the wicked should wickedly perish. Christ also sayd vnto y womā of Sidon, I am not sent but vnto the lost shepe of the house of Israel, neyther is it mete to take the childrens bread and to geue vnto dogges: In an other parable also of the wedding, for that they which were bidden, refused to come, they which seemed betterly vnworthy lieng in the streates and by the high way sides were compelled to enter in, and they which despised they calling, were worthely punished. Paul moreover as we shall after ward se, sayth, that Christ was the minister of circumcision. And euery where, where is entreated of the rendering of the saluation and felicity which we looke for, he sayth, Vnto the Iew first and vnto the Grecian. After this maner the fall of the Jewes is called the saluation of the Gentiles, the riches of the worlde, and reconciliation with God: and the Jewes are sayd therefore to be cut of, that the Gentiles might be grafted in they place. But to what end the calling of the Gentiles tendeth, Paul declareth when he sayth:

To this end, to prouoke the emulation. How y Hebryes were by the calling of y Gentiles incensed with zeale and emulation, it is not hard to know. For they saw that the spirite, grace, knowledge of the scriptures, miracles, and in a manner all spirituall giftes, wherewith they before flourished and were adozned, were now transferred vnto the Gentiles: which giftes although of themselves they are greate and excellent, and mought as touching they nature be common vnto all men, yet notwithstanding they seemed most of all proper vnto the Jewes. Wherefore they could not but be exceedingly soze, y they which were the childe of the kingdome, the peculiar people and inheritaunce of God had fallen away from so greate giftes, and y the Ethnykes should be put in they place to possesse these thinges, which before were idolaters, vncleane, ignorant of thinges diuine, fooles, and contaminated with all kind of vices: and that the same should be brought to passe not by the iudgement of men, which is oftentimes peruerse & weake, but by the iudgement of the immortal God, who as he straieth not fro iustice, so also most constantly appoynteth he his decrees. God would in thys maner haue the Jewes grieved for that the Gentiles were receaued, and would also that our saluation should nippe them at the hart, for y these things were of no small force to impel vnto Christ, the elect of that nation. He before made mention of thys stritation, when he cited the testimonye of Moses. And as touching the word, παράκλησις signifveth nothing els but to prouoke and stirre vp to emulation. Wherefore the Latine interpreter turned it ill, saying, ut illos emulatur: that is, that they, namely, the Jewes should emulate or prouoke the. For vnto God is all whole referred, and the sence is that whiche we before saide, namely, to prouoke them to emulation: which hath effect in those which pertain vnto election. For the reprobate which are of that natiō, are hereby rather disturbed, prouoked to enuy, and in great desperation pearish: and are in a manner broughte to that point, that they neither also beleue Moses. But whereas Paul saith, that this emulation in some turneth to god, that is both now partly true, & towarde

Betweene
the fall of the Jewes and
saluation of the Gentiles
is not a necessary connexion.

Betweene
the Jewes
and the Gentiles is only a respect of order.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

What is a let to the ad-
uancement
of the kingdom of god.

the end of the world shalbe fully performed. Yea this should now also haue better successe, if as we haue the veritye of doctrine, so also we had byrightnes of life. By this meanes without doubt, when the euidence of the doctrine, and efficacye of the wordes of God shoulde be set forth vnto infidels, as well Turkes, as Iewes, and Papistes, the kingdome of Christ should much be aduanced: but our doings seme such, that we rather turne away the hartes of the vnbeleuers from God. Chrysostome could not but wonder at the excellent prudence of the Apostle, which minding to entreate of the blindenes and reiection of the Iewes vsed the oracles of the Prophets, to the ende the lesse to irritate their minds against him in so teaching. But on the other side when he comforteth them, and extollet their conuersio to come, he speaketh in his owne person, to the ende they might vnderstande that he loued them, and hated them not. Although in dede the Iewes fell grauoulye, yet doth not Paul here entreate of the grauoulnes of the fall, and destruction of the Iewes, to deny that they fell grauoulye: but by the euent he comforteth them, and sayth that that nation shall after the saluation of the Ethnikes be rayled by and erected. The oracles now alleadged seemed at the firste to make the fall of the Iewes irrecoverable, but Paul here by his wisdom helpe the matter, and geueth a milde exposition. For God is good and suffreth not his promises to be vniuersallye boide. But as touching the wordes this is to be noted, that Paul putteth no small difference betwene πίπτειν and παραπίπτειν. For in the firste place by πίπτειν, Paul vnderstandeth to fall irrecoverably: but παραπίπτειν signifieth to fall thowow negligenge: which happeneth vnto them that liue carelesly and losely. Neither is this a meane honor which the holy Ghost by Paul ascribeth vnto the natio of the Iewes, when vnto they fall he adioyneth the calling of the Gentils, and vnto they laste conuersion the resurrection from the dead. Origen vpon this place noteth, that the fall of the nation of the Iewes was not as the fall of the Deuill, for that their fall is recoverable. But Satan cannot be conuerted, no not at the ende of the worlde.

Origen's interpretatio vpon this epistle suspected.

How we may vse the sinnes of other men.

Which sentece is both worthy of admiration, and is also most manifestly repug- nante vnto his opinion whiche he hath both in his booke Peri archon, and also in many other places. Wherefore this his interpretation vpon this Epistle to the Ro- manes is not without iust consideration suspected of the learned, as though it wer none of his: vnles we wil say that at diuers times he was diuersly minded: or that his booke were as some thinke corrupted by heretikes, which thing in my iudge- mente is not so credible: for that it is scarce possible to corrupte all the examplers. But this mighte be, that he whiche turned this exposition into Latine salued it somewhat in some places. But touching this matter, howsoeuer it be, it shall suffice to be admonished thereof. In the meane time let vs consider that God in his iudgements is alwayes one, & therfore y<sup>e</sup> which we haue now hearde, let vs neuer suffer to slippe out of memozy. Namely that falles and sinnes by the prouidence of God alwayes bring with them some profite and somewhat tending to the glozye of God: but although not alwayes to them which haue sinned, yet oftentimes to o- thers. Wherefore it is our part, that when we see y<sup>e</sup> fal of our neighbor, we straight way consider, how we may vse that fall either to our edification, or to admonishe, correct or to comfort him which hath sinned, or at the least way to instruct & helpe others. And if peradventure none of these thinges take place, yet let vs not there- fore put of all hope, but cleauing faste to this doctrine, let vs praye vnto God, that he woulde vouchsafe to geue vnto sinnes and wicked actes that are committed some desired fruite.

Good is of more might then euil.

If the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of the, the riches of the Gentils, how much more shall theyr fulnes be? Vereto Paul tendeth, to teach that the conuersion of the Iewes shalbe profitable, euen as theyr blinding was, & he vseth an argumente taken a minori, that is of the lesse. For if their fal and diminishing gaue place vnto the Gentils, that they also might obtaine saluation, muche more shall theyr conuersion be profitable vnto the Gen- tils: for that which is good is of his owne nature of greater might to produce forth god good thinges, then is that which is euill. And Paul by an excellent Antithesis vnto fulnes setteth as contrary falling, and diminishing. And when he sayth that they: fal and diminishing was the riches of the world, he meaneth, that by that meanes great plenty and a great multitude of the Gentils came vnto the Gospell and vnto the church. These thinges serue not onely to comforte the Iewes, but also to confirme the Gentils: for they mought haue suspected that the conuersion of Iewes should be vnto them noysome, by an argument taken of contraries after this sort. If the erecacion of them was a way and occasion of they: saluation, then contrariwise their conuersion shalbe an occasion of they: reiection. But saith Paul it is not so: for that this came to passe againste the order of nature, that the fall of the Iewes should cause the calling of the Gentils. But that the repentaunce and saluation of the Iewes shoulde aduaunce the sayth and pietye of the Gentils, is farre moze agreeable: and if we shoulde weigh the matter well, humane reason can not so well perceauce how the fall of the Iewes could cause the calling of the Gentils: and therfore we befoze sayd, that this is wholly to be ascribed vnto the ordinaunce of God. The fulnes of the Iewes shall then be, when that nation shall publikely confesse Christ: for now only a few remnantes are adioyned vnto the church. But at ytime the number shal be great, and they shal haue an ample church gathered of they: own nation. Paul in this place taketh for wante or diminishing of this verbe ἡτλημα, which signifieth to be vanquished and to be ouercome. Wherefore ἡτλημα is a conflict and hath a passive signification, namely when a man in fighting and struing is ouercome. Whe the Iewes withstood Christ and his doctrine and sought to dyne him away cleane, they were ouercome, and were spoyled of all the good giftes wherewith they were befoze adorned. This selfe same woord Paul vbled to the Corinthians, in his first epistle against them which in matters of contention drew they: betherne to the iudgement seates of infidels: and there when they were ouercome with lust or desire, and not able to brydle their affectes they suffered ἡτλημα, that is, they were vanquished. Origen in this maner expoundeth the fulnes of the Iewes, that in this time the church shalbe enlarged amongst many natiōs, which church although by getting vnto it new members it be alwaies encreased, yet then shall it haue his fulnes, that is, his vttermoste power and perfection, when the people of the Iewes shall cleaue vnto Christ. And yet let no man thinke, that all shall at the length so come vnto the Gospell, that in that people amongst the sheepe shall not be mingled many goates, and with the wheate, tares, and with the wise virgins, foolish virgins. But the sence is, that euen as nowe all of them are in a manner turned away from Christe, so at that time the greatest parte of them shalbe turned vnto Christe. Chrysostome vpon this place hath in my iudgement a very bold interpretation. For he sayth that Paul in wordes only fauoreth the Iewes, after a sorte to comforte them, and ascribeth vnto them those commendations, which in very dede are not commendations: for that howsoeuer it were that the Iewes were made blinde, the Gentils should neuer haue had saluation vnles they had beleued. Here doubtles I durst not geue such an interpretation, and although I confesse that by the vsuall and naturall order sinnes can in no wise bee the causes of any thing that is good, especially if we consider them that sinne: yet woulde I in no wise take vpon me to say, that Paul dealeth onely in wordes, & in steade of commendations, setteth forth vnto vs those which in very dede were no comendations: for we ought to defend the holy Scriptures from all manner of lying. Therefore I thus thinke with my selfe that God doth not of necessity neede seconde causes, but rather that naturall causes therefoze bryng forth some effect, for that it hath pleased God to vse them as instruments in the setting forth of new thinges. Wherefoze euen as he vseth the Sunne to make warme and to geue light, for this thing hath he by his woord commaunded that it shoulde do so: can he if he will vse any other thing to these woorkes? Wherefoze as I haue befoze sayd, according to the order of nature, sinnes can not be the causes of vocation, and of saluation: but onely occasions; howbeit if God will vse them as instruments whereby to worke, I se not what can let him. For he calleth those things

We comforte not onely the Iewes but also the Gentiles.

What shall be the fulnes of the Iewes.

We must not charge the Scriptures with any kind of lying.

God hath no neede of seconde causes, but vseth such causes as pleaseth hym.

God can vse sinnes for instruments of saluation.

III.

which

Cap.ii. A Commentarie vpon the

which are not, as if they were: he healeth by the sight of the brazen Serpent, he by spittle and dust restoreth sight vnto the blynde man: wherefore he can also vse sinnes as instruments and meanes whereby to bring some to saluation. Yet not withstanding we ascribe the whole efficacy thereof vnto God, and doubt not but that Paule spake in good earnest. But there yet remaineth an other doubt. What sayth Paule, shalbe theyr fulnes, if theyr fall & diminishing be the riches of the world? Of which wordes it seemeth that we might gather, that by the conuersion of the Iewes many other nations shall be brought vnto Christ, which is not possible, when as afterwarde it is sayd, that the Iewes shall then bee saued and enter in, when the fulnes of the Gentles hath entred in. And if the calling of the Gentles shalbe complete, what other Gentles shall there be remainyng to be by the conuersion of the Iewes brought vnto Christ? But this wee maye aunswere, that Paule in this place sayth not, that by the conuersion of the Iewes in the last time shalbe drawen other nations vnto Christ: but onely sayth, How much shall theyr fulnes be? For it is possible that the Gentles already conuerted may wonderfully bee holpen by the Iewes which beleue in Christ: for peraduenture by lyght of doctrine, feruentnes of the spirit, and holynes of lyfe, they shall so illustrate the Church, that by them the Gentles also shall be stirred, and confirmed, and shall thinke themselves to bee in a manner nothing in comparison of them, or to haue done nothing in respecte of them. Wherefore by them as it appeareth shall be brought much perfection vnto the Church.

The church
shal receiue profite by the conuer-
sion of the Gentiles.

For I speake to you Gentles, in as much as I am the Apostle of the Gentles, I glorify my ministry. To trye if I might by any meanes prouoke them of my flesh to followe them, and might saue some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receauing be, but life from the Dead? For if the first frutes be holy, then is the lompe holy: and if the roote be holy, the braunches also shalbe holy.

For I speake to you Gentles, in as much as I am the Apostle of the Gentles, I glorifie my ministry. When he had now reasoned a minori, that is, of the lesse, he by an example of himselfe confirmeth his sentence which he put forth, namely, that of the conuersion of the Gentles should followe the saluation of the Iewes through emulation. For he had sayd that God called the Gentles to prouoke the Iewes to followe them: he now addeth: that which God doth, I also seeke in my ministry: for I glorifie it by this, to bring many of the Gentiles to Christ, to see if I coulde by any meanes prouoke them of my flesh to followe them, and to bring some of them to saluation. By this place we see, wherein consisteth the honour of the ministry, namely, to bring and to conuert manye vnto Christ, and this is done by doctrine and preaching, both publique and priuate. The ministry is not adozned with riches, nor with silke and precious garments eyther to be vled commonly, or to be vled about any holy seruices. These ornaments are Sophisticall, that is, per accidens, or by chaunce. For euery thing ought to be adozned with those thinges which pertayne to the nature & substance therof. Wherefore seing that the holy ministry consisteth chiefly in doctrine and preaching, thereout ought it to haue his dignity. But as there haue bene many which only by beard, cloke, and staffe haue made a shew of Philosophers, and as Seneca sayth, sought rather to haue the visor then the face of a Philosopher: so in our dayes, there are many, which will vse only the name, title, and garments of ministers, but will not performe the work therof. Paul sayd, that this thing is chiefly requir'd of stewards and ministers, that they be sound saythfull. And in the 2. to the Corint: the 6. chapter. Let us in all thinges approue our selues as the ministres of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in prisons, as deceauers when yet we are true. All which thinges he as a notable example to ministers excellently performed, for he continually suffred greate troubles, besides the dayly care which he had ouer all Churches: none was tempted or bur-

The honor of the ministry wher-
in it consi-
steth.

What is chiefly required at ministers
handes.

ned

ned, but he together with him suffered and was burnt. Where neede was, he preached freely, he sought not his owne things, but was made all to all, to the end to winne all men, he sayd: Woe be unto me if I preache not the Gospel. He which to his power doth not with these vertues glorifye the ministry of the Gospel, dishonoureth it. Pea, and Origen upon this place sayth, That Deacons or Ministers by the testimony of the Apostle, if they Minister well, gette unto themselves a good degree. Wherefore it is manifest, that they which execute not their office well, but yll, gett unto themselves a degree of reprobation, yea, rather assured damnation. And the same writer in this place, exhorteth Priests, and also Bishops, to glorifye their ministry. And doubtles all men as many as haue the charge of soules committed vnto them ought to thinke that this is spoken vnto them: for, for that at this tyme there are not Apostles, they haue succeeded in their place. But euen as ciuill lawes are many tymes well and healthfully made, but yet want such as should see them put in vse and executed, so at this day in the Church are degrees, and titles, and names of ministeries. But there are found very fewe which truly execute their office. Wherefore God is not without iust cause angry for that the ministry is so counterfeited. And it is much to be lamented, that this office is of a great many of the laity had in contempt: neyther can the ministers iustly complayne hereof, when as the greatest part of them haue first, and before all others thorough their licentiousnes, idlenes, slothfulness, and neglecting of their office, brought this funde out of estimation. Wherefore we must earnestly pray vnto God, that he would bouchase now at the length to succour his Church in sending workmen, which will labour diligently. The Apostle mought haue sayd, I glorifye the grace which is geuen vnto you, for that ye should come vnto Christe and vnto his Gospel, for thereby the Jewes were stirred vp to emulation: but he would make mention of his ministry, to the end to commend it and to set it forth, and that not without neede, for there were many false Apostles, which sayd that Paul was not the true Apostle of Christ, and euen where as much as in them lay extenuated his authority. And that Paul was an instructor and teacher of the Gentiles, it is manifest by the Epistle to the Galathians, where he sayth, that Peter, James, and John, had geuen vnto hym their right hands, that he should preache amongst the Gentiles, as they did vnto the circumcision. And vnto Timothe he testifieth, that he was appointed a teacher and instructor of the Gentiles. Although as he went thoroughout the world, before that he preached in any city vnto the Gentiles, he went first to the Synagoge of the Jewes, beginning there to publishe abraode the Gospell, according to the order appointed by God, that the Jewes should first be called: but y charge of the Church of Ierusalem he wholly left vnto others.

In as much as I am the Apostle of the Gentles.] That which in the Greke is ἐφ' ὅσον, that is, in as much, the lattine interpreter turneth quamdiu, that is, so long: and this also he doth in Mathew 25. chapter saying, So long as ye haue done these thinges to one of my least, when as in that place also in the Greke is reade ἐφ' ὅσον, which is more aptly turned, in that, in as much, and as. For when it standeth for an aduerb of time, the Apostle commonly addeth this greke worde χρόνον which signifieth tyme. As in the first to the Corinthyans: γυνὴ δεδεταί νόμῳ ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον ἡ ὁ ἀνὴρ, ἢ ἵς: the wife is bound vnto the law so long as her husband liueth. And vnto the Galathians: ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον κληρονόμος νηπίος ἐστίν. &c. that is, So long as the heyre is a child. But Origen I know not how readeth, quamdiu, that is, so long: and doubteth whether it should at the length come to passe that Paul should cease to be the Apostle of the Gentiles, and that Paul saue that after this life, he should be the Apostle of inuisible spirits, and that vnto him should be sayd that which we reade in the Gospell, Come herher good seruaunt and faythfull: for that thou hast bene faythfull in fewe thinges, I will set thee ouer many thynges. But because he saue as I suppose that thys is somewhat to harde to be easily beleued, he addeth: Shall we understand thys saying to bee as that is, I wyll be wyth you euen vnto the ende of the worlde, not as though I wyll not afterwarde also bee wyth you: so nowt also he sayth, so longe as I am the Apostle of the Gentiles, not as though at any time he should not be the Apostle of the Gentiles? Paul sayth that he glorifieth his ministry, for y he laboured by all maner of meanes

A place of the first to Timothe.

A simile made.

The false Apostles spake ill of Paul.

Paul was an instructor and teacher of the Gentiles.

Paul first preached vnto the Jewes before he preached to the Ethnikes.

The ministry is glorified to log as it is of efficacy in the hearts of the hearers. Nothing in the world better than the church.

The Jews are called the flesh of Paul.

The ministers by a certaine propriety of speech are said to saue.

The holy ministry ought not to be contemned.

A proposition on causall.

The same of the Gospel is our reconciliation with God.

that the ministry of his preaching might be of efficacy, and that that which he spake without, might by the power of the spirit be written in the hartes of the hearers: whereunto he bent all his industry, and laboured by continual prayers to obteyne that at Gods hand, to the end to prouoke them of his flesh to emulation. Pen labour to the bittermost of theyr power to followe that which they iudge to bee good, honest, and godlye. But I thinke that there is nothing in the world more goodly or better then the Church being wel and holily ordered: which Church God so loueth, as the husband doth his wife. This gaue occasiō to Salomon to write those songes of loue which are called Cantica Canticorum. And Christ omitted nothing though it were hard & horrible, which was eyther to be done or suffered for it. At this Church doe the Angels wonder, & of it learne many thinges pertaining to the sondry and manifold wisdoms of God. And men if they want not theyr right wittes embrace and reuerence it. Wherefore in the first to the Corinthians it is written: And if they shoulde prophesie and behaue themselves in a decent order in the Church; and there should enter in any vnlearned hearing his secretes touched, and made manifest, namely, by preachinges, they would fall downe and worshippe, and will they or nill they should confesse that God is amongst the. Wherefore let the vnto whome is committed the charge to instruct and adorne so amiable and wonderfull a society take hede what they doe: for they haue committed vnto them not only the charge of those which are present with them, but also of others which by emulation of this church being wel ordered may be brought vnto Christ. He calleth the Jewes his flesh after the maner of scripture, where in me vse to speke of theyr brethren and kinsfolkes, He is our mouth and our flesh. And in so saying he obteyneth theyr good will to heare him.

That I might saue some of them. He sayth not all, for that he knew that this was not now possible for him to doe, for at that time it behoued that his greatest parte shoulde be made blinde, and be shut vp vnder incredulity. Towardes the end of the world is to be looked for a generall conuersion of the Jewes. This phrase of speech is to be noted wherein he sayth, That I might saue some of them: for no man doubteth, but that it is God which saueth as many as are sanctified: but Paul so sayth, for that he knew that he was a minister of the newe Testament, and of the spirit. And after the same maner wrote he vnto Timothee, when he exhorted him, to be diligent in doctrine and in reading, This doing (sayth he) thou shalt saue both thy selfe, and them which heare thee. Wherefore that which is proper vnto God, is by a certayne communicating of proprieties of speech attributed also vnto the ministers. And if God vouchsafe so honorably to speake of the holy ministry, they then greuously sinne, which contemptuously & disdainfully despise it.

If the casting away of them be the reconciliation of the world. He sayth the casting away of them, and not the remnauntes, so that it may be referred vnto the Apostles which were counted cast away, as though they were the reconciliation of the world: but by casting away he vnderstandeth theyr sal & execration. And this is a proposition causall: for casting away can not be reconciliation, but it is so called, for that the one springeth of the other: as if we shoulde say, that study is wisdom, or that dyines is barrennes: and by reconciliation he vnderstandeth saluation. For we haue by the benefite of Christ obteyned reconciliation with God. And in summe God in the Gospell will haue no other thing to be preached vnto vs but such a reconciliation. Vnto the Corinthians in the latter epistle it is sayd: God was in Christ reconciling vnto himselfe the world, to the end not to impute vnto it the sinnes thereof. And of the Apostles he sayth, God hath put in vs the word of reconciliation. We beseech you for Christs sake, be ye reconciled vnto God.

What shall the reaceauing be but life from the dead? In the exposition of this part, life from the dead, the interpreters much disagree. For Origen and Chrysostome here vnderstand the true and proper resurrection from the dead, which shalbe in the last time at the end of the world: as though some after the conuersion of the Jewes vnto Christ it shoulde follow. And some thinke that the Jewes shalbe shalbe conuerted in the ouerthrowe of Antichrist: as though there should be a certayne analogy or proportion, that euen as by the cutting of and the fall of the Iewes, the Gentiles were called: so when many nations haue falle by the seducing of Antichrist, the Iewes shall then be receaued into the Church, by whose helpe the Gentiles which haue fallen shalbe holpen by agayne. But these things are doubtfull, vncertayne, and obscure, therfore I will of them affirme nothing as touching the maner, forme, and reason how they shal come to passe. This we must beleue, as the holy scriptures testifie, that it shall come to passe that Antichrist, who now by his ministers worketh the misery of iniquity, shall deceaue many, as also at this day manye are by him deceaued, and that ye shall at the length by the power of the spirite of Christ be destroyed, and that the Iewes towards the end of the world shall come vnto Christ: But whether the Gentiles that haue fallen shalbe by them repaired or no, the scriptures declare not. Ambrose thinketh it to be an allegory, wherein is shewed that the world shall receaue greate vtility of the conuersion of the Iewes, and that therfore it is called life from the dead, for that that shalbe vnto the world greate increase thozough the sayth of Christ, and the worlde shalbe made on liue in men thozough the sayth of Christ. Verily that the felicity of the Church shalbe greate, all the Prophetes in a maner write, and especially Esaie, which as it is most likely it as yet had not, but shall then haue. Neyther of these opinions doe I reiect, neither is it necessary vnto saluation to know assuredly whether of them is the truer, howbeit this I suppose to be more probable, that the Apostle speaketh of the commodity which shall come by the conuersion of the Iewes, which shalbe in this life, and not of that commodity which we shal haue in eternal resurrection. But these thinges are of no greate force. And if we receaue the allegory of Ambrose, we shall seme to attribute small fruite vnto the conuersion of the Iewes, yea rather not one white more then to theyr refection: for if thereof shall come only the encrease of sayth, and spirituall life by the death of sinnes, this selfe thing was before geuen vnto the world in theyr refection. Howbeit my mind bēdeth more to this sentēce: and to that which is objected I would say, that the Apostle describeth not vnto vs a diuerse nature of the commodity and vtility, but only amplifieth one and the selfe same, as though it shalbe a degree more, and extend farther.

And if the first frutes be holy, then is the lompe also holy: and if the roote be holy the branches also shalbe holy. ] That the nation of the Iewes is not abiect and to be contemned he confirmeth by the promise of God made vnto the fathers: for in the fathers it was by reason of the leage which was made with the sanctified, and as touching this the Iewes were of greater estimation the other nations. Howbeit in this place is not entreated of men perticularly, for there were amongst the Hebrewes many wicked men, which thozough theyr obstinacy, incredulity, and most heaynous factes wickedly perished. Wherefore John Baptist called them, Generation of vipers. And Christ said, Ye are of your father the deuill. Wherefore here is entreated of that nation generally, which was called the people of God, and came of the most holy partriarch. For so is it to be considered in this place, & not as it had his beginning of Adam, for that way it nothing excellerth other nations. For in Adam we are all sinners, we are all dead, and we are all the children of wrath. But in Abraham, Isaake, and Iacob, were the Iewes seperated from other nations: and especially by reason of the couenaunt which God in times past made with those fathers. Which couenaunt for that it thozough the vnfaithfulness of men which liued in this latter time semed to be obscured, Paul now aptly putteth the Ethnikes in mind of the first frutes and roote of that stocke wherof consisted the greate nobility of that nation. And nobility (as saith Aristotle in his Rhetorikes) is nothing els, but the honour & great fame of elders. And he saith also, that when we speake of any perticular famely or person, or nation, or people, to the nobility thereof belongeth, that they be & vndergoe, that is, men first inhabiting the land: which thing the Iewes were not:

Here is entreated of the whole nation, and not of perticular persons

Here is spoken of the Iewes not as they had their beginning of Adam.

What nobility is.

What is the nobility of any nation or people.

The nobilitie of the Jewes is described.

Wherin the holines of the Jewes chiefly consisted.

The metaphors which the Apostle useth.

What the first fruites signified in the law.

for they were brought from an other countrey into the land of Chanaan: but which is of much more excellency then this, they obtained by possession of the land, not by the force of man but of God, and by many miracles & wonders. This also belongeth to nobility, men be free, and live vnder no man, but vnder their own lawes. The Jewes were set at liberty by God, and by Moses receaued of God himselfe most wise and wonderful lawes. Moreover the nobility of any nation is commended by auncientnes: But there are no histories that make mencion of any nation auncienter then the Jewes. For the writers of the Gentiles can find nothing that was written before Abrahams time. This also maketh a nation noble, if it haue had excellent and notable Princes: which thing the Jewes wanted not: for they came of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and other of the patriarches. Finally this also is considered, whether in a nation haue flourished many excellent and notable men. As touching which thing there was neuer any people that therein could compare with the Jewes: they had Patriarches, Prophets, Judges, and most noble kings, and infinite other most notable men excelling in all kind of vertue. Wherefore before in the 9. chapter it was sayd, Vnto whome pertayneth the adoption, the glory, the testaments, the geuing of the law, the worshipping, the promises, the fathers and Christ also as touching the fleshe. Wherefore that nation without doubt is to be counted most noble, and that not only as touching the nobility of this world (which is doubtles a gift of God not to be contemned) but also as touching spirituall nobility, which dependeth of that couenaunt which God himselfe made with them: And to make the thing more plaine, this is to be noted, that Augustine in his 106. epistle to Paulinus, or to Bonifacius writeth that this holines consisteth rather in the communion of faith and of the sacraments, then in carnall propagation. Which his saying is most true. For true & sound holines in them that are of full age dependeth of faith, which by the sacraments is both sealed and stirred: when these thinges are had men geue themselves vnto God, and are made vnto hym holy. Whereunto if procreation of godly elders be adioyned, it is not to be doubted, but that God doth for the most part bestow more ample gifts vpon them, according to his promise, wherein he hath promised, that he will do good vnto the godly euen vnto a thousand generations: for he remembreth the couenaunt which he hath made betwene him and the faithfull, that he is the God not only of them but also of their seede. Yea and also oftentimes for the godly parents sake he geueth vnto their children so much grace, that they are brought vnto faith, are adioyned with the sacraments, and endued with giftes of the spirite. Which thing although it do not alwayes happen or of necessity, yet vnder the hope of such promise we baptise our infants, as the Jewes in the olde time circumcised their infants. But as we haue before said, here is not entreated of men perticularly, but of the whole kind vniuersally, and here is not a respect had vnto carnall propagation, but vnto the couenaunt and promise. For the father when he begetteth a childe doth not together with the seede poure into him holines, but rather sinne and corruption of nature, according to that saying of Dauid, In iniquities was I conceived, and in sinnes hath my mother conceived me. The Apostle in these his wordes useth two most elegant metaphors, or rather allegories when he calleth the fathers of the Hebrewes the first fruites, and the roote. In the law it was commaunded, that of all the encreases and fruites of the earth should be geuen vnto God the first fruites, yea also the first borne of liuing creatures were due vnto him. And when Paul maketh mencion of the masse or lombe, he alludeth to that which we reade in the 15. chapter of the booke of Exodum, that some part of the lombe of new dough was commaunded to be seperated for God before that the new bread should be tasted of: for thereof were made sweete cakes which were offered vnto God. Which thing he therefore caused to be done, that men by that ceremony might vnderstand, and of their owne accord testify that God is vnto them the geuer and distributor of all fruites. Wherefore that oblation encreased not the riches of God which are otherwise infinite, but only nourished in men a greatfull memory memory of benefites receaued. As oftentimes Emperours and great and mighty kings geue vnto some one man a city, or prouince or some certaine dominion, with this condition, that he shall pay vnto him euery yeare some thing of small valew in the name of a tribute, not that they seeke by that tribute to be enriched, but that man maye perpetually vnderstande and testifie, that he dependeth of that Prince, and that that he hath at his handes obtained that dignity, which he now enioyeth. Moreouer this commodity had the common wealth by that ceremony, that by such oblations the holy ministry was sustayned, whose vse is so great that it ought to be maintayned, yea though with great charge. Moreouer in all the first frutes was signified Christ the first bozne of all creatures, and namely, the first frutes of them that rise againe from the dead, whereby all the saythfull are sanctified: for by the first frutes was made holy that which was remayning and left at home to sustaine the family. Yea and this maner of offering first frutes was deriued also vnto the Ethnikes: for the virgens called vesta, offered frutes vnto their domesticall Goddes: and as Plutarch telleth in Symposiacis, the men in the olde time dranke not any wyne, befoze that they had first offred sacrifice to some God, that that which they dranke might not hurt them. And at Athens the 11. day of the month they offred the first frutes of wyne. In all these things we may behold the steppes of that holy institution: although the Ethnikes had with idolatrous supersticion violated that which was well instituted. At this day also although the yoke of the ceremonies of Moses be taken away, yet should it be very well done of vs, of our free and liberall will to offer vnto God the first frutes by geuing them to the poore. The other metaphoze or allegozy is taken of the rootes of trees, which draw good sappe out of the earth, which is dispersed thorough out the stocke and branches and causeth good nourishment and plentiful fruit. And that a stocke or famely is called a roote, it is so commonly vled in the scriptures, that it nedeth no exposition. Esay sayth, A rod shall come out of the roote of Iesse, &c. In which words is described that Christ should be bozne of the stocke of David. And when as by this roote are vnderstanded the fathers as Abraham, Isaacke, and Jacob: these are not to be considered as they were men, but as they were ioyned vnto Christ, and thereout as out of a most fertile ground thorough faith drew the sappe of saluation. Neither in this place, as I haue admonished, is to be imagined any other holines in y<sup>e</sup> roote or in the first frutes, then the blessing of the couenant made betwene God and the fathers. Neither is the holynes of the roote or first frutes any thing against originall sinne, for by nature we incurre that sinne, which nature we draw corrupted from our parents. But by the promise and force of the couenaunt it is forgiven, which forgivenes when God willeth, we can not learne by the testimony of the scriptures. Paraduventure it is forgiven vnto infantes, when they are yet in the wombe, or when they are bozne or straight way after their birth, neither is it paraduventure geuen vnto all men at one and the same time. And such a forgivenes is nothing els, but not to impute that sinne vnto them, although in very deede it be in them. Wherefoze we putting our confidence in the constancy of the couenaunt and truth of the promise of God, do baptise our infantes. This allegozy of Paul of the holines of the rootes and of the first frutes might at the first sight seme to be against a saying of Ezechiell, in the 18. chapiter, wherein he saith: If the father be godly, innocent, and adorned with vertues, the sonne which is borne of him, if he be vngodly, and an oppressor, and defiled with wicked facts, shall dye the death: the holines of his parent shall nothing profite him. And Christ seemed to declare the selfe same thing, when he sayd, If ye be the children of Abraham, do his workes. But in very deede obseruing the exposition which we befoze brought, in those sayinges there is no contrariety, for we do not affirme y<sup>e</sup> the generation or propagation of the flesh is the whole, perfect, & absolute cause of grace or of holynes (for God can without it geue grace, and in very deede he geueth it vnto many, which were the children of infidels: and many of those which are the posterity of holy parents are excluded from it) but the promise which

I similitude.

The cause of some of offering the first frutes came also vnto the Ethnikes.

The first frutes are offered vnto God in the poore.

What holines in the first frutes is here met. Holines of the roote & originall sin let not one the other.

Whethers Paul be against Ezechiell.

The propagation of the flesh is not the cause of holynes.

is the cause of holines is in this manner & forme set forth & offered vnto vs of God, & he will be our God, and God of our seed. Which promise the children of Godly whē they come to age ought by faith to take hold of, and to assent vnto it, and with an effectuall assent, which hath ioyned with it the fruits of good workes, otherwise they should not haue saluation, & the piety of their parents & elders should nothing profite the. Neither must we say, as some say, that Paul now speaketh not of actual holines, as they call it, but of holines in power: for the children of the wicked also maye as touching power be saued, for they are created vnto the image of God, whereunto is not repugnant, so that it please God, but that they may be brought to saluation. Howbeit they vse to say that the children of the faithful haue a more nigher power. But this also is not inough: for that in this sorte to be nigh in power, what thing is it? Doubtles they can assigne none other thing but this promise and couenante made with God. Howbeit Ambrose laboureth thus to declare it. Forasmuch as (saith he) they haue had faithfull elders, they also are not unworthy to be called vnto the faith. But he seemeth to write ambiguously. For if he take worthines for merite, his wordes ought in no wise to be admitted. For there is none which meriteth or deserueth to be brought vnto iustification. But if by worthines he vnderstande, that they by reason of the promise and couenant of God are somewhat more apte then others, this is to come to that exposition which we firste gaue. Let vs in the meane time hereof gather, that the Jewes are not to be reiected, as Paul concludeth. Let vs also constantly beleue, that we are in such sorte brought into theyr society, that as touching our children, we haue the fruition of the self same blessings and priuileges that they had. And therfore is not their saluation past all hope, whiche now both in the east parts, and also vnder the tyranny of the Papistes liue in sondry superstitions: seeing that they haue descended from faithfull elders: for it maye easily come to passe, that the blessing and vertue of the couenant may spring forth againe in them, and that they may be drawen to saluation.

Iustification
consisteth not of merites.

We as touching our children haue
the fruition
of the same
priuileges
that the Jewes had

And though some of the braunches be broken of, and thou being a wilde oliue tree was grafted in them, and made pertaker of the roote, and of the fatnes of the oliue tree, boast not thy selfe againste the braunches: And if thou boast thy selfe, thou bearest not the roote but the roote thee.

And though some of the braunches be broken of. When the Apostle had now proued that the fall of the Jewes was not so horrible, but that manye of them were saued, and shall hereafter be saued and had added that the fall was such, that it brought no small commoditie vnto the Gentils: and after that had by the holines of the roote and of the first fruites proued the excellency of the Jewes: now he concludeth that we ought not to despise them, nor to reprove them. And he vseth the figure occupatio, that is, a preuentio: for the Gentils moughte haue sayde, what profite haue they by the holines of the roote and of the first fruites, when as they are cut of from the holy stocke of their godly parentes? The Apostle answereth, now indeede they are cut of, but ye haue bene long time wilde oliue trees, barren fruitfull, and straungers from God. He putteth them in minde of their old estate, which thing much conduceth vnto modesty. Men should plucke the wallet whiche hangeth at theyr backe before them and looke vpon it and beginne firste of all to weed their owne fieldes, and then they should not easily shorne at other mens infirmities, misfortunes, and chaunces. In this sorte doth Paul now deale with the Gentils. The braunches (saith he) are broken of, but ye haue bene long time barren fruitfull: they are cut of, but they were in the stocke: we are grafted in, but they before obtained the naturall sappe, and proper fatnes, when the Gentils are sayde to haue bene wilde oliue trees without fruit, he entreateth not of any Ethnikes particularly which though they haue obtained saluation, but as I before admonished, these things are spoken of the people of the Gentils generally: which are worthy

The calling
to minde of a mans olde estate much conduces
to modesty.

ly called a fruitles wild olive tree, for that they had not publicly the profession of true piety as the Jewes had. Some thinke it straunge, that Paul should say, that some of the branches were broken of, when as the greatest part of the Jewes had fallen away. And Chrysostome cleaueth vnto his firste exposition: namelye, that the Apostle in words onely comforteth the Jewes, and speaketh to get fauour of them, whiche thinge saith he, vnles it be well marked, he shall seeme to speake manye thinges repugnant. This interpretation I thinke not so apte, for if there be in the scriptures admitted any kinde of lye, there shall doubtles be nothing remayning in them, whiche shalbe without suspicion of a lie or of falshoode. Paul in this place had a respect not onely to one age of the people of the Jewes, but to the whole nation together, both which was from the beginning, and which should be euen vnto the end of the world. And who seeth not that they at that time were saued a great part? There were many most holy patriarches, iudges, kings, priestes, prophetes, priuate men, and women, which were all deare vnto God, and towarde the end of the world they shall in great heapes be conuerted vnto Christe. Yea and in the Apostles time, there were in one day wonne vnto the Lord siue thousand. What marueile then is it, if he saye that some or certaine branches were broken of? It mought haue seemed a lie, if all had bene cut of. Further although the Apostle do somewhat extenuate, or rather lenisye that which was in deede verie harde to be spoken, yet maketh he no lie, to speake for fauour, or to comfort in woordes onely contrary to the truth of the matter. Wherefoze he putteth the Gentils in minde what manner ones they were before, and in what state the Jewes were in times past before God. And doubtles if the Gentils had considered with themselves their former estate, and the publike and ciuill doctrine and manners receaued amongst them, they should haue found nothing in a manner, which was not obnoxious vnto the curse. And if they had any thing afterward, whereof to gloze, the same came wholly not of the doctrine and manners receiued of long time amongst them, but of their new grafting into Christ in the place of the Jewes which had falle away. And without doubt that grafting in of the Gentils which we now entreat of was wonderful. The lord sayd of it, Many shall come from the east, and from the west, & shall rest with Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, &c. And Paul excellently wel expresseth the same vnto the Ephesians in the 2. chapter, saying: Remember that ye beinge in times past Gentiles in the flesh, were called uncircumcision, of the which are called circumcision in the flesh, whiche circumcision is made with handes, that (I say) ye were at that time without Christ, aleantes from the common wealth of Israel, and straungers fro the couenantes of the promise, and had no hope, and were Atheistes, or without God in the world: but now ye which were once farre of, are made neere through Christ, by his blood. And straightway in the selfe same chapter. Now therefore ye are no more straungers and foreners, but citezens with the saintes, and of the household of God, and are built vpon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets. And this is to be noted y this place maketh much to proue, that the olde Testament and the new is one and the selfe same. For the roote is one and the selfe same, and the stocke or bodye of the tree is one and the selfe same, the Jewes are cut of, and we are grafted in, one and the selfe faith abideth, one and the selfe same mediatoz, the selfe same sacramentes, as touching the thinge, although the outward signes and ceremonies are chaunged. And doubtles the promises as touching the substance abide now the selfe same, although, at that time were mingled with them certaine shadowes of thinges, as of they infinite populous multitude, of the possession of the lande of Chanaan, of the kingdom, of the priesthoode, of the temple or tabernacle. &c. Wherefoze the substance, thing, and spirite are in either testament one and the same, onely there is found some difference in qualities, and certayne circumstances. But whereas the Apostle calleth the stocke and propagation of the saintes an olive tree, it may seeme that he tooke that out of the holyc scriptures. For in the 11. chapter of Jeremy, the Lord said, that he had made Iuda an olive tree full of branches, fruitfull and fat, but he there prophesieth, that it shoulde be broken for their impiety: whiche sentence

Paul in this treatise maketh no lie.

The grafting in of the Gentiles into the wild olive tree is wonderful.

The olde Testament and the new is one, and the selfe same thing as touching the substance.

the

the Apostle nowe vseth, namely, that the bzaunches are broken of. And Dauid saide, I as a greene olive tree and full of bzaunches in the house of the Lorde, haue put my truste in my God. In whiche sentence is touched the cause of the fatnesse, namelye, for that the Saintes put their confidence in God, and do truelye beleue in him. I mighte also speake of that parable whiche in the booke of Judges Ioathan, the sonne of Ierobaall bzought against Abimelech, and against the Sichimites, where he maketh mencion of the Olive tree and and of the fatnes thereof, together with the sweetnes of the fig tree, and pleasantnes of the vine tree: wherefore these thre kinds of trees, the vine tree, the olive tree, and the figge tree are in the scriptures compared vnto the Church. The Cedre tree also is somtimes added because of the beauty and heighth therof. Although of the vine tree it be sayd that it was turned into a wild vine, yet that is not to be vnderstanded vniuersally, but only as touching the bzaunches which fell away. Wherefore Augustine hath a very good saying, that this tree is putata, non amputata, pruned and not cleane cut away. The Apostle straight way prohibiteth the Gentles from glozieng against

It is not possible but that we should reioyce in the giftes of God.

the Jewes. He indeede forbiddeth not glozping generally (for how can it be, but that we should reioyce in the giftes of God: but addeth against the bowes that are broken of, namely, that we should not reproch them. To glozy against the, were to glozy against the roote, and to go about in a manner to strine euen against Abraham, who is our father. For in the third to the Galathians it is witten, They which are of faith are the sonnes of Abraham. And likewise to the Romanes in the 4. chapter. But in Pauls metaphoze the absurdity is a great deale moze manifest if the bzaunches should arise against the roote. Neither is the elegance of the metaphoze of the wild olive tree lightly to be passed ouer: for euen as the wild olive tree hath in dede the forme and shape of an olive tree, but yet as touching the ende and fruits it is not so prayse worthy: so they which are straungers from Christ, Why straungers from Christ are called wilde olive trees. What the grafting into the good olive tree is.

although they haue still a certaine print of the image of God, & do certayne works which are goodly to the shew, yet notwithstanding they are not acceptable before God, and the things which they do are barren, yea rather they are sinnes before God. Farther the grafting into the good tree whereof is now made mencion, semeth to be nothing els but the communion of the Saintes which in the article of our faith we confesse. For this we ought to know, that whatsoeuer grace and good gifts are geuen vnto vs, are not geuen only for our owne sakes, but to helpe to the saluation and edification of others. Which thing if Christians would in these dayes diligently weigh with themselves, there should be les selfe loue and misery in the Church. Neither is this to be passed ouer that in this place is reproued the wickednes of the Jewes, which were not by their holy first fruits chaunged, as a whole lombe of dough is commonly chaunged by leuen though it be neuer so litle, and they would not imitate their roote, but miserably degenerated from it. We may when we heare that the bzaunches are broken of, thereby gather, that the election and promise of God is not so bound to any stocke or to the flesh, that none can be damned which come of godly parents: which thing also was before declared in Esau & Ismaell, which were bozne of Abraham & of Isaack. And when the Apostle saith that the Gentles were wild olive trees, he not only putteth down their pride and arrogancy, but his words also are of great force to prouoke the Hebzeus to emulation, when they heare that the good fat and fertile iuyce of their olive tree is participated vnto wild olive trees, that is, vnto the Gentiles which had before bene filthy idolaters. This I say mought haue stirred by the Jewes to repentance if they had had any consideration. And he thought it not inough to say, Thou art grafted into the good olive tree, but he also addeth, and art made partaker of the fatnes of the olive tree, that the Gentles Could vnderstand, that they were not only in name made the people of God, but were in very dede made partakers of grace, and of the spirit, and of heavenly gifts. Let vs mozeouer consider that this grafting in, which the Apostle now entreateth of is contrary (as Ambrose noteth to the maner of naturall husbandry, wherein a good science or graft is taken, and grafted grafted into a barren and wild tree, namely, that by the fatte and fruitfull sappe of the godd graft might be amēded the barenes and wilones of that stocke wherinto it is grafted. But here it is contrary: The tree that is the body of the Church and the society of the godly is good: but the graftes are vnfruitfull barren and wild olive trees. Neither could it be otherwise, for whatsoever is found without Christ, and his body, how glorious so euer it be, can not but be wicked and vncleane. And to boast against the bzaunches, is to reioyce in their fall. If God thereby bring commodity, then in that respect we may reioyce, but to reioyce for the fall of any man, we can not lawfully, vnles rashly and per accidens as they speake, that is, by chaunce.

In this allegory are reproued the Jewes.

The promise is not bound vnto any kinred, nor to the flesh.

Thou bearest not the roote, but the roote thee. ] They which fight against their roote can not stand long themselves. This place of the Apostle also teacheth vs, that vnto our iustification are not required merites of workes and naturall endeouors, for the wild olive tree can by no meanes graft it selfe in. Wherefore as we are begotten of an other without any our help, and as trees are grafted of others: so we are through Christ iustified of God without any merites. Moreouer by those words is declared as we also before sayde, that we had not bene grafted in vnles the Jewes had first fallen: as graftes are not grafted in vnles first be cut away somewhat from the tree. Farther Origen noteth that by this doctrine is confuted Valentinus, and his disciples, who thought that the soules are in kind distinct, and that some of them are so good, and as they spake golden, that they can by no meanes be damned, howsoever they liue, and whatsoever they do. Other soules they thought to be by nature euill, so that they could by no meanes attaine vnto felicity, but yet by their labours and good workes, they might at the length so profite, that they might be brought to a middle estate, where should be some refreshing, but not the chiefe felicity. Wherefore they sayd that they were spirituall, perfect, and mere gold: so that although they committed many vncleane, and absurd thinges yet they sayd they lost not their holines, for gold though it be neuer so much couered with durt, ceaseth not to be gold. But they exhorted others to do good workes, namely, for that they should neede them, if at least they would attayne vnto the middle estate. And of this pestilente doctrine Iereneus maketh mention in his first booke. Paul now contrary to this pestiferous doctrine saith, y branches cut of fro a wild olive tre may be grafted into a good olive tre. Origen after y he had confuted these men, doubteth, that forasmuch as we affirme y the nature of the soules is one & the selfe same, how we can, as Paul now teacheth, defend the double tree, y good olive tree, & the wild olive tree. He answereth vnto this question by a similitude: All the bodyes (saith he) that are in the worlde, as touching that they are a body communicate in nature, neither differ they one from an other, but out of euery nature of them arise and spring many properties and conditions, whereby they beginne to differ from others, and do indeede much differ from them. And in this maner the celestiall bodyes are distinguished from the elementes: and the elements from corruptible liuing creatures: and agayne those liuing creatures from the plants: so saith he, happeneth it as touching the soules: all are endued with one and the selfe same faculty of free will: where out whē some bring forth faith, vertues, & good workes they make a good tree: & when as contrariwise some out of the liberty of the will where with they are endued, do bring forth impiety, sins, & euill workes, therby they are made wild olive trees: and by this meanes he ascribeth y whole diuersity & distinctiō of trees y one fro y other vnto fre will. And to confirme his sentēce he bringeth that saying of Christ out of the Gospel, Eyther make the tree good and his fruites good, or the tree euill and his fruites euill. But in the bzaunches he noteth an other diuersity. That euen as in naturall bodyes, there are some which longe kepe still theyr proprieties and qualities, as the beaumenty bodyes which shall in one and the selfe same estate abide euen vnto the end of the world: and there are others which are more easely changed yea also come to corruption, as herbes, plantes, and sensible creatures: So there are some brāches which perpetually adide in that tree, or doubtles very long, but other some soone fall away. At the length he writteth, that

This grafting in, is contrary to naturall grafting.

An argument against iustification by workes.

An error of the Valentinian hereticks.

A similitude.

A similitude.

Cap.ii. A Commentarie vpon the

that although some thinke that Abraham and the holy fathers are the good tree and the root, yet he thinketh that we ought to put Christ to be that good tree and roote, as into who we are by fayth grafted. Touching these thinges out of him alledged, we may allow the former part which was brought first agaynst Valentinus, for they are well and profitably noted of him. But that difference of the two trees is farre otherwise to be put. And first we ought to know, that the whole lump of our nature is corrupted with originall sinne: wherefore it might well be called a wild olive tree. Neyther should we haue had from any elsewhere a good tree, vnles by the mercy of God, Christ had bene both promised and geue, into whom the elect by beleuing are altered, transplanted, and grafted, as into a fruitfull and fat tree. But that they shoulde beleue, cometh not by the power of free will, for fayth is the gifte of God, and not a worke of our strengths: and therefore it lieth not in vs to make the tree good. And if Origen thinke that Christ so sayth, the error springeth of the misvnderstanding of this worde, Make ye: for in that place it signifieth not a working, but a supposition: As though he shoulde haue sayd, Thinke and be assured that that tree ought to be good, which shoulde bring forth good fruites & that tree euill which shoulde bring forth euill fruites. And that this is the sence of those words, that which went before declareth. For the lord had sayd: Forasmuch as ye are euill ye can not speake good thinges. And in the 7. chapter of Mathew it most manifestly appeareth that the tree ought first to be good before that good fruites can follow: but Origen contrariwise imagineth that by the workes of free will the tree is made fruitfull. And as touching the plant and roote, we also affirme that the fathers, with whome was made the couenaut, and who led in it an holy life, are that plant and roote although we are not ignorant that in other places of the scripture Christ calleth himself the vine tree and vs the branches: yea and in this selfe same epistle it is written that by baptisme we are grafted into Christ, into the similitude of his death. Neyther doth any man doubt, but that Christ is the only foundation, besides which no man can put any other. But Paul now tendeth not that way, but only hath a consideration vnto the kinred of the Hebrewes, and holines of the fathers, which is here by gathered, for that he calleth the Iewes the naturall branches of the good olive tree: which can not otherwise be vnderstanded, but for that they came of holy parentes. And freight way he expessedly sayth, There are enemies for your sakes, but elect for the fathers sakes. Neyther doth this which is added any thing let: Thou standest by fayth, which fayth hath a respect vnto Christ as vnto the object thereof: for we also when we affirme that the holy fathers are the plant and roote doo not exclude Christ, for the roote and tree are not here taken, but in as much as they are holy: but the fathers had not of them selues naturall and inward holynes, but, as we haue before sayd, they by fayth drew it from Christ.

The whole lump of our corrupt nature, maybe called a wild olive tree. It lieth not in our power to make our selues good trees.

The fathers are called the roote, & the plant, in as much as they are rooted in Christ.

Thou wilt say then, The branches are broke of, that I might be grafted in, Thou sayest well. Thorowh vnbelefe they are broke of, and thou standest by fayth, Be not high minded, but feare. For if God spared not the naturall branches, take heede that he also spare not thee.

Thou wilt say then, The branches are broken of, that I might be grafted in, Thou sayest well, Thorowh vnbelefe they are broken of, and thou standest by fayth. The Apostle continueth still to repress the arrogancy of the Gentiles which extolled themselves against the Iewes. And he vseth a counterfeate speech vnder the person of the Gentiles, so that it is a preuention. The Gentiles peradventure mought haue said, we glory, for that we are both better and more worthy then the Iewes: which is hereby proued for that they were broke of for our saluation sake, that we shoulde be grafted in: but he is of much more worthines for whose sake a thing is done, then is y which is done for his sake. The Apostle answereth and wereth, Thou sayst well, that the Jewes are broken of, that thou shouldest be grafted in, this I deny not: but the remember thou that thy grafting in cometh not of merites or workes, but of sayth, which is mere and pure grace, and hath a respect vnto the mercy of God only. It is the practise of Satan to make vs to glory of that thing, which we haue not of our selues, but is the pure and simple gift of God. I will not speake how that the Jewes mought by the like kinde of reasoning say, we are of more excellency then thou, when as thou wert to this end called, that we by thy conuersion might receaue fruit, and by enuilation be prouoked vnto saluation. Chrysostom sayth, that here are touched the true and proper causes of the destruction of the Iewes, and of the grafting in of the Gentiles, incredulity, I say, and sayth. And therfore he continueth in that mind which he was of before, that the Apostle comforteth the Jewes in wordes onely, and with commendations which in very dede were no commendations. But in thus speaking he considereth not that which was before sayd, that the counsell of God in the execution of the Jewes stayed not there, as though he willed that blindness in respect of it self only, but had a respect vnto the calling of the Gentiles, which he would should therof follow. And I wonder he saw not, y the Apostle here approueth y argument of y Gentils wherein they sayd, They are broken of that we should bee grafted in. He mought doubtles haue sayd, this is not true: fro which saying he is so farre of, that he rather auouched, graunted, and approued that which they alledged. Wherfore it is not to be doubted, but that the blinding of the Jewes was appoynted of God as a meane, whereby the saluation of the Gentiles should follow. Wherfore Paul calleth backe the Gentiles to the consideration of this end, and willet them to weigh with themselves, that they stand by sayth, whereof they can not glory, for that they haue freely receaued it at Gods handes. In the first to the Corintheians the 1. chapter, he sayth likewise, that the beleuers stand by sayth. Neyther is that hereunto repugnaunt which is written in the selfe same epistle in the 15. chapter, That the Corintheians stand in the Gospell, for sayth is referred vnto the Gospell as to his proper object, yea rather after a sorte it thereof springeth, as we haue before hard. Neyther is in this place entreated of men perticularly, but of the congregation & body of the beleuers: And therfore he not without iust cause addeth,

Be not high minded, but feare. For euen as the Church of the Jewes is now extinguished, and Affrike likewise and Grecia, and Asia haue lost many churches: so is it to be feared lest the selfe same thing happē now vnto the Churches which seme to stand. Wherfore let them not puffe themselves vp. But no man of the member of the saythfull ought to be in doubt of his own saluation. For the nature of sayth is, to make men assured of the promise of God. Howebeit thys is to be known, that it is not possible, that so long as we liue here, we should utterly shake of all feare. For we are continuallye tossed betwene two cogitations, the one of the goodnes, sayth, and constancye of God, the other of our corruption, infirmitye, and prones to euill. For when we consider howe weake we are, and prone to euill, and consider also the filthines and imperfection of our workes though they be neuer so good, & there with all the seuerity of the lawe in requiring euen to the uttermost the thinges which it commaundeth. This consideration (I say) if it be vehement, can not but exceedingly make a feard the minde, and deiect it. But on the other syde, when we consider the clemency, goodnes, and mercy of God, and his constancy in his promises, and therewithall also remember, that all the merites of Christ are communicated vnto vs, we are refreshed, and recreated, and the feare is eyther lenified, or els sometymes utterly layd away. And these affectes where they are perfect & vehement, doe succede the one the other: for they can not be both at one tyme: or if they be both at one tyme, then are eyther of them remisse and not vehement. But in what maner they geue place the one to the other, we may by dayly experience vnderstand. For if any man be set vpon the toppe of an highe toure, and if being there his mind runne vpon nothing els but vpon the heigth of the tower,

S. i.

and

The comparison is declared. No perticular man ought to stand in doubt of his saluation. So long as we liue here we cannot utterly shake of all feare.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

Faith doth
no lesse ex-
pell feare, then doth
charity.

and what a deepe way he should fall, so that he can not fall without danger of death, it is not possible, but that his mind being still vpon this, he should be altogether smitten with an horrour: But if he turne his eyes a syde to the barres or battlements which stay him by so that he can not fall, then will he plucke by his spirites agayne, and put away all feare. Neither ought it to seme vnto any man straunge, that we say, that faith expelleth that feare which is ioynd with doubting of saluation, when as in Iohn it is sayd, that charity dryueth feare out of doores. For, it is most certaine, that that which scripture attributeth vnto charity ought much more to be attributed vnto faith: for charity springeth of it. But as we haue already sayd, Paul in this place entreateth not of men perticularly, but of the publique profession of Christ, and of the preaching of the Gospel and of his religion receaued in any whole nation or prouince. And that which is here spoken, ought to stirre by godly men to most seruent prayers for the preservation of the churches. After that he addeth a reason of his sentence.

For if God spared not the naturall branches, take hede that he also spare not thee. He reasoneth à minori, that is, of the lesse: for it seemed les likely, that the naturall branches should be broken of, then they which are agaynst nature. Now if they be broken of, the is it much more to be feared, lest others also should be cut of. But let vs see what is to be vnderstanded by the naturall branches, or by the brāches of nature, which phrase Paul a litle afterward also useth. Chrysostome sayth: Forasmuch as in things natural is found necessity, in this place can not be put that necessity, for that holynes, and these giftes of God whereof we now entreat, may both be in vs, and also be remoued away from vs. Wherefore he thinketh, that here is rather to be vnderstanded a certayne likelines of truth, and consequence, as we commonly saye, that that is naturall, whiche reason iudgeth probable and agreable. Ambrose expessedly writeth these woordes: For if they which throughe the prerogative of the fathers were woorthye, vnto whome also was made the promise, and which were adopted of God into childre, were for theyr incredulity sake made blind, what shall become of them, which are without any commendation exalted on high? and which being of no dignity at all, are brought to honour? But Origen by nature vnderstandeth free will, as though this whole dignity should depende of free will, which opinion we haue a litle before confuted. Wherefore Ambrose cometh nerer vnto the truth, who referreth this dignity or worthines to the promise of God, although none of them haue properly declared, why mention is made of nature. And Paul in my iudgement therfore maketh mention of nature, for that the children of the saints were so borne, that they came out of a good tree, and out of an holy roote. And verely the etimologie of this word, nature, is deriued of this word, nasci, that is, to be borne. And yet is not this so to be taken, as though they should haue in themselves the beginning of holynes: for, that dependeth of the godnes, promise, and will of God. For there is no part of the blessing of God to be attributed vnto the stocke of the fleshe being considered apart by it selfe, but so far forth as vnto the stocke or propagation is ioynd the promise which is a thing of great efficacy: which promise if we will know of how great force it is, let vs looke vpon the nation of the Iewes, which was in deepe sinfull and contaminated with many kinds of sinnes: and yet it ceased not to be the people of God, vntill they had publicly denied and reiected Christ, although euen then also remnants of them were saued. Howbeit that people was first corrected with the rodde and with afflictions, and sometymes sent into captiuitie, but was not altogether reiecte: And that this benefite was bestowed vpon the fathers, the Scripture in many places mencioneth. There were other nations which in deepe receaued the Gospel, but yet kept it but for a while, scarce aboue one age or two. It is true, that we haue succeeded in the place of the Iewes, and are made partakers of the selfsame priuiledges with them: yet notwithstanding the Iewes were before vs: & abode the long tyme before in possession. Wherefore if they be nowe broken of, we ought more to bee afearde: if they for their pride were smitten with blindness, & were for their incredulity cut of, what is to be thought of vs wild oliue trees, and barren, & vnfruitfull branches? Thorough incredulity were they broken of (sayth Ambrose)

The etimologie of this worde nature.

How the blessing of God is towards the stocke and propagation of the fleshe.

not for thy sake, but by reason of their owne default: whiche thing I meruayle he should write, If this Proposition propter, that is, For, do signifie the cause efficient, I graunt that our saluation was not the cause of their cutting of. They had in themselves the sinne of incredulity, which God minding to punishe, in this sort by his iustice reiected them. But that our calling was not the small cause, which God in their reiection had a regard vnto I can in no wise deny, seing that Paul affirmeth it: wherefore I thinke rather we may say, that they were broken of from their fruitfull tree both for theyr owne default, and for our sakes.

Be not high minded. μη υψιποποιει. This is, which is other wise sayd, μη υπερβηαι which vice is opposit vnto the pouerty of the spirite, which Christ so commended that he called them which were endewd with it, blessed. But they are to be laughed at, which by this saying of the Apostle labour to defend ignorance, & to feare away men from knowledge. Noli altum sapere say they, that is, Be not ouer wise. Whiche exposition how strang it is from the scope of the Apostle, I suppose now euery man plainly seeth. But to close by the exposition of this place, I thinke that betwene the degrees whereby we come to saluation, & the meanes which bring vs hedlong to destruction this order is to bee put. As touching them which shalbe saued: first is election or predestination. Thereout burst forth grace the spirite and sayth, straght way follow god woorkes, then haue they geuen vnto them perseuerance, and at the last is rendred the crowne of felicitie. But vnto destruction the first degree, is the corruption of the lompe of mankind thorough originall sinne, & that God would not haue mercy: thereof followe many sinnes, which we by living wickedly after ward adde: after them followeth blindnes, & they are infected with incredulity, mozeouer the harte is hardened, and at the last followeth eternall damnation.

Our saluation was the small cause of the reiection of the Jewes.

The degrees to saluation, and the degrees to destruction.

See therfore the bountefulnes & seuerity of God. Towards the whiche haue fallen into seuerity, but towards thee, bountefulnes, if thou continue in his bountefulnes: or els thou also shalt be cut of. And they also, if they abide not still in vnbeliefe, shalbe grafted in. For God is able to graft them in agayne. For if thou wast cut out of the oliue tree, which wast wild by nature, and wast grafted contrary to nature into a right oliue tree, how much moze shall they that are by nature be grafted into their owne oliue tree:

Se therfore the goodnes and seuerity of God. &c.] This word is, in Greke est, See, some turne Ecce, is, Behold, for in signification it is sometimes all one wth is. The Apostle continueth still in one & the self same matter. For this treatise was very necessary to put away the discord which in h primitive sprang betwene the Gentiles & the Jewes. He exhorteth the to set two things befoze their eyes, the goodnes of God, & his seuerity. Goodnes he calleth χρηστότητα, which word signifieth clemency, & a redines of mind to do a man good, & to do him pleasure. Seuerity he calleth in the Greke ἀποτομία, whiche is then, when thinges are done with extremitie, and that men are delt with, euen according to the rigour of iustice.

Towards thee (saith he) goodnes. For that was a singular bountifulnes, that when as the Gentils were contaminated with idolatry, and mought iustly & woorthely haue bene left in their infidelity, they were yet notwithstanding called adopted and adozned with so many ornaments and giftes. By these wordes are confuted the Panichies & Marcionites, which affirmed that there are two Gods, one good, gentle, and mercifull: the other seuer, yea and cruell: when yet the Apostle in this place attributeth the selfe same proprieties vnto one and the self same true God. It is manifest also that they which are cut of, are by the iust seuerity of God broken of, and fall away, so that they are without excuse. Mozeouer not onely Paul in this place, but also the whole scripture in infinite places in a maner, prouoke vs to the consideration of those two thinges. And that not without iust cause for in the consideration of the goodnes of God we are prouoked vnto faith, and vnto

The singular bountifulnes of God towards the Gentiles. Against the Panichies and Marcionites. The scripture euery where inuoceth vs to consider the seuerity and goodnes of God.

loue towards him, & also to geue him thanks for þe benefits receiued at his hands. But when we consider þe seueritie & iudgements of God, it maketh vs to pity those which fall, and to be fearefull of our owne estate. Christostome expounding this sentence, See the goodnes. It is not saide, (saith he) See thy merites, and thy laboures, for it commeth all whole of grace from aboue. I woulde to God he had alwayes spoken after this manner, and that he had abode still in that whiche he here teacheth. The entent of the Apostle in the consideratiō of the seuerity of God is, that we beholding other mens dangers and falles should be made moze ware. Which selfe thing he in an other place meaneth when he sayth in the first to the Corinth. He which standeth, let him take heede that he fall not: and vnto the Galathians, Considering thy self, least thou also be tempted. Wherefoze this is to be known, that feare is of two sortes: the one is, which abateth nothings of confidence, but onely engendreth a greater diligence, and bringeth moze effectually endeuours. The other is which exceedingly diminisheth, yea rather taketh away confidence, pulleth away endeuour, and bringeth sluggishnes. The latter commeth of infidelity, the other cometh of diligence and of fayth. By this kind of feare are the churches moued moze and moze to apply themselves vnto God, and to praye instantly for their preservation, namely that the kingdome of God shoulde not be transferred from them vnto other nations. This is the cause why in holy seruices prayer is made for the churches: which I woulde to God it were done with that seruentnes of minde that it ought to be done with, and that vnto the prayers were adioyned an endeuour to adorne and refozme them: for to praye, and not to labour to do thereafter, is to dally with God.

Two kinds of feare.

What prayer is vaine.

None that is godly is vncertaine of his saluation.

The etimology of faith

Our flesh is to be taken heede of, for that it is weake and vncleane.

What is to be feared touching the church. It is not possible that the church should perishe. Perticuler churches may faile.

We indly feare touching our posteritie.

Otherwise thou also shalt be cut of.] None which beleueth, ought as touching himself to be perswaded that he shalbe cut of. For faith suffreth not this persuasion to take place. The Lord saith, that he which beleueth passeth from death vnto life, not to euery kinde of life, but vnto eternall life: whiche is now already begunne, and shall be accomplished in the world to come. Wherefoze seeing that eternall life is promised vnto vs, we ought in no wise to doubt therof: euery one of the faithfull beleueth that he is adopted of God into his sonne, and that he is elected vnto eternall life. Wherefoze it shalbe vnto him as he beleueth. For the Etimology of this woorde faith many thinke hereof to come, as though that shall indeede be done which is spoken. Howbeit he which so beleueth, ought alwayes to be mindfull of perseuerance, and not to liue loosely, and ought also to imploze at Gods hands his gift and grace to abide in his bountefulnes, touching the obtainment whereof we oughte not to doubt, when as God hath both promised it vnto his, and also a faithfull prayer cannot be powzed out with doubting, as the Apostle James testifieth: howbeit, it is profitable attentively to looke vpon our flesh, which is weake and euery way vncleane, neyther is any thinge in the nature thereof, but that it may be damned. Wherefoze these wordes of the Apostle stirreth vs vp to brydle the pride therof, and to brydle the security of it, and also to shake of sluggishnes. Howbeit for the retaining still of certainty we must fly vnto that, whiche is a little afterward witten, that the giftes and calling of God are without repentance. And that we may see howe profitable this admonition of the Apostle is vnto the faithfull, and not in any wayes in vayne, we will vse this distribution, firste to see as touching the church what is to be feared. If we speake of the whole church we muste not in any wise feare that it shall ever faile: for Christ hath promised that he will be with it vnto the end of the world. It may indeede be tempted, cifted, and shaken: but utterly ouerthrowen it can not be. And therfoze we pray that the crosse, temptations, and persecutions thereof might be allwaged, and turned to good. But touching perticuler churches, for that it is possible that they maye be transferred, we do pray both against their continuall temptations, and also that with them and especially with our church may abide the kingdome of God. And as touching our posterity also there is cause why we shoulde feare, for that the promise is indefinitely set forth, and vnles it be contracted by election and predestination, it maye come come to passe that it shall not comprehend them, as all the Jewes were not comprehended in the promise. And touching infants we may also iudge the like. The covenant indede and promise excludeth them not, yea they are generally ment in these wordes, wherein the lord saith, I wil be thy God, and the God of thy seed. Under which promise we baptise them, and visibly incorporate the into the church, who yet when they come to age may reiect the couenante, and contemne the Gospell: whereby is made manifeste that they in very dede pertained not to election and vnto the promises. Wherefore we may iustly feare, least they should not stande, as we see happened in Ismaell and Esan. There are moreover in the church some πρόδοχοι, that is, which beleue but for a time, and in time of temptacion step backe, as did Judas, and they which in time of persecutions denied Christe: wherefore for these also we haue greate cause to be afeard. And touching those which sincerely beleue in Christ, although they haue confidence of their saluation, and are assured thereof, yet so long as we liue here there alwayes hang ouer our heads many fals, and those greate, as it is manifeste in Peter and in Dauid. Wherefore they haue wherof to be afeard, although they be not afeard, that they shall eternally be damned, but assuredly hope that either they shall be defended of God from fallinge, or that if they do fall they shalbe restored againe: as we also haue confidence of them which are excommunicated: for they are not cast out of the church that they shoulde perishe, but that at the last their spirite should be saued. And therfore the elect also and they which sincerely beleue, ought continually to be afearde of falles, and that they be not cut of from Christ, at the least way for a time. And of this restitution of them that haue fallen is also mencion made in Jeremy the 3. chapter. Thou hast played the harlot with thy louers, howbeit retorne againe. All these things declare vnto vs, that this exhortacion of Paul vnto feare, is not vnprofitable: when as we ought so many ways to be careful both for our selues & also for others. Chrysostome addeth also hereunto, that the abuse of the grace of God which raigneth amongst vs, ought to be vnto vs a great feare and horror so often as we consider it.

If thou continue in his goodnes. Otherwise thou also shalt be cut of. And they also if they abide not still in vnbeliefe, shalbe grafted in agayn. Forasmuch as it is not to be doubted, but that very many of the Jewes so fell away, that they sinned against the holy ghost, and could no more be grafted in againe, it is manifest, that Paul speaketh these thinges, which he speaketh, indifferently of y people of the Jewes, as touching a part. Further, forasmuch as it is vncertayne, whe a man doth fall into so horrible a case, vnles it be declared by some certayne peculiar reuelation of God, therefore Paul so speaketh, that we should not put away all hope of any man, so longe as he liueth here. Chrysostome semeth now to alter his mind, as touching that y he had before spoken, namely, that all thinges ought to be attributed vnto the grace of God, and that merites or good workes are not to be regarded. For by this he sayth, It is manifest, how greate the dominion of our purpose, and the power of our will is: as though it should lie in our hand to stand in the goodnes of God, or not to abide in incredulitye, when we are fallen into it. And for some profe and confirmation of this his corrupt sentence: he from the true sense wresteth these wordes, If thou continue in his bountefulnes, and saith, If thou shalt do the things which worthely are correspondent vnto the goodnes of God, and he sayth not, If thou shalt abide in fayth, for fayth onely is not sufficient. These thinges in very dede are not so. For Paul althoughe he sayd not, If thou abide in fayth, yet is it all one when he sayth, If thou abide in his bountefulnes. For χρηστότης, as we a litle before sayd, is goodnes, and a certeyne redines of the mind to do good to any. In this goodnes of God, sayth he, if thou abide, that is, if thou fall not away from it: In which wordes he most manifestly attributeth vnto the goodnes of God our conseruation. For of it dependeth fayth, whereby we are saued. Wherefore he putteth the cause in stede of the effect. For before he had sayd, Thou standest by fayth, but that thou shouldest not thinke that y fayth is of thy self, now he maketh mencion of bountefulnes, whereof as of his true beginning fayth dependeth, and that this is true, it is plainly to see by the Antithesis or

S. iij.

contrary

Many fals hange ouer
the faith-
fuls heads.
We are in hope that they whom we excom-
municate,
may be restored a-
gayne.
The godly also haue in hereof to be afeard.

Paul put-teth the cause for the effect.

contrary position. For he sayth, If they abide not in their incredulity, they shall be restored agayne, thou shalt be cut of, if thou continue not in his bountefulnes. This bountefulnes, as thou seest, is opposite vnto incredulity: and therefore it occupieth the place of fayth, and that very aptly, when as fayth is inspired vnto vs by the singular bountefulnes of God. Neyther ought we to thinke (which thing that godly father seemeth to goe aboute to proue) that it lieth in the handes of euery man, either to continue and to abide in a good and holy purpose, or els, if peradventure we fall, to be restored agayne. For what dead man is able to rayse by himselfe agayne? or in steele of a stony hart to graft in himselfe a fleshy hart? And, that perseverance also is the gift of God, the Apostle declareth when he sayth, that it is God which geueth both to will and to preforme, and that according to his good will. And Augustine wrote a very good booke, De bono perseverantia, whereout we may abundantly gather sound doctrine. But what neede there many arguments for proue hereof. Paul himselfe discusseth this question when he addeth:

Perseverance is the gift of God.

True faith which is never alone

Amongest the effectes of faith, iustification hath the first place.

Whether fall is more greivous, the fall of the Jewes, or the fall of the Ethnikes.

For God is able to graft them in agayne.] He sayth not, that it lieth in their handes: this worke he attributeth vnto God only. Why do we then runne vnto the power of our owne will, or to the determination of our owne purpose? And whereas he sayth, that fayth alone is not sufficient when we speake of iustification, this is in no wise to be receaved, especially seeing that he himselfe in another place sayth, that fayth alone is sufficient, and so is contrary to hymselfe. Notwithstanding to auoyde confusion in serching out of these thinges, this we ought to know, that the true and iustifying faith is never alone, but hath ioyned with it other good workes and vertues. But yet as the effects thereof, which effects followe naturally after that it hath iustified the beleuer, so that amongest other effects iustification hath the first place. Origen noteth in this place that, of the Leues it is sayd ἐκκλησίου, that is, they are broken of, but of the Gentiles ἐκκοπή, that is, thou shalt be cut of: and he thinketh it a farre more greivous thinge to be cut of, then to be broken of: as though the punishment of the Gentiles, if they should fall away from the faith receaved, should be more greivous then the punishment of the Jewes, which were remoued from their old estate. I can scarcely be perswaded, that Paul in these wordes had such subtile understandings. Further the holy scriptures neuer in any place make mention, that the fall of the Gentiles should be more greivously punished then the fall of the Jewes. Yea, rather if a man will consider the matter well, he shall see, that if punishments ought to be according to the sinnes, whersoever is the greivouser sinne, there ought to be the greivouser punishment inflicted. And if the Leue and the Ethnike be equally placed in the calling of God, and both, as it possibly may be do fall, it is out of doubt, that the Leue sinneth more greivously: for that besides the fayth of Christ, which he hath common with the Ethnike, he was in comparison of him endued with many other gifts: which soasmuch as he hath neglected in falling away from God, he is the more ingrate, and therefore his fault is the greater. That the Leues shall at the last be restored agayne, the Apostle proueth by the power of God. And his argument is taken a maiori, that is, of the greater: If God could graft thee into it being by nature a wild olive tree, and strange from a good olive tree, how much more is he able to restore the branches which were in tymes past broken of from the fat olive tree? And when he sayth, that the Gentiles were cut of from the naturall wild olive tree, he seemeth to asseigne, that malice or wickednes is naturally in them, which ought not to be vnderstanded of nature as it was instituted of God, which was created good, but as it is corrupted thorough the sinne of Adam, and so by generation deriued into his posterity.

A distinction of the nature of man.

And wast contrary to nature grafted into the true olive tree.] Shall we say, that it is contrary to the nature of men, though they be Ethnikes and infidells, to be called agayne to God, and to be conuerted vnto pietie? We must make a distinction of the nature of men, either as it is referred vnto God, or as it is referred to his owne proprieties. For as it is referred vnto God, there can nothing thing be done of him in it, which is not sayd to be done according to nature: for this is naturall to every thing created, to be subiect vnto his Creator. And man was made to the Image of God, and to this end instituted to be ioyned to his Creator: wherefore both by the first counsell of God, whereby he made man, & also by the nature of things created which are naturally subiect vnto the efficacy and working of their author, it is naturall vnto men, religiously to cleave vnto God. Wherefore sinners are not sayd to be grafted into the good olive tree against nature: neither in this respect are miracles done, eyther besides nature or agaynst nature. But if we looke vpon the properties and qualities of things, both miracles are not according to nature, yea, rather they are repugnant vnto it, and men are contrary to nature called backe to true piety, and grafted into a good tree. Wherefore Augustine aptly said, that to haue possibility to beleue, is of nature: but to beleue is of grace. I knowe that there are some which in this place refferre contrary to nature this way, that the spirituall grafting in, is contrary to the naturall grafting in, which men according to the rules of husbandry vse, when as in naturall grafting, the graste, which is grafted in bringeth forth fruite agreeable to his owne sappe, & not to the sappe of the stock wherinto it is grafted. But here the branches of the wild olive tree grafted into the fatte olive tree, draw their sappe wherout they bring forth good frutes, not of their owne naturall plant, but of that wherinto they are grafted. These things without doubt as I haue before mencioned, are true, but they seme not to serue to the purpose of Paul. The summe is, that there is a greater conformity, agreeableness, and proportion betwene branches broken of to their owne plant, then betwene straunge branches to the selfe same plant. But because this conformity though it be neuer so nigh is not of it selfe sufficient, therefore the power of God is necessarily to be had. Whiche power is sufficient to graste in any, whether they be nigh or farre of, or howsoever they be. God is able (saith Iohn) of these stones to raise vp children vnto Abraham. And the Lord sayth, Things which are impossible with men, are possible with God. The Prophets and all the scriptures in a manner, when any great things or after a sort incredible are to be looked for at Gods hands, commaunde vs to consider the power of God. And thereof commeth vnto the godly most sweete consolation, if at any time any great aduersities hange ouer their heddes: for they doo not easely feare the power of their aduersaries, which set before their eyes the power of their heavenly father. And hereof it commeth that the Church when it prayeth for helpe at Gods hands, alwayes in a manner in the beginning of their prayers hath these two wordes, Almighty God. Neither is this to be passed over, that it commeth to passe farre otherwise in vs then in God, both in all other things in a manner, and also in this thing chiefly. For in vs the will extendeth a great deale farther, then the power, when as oftentimes we will very many things, which yet we are not able to performe. But it is cleane contrary with God, for he is able to do many more things then he will. For the Father coulde haue geuen vnto his sonne which was euen at the point to be crucified eleuen legions of Angels, which should straight way haue deliuered him, but he would not. But if a man say that it is not a strong argument a posse, ad esse, as the Logicians vse to speake, that is, from possibility, to being, and therefore Paul ought not to conclude that the Jewes shalbe grafted in againe, for that God is able to performe that thing, for besides power is also required will: We answere that here can no controversy be made touching his will, for that he is ready to do them good, the promises, the covenant which he made, and the benefits which he bestowed vpon their elders, playnly declare. Further if he would graft in the Gentles being straungers, why should we doubt, but that he will one day bestow the like benefit vpon the Jewes? Wherefore this we may affirme that the nation of the Jewes is at this tyme like vnto the roote of some good tree in the tyme

It is naturall to the creature to be subiect to his creator.

Branches proper haue greater conformity to their owne plants, then straunge plantes.

In the beginning of prayers are well put these wordes, almighty God. The power of God extendeth farther then the his will. How an argument a posse ad esse, is in this place of force.

A simile made.

God hath not extinguished the zeale, but daily calleth
some of the.

Certain tokens of the nobilitie of the nation of
the Jewes.

of winter, which roote if one that hath no skill looke vpon, he will soone comteinne, plucke, vp and burne it if it lye in him. But a skilfull husbandman will say, that it ought to be spared, and will be moze carefull to cherishe it: for he knoweth that when the time commeth he shall haue thereof leanes, flowers, & fruites. So vndoubtedly doth God deale with the Jewes, he extinguisheth not that stocke, but oftentimes out of it calleth some vnto him, and towards the end of the world looketh for great plenty of his elect to come thereout. For that any holynes is to be attributed vnto that stocke or generation, if it be considered by it selfe: for as we haue already twise admonished, as touching it selfe it is condemned and obnoxious vnto the curse. Which thing Paul acknowledged when he sayd, We are by nature the children of wrath, as others are. But when these excellent things are spoken in the commendation of the nation of the Jewes, vnto it is adioyned the fauor of God and his promise, and covenant, which yet burst not forth into acte, but only as touching the elect. Of which things yet there ap-peare some markes in others: for they are studious of the law and of the word of God, although they vnderstand it not rightly, and as Paul sayd, They haue the zeale of God, but not according to knowledge, which things although vnto them they are sinnes, yet is it a certaine light and shew of that nobility wherof we speake.

For I would not brethern that ye should be ignoraunt of this mystery, least ye shoulde be high mynded, that partly blindnes is come vnto Israell, vntil the fulnes of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israell shalbe saued, as it is written. Out of Sion shall the deliuerer come & shal burne away the vngodlines from Jacob And this is my testament with them, whē I shall take away their sins.

How much the tranquility of churches is to be desired,

What mystery signifieth, & how many signi-
fications it hath.

For I would not brethern that ye should be ignoraunt of this mystery. I The entent of the Apostle now is to proue, that in the nation of the Jewes still remayneth sēde of election, which thing he doth many wayes. First, he setteth forth his prophesy which he calleth a mystery, after that he bringeth testimonies of the Prophets, then he declareth the nature of the vocation and giftes of God, namely, that they are without repentance, last of all he teacheth that the order of thinges so requireth: and he abideth long in this matter, for that of the full knowledge thereof much depended the peace and quietnes of the Church at that tyme.
And how much the peace and tranquillity of Churches is to be desired, we may easily hereof gather, if we loke vpon the contrary. Doubtles it is a miserable and horrible thing, to see in one and the selfe same body the members at discorde one with an other, yea rather fighting one against an other. And when he saith brethern, and saith, that he setteth forth a mystery, he moueth them to geue diligent attentiuenes. Mystery, Chrysostome sayth in this place, signifieth a thing vnknoen, vnspeakeable, which is full of admiration, and is contrary to the opinion of men. Augustine in his booke de predestinatione sanctorum, when he interpre-teth this place turneth mystery by this word, Sacrament. And touching the sig-nification of this word mystery, I finde that it is diuers in the scripture. Sometimes it is a secret thing, and which happeneth contrary to hope, and to the iudge-ment of our reason, as Paul saith in the first to the Corinthians, Behold I tell vnto you a mystery, We shal not all slepe, but we shal all be changed. And vnto the Colos. vnto the Ephesians he calleth the vocation of the Gentiles a mystery. Sometimes mystery signifieth that which is indeede partly knowen vnto vs, but yet not perfectly, but the perfect knowledge thereof is reserued till we come to our contrey, where we shall be in full possession thereof: and this is it which Paul sayd, I speake wisdom in a mystery. Of this kind are the articles of the faith, which we beleue, but not fully vnderstand: Now we partly know, but then we shall know as we are known. Lastly that is called a mystery, which setteth forth one thing vnto our sece, and ministreth vnto our minde and spirite an other thing, as Paul sayth of the coupling together
of

of the man and the wife in matrimony, for it signifieth vnto vs the coniunction of Christ with the Church. Neither for any other consideration are our sacraments, Baptisme, I say, and the Eucharist, called misteries, in which bread, wine, and water are shewed vnto the senses, but farre other thinges are signified. But why they are called Sacraments, it is more hard to gather. Whobeit this must we knowe that amongst the Latins this word Sacramentum, that is a sacrament, is take for an oth: so that we reade oftentimes euen in good writers, those wordes Sacramenta militaria, that which signify othes pertaining to warre: for they which were admitted into warrefare sware that they would manfully do whatsoeuer they? Generall captayne commaunded them to do for the pub. welch of Rome. So long as they were bound with this sacrament or othe, they could not depart from warfare, and it was neuer lawfull for them to fight agaynst they? enemies, vnles they were bound by Sacramentum militare, that is, by the othe of warre. Wherefore soasmuch as in these misteries and sacramentes, and manifest simboles we are adoynd vnto the host of Christe and vnto the Church, whereinto we were before thorough the spirit and sayth hiddenly grafted, therefore were they called sacramentes. And besides this, as Varro telleth in his booke de Lingua Latina, when any matter of contention was, both the playntife, and also the defendant layd downe with the priestes a certayne summe of money and of other thinges which was layd by in some holy place: and he which had the upper hand, receaued agayne out of the holy place, that which he had layd downe, so that he was sayd to receaue agayne his sacrament: but he which had the foyle was punished, and the thinges which he had layd downe were forfeated and put into the common theasozp. Whereby it is manifest that a sacrament signifieth not only the inuocation of the name of God, which is vsed in an othe: but also a certayne bond. And for that in those ceremonies which the Church now calleth sacramentes, men binde themselves vnto the ecclesiasticall society: and do also addia themselves vnto God, and God by them sealeth his promises, therefore it seemeth that they are not without good consideration called sacramentes. And this is to be noted that such ceremonies are called misteries, when they are taken in that third signification which we haue now mencioned. But here misery pertaineth vnto the first, for the Apostle now openeth that, which was hidden vnto humane reason, and should come to passe contrary to the opinion of the Gentiles. For when they saw the Jewes such enemies vnto God, they thought that they should neuer agayne be receaued.

Be not high minded. ] In Greke it is ὑψηλός. Which word seemeth to be referred vnto prudence and wisdom, so that the Latine interpreter turneth it, Ne sitis sapientes apud vosmetipsos. his, be not wise in your owne conceate. Which sence Origen also followeth, when he sayth, that this is the wisdom which properly cometh of God, whereby we are impelled not to be puffed vp agaynst our neyghbours. And he maketh mencion of an other wisdom of the fleshe which the Apostle now reproveth. But I thinke rather that that word ὑψηλός is to be transferred vnto the affect, namely, that we should not be high minded. And this affect commonly hereof springeth, for that men thinke that they haue by they? owne strength gotten the giftes which they haue, and thereby are stirred by in respect of themselves to disdain others. By these wordes we may easely perceave what the scope of the Apostle is, namely, to reconcile vnto the Jewes those whome he admonished, and to take away the discord, which the Church was infected with.

Blindnes is partly come vnto Israell. ] Origen in expounding of these wordes somewhat digresseth, whose digression I thinke it good here to touch, At the beginning (sayth he) the most highest deuised the earth vnto the children of men according to the number of the Angells, so that euery nation was vnder the gouernment of some one Angell: but the people of Israell he reserued vnto himselfe as peculiar and proper, whome he would by himselfe gouern. These thinges it seemeth he toke out of the booke of Deut: the 32. chapter according to the translation of the 70. interpreters for there they

How our sacraments are called misteries.

Sacramentum militare.

A manner bound of them which had any matter of contention

Wisdom of two sortes.

Wherof springeth haughtines of the munde.

Angels are ouer diuers regions.

God governed also the Israelites
by angels.
God excluded not the Gentiles
his prou-
dence.

Lex talio-
nis.

The scripture testifi-
eth not that the angels whi-
che are gouernours ouer regions
are euill.

Origens
rule in reasoning the prophecies.

they haue κατα ἀριθμὸν ἀγγέλων θένον. That is, according to the number of the angelles of God. But in the Hebrew it is not so, for in the Hebrew it is written Lemitpar bene Ischraell that is, according to the number of the children of Israell. That the Angelles as ministers gouerne diuerse regions I deny not, but that can not by that place be proued, but rather it may be proued by Daniell. Further we may not thinke that God without the ministry of Angelles gouerned the Israelites: for we know that he many times sent angelles vnto the Fathers and vnto the Prophets: howbeit we are assured that by reason of the singular giftes and wonderfull fauour of God, the Israelites were vnto him a peculiar people. That he had utterly no care ouer the Gentiles, it is not to be thought. For he had a singular care ouer Iob, ouer the Philistines, ouer Naaman the Syrian, ouer all those which in Chaldea and Persia beleued by the meanes of Daniell, and his fellowes. Origen addeth, So long as that the Israelites claue first vnto God, as his singular inheritance, the Gentiles could not come vnto him, for the possession was enioyed of others: but it happened, that the Angelles which gouerned ouer the Gentiles, and held the after a sort captiues enuied this so blessed estate of the Israelites, and therefore entisemētēs drew them away from God, namely, vnto idolatry, and to other wicked fables. And God seeing this, suffred it, and resisted not, but the lewes being withdrauen from him, he called the Gentiles, and toke them out of the handes of the Angelles, and made them his people. So that God here vsed the lawe of the like, for in that thing wherein the ill Angelles sought after a sorte to haue taken him, they were taken themselues: and whilst they went about to take away an other mans seruantes, they lost those whome they already possessed. Hereby I see that this man was of this mind, that the Angelles whome God hath set ouer diuers regions are euill, which thing is not mencioned in the scriptures. Paul indeed sayth, that the deuill and euill sprites are the rulers of darknes, & he calleth them gouerners of the world: for they are Gods ministers in the world to auēge sinnes, neither should they be able to tempt the iust, vnles God permitted them: yea they were not able to enter inter into the swine, before that Christ had geuen them leue. These thinges I say we know right well, but that those Angelles which are called the princes of the Grecians, or of the Persians are euill I thinke not, yea rather they are good, whome God will haue to defend kingdomes and prouinces, that they should not be destroyed thorough the malice & violence of Sathan. But that which he afterward addeth is true, both that by the plucking away of the Iewes from God is place made vnto the Gentiles, and also that God by his prouidence hath appoynted those courses and alterations, that so long as the Iewes beleued the Gentiles should be excluded, and the Iewes being made blind, the Gentiles should enter in: but yet not in such sorte that the Iewes should abide still in theyr blindness, for at the last when the Gentiles are illuminated, they shall see in what good case we are, and how unhappely all things go with the, so that being by emulation picked forward, they shall say, as it is writtē in Ose the prophet, I will return vnto my first husband for then was it better with me, then it is now. And God wil neuer forget his leage & covenant, as he hath many times testified by Ieremy & by other prophetes. And soasmuch as the Iewes were made blind, that the Gentiles should enter in, it followeth that the Gentiles being entred in, the blindness of the Iewes shall cease. Wherefore it is sayd, When the fulnes of the Gentils shall be entred in, all Israel shall be made safe. But who they be that pertainē vnto this whole Israel, & who they be that are that fulnes of the Gentils, none knoweth but god only, & the sonne of God, & they if there be any such which are his deere frends to whom he hath revealed it. These thinges I doubt not but are true, for that the secretes of the predestination and eternall election of God can by no manner of meanes be knowne of vs: but yet he sayth hereby this we may vnderstand, that none of the Israelites, if they be Israelites onely as touching the flesh shall haue saluation: and also that none of the Gentils shall be saued, vnles they pertainē to this fulnes: wherof is mention now made. And he addeth a rule which we ought to obserue in reding of the Prophets, that so often as we read any dolefull and horrible things spoken against the Gentils, we should apply the to those which wer none of that fulnes: but whē we here any pleasant ioyful and happy things spoken, then let vs know that they pertainē unto this fulnes. And so as touching the Jewes, where the Propheets speak things prosperous of them, let them bee vnderstanded of election and of the holie remnant, but when they speake of thinges sharpe and troublesome, we must applye them to the blinded and to the reiected. But in the meane time let vs not cease to wonder, how God being most wise turneth to the saluation of others that destruction whiche men thorough their owne defaulte bring vnto themselves. But the better to vnderstand touching the Israelites that shalbe saued, and touching thys fulnes, he saith. They which are by the word of God and preaching of the Gospell purged, shall obtaine saluation: but they which are not by these purged, shall be deliuered vnto fires to be purged. We graunt indeede that men are purged by the woord and by preaching, for it is witten, by faith purifying their hearts. We graunt also that they which are not purged, ar deliuered vnto fires, but not to be purged, as though the punishmentes of the damned, that is, of infidels which haue neither receiued the woord of God, nor preaching of the Gospell shall euer haue end. And that he so beleued, it is manifest, both by other booke of his, and also by those thinges which he here addeth. For he saith, This purgation by fire how long time, or how many hundred yeres it shall last, only the sonne is able to know, vnto who the father hath geuen all iudgement. What other thing els is this, but of the paynes of hell to make suche a purgatory as the Papistes haue sayned: Neither is he holpe by that testimony which he bringeth, namely, that God will haue al men to be saued: for as we haue before taught, that sentence of the Apostle hath a farre other sence. Now that we haue noted these things in Origen, let vs somewhat moze diligentlpe peise that whyche Paul sayth.

Blindnes is partly come to Israel. It was before declared, who sent that blindenes, and it was concluded that it was done of God, whilest he punisheth sin by sinne, without any his fault, for sinne claue only in them which are made blind. And when Paul here speaketh of Israell, he taketh the woord properly, and not by an allegorye.

Partly, for that the blindnes shall not be perpetual in that nation. It may also haue a respect vnto the remnantes that were saued or it may be referred vnto the time. Chrysostome saith partly, for that all are not made blinde. But by fulnes vnderstand a definite and an appointed multitude, which is therefore called fulnes, for that the number of the beleuers shoulde be a iuste and verie greate number, so that publikely amongst the Gentilles shoulde be gathered a wonderfull great Church. As also all Israell is to be taken for a greate number of the Hebryes amongst whome Christe shoulde be publikely acknowledged. Not that some both of the Gentils and also of the Jewes shall not be destroyed. For vniuersall propositions in the holy scriptures are oftentimes so to be taken, that they ought to be contracted to a definite vniuersality: as this, All fleshe shall see the saluation of God. Again, They shall all be taught of God. Again, God will haue all men to be saued. whiche is to be vnderstanded, as Augustine saith, of all those whiche are saued: for they are made safe by the will of God. Which manner of interpretation Gregorius Nazianzenus also followed in the fift booke of his theologie, where he had to do against those which denied the holy gost to be God, and fained him to be a creature, alledging for themselves that which John writeth of the woord, All thinges were made by it. Whereof they inferred, that the holy Ghoste also was both made and created by the sonne. He aunswereth, that this saying of Iohn is to be vnderstanded of all thinges which are made, as if it should haue bene saide, whatsoeuer thinges are made, are made by him, as August. expoundeth, As many as are saued, ar saued by the will of God. This connexion of the blindenes of Israell with the entringe in of the fulnes of the Gentils hath not an naturall order, but is firme onely by the disposition and order appointed of the prouidence of God. This particle partly Ambrose most aptly referreth vnto time. I knowe there are some whiche by all Israell, of whome the Apostle now speaketh, vnderstande the people of God gathered both out of the Gentils and also out of the Jewes, which people is dayly gathered together euen vnto the ende of the woord, neither thinke they that there is to be looked

With how great wisdom God vseth the destruction of the wicked. When are purged by the woord of God and by preaching.

The wicked shall by fires be consumed and not purged.

Origen made of hell the papistes purgatory.

Vniuersall propositions in the holy scriptures how they are to be vnderstanded.

The connexion of the blindnes of Israell, with the entrying in of the Gentiles is not natural.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

Whether
this place
proue that towards the ende of the worlde shalbe great plenty of the Jewes con-
uerted vnto
Christ.

I conciliation of two places whi-
che seme to be repugnant

The Gen-
tles before
they are called, are
without.

for any greater aboundance of the Jewes to be conuerted. But if we follow this exposition, what mystery or what secret had Paul now reuealed: all men saw that some of the Hebrynes were dayly conuerted and came vnto Christe. Further it is most manifest, that Paul went with a certain peculiar commendation to adorne the Jewes, to the end they should not be contented of the Gentils. But if he should haue saide as these men meane, then shoulde he haue spoken no new thing at all, when as it was manifeste vnto all men, that some few of the Jewes were dayly conuerted vnto Christe. Moreover the foretellings of the Propheates, as we shall straight way see, entreat not of any certain perticuler men, but speake euen of the multitude or people of the Jewes. Finally by that meanes Israell should seme to be taken allegorically, whiche in no wise agreeth with the entente of the Apostle. Yea and many of the fathers incline this way that the fulnes of the Gentils being entred in, the Jewes also shall retorne vnto Christ. Chrysostome in his 12. Homely de verbis Domini in Marcum, in the 2. Tome, when he entreateth of the figge tree that was dried by at the word of the Lord, saith, If Christ had found fruit in the figge tree, the fulnes of Gentils had not entred in: but because the fulnes of the Gentiles hath entred in, all Israell shall at the last be saued. And he addeth, that whiche is writen in the Apocalipse of Iohn: Of the Tribe of Iuda were sealed xii. thousande, of the tribe of Rubene were sealed xii. thousand. And also Hilarius, in his xi. booke de Trinitate when he entreateth that the Sonne shall deliuer by the kingdome vnto God and vnto the father, but in the meane time it behoueth him to raigne vntill he haue put his enemies vnder his fete, by enemies vnderstandeth the Israelites, who although according to election and for they fathers sake they were beloued, yet are they enemies for our sakes, and according to the Gospell. The selfe same thing also testifieth he vpon the 58. and 60. Psalmes. And if a man diligently loke he shall see that the reste of the fathers likewise write the like, when they enterprete these places. And Gennadius amongst others, as the Greeke Scholies declare saith, that Paul addeth, Partly, because of election: for the electe are not made blinde, and then he addeth, that God will afterward take them all vnto him. But they which thinke that this is by no meanes to be looked for, are hereby moued, for that all Israell shall neuer be saued, but some shall perish. But that word, All, as we haue declared, is not so to be vnderstanded, as though no Israelite as touchng the flesh shalbe excluded. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the 118. question toucheth either of these opinions. But what shall we say vnto the words of Christ wherein he sayth, Dooft thou thinke that when the sonne of man commeth he shall find faith vpon the earth? Merely if the Jewes be in such great plenty conuerted vnto Christ, and that with the commodity of the Gentles, as we haue before declared, then shall there remayne much faith, which Christ when he returneth vnto vs shall find. But we may answere, that here is no contrariety, for Antichrist shall subuert in a manner all thinges, so that if it were possible, the elect also should be decreased, which Antichrist when he shall by the spirite of the mouth of Christ be slaine, peradventure the Jewes shall retorne againe and shall acknowledge their Messias, and shall confirme the Gentils being wauering and seduced. It is possible also, that when the Jewes shall beleue, and the Gentils shall after a certayne tyme put to their helpe, then, as the nature of the flesh is, may arise some security, and licentiousnes, especially if Antichrist follow, by meanes whercof an infinite number both of the Jewes and of the Gentils may be alienated from Christ; so that that shalbe true, that Christ when he commeth shall find very fewe which purely and sincerely shall confesse him. Whether of these two opinions a man reueaue, there is no absurdity, and he shall easely thereby conciliate these places, but whither of them is the truer I can not certainly iudge, neither is the knowledge thereof necessary to saluation. Let vs consider also, that when Paul sayth, that the fulnes of the Gentles shall enter in, he thereby noteth, that before the preaching of the Gospell the Gentles were without, for as much as they should afterwarde enter in. Neither spake Christ any other wise whē he sayth, that they which were in in the high wayes and streates should be compelled to enter in. Ambrose expounding these wordes saith, That then shalbe wyped away from the eyes of the Jewes their blindnes, that they may beleue. In which wordes he declareth, that so long as this execration abideth, they can not beleue. And he addeth, That God prohibiting from their hartes the spirit of pricking which worketh in them blindnes, may render vnto the the fre choyce of the will. In this sentence he manifestly declareth, what he thought of free will, namely, as touching those thinges which pertain vnto iustification and vnto regeneration. Whatsoever he writeth of it in other places, here he most truly affirmeth, that straungers from Christ want liberty of will, which then is restored vnto them, when they are illuminated.

Ambroses munde touching free
will.

As it is written, Out of Sion shall the deliuerer come, and shall turne away the vngodlines from Iacob. This p[ro]p[he]cie which he bringeth out of the sayings of the Prophets, hath in the conclusion necessity only by supposition, and not absolutely. The strength of the argument herein consisteth, for that deliuey was by covenant promised vnto Israel. But with the Gentiles there was neuer before Christs tyme any league or covenant publicly made. There was in deede a promise of their calling. For it was sayd vnto Abraham: In thy sede shal all Gentles be blessed. but in very deede there was no couenaunt publicly made with the Gentiles. Neither can this deliuey be vnderstanded as touching any p[er]ticular persons, when as it is promised vnto Sion and vnto Iacob, by which names, not any singular persons are signified, but the whole people. This testimony as touching the greater part thereof is taken out of the 59. chap. of Esay, and part of Ieremy, and especially out of the 31. chapter towards the end. Origen & Ambrose affirme that it is taken out of Esay. And Ambrose peculiarly seemeth to saye that the conuersion of certayne of the Jewes p[er]ticularly, which happened dayly was a certaine experimēt of the will of God as touching the restitution of that nation. Howbeit that which Esay speaketh in the 59. chapter, is not in all pointes as touching the wordes in such sort as the Apostle now alleadgeth them. For he after this maner followeth the 70. interpreters, who not as touching the sence, but only as touching the wordes. In Hebreu it is, Vba lesion goel vleschabe pescha beiaacov vehum ichouah: that is, Where shall come a redemer saith the Lord vnto Sion, and vnto those in Iacob, which shal repent them from their iniquities. And then is added, And this is my couenaunt with them, sayth the Lord, my spirit shal be vpon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thy mouth, shal not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy sede, nor out of the mouth of the sede of thy sede. Whereas in the Hebreu it is sayd, Vnto Sion shall come the redemer, the Seventy as Ierome writeth haue turned it, out of Sion: whome Paul also followed. And it wel known that Christ was borne of the Jewes who are ment by the name of Sion: and the word of the Lord and preaching of the Gospell therence had his beginning, although the Greke edition which we vse, hath ἐκ τῆς σιών, that is, for Sions sake, whereby it is manifest that this which we haue, either is not the translation of the 70. or els it is in many places corrupted. And Ierome addeth, that this word Noal according to the nature of the Hebreu signifieth to be nigh, so that is all one with ἐγγύς, which signifieth nigh, namely vnto whome the inheritance of the kinsman that is dead cometh. Wherefore the sence of the Hebreu wordes is, that vnto Sion shall come a nigh deliuerer. Moreover, that which is written both of the 70. and of Paul, And he shall turne away the vngodlines from Iacob, is in the Hebreu, Lishbe which they peradventure toke as though it were written Leshob peschaa, but this maketh no disagreeing as touching the sence. For they which are deliuered by faith from their sinnes haue alwayes repentaunce annexed and ioyned with their faith, not as a condition which should be the cause of remission, for this should be a condition of the law, and vnprofitable, when as no man is able to performe it: but an euangelicall condition, as which followeth the forgettenes of sins or iustification, at least by nature, & is acceptable vnto God: for whatsoever waiteth therof by reaso of our infirmity is holpe by the merits of Christ.

Before the gospell was preached
there was no league
made with the Gentles.

The Greke translation
which we vse, is ether
not the tra-
nslat[i]o[n] of the 70. or els it is corrupted. Faith whiche iustifi-
eth hath re-
pentaunce annexed with it.

And this is my testament with the. ] That which followeth in Esay touching the spirite and word of God, excellently setteth forth vnto vs the couenant or leage of God. For first are the wordes of the promise, which also shall alwayes remaine amongst the saythfull; which yet should be vnprofitable, vnles ther to were added the spirite, whereby the hartes of the hearers are moued to beleue.

VWhen I shall take away theyr sinnes. ] This part is not read in Esay, wherefore it may be taken as a compendious interpretation of those thinges which the Prophet before spake of the couenant, for where the spirite is, & the wordes of God are spoken, when we embrace them by sayth streight way soloweth forgiveness of sinnes: and for that the prophet expessed not the effect, Paul thought he would manifestly set it forth. Otherwise it is gathered out of h 31. chap. of Jeremy, where when mencion had bene made of h new couenant, h first being abrogated, it is sayd; I will be mercifull vnto theyr iniquity, and I will no more remember theyr sinne. And that which Esay speaketh of Sion and of Iacob, and Jeremy also of the house of Iudah and of Jerusalem, can not be taken of Paul allegorically as though in these wordes is signified the number of the saythfull, of what people so euer it be. For as we sayde, Pauls meaninge is peculiarly to commend the Iewes, and to put away the discord which was sprung in the Church betwene the Ethnikes and the Iewes. And in h it is sayd that the Iewes should by the Messias be deliuered from theyr sinnes, it is a sure argument that he should be God, when as it belongeth vnto him only to forgive sinnes. Men may indeede remitte the punishments which they which haue sinned should suffer, and not take vengeance of them: but they are not able to blot out the sinne: for the guiltines abideth still, and he which hath sinned is obnoxious vnto the iustice of God. Only God whome the sinner offendeth is able to blot out such guiltines. Wherefore the Pharises when they saw that Christ toke away the diseases & paynes of the body, which are the effectes of sinnes, and heard him say mozeouer, Thy sinnes are forgiven thee, cried out, that he blasphemed for that he attributed vnto himselfe that which was proper vnto God. But peradventure some man will say, doth God so forgive sinnes, that men may not remitte them? Where to then serue the keyes in the Church? In this case by this meanes is committed error, for that the Papistes imagine farre other thinges of the keyes, then the word of God teacheth. Christ hath left vnto the Church the keyes wherewith sinnes should be forgiven, which keyes are the word and sayth. For in the word of God is set forth vnto men the promise of God, whereby thorough sayth in Christ sinnes are forgiven, and he which beleueth not, shall be condemned, and his sinnes shall be imputed vnto him. This is one key which the Church vseth, whilest in it is both publiquely and priuately preached the word of God. The other key is sayth: for if any heare, and geue theyr assent vnto these thinges which are set forth vnto the, they haue remission of sins. And these two keyes the Euangelists haue excellently wel declared vnto vs. For in Iohn Christ breathed vpon h Apostles & said, Receiue ye the holy gost, and whose sinnes ye forgive &c. And what he wrought by this brething & spirit, is declared in Luke where it is said, that he had opened vnto the the sence of the scriptures. This key also is set forth in Matth. where Christ commaunded h apostles to go & preach &c. The other key belongeth vnto h heares, namely, h they beleue. He which beleueth shall be saved. Wherefore although the keyes be in the Church, yet do not men geue remission of sinnes: for the keyes are the instrumentes wherby God offereth it. But bycause Paul sayth out of the testimony of Esay, that this is a Testament: and we read the same in the 31. chapter of Jeremy, that the new couenant herein consisteth, that the deliuerer should come, and be mercifull vnto iniquities, there ariseth a doubt, whether the new Testament and the old be diuers or no. Of which matter I haue before spoken somewhat, but now I intend moze at large to encrease thereof.

At the first sight they seme vnderly distinct, so that the one is altogether diuers from These wordes are to be vnderstanded properly of the Istraelites.

In argument wherby is proved that the Messias is God. Only God forgiveueth sinnes.

Of h keyes

The keyes of the church are the word and faith.

Although the keyes be in the church, yet do not men geue remission of sins.

Whether the old Testament and the new be vnderly distinct.

from the other: for in Jeremy it is sayd, that there should be a new Testament, and not according to that which he made with the fathers. And the epistle to the Hebrewes addeth, When he sayth, a new, then is that abolished which was old: but who seeth not but that when one thing abolisheth and maketh voyde another thing, it utterly differeth from the same? There is also another argument, for that as they say in the old testament was not forgiveness of sinnes. For the epistle vnto the Hebrewes in the 10. chap. sayth, That the blood of Goates and of oxen, and of calves could not take away sinnes. But in the new testament no man doubteth but that there is remission of sinnes: wherefore no man will say but that the thinges which in so greates a matter differ, are diuers. But on the other side this is to be considered, that that sayth whereof iustification consisteth, is in eyther Testament one and the same: moreover, that the mediator is one and the same, namely, Christ Iesus: one and the same promise of the remission of sinnes, and of eternall life throught him: the selfe same commaundementes as touching moztall commaundementes: one and the same signification of the sacramentes: one and the selfe same roote and plant, from which some of the Iewes are cut of, and we grafted in theyr place. All which thinges playnly declare, that eyther Testament as touching the substance or essence (if I may so call it) is one and the same thing: although there must be granted some differences by reason of the accidents, which are, that Christ was there knowen, as which should come, but with vs he is knowen, as which is already come. And also theyr simboles or figures were diuers from ours in forme, but of like strength in signification, as Augustine sayth. Moreover they had a certayne and assured pub. welth, for the preservation whereof they had ciuill precepts deliuered vnto them, which we haue not. And finally vnto the promise of the remission of sinnes by the Messias, were in the old time added a greates many other promises, as of the encrease and preservation of theyr posterity, and of the possession of the land of Chanaan, which promises we haue not. And besides all this, our sacramentes are more easy, and fewer in number, and also more manifest, and extend much farther, whē as they are not shut vp in a corner, as theirs were in Iewry, but are spread abroad throughtout the whole world. Wherefore we may affirme that the new testament and the old are in very dede one as touching the substance, and differ only in certayne accidents which we haue not mentioned. But now resteth to answer vnto the two argumentes which were before brought. Touching remission of sinnes, we deny that it was not in the old Testament, for if we consider the promise which there also was of force, by it the elders were iustified. For it was sayd of Abraham, He beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him to righteousness, as the Apostle hath declared. And Dauid sayth: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sinnes are couered. But if we looke vpon the sacramentes or ceremonies, they did not remitte sinnes, as touching the worke, yea neyther haue our sacramentes strength so to do. But whereas Paul sayth vnto the Hebrewes, that the blood of goates, oxen, and calves could not take away sinnes, we deny not this to be true, but yet in the meane time neyther doth Paul deny, but that the faith of the elders, whereby they had a respect vnto Christ and embraced him, in the signification of those sacrifices, iustified, and obteyned remission of sinnes. Doubtles the blood of those sacrifices washeth not away the sinnes of the world, but only the blood of Christ as he sayd, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which shall be shed for you, and for many, for the remission of sinnes. But whereas we are sayd to be baptised into the remission of sinnes, the meaning thereof is, that in that sacrament is sealed vnto vs and signified the remission of sinnes, which by the blood of Christ we haue already obteyned: which selfe thing also is done in the Eucharist, and sayth ought alwayes to go before the receauing of the sacramentes, if we receaue them rightly, and the order be not inuered: for as with out sayth men eate and drinke in the Eucharist vnworthely, so also without faith baptism is vnworthely receaued: which yet is to be vnderstanded touching them

One & the selfe same manner of iustification in each.

One and the same mediator.

The promise of the forgiveness of sinnes & of eternall lyfe is in each.

The selfe same moztall commaundementes, & the selfe same signification of the sacramentes.

The selfe same roote and tree. The substance of eyther Testament is one & the same, the accidents differ. In the olde Testament was iustification, that is, remission of sinnes.

The blood of Christ, and not the blood of sacrifices washeth away sinnes.

How we are baptised into the remission of sinnes.

Faith must go before the receauing of the sacraments them that are of full age: for touching infants, how it is with them we haue elsewhere declared. Wherefore if faith go before, the is it manifest that sinnes are forgiven, which thing the sacraments which follow, scale vnto vs and confirm vs of the will of God: and when they are set forth vnto vs, they oftentimes stirre vp faith no other wise then doth the word of God, when it is heard. So that it is not possible, but that faith being newly stirred vp, iustificatio is more and more taken hold of, and our strengths are more and more renewed to leade a newe life. And therefore whereas Chrysostome when he enterpreteth these wordes saith: When I shall take away their sinnes, they are not yet circumcised, they do not yet offer, & whilst they do other thinges pertaining to the law, their sinnes are taken away. we muste not doubtles so vnderstand him, as though the fathers in y<sup>e</sup> old time when they did these thinges, and by them exercised their faith, for that they sawe Christe signified in them, had not thereby fruite, as we haue: but he so spake, for that now after that Christ hath suffred, these thinges are vnprofitable, & in the old time they did not of the worke it selfe conferre grace, as y<sup>e</sup> Jewes dreamed. In which thing also in our dayes y<sup>e</sup> sophistical diuines are deceined as touching our sacraments. But as touching y<sup>e</sup> other argument, whereas in y<sup>e</sup> epistle vnto y<sup>e</sup> Hebrewes it is said, that the olde testamēt is abolished & made voide, the new taking place, & whereas Jeremy saith, that God wold make a new couenant, not according to the couenant which he made with the fathers, when he brought them out of the land of Egypt: We answer that there the couenant is taken for the law, as it is distinguished from the Gospell: whiche is hereby manifest, for that he sayth, that he will write his lawes in theyr hartes, and will graue them in their inward partes: Which thing is not agreable with the law, whiche onely sheweth sinnes, condemneth and accuseth, neither geueth strengths: yea rather it after a sorte commaundeth infinite thinges, and layeth vpon vs such a burthen, as we are not able to beare, and therefore the prophet there saith, that they abode not in their Testament: Wherefore this word couenant or testament is not there so take, as we now here take it: for as we here entreate of it, it comprehendeth both the law and the Gospell. And this way there is no difference betwene the old testamēt and the new, but onely as we declared. And if thou wilt say that the prophet there also vnderstandeth this word Testament, in such sorte as we now speake of it, we may then graunte that by the comming of Christe is made some abrogation, when as those accidentes, condicions and qualities, which were in the olde testamente are now abrogated. Wherefore therein is v<sup>se</sup>d the figure Sinechdoche, wherby a thing is simply or absolutely sayd to be abolished or made voyde, when it is taken away onely as touching some parte thereof. The Jewes are wonderfully troubled with this sentence of the Prophet, and can scarce tell what to saye: for whilst they seke to defend the old law, and so to defend it, that nothing is thereof to be chaunged, and reprove vs, for that we haue chaunged circumcision into baptisme, and the day of the Sabaoth into the Lords day, and haue reiected many other thinges, how can they affirme that a newe couenaunte shalbe made, and not according to that which was made when they were brought out of Egypte? Here they can scarce tell whiche way to turne themselves. Howbeit leaste they shoulde seeme to geue place, they say that onely the manner shalbe diuers, and thinke that the couenaunte as touching the thinge shalbe one and the same, but that vnder Messias, it shall more firmly and more surely be established. But we may more truly saye that this was done at the beginning of the churche, when so greate a boundance of the holy ghost was poured into the beleevers, y<sup>e</sup> they not onely spread abroad the Gospell throughout the whole world, but also no persecutions nor torments were they neuer so horrible, no nor death though it were most sharp, could cause them to depart from the couenante which they had nowe thorough Christe made with God. And as manye as are in very deede faithfull do willinglye and of their owne accord cleaue vnto the truth and vnto holines. And forasmuch as here is mencion made of the couenant, this is to be knowne, that it is for the most part called of the lattines Testamentum, of the Grekes Διαθήκη, and of the Hebrewes

A place of Jeremy.

The figure Sinechdoche
is v<sup>se</sup>d, when the old Testament is said to be abrogated.

A startyng hole of the Jewes.

Bedith, all which wordes very aptly expresse it. For a testamente is so called, for that it is a testimony of the last will of him, which disposeth his goods, and for that this is done vpon sure consideration & in iust order, the Grecians called it, διαθήκη that is, a disposinge. For the inheritance is ordered in deuiding it amongst the heires. But with the Hebrewes, Bedith, signifieth a league or couenant, which here had great force for in this leage was appoynted that God should be their God, and they his people. And the form and strength of this couenant, leage, and testament herein chiefly consisteth, that our sinnes should be forgiven vs and that by Christ. And when the Prophet writeth, that out of Sion shall come a redeemer vnto Iacob, it is not so to be vnderstanded, as though Christ shall come againe into the worlde to redeme them: for it is sufficient that he in spirite come into their hartes, and be applied vnto them by faith.

By what wordes a testament is called.

A testament why it is so called.

Christ shall not come againe to redeme mankind.

As concerning the Gospel they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching election, they are beloued for the fathers sakes. For the giftes and calling of God are without repentance. For euen as ye in times past haue not beleued God, yet haue now obtained mercy through their vnbeliefe: euen so now they haue not beleued, by the mercy shewed vnto you, that they also maye obteyne mercye. For God hath shutte vp all vnder vnbeliefe, that he myghte haue mercye on all.

As concerning the Gospel they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching election, they are beloued for the fathers sake. The Apostle maye seme here to speake thinges contrarie: for befoze he wrote that the Iewes were reiecte, made blinde, and bled with the spirite of pricking, whereby they were stirred vp againste God. But now he seemeth to make them holy by their stocke, and by the hope of the redemption whiche shall come vnto them to pertayne vnto God. What shall we then say of them? For Gods frendes and enemies are also our frendes and enemies: For if we loue God, it is mete that we count his enemies for our enemies, and his frendes for our frendes. The Apostle in a diuers respect affirmeth eyther to be true of them: according to the Gospel, which they beleue not, which they resiste, whiche they woulde not haue to be spread abroad and to be preached, they are the enemies of God. For your sakes also whose saluation they cannot abide, and whom they enuy for that ye are adoped in to children, they are enemies, so long as the Gospel whilst they are thus blinded is preached, and ye brought to saluation. Now Hilarius in his 11. booke de Trinitate Dei calleth them the enemies of God, we haue befoze declared. Being therfore they are the enemies of God, they oughte also to be our enemies: but not that we should entreat them ill, or hurt them, but rather that we should withstande their wicked enterprises. Will they not beleue: Let vs do the best we can to bring them to beleue: Will they not haue the Gospel preached: Let our care be that it be more diligently preached: Do they seeke to hinder our saluation: Let vs seeke to aduance it. But on the contrary side if we looke vpon election, if we consider the fathers of whome they came, we shall see that they were beloued of God: for he chose their fathers, and would haue the seede yf came of them to be holy, not as touching all which should come of them, but as touching so many, as should be able to adorne that kindred with the name of holines. And this loue hath declared it selfe in those especially, which are as remnantes saued, and shall towards the ende be saued. But in the meane time let vs obserue this rule, that those whome we count for our enemies or frendes, we so counte them for the Gospel or saluation sake, and not for our owne priuate commodities or pleasures sakes, and that that maner that we haue befoze described. Whereunto this also is to be added, that for the amplifieng of the Gospel we suffer at their hands thinges dispitfull and hateful, we suffer them patiently. As forasmuch as the Iewes are, according to election and according to the

What we ought to do against the Iewes which are enemies vnto vs.

We ought not for our priuate commodity sake to count any for our enemies.

couenant made with the fathers, beloued, God will not be vnmindful of his couenant. But whereas Chrysostome saith here, that this consolation of Paul, which he vseth vnto the Iewes, consisteth in wordes only, is in no wise to be receaued: For Paul saith nothing in wordes, which is not firme and sound. Neither is that of any force which is sayd, that the fathers profited them not vnles they beleued, for we also confesse that thing, and affirme that the Iewes whiche are saued, are saued by faith: but we say mozeouer that God is of his mercy and voluntary clemency moued to geue vnto the faith, and this also he doth, for that he wil not be counted vnmindfull of the promises whiche he made with the fathers, and for their progenitozs sakes who were vnto him dearely beloued, he bestoweth vpon the many giftes: for so would he honoꝝ them. As it is sayde of Isaack, in the booke of Genesis, that God would do good vnto hym for hys father Abrahams sake, who had obeyed hys voyce. And in the tenne Commaundementes the same our GOD promyseth that vnto the godly he will do good euen to a thousande generations. Neither is Ambroses interpretacion to be allowed, who saith that forasmuche as they are the children of good parentes, when they repente they shalbe receaued of God: for that the remembraunce of their parents shalbe stirred vp before God. God is not forgetful, neither nedeth he to haue his remembraunce to be stirred vp. Farther his appointment is, y as many as repent shalbe receaued into grace: and whē they first beleue, the acceptatiō of their fathers is not annexed thereunto, but they are receaued for Christes sake in whom they beleue. Howbeit to the end they should beleue and y God should adorne them with faith & motions of y god spirit the friendship & leage wherby god was ioyned to their fathers may be of force, yea & is somewhat of force.

How far-forth the ac-ceptation of
the fathers
conducceth vnto the childzen.

Why men
repent the,
and why God repē-teth him
not.

Places
which seme
to note that God repē-
teth.

God is not moued with affects.

Things
which are geuen by
predestina-
tion are not chaunged.

For the giftes and calling of God are without repentaunce.] By this reason he proueth that the election of God abideth still in that kinred. For this is the nature of God, not to repent him: he is constant and is not chaunged: his singular wisdom suffreth him not to repent. This pertaineth to vniware men, which haue an ill iudgement euen from the beginning, and contrary to whose opinion many things oftentimes happen. But in God can no such thing happen: for he hath from eternally most wisely appointed all thinges & nothing can happen but that which he foresaw, and is thereof in a maner the authoꝝ. Wherefore seing that he hath promised y the sede of the fathers shalbe holy, he wil stand to his promises, and wil thereout gather many his elect. For his gifts and calling are without repentaunce, although the Iewes seme for a tyme to be expulsed. But this is worthy of consideration, how this is true, that God repenteth not, when as he himselfe sayde, I repenteth me that I made man. And it repented him that he had made Saul king. And in the 18. chapter of Jeremy it is witten. I will repent me of the good, which I promised to a kingdome or nation, if they decline to iniquitye. And dayly experience teacheth, that many giftes are of God taken away from many men. Hereto we say, that God is not moued with affects as men are, although the scripture entreat & speake of him by the figure ἀνθρώπου: but he is described as one stirred vp by affects, for that he doth those thinges which men stirred vp by affects vse to do. He is said to be angry because he auengeth, as me ouercome with anger do, although he thereby suffer no perturbation. He is sayde also to repent for that although he be not soꝝ, yet he chaungeth the thinges which he had before done. He had appointed Saul to be king, whome he after ward reiected: and he had appointed man vpon the earth to be encreased in number, whome he after ward destroyed by the flood: and therefore he is sayd to haue bene moued by repentaunce. But here thou wilt say, I speake not of the perturbation of God: admitte that he be quiet: but forasmuch as he can chaunge the thinges which he hath done, he can also chaunge his vocation, and can take away the giftes from them, vnto whome he before gaue them. This we deny not, but this is to be knowen, that Paul here speaketh not of all kinde of gifts or callings, but of those only which according to his eternall predestination he geueth: for they are most constant and vnchaungeable, as it was before sayd in this self same epistle: Whom he foreknewe, those hath he predestinated:

whome

Whome he hath predestinated, those also hath he called: whome he hath called, those also hath he iustified: and whome he hath iustified, those also hath he glorified: this gradatio is inuicible, and this chayne is indissoluble. But to make the thing yet more playne, we will make this distinction: they which receaue the giftes of calling of God, are either predestinated, or els are not of the number of the elect. If they be not predestinated, they haue oftentimes certayne gifts of God, but those are slender gifts, which do not perfectly chaunge the, so that in temptations and persecutions they fall away, and are called προσκαίροι, that is, men during but for a time, and they easely lose theyr gifts, not that God repenteth him or that he is chaunged, but the chaunging is in them which withowt themselves from the truth: and God appointed to geue vnto them gifts, not perpetually, but for a time. But they which are predestinated do, as touching vocation to saluation, and touching the gift of the fauor of God, abide in the state of saluation without any repentance and chaunging of the purpose of God. And although for a tyme be taken away from them the spirite, consolation and some certayne grace, as from Peter when he denied Christ, and from David when he fell into adultery: yet are they restored againe, and so the gift of election, and their calling abideth perpetually, and God repenteth him not thereof. But the Apostle at this present speaketh of the nation of the Jewes generally, and not as touching euery singular persons. And this is worthy to be considered that in the threatnings which the Prophetes vse against the Jewes, is alwayes in a manner towards the ende added a consolation of the pacifying of God to come, and that they shalbe restored and called home agayne to their olde estate. In Deut. the 30. chapter it is sayd, Though thou be disperfed throughout the fower corners of the worlde, yet will I gather thee together agayn into thyne owne land. Howbeit although those things are spoken of that nation and of the couenaunt made with it, yet can it not be chose, but that they must nedes helpe also our confidence, namely that we which beleue in Christ should not be in doubt of our saluation. But thou wilt say, what if my calling and giftes should be temporall, and should thorough my default and not thorough the inconsistency of God be chaunged? We ought to aunswere, that in deede our fleshe, and corrupt nature is so made, that it may goe backe, & woulde easely of it selfe fall away, but faith when it is a true faith, perswadeth to the contrary on Gods behalfe, namely, that he will not suffer, that when we fall, we should for ever fall away from him. For how is it possible that we should confesse and beleue that God is in very deede our father, and yet in the meane tyme be in doubt of his faith? Those thinges hang not together. Wherefore although as touching vs there is no let, but that we may be destroyed, and we haue in our selues the causes of damnatio, yet notwithstanding faith bringeth with it a contrary perswasion, that God is our father, and wil be our God and sauio. And that which the Apostle now saith, is in a maner all one with that which he before sayd: What if some of them haue not beleued: shall their incredulity make voyde the faith of God? God forbid. Let God be true, and euery man a liar. Ambrose semeth to interpret those things vterly wide from the text, as we also before sayd, for he will haue this sentence, the giftes and calling of God are without repentance, to be referred vnto baptisme, namely, that they which are baptised haue freely the forgiveness of sinnes, neither are they compelled to any repentance. And this he thus goeth about to apply vnto this place, That it mought seme wonderfull that the Jewes being such unbeleuers, obstinate persons, wicked and vngodly men, should one day be receaued agayne of God into fauor: this (saith he) is not to be wondred at, forasmuch as that receauing by baptisme is done without repentance. But it is most manifest that Paul at this present ment no such thing, but onely would declare, that they by reason of election, and for the couenaunt sake made with the fathers, are beloued. For confirmation of which reason he bringeth, that God repenteth him not, neither chaungeth he his purpose. Further the Greke wordes suffer not this interpretacion: for it is sayde that the calling, and χαρίσματα, that is, giftes, or ἀνταμίαια, that is, these are the things Giftes bestowed vpon them that are not predestinated, are taken away from them.

The calling & saluation of the predestinated is not chaunged.

The threatnings of the prophetes oftentimes end in consolations.

Whereby we are confirmed touching the certainty of saluation

In the baptisme of them that are of full age is required repentance. With a true faith is required repentance.

3 repetitiō of three arguments.

The fourth reason.

The woꝝkes of god do helpe the one the other.

It is a singular woꝝke of God that the Jewes continue euen to this tyme.

The Jewes are our witnes which are without repentance. But if Ambroses exposition should be true, not the gifts but the sinnes before committed should be without repentance, so that they which are baptised should not repent them of theyr sinnes. Wherouer it is not true that in baptisme is not as touching them that are of full age required repentance: For Peter in the Actes of the Apostles sayth: Repent ye, and be baptised every one of you. Neither availeth this any thing, if thou sayst this repentance is take for sighing and mourning & such woꝝkes which are called satisfactions. For although we graunt, ynto the which were baptised were not enioyned such ecclesiasticall satisfactions, yet if it be a true & effectual faith, how can it not have ioyned with it a vehement repentance, and mourning, and most plentifull teares: Read the conversion of saint Anselm, and thou shalt easily see, with how vehement groanings and lyes he (before he was baptised) lamented and bewailed his lyfe before led. Wherfore let vs kepe still the former exposition, as simple and more true. And this selfe thing let vs obserue towarde our neighbours, namely, to loue them constantly and without repentance. Now therefore we see y the proposition of Paul is confirmed by three reasons: namely, by his owne prophesie, by the oracles of the prophets, and by the nature of the purpose and counsell of God, which is, not to be changed, nor to be altered by repentance. Now is behind the fourth perswasion, wherein he sheweth that the consideration in vs and in them is all one, and that the like euēt is to be looked for in them that was in vs: and he saith:

For euen as ye in times past haue not beleued God, yet haue now obteyned mercy thorough theyr vnbeliefe, euen so now they haue not beleued by the mercy shewed vnto you, that they also may obteyne mercy. ] As ye were from incredulity brought vnto faith, so they which are now enfeaded with the selfe same incredulity shall be brought agayne to saluation. And euen as ye were not forsaken of God when ye were vnbeleuers, so they shall not be forsaken in theyr recreation especially seeing that they are for the fathers sake elected, which benefite ye had not. The woꝝkes of God are of that nature, that they helpe the one the other, and by no meanes hinder the one the other. Therefore the exccration of the Jewes although in them it be sinne, yet because it is the woꝝke of God, had a good end, namely, the conversion of the Gentiles: and the conversion of the Gentiles shall helpe towards the saluation which shall be geuen vnto the Jewes for as it hath bene declared it shall prouoke them to emulation. And in y meane time vntill this thing come to passe, let vs consider with our selues the wonderfull woꝝke of God: they still in such greate aduersities, and in so diuers and greuous a captiuitie and dispersion continew and are preserved, they hold still theyr religio as much as they may: they exercise themselves in the holy scriptures, although they vnderstand all thinges corruptly. Doubtles no auncient Troians, Lombards, Hunes, or Wandales, haue so held still theyr owne, that they were in ciuill life and religion theyned from all other nations, and could shew theyr originall and history set forth in most sure writing, and being euery where dispersed forsooke not theyr ordinaunces. Which thing forasmuch as it so continueth amongst the Jewes, is without doubt a singular woꝝke of God, and bringeth vnto vs no small commodity. For they are witnesses of our bookes, & do cary them aboute with them as theyrs and of greate authority, which thing Augustine also noted. For vnles that people were still yet remayning, the Ethiopian Philosophers mought suspect that these thinges are of our owne inuention which we beleue and preache of the creation of the world of Adam of Nobah of Abraham, of the Patriarches, kinges, and Prophets. Wherfore they are vndoubtedly all this while perpetually preserved of God to some saluatio to come. Paul ascribeth vnto either part the sinne of incredulity, to the end that both the Gentiles should not puffe themselves vp, when as they heare that they were in that state once, and also that the Jewes should not refuse to come vnto Christ, nor be past all hope of pardon, when as they see that the Gentiles which were before enfeaded with the selfe same sinne are brought to saluation. Erasmus noterh, that that when it is sayd, So they haue not beleued by the mercy shewed vnto you, the sence may be not only, that the Iewes were made blind, that the Gentiles should obteyne mercy, but also, that euen therfore for that we are called, and receaued of God into sauoz, they are moze irritated, and moze and moze goo back from God, and from sayth in him: which thing Chrysostome also befoze noted, when he interpreted that place, they are enemies for your sakes, as though he had sayd, by reason of your sayth and saluation they are made moze contentious and rebellious. Neither is this to be passed ouer, that Paul calleth our saluation and the saluation of the Iewes to come by the name of mercy, that we might know that nothing is attributed vnto merites or woordes. These courses & alteracions of thinges are so to be taken, that yet we go not on infinitely. For when the Iewes shalbe conuerted, the Gentiles shall not agayne be made blind or reiected: but there shall the stay be. After that, let vs loke for nothing els, but the end and consummation of the world. And the thinges which Paul now writeth, are partly admonitions, whereby the Gentiles are put downe from theyr pride, and whereby the Iewes are pacified by the consolation of the Apostle, and partly they are foretellings and prophesies of thinges to come. And this is to be noted that herein the prophesies of the Prophets and of the holy scripture differ from the foretellings of curious Mathematicians and of diuiners, for that in them is a respect had to vanity only, but here the end is edification: namely, that men should eyther be conuerted and cease of from some sinne, or els that they should profite and be confirmed in the way of God.

God hath shut vp all vnder vnbeliefe, that he might haue mercy on all. ] Here he speaketh of two nacions, namely, of the Gentiles, & of the Iewes, of which eche were shut vp vnder vnbeliefe, that the glory of God might be made the moze manifest. In Osea it is sayd, I will call a people that is not my people, my people, and that is not beloued, beloued. The state from whence we are called, is incredulity, vnder whiche none of the people of God remayne. Beholde the Apostle mozte manifestly affirmeth, that God punisheth men wyth incredulity, wherewith when he hath smitten them, there can none but himselfe illuminate agayne theyr mind. And although vnto humane reason it seme very hard and absurd, that so greate a multitude haue perished in vnbeliefe, God both suffering and willing the same, yet ought we not to speake any thing agaynst him, but rather to cry out wyth Paul, Oh the depth of the riches &c. And whē we heare that the Iewes, though they be neuer so much vnbeleuers, shalbe conuerted, let vs thereby learne to dispayre of none, though they be straungers from sayth vnlesse by a peculiar reuelation we haue some knowledge that they haue sinned to the death: yea rather we must perpetually seke to bring them to saluation: For although they be shut, by vnder that vnbeliefe where with they are infected, yet are they oftentimes by hidden wayes prepared of God, and called vnto true religion. Neither ought we to thinke that there is any crime so heynous that it can be any let vnto the power of God, but that he can draw vnto him whome he wil. And forasmuch as we are all called out of one and the selfe same estate, namely, out of incredulity, none of vs ought to be puffed vp aboue an other. Howbeit hereout is not to be gathered (which thing some foolishly go aboute) that all men shalbe sauēd, for that it is sayd, that he might haue mercye on all: that followeth not, when as here is entreated of the kindes or sortes of mē, and not of euery perticular man, as Augustine interpreteth this sentence, God will haue all men to be sauēd. Whereas our translation hath, God hath shut vp, omnia, that is, all thinges in infidelity, it is not so red in the Greke, for there it is, πᾶσι, that is omnis, namely al men. It is true in dede that vnto the Galathians in the 3. chapter it is sayd, The scripture hath shut vp al thinges vnder sinne: but howsoeuer it be, it skilleth not much: this only let vs note, that we are all bound wyth the selfe same chayne of error and blindness, vnder which God wil haue all men to be holden, at the lest for a time, to the end they should be moze moderate, & the better be a-

Our saluati-
on is called by the name of mercy.

The difference betweene the foretellings
of the saines
and of the prophets, & betweene the foretellings
of diuiners

They whiche
are called are brought fro
incredulity.
Paul manifestly saith,
that God
smitteth
wyth vnbe-
liefe.

All men shall not be sauēd.

Cap. ii. A Commentarie vpon the

ble to iudge of themselves, & to the end as it was before said, euery mouth shoulde be stopped, and the whole worlde made subiect vnto God. Chrysostome thinketh, that that word, hath I shut vp, is thus to be interpreted, hath reprobued, declared, and manifestly conuinced that they are vnbelleuers. Vnto which exposition peradventure he was moued by an other place vnto the Galathians in the third chapter, where it is said, The scripture hath shut vp all vnder sinne: where by scripture out of doubt he vnderstandeth the law. For a little before he had made mention of the law saying: For if there had bene a law geuen which could haue geuen life, righteousness should haue bene by the lawe. Wherefore Chrysostome considered that the office of the law is to shew and to reprove sinne, and so the scripture shut vp all vnder sinne: so that here also he vnderstandeth nothing els, but to reprove, to conuince, and to shew forth. But this is to be noted, that the law also by occasion stirreth vp, and more pricketh forward to sinne, for the lustes in that they are forbidden are more vehemently inflamed. So God besides his reprobuing, doth also in punishing stirre vp and incline, as we haue before taught. And Origen also hath in a manner the selfe same exposition that Chrysostome sayth: He hath not shut vp by pouring in infidelity, but through it making open to others an entrance to saluation. And God is sayd to haue shut vp, for that he did not cut of the euill purpose of infidelity. Vnbelief sprang out of free will, and God letted it not, knowing whereunto he would at the length vse it. Others say that God only permitteth it, but we haue els where declared that the permission of God is at the length resolved into his will. The commentaries ascribed vnto Ierome haue this interpretation: God hath shut vp all vnder vnbellefe, but not by force, but by reason. I thinke that he in these wordes ment the same thing that Chrysostome and Origen ment, namely, that God by reason shewed vnto men their vnbellefe, so that they coulde not deny it, before that he called them to saluation. Although neither we in this, as we haue oftentimes declared, put any coaction or violence. But in my iudgement the Apostle here speaketh in a maner after the same sort, that he spake in that third chapter to the Galathians which we before cited: and before faith came, we were kept vnder the law, shut vp vnto the faith which should afterward be reuealed. Wherefore vntill Christ came, which is our faith, we abode vnder the law as in a prison, and shut vp vnder it. So commeth it to passe in men before that they obtaine mercy through the Gospell, for so long they are held of God the iust iudge, shut vp as it were in a darke prison of infidelity.

The law by
occasio stir-
reth vp to
sinne.

That he might haue mercy on all. Chrysostome thinketh that is to be vnderstanded by way of comparison, namely, that by these he woulde haue them to be saued. But Ambrose seemeth to haue considered that which is written to the Galathians: that the scripture hath shut vp all thinges vnder sinne, that the promise shoulde be geuen vnto the beleuers by the fayth of Iesus Christ. Wherefore he saith, Forasmuch as all men were holden vnder with vices, wicked factes, and vnbellefe, God seeing that man could not be saued by the lawe, set forth vnto them fayth, by which only they might obtayne mercy. And he addeth, that it is a miserable thing for him to be proude, whose faultes hath bene forgiven, and therefore seeing that the Gentiles were by the mercy of God forgiven their vnbellefe, they ought not to behaue themselves proudly agaynst the Iewes in contemning them.

O the deepenes of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how vnsearcheable are his iudgements and his wayes past finding out: For who hath knowen the mynde of the Lord: or who was his counsellor: Or who hath geuen vnto hym first, and he shalbe recompensed: For of him, and through him, and for hym are all thinges: to hym be glory for ever. Amen.

Why the
apostle thus crieth out.

O the deepenes of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God. The Apostle hauing now ended his so long disputation, bursteth forth into this exclamation mation, for that he knew that it was not possible, but that all men would be amazed when they heare that all things are attributed vnto the mercy of God, for that all otherwise were shut by vnder incredulity. And that the lawe, the ceremonies, the common wealth, and miracles wrought by God nothing profited the Iewes: and also that philosophy, excellent lawes, and notable works nothing anayleth the Gentils. And that forasmuch as we are all of one & the same lump, only the election of God and predestination putteth the chief differences betwene men. That a man can haue nothing of himselfe, whereby he can obtaine the mercy of God, and deserue righteousness. And forasmuch as humane reason is wonderfully against these things, and is offended therewith, for it would by it selfe get saluation, and coueteth this similitude or likenes of God, that euen as he hath felicity of himselfe, neither dependeth of any other, so would it be vnto it selfe the cause of blessednes. This is that poison which the serpent in the first temptation breathed into our first parents. Being therfore the case standeth so, and that there can not be rendred a reason of the iudgements of God, the Apostle draweth the faithfull into this bottomles pit. And although he had sayd much, and brought inuincible argumentes, whereby he proued that the thing is so, yet when he sawe y this could not satisfy, and that mans iudgement could not be therewith content, he being as it were overcome with the deepenes of the matter, cryeth out, O the deepenes. He is all whole inflamed with a wonderfull affect, and that the motion of his exclamation should not seme to be of man, the things which he addeth he bringeth out of the scriptures of God, for this, V Who hath knowen the minde of the Lord? or who hath bene his counsellor, is thus written in Esay in the 40 chapter, mi ticcen eth ruah iehoua, that is, Who hath prepared & instructed the spirit of God? V esch atfatho iodeunnu, that is, And who hath shewed vnto him his counsell? And that which is added, who hath geuen vnto him first, and it shalbe recompensed him? is written in Iob the 41. chapter, mi heedimani vaalchallam, that is, Who shall preuent or go before me, and I will recompense? Wherefore the Apostles meaning is by these wordes to proue that God through his free will and election geueth saluation vnto men. By which sentence mans pride is wonderfully abated and put downe. And these are the reasons which he bleth: God is the chiefe in all things: therfore he is moued by no outwarde things: the chiefe as touching wisdom, when as he needeth not to be instructed of any: the chiefe as touching strength and power, for no man hath geuen vnto him any thing first, but he geueth vnto all others the things which they haue. Doubtles these things ought to be a bridle vnto euery man though he haue neuer so redy a witte and deepe iudgement, not to speake arrogantly of God, or to be more curious in searching out of things then it becometh. Let euery man consider with himselfe, who it is that after this sort crieth out, and he shall see that it is Pan the instructor of the whole worlde, who was rapt by euen into the third heauen, and there saw secretes which were not lawfull for men to speake. And seeing that he so wonderth, and is amazed at the iudgements of, God, how should not we which are farre inferior vnto him reuerence them? O the deepenes (saith he) of the riches, of the wisdom & of the knowledge of God. These wordes we may thus vnderstand, as though by these three genitiue cases were shewed three distinct proprietie of God, namely, his riches, wisdom and knowledge, and so shewed, as most deepe and impenetrable. And by riches peraduenture is to be vnderstanded godnes and clemency. Or it may be taken seperately, O the depth of the riches, and the two genitiue cases which follow, namely, of the wisdom, and of the knowledge, depend and are gouerned of the first word, namely, of riches: as though he should say, that the wisdom and knowledge of God is most rich and plentiful, but which way soeuer it be taken it maketh no matter. We know by many places of the scriptures, that wisdom and knowledge are ioyned together in God, and not only in God, but also in Christ, according to that saying in the epistle to the Colossians, in whom are all the treasures of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God: where also thys worde Forasmuch as God is the highest and chiefe he is not moued by outwarde things.

If Pant the teacher of the Gentiles do in this sorte wonder, what shall we doe?

These properties of God.

In God & in Christ, wisdom & knowledge are ioyned together, treasure

God knoweth
all things
as that after a won-derfull manner.

We must enquire no farther of the iudge-
ments of god
then the holy scriptures set forth vnto
vs, and creatures declare.
The deepe-nes pertay-
neth to election and to predestina-
tion.

By these wordes we are not feared away
fro the searching out
of the scriptures.

How we may understand some secretes of God.

Reason
ought not to perswade
vs to doe
euill thinges
that good may ensue.

By these sayings is nothing taken away
fro the certainty of sayth.

Predestina-
tion is not of workes
foresene.

treasure answereth vnto this word riches. So greate is the wisdom and knowledge of God, that nothing escapeth his sight. Wherefore vnto the Hebrewes it is sayd, All things are naked and open before his eyes. Neither doth he only know all things, but also after a wonderfull manner knoweth them.

How vnsearchable are his iudgements, and his wayes past finding out? Here is after the Hebrew manner a repetition and doubling of wordes: and one and the same thing is signified. And wayes & iudgements are taken both for one and the same thing: vnto by iudgements we will vnderstand the endes, and by wayes the meanes and manner whereby he bringeth all things to theyr endes appoynted. The wayes and iudgments of the Lord are after a sort known by the creatures, and so farre is there no let, but that we may searche them out. But although we search out the endes or successes of things and also the reasons whereby God worketh in things, yet shall we neuer be able to find them out.
The iudgements of God, as it is sayd in an other place, are a great a depth.
Wherefore let vs thinke that God doth alwayes that, which is best. And touching his wayes and iudgements, let vs enquire not farther, then is set forth in the holy scriptures, otherwise we shall fall into such labyrinthes or mases that we shall neuer be able to winde our selues out of them. And this is to be knownen that these vnsearchable iudgements whiche are ment in this place pertayne chiefly to the election of God and to predestination. And when he sayth ἀνεξέσμητα, he sayth not only vnsearchable, but which also ought not to be serched out. And yet doth he not in these wordes feare vs away fro the searching out of the scriptures, when as here is not entreated of the will of God reuealed in the scriptures, but of the secrets of his counsels, whose most wonderfull depth Paul wondered at, but yet expressed not how greate it is. And lest he should seme to speake this without any purpose, he addeth:

For who hath bene his counsellor? or who hath geuen vnto him first, and he shalbe recompensed? Which testimonies as we haue sayd are taken out of the 40. chapter of Esay the Prophet, and out of the 41. chapter of Iob. And the meaning is, that we can not penetrate vnto the secretes of God, when as they no manner of way depend of vs: for our wisdom, or goodness can do God no pleasure at all. Of this matter it is written in the first to the Corinthians, The things which are of God no man knoweth, but only the spirit of God. And if we vnder-stand any thing of them, that cometh, as it is there sayd, for that God hath reueled vnto vs his spirit. And we haue the mind of Christ, which we haue by a chiefly out of the holy scriptures spiritually vnderstanded as it is mete. Augustine entreateth of this place towards the end of his booke de gratia & libero arbi-trio, and sayth, That Paul before sayd, That God hath shut vp all vnder infidelity, that he might haue mercy of all. And shewed also that so long as the lewes beleued, the Gentiles were vnbeleuers: but when the lewes were made blind, the Gentiles came vnto the true sayth: and from the serching out of these secretes men are iustly forbidden, for that they are not able to perse into them yea oftentimes they haue thereby hurt, and they fall into absurd opinions. For when men heare that God hath shut vp all vnder beliefe, that he might haue mercy of all, straight way they adde: therefore are euill thinges to be committed, that good thinges may ensue: when as rather they ought to say: We haue done euill thinges and the lord hath thereout thorough his mercy brought forth good thinges, let vs therefore doe good thinges that better may ensue. No man hath bene Gods counsellor, for he is the chiefest wisdom. Howbeit by these sayings is nothing taken away from the certainty of sayth, for that it cometh not vnto vs by humane strength, or by our owne vnderstanding, but by the breathing of the spirit of God. And whosoever do rightly and diligently weighe those thinges, they shall neuer be able any maner of way to complaine of God, as though he should deale with them vnjustly when as he, as it is manifest, is in debt to no man. Neither can this be true, that predestination is of workes foresene, when as it is sayd, that no man hath geuen vnto him first, that he should be recompensed. For what els is this, God to predestinate according to workes foresene, then to render vnto them his appointing

pointing to eternal life. Merites also are hereby most manifestly excluded, which can not properly consist, vnles we affirme that we geue something that is our owne, which thing this sentence which we now entreate of suffereth not. Wherefore let no man cry out that he hath done many thinges, and therfore many and greate thinges are deu vnto him, when as no man hath any thing that is his owne. And although it be written, that God will render to euery man according to his workes, yet is that so to be vnderstanded, that if they be good workes, they are for no other cause called any mans workes, but for that they are wrought in hym, namely, by the power of the spirite of God, whereby they are in very dede the workes of God. And Augustine most truly sayth, that God crowneeth in vs his gifts. For as touching vs, we deserue nothing but death. Finally let vs hereout gather, that forasmuch as no man can by his owne wisdom or strenghts attain vnto thinges diuine, the best remedy is that we all suffer our selues to be led by the spirite and word of God.

Merites are excluded.

Our good workes are the workes of God.

For of him, and thorough him, and for him are all thinges; to him be glory for euer. Amen.] That we can in no wise be Gods counsellors, hereby it is evident, for that all thinges depend of him, as it manifestly appeareth in the creation of all thinges, and also in regeneration whereby we are iustified, where all whole is attributed vnto him, and finally we are no otherwise in his handes, then the vessell is in the hand of the potter. Wherefore we may conclude, that he hath full right to do with vs, whatsoever he wil: and it is our part not to be too much inquisitiue, but to geue the glory vnto him, and to direct all our doinges vnto him, from which thing both idolaters and also they which attribute iustification vnto theyr workes, are most farre distant. Origen noteth, as also he before did, that this sentence, None can be Gods counsellor, ought to be vnderstanded of thinges created, and not of the sonne, or of the holy ghost. And to proue that the holy ghost knoweth the father, he bringeth this sentence, No man knoweth the thinges which are of God, but the spirite of God. Wherefore he admonisheth, that from this proposition is to be exempted the blessed trinity: which thing I therefore mention, for that it is thought that he was of this opinion that the sonne knoweth not the father, and that the holy ghost knoweth not the sonne. Wherefore this commentary of Origen vpon the epistle to the Romanes is not without iust cause suspected. The Apostle, when he sayth, Of him, meaneth not that the thinges which are created do consist of the nature of God as of a certayne matter, but they are of God as of the efficient beginning, neyther neded there any matter in theyr creation, for they were made of nothing. And all thinges are therefore thorough him, for that God neded not an helper: for he is endued with a full power of his own, he is sufficient of himselfe. And he created all things by the sonne, not as by an instrumente, but as an artificer by wisdom exerciseth his arte. For instrumentes haue not any such force that they are to be counted equall to the artificer: But the sonne is in all poyntes equall vnto the father. And all thinges were created of God for him, for that he hath nothing more perfecter then himselfe, and therefore for him selfe he created all thinges: for he is the end of all thinges. Augustine in his booke de Natura boni agaynst the Manichees, in the 27. and 28. chapiters at large intreateth, how these thinges are to be vnderstanded, neither varieth he from the exposition now brought. I omit to speake of them which referre these thinges vnto the father, the sonne and the holpe ghoste, for as it is not of anye greate wayght, so seemeth it to be too muche constrained.

When it is said that no man can be Gods counsellor, the sonne nor the holy ghost are not excluded, for the whole blessed Trinity knoweth all thinges.

Origen's exposition vpon this epistle suspected.

The thinges which are created, consist not of the nature of God.

How God created all thinges by the sonne.

Instrumentes are not to be made equal vnto hym that worketh with them.

Why God created all thinges for himselfe.

Amen, is a word of confirmation. For the maner of the Apostle is, so often as he hath made an end of entreating of those thinges which pertaine vnto the glory of God, to burst forth into this affirmation: which thing we also ought to imitate, to approue the glory of God so often as occasion serueth: with all our hearte to wishe it, and with a willing and glade assent to affirme and ratify it.

The questiō put forth.

The signification of this worde
to iustifie.

God is said
two maner
of wayes to iustifie.

We now in treate of the latter forme
of iustifica-
tion.

What this worde faith
signifieth.

But now to make an end of the long disputation which we haue had, it shall not be amisse more fully to entreate of Iustification, which is the scope and end of all that which Paul hath hitherto spoken of. And in this sort, let the question be put forth: Whether men be iustified by workes, or by sayth. But first of all it shall be good to pease and discusse the wordes of the question proposed, and let vs beginne with this word Iustification.

This verbe Htsada, with the Hebzeues, in the first coniugation signifieth, to be iust. But if it be transferred vnto the third coniugation, it signifieth to transference righteousness into an other, and to make iust: for this is the nature of the forme of those verbes which they call Hiphil. Euen as Amad, signifieth, to stand: so Heamid, signifieth, to appoint, that is, to make an other thing to stand. Wherefore Hitsadik, in the Hebzeue signifieth, to iustifie, that is, to make one iust: which thing when it is done of God, is done of him two maner of wayes. For sometymes he doth in very deede bring forth righteousness in men: First when with his holy spirit, he frameth them agayne & wholly reneweth them, in restoring the strengths of their mindes, and deliuering the powers of man from a great part of his naturall corruption, and this is the first righteousness which sticketh and cleaueth to our mindes by the benefite of God thorough Christ. Then when he hath so restored and made them new agayne, he geueth god and holy workes, by the vse and frequency of which workes is engendred in our minds a quality, or as they call it an habite, whereby we are made prone to lyue honestly and holyly. And we deny not but this kind of righteousness is in the harts of the regenerate. But sometimes God iustifieth in absolving vs from sinnes, and ascribing and imputing vnto vs righteousness. And then this word Hitsadik, is a word taken of the lawe, whiche pertayneth to iudgements, as also this word Hirshig, which signifieth, to declare, one to be wicked and hurtfull. And to iustifie is by iudgement, wordes, testimony, and affirmation, to count one for iust. And forasmuch as there are two significations of this word to iustifie, namely, eyther in deede or in account, and estimation. And God is the author of either of them, whether of these two shall we followe in the disputation proposed: Forsothe the latter, and that for because the renovation inspired by the spirit of God, and our righteousness, as touching the habite gotten by good workes, are whilest we lyue here so vnperfect and mayned, that if iudgement should be geuen by them, we were neuer able to stand before the iudgement seate of God. Besides that, Paul disputing of this matter, after he had brought forth the authority of Dauid, and a testimony of the history of Abraham in Genesis, vseth this word of imputing, and by the proper signification thereof he reasoneth touching this present cause or question. And this I suppose to be sufficient, as touching the declaration of the first word, namely, of Iustification.

Now let vs entreate of sayth. A man in the Hebzeues in the first coniugation signifieth to be firme, which self same verbe in the third coniugation, which as I haue sayd, is called, Hiphil, signifieth to geue constancy and assurednes to any promise or thing. Wherefore the Latines say, Fidem homini, aut verbis tribuere, which is in Englishe, to geue sayth vnto a man or vnto wordes, and it signifieth as much as if a man should say to beleue. Wherefore this Hebzeue verbe Heemin, signifieth none other thing, then to suppose or thinke a thing to be firme, constant, and sure: And as touching God, he which beleueth not him, maketh him a lyar. For Iohn sayth in his first Epistle, the 5. chapter: He which beleueth not God, maketh him a lyar. Which thing how greuous a sinne it is, let every man consider with himself. Contrariwise, he which beleueth God, adorneth him with glory and honour. For in this Epistle to the Romanes it is written of Abraham, that he staggered not thorough doubting, in hauing consideration to his own body, being now almost dead, or to the wombe of Sara being past child bearing, but gaue the glory vnto God being strong in sayth, and fully persuaded, that he was able to performe whatsoever he

he would. Wherefore there seemeth to be a certayne Analogy or proportion betwene this verbe, to beleue, and to iustifie, as we in this place take it: for as to iustifie, is by iudgement and estimation to ascribe righteousness to a man, and not to make him to be in very deede iust, so to beleue, is not in very deede to make the wordes and promises of any man sure, and firme, but to thinke and settle with our selves that so they are. But this acte of beleuing whereof we now intreate, hath two manner of firmenes and certaynety. First of the things, namely, of the wordes and promises of God, which abide much more firmly then heauen and earth. Secondly, as touching the persuation, which forasmuch as it is wrought by the power of God, is also most firme and most certayne, and of an assured persuation, that is, that it is neuer naked, but alwayes draweth with it many and sundry motions of the mind. For experience and dayly vse teacheth, that in things ciuile, a man being well and fully perswaded of pleasaunt promises, is filled with confidence, reioyseth, sheweth a merry countenance, is glad, and pleasaunt and cleaueth vnto hym that made the promise, so that he doth by all meanes allowe him. But contrariwise when he beleueth not the persuation, he laugheth at it, neglecteth and contemmeth it, or wareth cold, and bendeth the browe: wherefore it can neuer be, that he which beleueth in very deede, can want such affections, whiche are accustomed to followe a full and stronge persuation. And therfore those that are the pure professors of the Gospell do iustly affirme, that to beleue hath a very greate coniunction with action, or withe the motion of confidence, hope and such like affections: But most of all with a sincere and firme affiance, which it alwayes draweth with it. Whereby it cometh to passe, that in the holy Scriptures promises are made both to sayth and to trust. For euen as it is sayd, The iust man liueth by sayth: Also, He which beleueth in him, shall not be confounded: And in the new Testament: He which beleueth in the sonne, hath eternall lyfe: Agayne, We thinke that a man is iustified by sayth: So also is it written in the Psalme, Blessed are all they, which put their trust in him. And in Esay, the 26. chapter, He shall keepe peace, because they hoped in him. And in the new Testament, Hope confoundeth not: To Titus also the 3. chap. That we may be heyres according to the hope of eternall lyfe. Althoughe in the old Testament we finde the promises are oftener made vnto hope, then to sayth, yet in the new Testament it is contrariwise: whereof this may be the reason, because in the old tyme, the Hebrues erred not in the beliefe that there was but one God: yea, they professed the worshippinge of hym onely: but this was not well amongst them, that they had not a lively sayth, which draweth with it a trust, but onely by education had conceaued eyther a certayne opinion, or els a certayne knowledge, and therfore vnto this the Scripture exhorteeth them, to beleue truly and with efficacy, which is expresse by the affecte vnder the name of trust. But in the new Testament they erred in the meaning, both the Gentiles which were worshippers of Idoles and of many goddes, and also the Iewes, as touching the conditions of Messias, for they looked that he should come in glorious pompe, like a kinge, and magnifical in worldly gouernement, wherefore faith was oftentimes beaten into them, whereby they myght obteyne the promises of God: For it was very necessary, that they should rightly be instructed of the chief point of the thing that they should beleue. And of this Hebrue verbe Aman is deriued this nowne Emunah, which signifieth sayth. And it sometymes signifieth certaynty and constancy of wordes and promises. Wherefore God is in the holy Scriptures oftentimes called saythfull, and his workes are called saythful, because they are firme, and constantly continue. And we read before in this Epistle: What if some of them haue not beleued? hath their incredulity made vayne the sayth of God? Yea, and this latten word Fides, that is, sayth (if we may beleue Cicero) is deriued of Fio: because that thing is done in dede which was spoken. And sometymes it signifieth the assent of our mynd, whereby we receaue wordes which are set forth vnto vs, as it is sayd of Abraham, He beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him for righteousness. And forasmuch as in this disputation nowe we take sayth after this manner, it shall not be from An analogy or proportion betwene to beleue and to iustify.

A double certaintie of faith.

An assured persuation is not naked. It draweth with it also other motions of the mynde.

Vnto true faith is toynded an assured confidence.

Promises are in the scriptures giuen both vnto faith, & also to confidence.

Why in the olde Testament is oftener expresse hope & confidence, but in the new testament met sayth.

Faith signifieth firmenes.

How sayth is taken in this disputation.

Cap. ii. A Commentarie vpon the

The definition of faith. the purpose to define what faith is, wherefore faith is a firme and an assured assent of the mynd vnto the wordes of God, which assent is inspired by the holy ghost vnto the saluation of the beleuers. And therfore it consisteth in the mynd, and is occupied about the wordes of God, from whence we haue the matter thereof. Of the forme also we neede not to doubt, because it is defined to be an assent. The efficient cause is here, to be the inspiration of the holy ghost. And the ende is declared in the last place, when as we say, that this assent is inspired of the holy ghost to the saluation of the beleuers.

The definition of faith which is written in the 11. to the Hebrewes is declared.

What hypothesis signifies.

In beleuyng we haue neede of strength.

ἄρχος.

Whether faith be defined in that place to the Hebrewes. ὑπόστασις is applied vnto hope also.

And it is deriued of this verbe ὑπέρσταναι, which signifieth, to susteyne, to receaue, not to geue place to one that rusheth vpon a man. Whereof a souldier is called ὑπερστανός, which is trusty, and turneth not his backe vnto his enemies, but goeth agaynst them, and resisteth them. And vndoubtedly in beleuyng we haue neede of this strength and patience, by reason of the greate fyght, of which there we haue experience. For we must resist the fleshe, reason must be overcome, whiche very much striveth agaynst faith: we must also resist the condemnation of our owne conscience, synne, and the anger of God, and there are many thinges besydes, by which a faithfull assent is both letted and resisted. Very well are compared together betweene them selues these two, ὑπόστασις, that is, a substance, and those thinges that are hoped for. For God promisseth resurrection, but yet vnto the dead: he promisseth eternal lyfe, but yet to them that are rotten: He calleth men blessed, but yet those which abundantly thyrst and hunger, and are on euery side oppressed: He pronounceth men to be iustified, but yet such as are couered with synnes and filthines. Wherefore seing these thinges seeme to be so farre of from vs, it is needfull that we haue boldenes, strength, and the assuraunce of a most firme assent, which may make these thinges to abide, and to consist vnto vs as thinges most assured. With such a shield of defence ought we to be armed, whereby we may quenche all the fyrie dartes of the deuill, when they are cast agaynst vs, that we may also overcome euen the world. For as John testifieth, This is the victorie which overcommeth the world, euen our faith. Further we must note, that this word Argumentum, that is, argument, which in Greke is ἀρχος, is turned of some demonstration, that is, a declaration: because, by faith are shewed and declared those thinges which appeare not: but me thinketh Augustine, althoughe peraduenture not so Latine like, yet very faithfully turned it conuictio, that is, an overcoming. For by faith our mynd is overcome to graunt that those thinges are true whiche God eyther speaketh or promisseth. But Hosius in his booke, De summa Trinitate, & fide Catholica, laboureth by two reasons to shewe, that faith is not by these wordes of the apostle defined, because that ὑπόστασις, or substance agreeth also with hope. Wherefore forasmuch as it is not proper to faith, it can not be applied to the definition thereof. Further, because faith hath not a regard onely to thinges to come, and those thinges which are hoped for, but also is referred vnto thinges past. For we beleue that God created heauen and earth: that Christ was borne of a Virgyn, that he suffred for vs, and was rayled from the dead: but all these thinges are past, neyther are they hoped for to come agayne. These two reasons of Hosius are very weake, neyther do they proue, that these wordes vnto the Hebrewes can not be applied vnto the definition of faith. I graunt in deede that the entente thereof the Apostle (or what soeuer he was that was the author of the Epistle) was not to define faith: because then he chiefly entreated of patience, & endeouored to shewe that it is most of all ioyned vnto faith, because faith is ὑπόστασις, that is, a substance, &c. But by this his reason are touched all thinges that expresse the nature of faith. And to the first obiection we say, that ὑπόστασις, or substance may

in

in deede be applied vnto hope, but yet that ἐνόςασις which it draweth from fayth, not that which it hath of it self. Neyther ought it to seeme any new thing, if these thinges which are of a diuers nature haue some thing common in their definiti- ons; for a Lyon, a dogge, and a mā, although they differ much in nature, yet here in they agree, in that they be liuing creatures, and therefore in their definitions is something put which is common vnto them all, when as they are both bodies, and also thinges hauing life, and endelwed with senses. Wherefore it ought not to seeme meruelous, if fayth and hope agree in this word ἐνόςασις, forasmuch as they are seperate by other differences. For in fayth ἐνόςασις is referred vnto the assent, but in hope to the expectation, whereby we patiently abide vntill the promises & such thinges as we haue receaued by fayth be rendred vnto vs. To the other reason we aunswere, that Paul made mention also of thinges past whiche are made playne vnto vs by fayth, for he sayth not onely, that it is a substance of thinges to be hoped for, but addeth, that it is an argumente or conuiction of thinges that appeare not. Nowe those thinges also whiche are past appeare not: for by that worde Paul (or any other whatsoeuer he was) comprehendeth what soeuer is beleued and is not euident, whether it be passe, or whether it be to come or whether it be now present. But peradventure thou wilt demaund, why in the first place he maketh mention of those thinges which are hoped for? we aunswere that it is aptly done, because worthely are those thinges put first, which are moze harde to beleue. For peradventure there are some, which will easily inough graunt that God created all thinges, that Christus the sonne of God came into the worlde, and was bozne of the virgine, and such like: but yet they will much doubte of the remission of their sinnes, of the resurrection of the flesh to come, and of the eternal glozy which shalbe geuen vnto the iuste. Wherefore aptlye and orderly are those thinges placed which are read in the Epistle to the Hebyues. But what the nature of fayth is, Esay the Prophet hath aptly expressed in the 26. chap. in which place is described the church as a citie built of God. The Prophet crieth: Open your gates & a iust nation shall enter therein. And he addeth the cause of that righteousness. Scho- mar emanim: that is, preseruing or keeping fayth: where thou seest that by fayth the beleuers are iustified. Then he addeth in what thing consisteth that fayth, where- by the people of God is iuste, namely because Iasfar semoch titfor schalom, that is, with a constant affect thou shalt kepe peace. This is the true fayth whereby we are iustified, namelye, because we beleue that God will be vnto vs the authoꝝ of peace and felicity, and a faithfull keeper of his promise. Augustine in his 40. trea- tise vpon Iohn sayth, What is fayth, but to beleue that which thou seest not? Whiche selfe same thing he writeth vpon the words of the Apostle in his 27. sermon: but in his booke de spiritu & Litera the 31. chap. he writeth, that to beleue is nothing els but to consent, that that is true which is spoken. The Master of the sentences in the third Distinction the. xxiii. sayth, that fayth, sometimes is that which we beleue. For in the Symbole of Athanasius it is saide: And this is the Catholike faith that wee shoulde beleue &c. But sometimes it is that, whereby we beleue. and in this latter signi- fication, do we vnderstande fayth in this disputation. He seperateth also a liuely fayth from a deade fayth: whiche distinction is to be liked, because James ma- keth mention of a dead fayth. But we must know, that a dead fayth is only a fayth in name, neither is it any moze a fayth, then is a deade man a man. For euen as a dead man is called a man although he be none: so a dead fayth although it be called a fayth, yet hath it not the nature of fayth. There is also an other kind of fayth, whi- che serueth to work miracles, and much differreth from the fayth which iustificeth and is common both the godly & also to the vngodly. Of this Paul maketh mencio in the first to the Corinthians when he sayth, Vnto one is geuen the worde of wise- dome, to an other the word of knowledge, to an other he saith is geuen fayth. and it is not meete, that in that rehersall of giftes and free graces is ment any other fayth, then that which is the roote of miracles, especially whē as straightway are added giftes of healinge, and giftes of vertues or powers. And of this kinde of fayth both Chri-

Diuers and sundry na- tures haue somethyng common in their defini- tions.

ἐνόςασις, what it hath a re- gard vnto in fayth, and what in hope.

Fayth hath a respect to thinges past and also to thinges pre- sent, so that they be hit- ten.

The Sym- bole of A- thanasius. A distinctio of fayth. A liuely fayth, and a deade fayth. The fayth of miracles.

Cap. ii.

A Commentarie vpon the

some and also Theophilactus haue made mention vpon the same firste Epistle to the Corinth. where in the xij. chapter it is saide: If I haue all fayth so that I can remoue mountaines. And that vnto the wicked also is this kinde of faith graunted, is hereby testified, in that it is most certaine that of them are set forth both Prophecies and miracles. Wherefore Christ shall say vnto them: I know you not: although with full mouth they boast, Haue not in thy name prophesied, haue we not caste out de-

Faith that dureth but for a tyme.

nils? There is an other faith whiche endureth but for a tyme, of whiche the Lorde made mention in the parable of the seebe which is sowne in the field: for all falleth not vpon good earth, but some vpon stony ground, and when it is sprung vp, it very plainly declareth those, which with a glad and ioyfull minde receaue the worde of God, but when the burning heate and seruientnes of persecution shall waxe hot, they fall away from it, and therfore they are called ωρεοκαίτοι, that is, men hauing faith for a season. Wherefore leauing all these significations, in this disputacion by faith we vnderstand that firme assent which is of so great force and efficacy, that it draweth with it the affect of trust, hope, & charity, & lastly al good works, as much

Smith an Englishman an impudēt Sophister.

as the infirmity of this present life will suffer. Wherefore Smithe whiche wrote a booke agaynst me of Justification, (although he set it out before agaynst Luther, & agaynst Melancthon, and speaketh much against others, and seldome maketh mention of me, is herein exceedingly deceaued, in that he indgeth that those are sharply to be repproued, which say, that faith is a trust. And he bringeth a place out of the Epistle to the Ephesians the 3. chapter, where it is written, By whome, namely, by Christ Iesus we haue πάρεσιαν, that is, boldnes to speake, and προσάγγωγην, that is, an accesse ἐν τῇ πίστει, that is, in trust which cometh by fayth. Seeing therfore, trust (sayth he) is by fayth, it is not fayth. Oh trimme man, I promise you, and a sharpe diuine, which alone sawe that these two thinges namely, faith and trust, are two thinges separated. What other thing in a maner ment Philip Melancthon, and other our faithfull teachers, when they call that fayth whereby we are iustified, trust, but that it is not dead, that is, not slouthfull, that it is not a humane persuasion, but so vehement an assent, that it hath euen trust it selfe most inwardly nighly ioynd vnto it? But I mynd not much to contend with this man. All that he bableth he scrapeth out only of Eccius, Pighius, and other beastes of the Antichrist of Rome, and setteth them abroad as though they were his owne. That faith which draweth not with it trust, and other holy mocions of the mind, driueth men into desperation, so farre is it of that it can iustifie, which thing the miserable endes of Cain and Iudas do plainly testifie. But that which is a firme faith continually trusteth, yea it sealeth our prayers in the Church by this common and receaued word Amen, among other words vled of the faythfull. Which word is

A dead faith
iustifieth
not but draweth
into desperatio.
This word
Amen sealeth
prayers

They whiche
pray
without faith do lose their labour.
A similitude.

deriued of this Hebrew worde Aman, which I before spake of: & as David Chimhi testifieth, it signifieth, It shall be ratified and firme, so shall the Lorde bringe to passe. They which pray without such a faith do lose their labour. In this fayth vndoubtedly men do quiet themselves in tranquillity and vnspeakeable peace, and are like vnto him which found a most ample treasure and precious pearle, wherein he so contented himself, that he sold all that he had, to buy it. Whereof came it that in the 7. Chapter of Esay the Prophet sayd vnto the wicked king Achaz, exhorting him to the true fayth Hishamar Vehishakat, that is, Take hede, and be quiet:

What is the property of fayth.
A distinctio
of workes.

for the Prophet would, that the king should beware of incredulity, and stay himself with the word of God, which is the propriety and nature of fayth: as contrariwise the nature of infidelity is, to wauer and to be vncoustant. For they which beleue not, are caried about with euery wynd of doctrine and opinions, and are alwayes wauering and vncoustant. Wherefore in Iosua the 17. chapter, the people are repproued, because their hart flowed as water, and that vndoubtedly happened only by reason of their incredulity. Wherefore forasmuch as hereby it now appeareth what we vnderstand by fayth, and what signification of this word among many significacions we followe in this question we must now speake somewhat of workes. There is one kynd of worke, which after the action and motion remayneth

mayneth outwardly, and appeareth after it is finished as the Image whiche Phidias made, is called a worke, and the temple at Jerusalem was called the work of Salomon. And after an other sort, actions of men & their motions depending of will and reason, are called workes, & after this maner do we now take workes, which are also sundry wayes distinct the one from the other. For there are some which are inward, as to beleue, to loue, to fauour, to feare, and to pitye: other some are outward, as to trauaill abrode, to geue almes, to preache, to teache, and such like. And of both these kinds of workes is our question ment. They deuide also workes into such which pertayne vnto ceremonies, into such which (as they call them) are morall, both which kinds also doth this question comprehend. Further the tyme wherein workes are wrought is to be distincted: for some are done before we are iustified, and haue obteyned the benefite of regeneration: and other some followe and are counted as the fruites of a new lyfe, and of righteousness begon. And forasmuch as we can not entreate of these latter workes as such which followe iustification, we will speake only of the first: for this onely is called into controuersie, whether workes iustifie vs: for those which follow iustification can not bring forth iustification, because it is already had. These suppositions being thus set, we will dissolue this whole question by thre propositions, which are these: Justification is not of workes: Justification is had by faith: Justification is geue by faith only. These thre thinges when we haue confirmed by reasons taken out of the holy scriptures, and haue defended them from the obiections and cauillations of our aduersaries, we suppose that then we haue sufficiently answered the questiō. God graunt and worke with vs to bring this to such effect as we desire. As touchinge the first proposition, when we saye that men are not iustified by workes, it is not to be thought that the same happeneth thorough the default of good workes: For if they coulde so be performed of vs, as the law commaundeth them, then should we be iustified: by them for God, for that he is iust, as he acquiteth not the wicked, so should he by his sentence iustifie such as satisfie the lawe. But there is no man which can thoroughly accomplishe such workes as the lawe commaundeth. As if a man should owe a thousand crownes of gold, and had to ward the payment ther of, but onely a thousand pieces of leade, or brasse money, vndoubtedly he shoulde not be discharged of the debte, neither can he bee pronounced cleare or quitte: whiche thing shoulde not happen thorough the default of the crownes of golde, but thorough the defaulte of his noughty money, and for that he wanteth money of golde: euen so say we that the lawe is in deede spiritual, iust, and holy, and he which could do all the thinges that it commaundeth, should liue in them, for it is set forth vnto vs as life, but forasmuch as none of vs either doth or can do it, as it is geuen of God, therfore are we not iustified by workes. Moreover also sayth if it should be considered as it is our workes, we can not be iustified by it, forasmuch as it is a worke both mained and vnperfect, and farre vnderneath that that law requireth. But therfore are we sayd to be iustified by it, for by it we take hold of the promises of God, and of the righteousness and merites of Christe, and apply them vnto vs. Suppose there were a begger which hath a most filthy and leprous hand, wherewith he receaueth the almes of him that offreth it vnto him, vndoubtedly that beggar is nothing at all holpen by the filthines or leprosy of his hand, but by the almes which he receaueth with his hand, what maner of hands so euer he haue. There is none endued with true piety, but must needes greauously lament & be sorry, when he seeth that many which are called christians are ignorant whether workes iustifie or no: when as this doctrine is the head, fountayne, and stay of all religion, and therfore of it aboue all thinges we ought to me most sure and certayne. But now a dayes it is not onely called into controuersie, but many disagree one from an other, and perniciously erre from the true doctrine. But if by complayning I might any thing preuaile, I would very much complayne of this unhappines: but forasmuch as it is so, and that by no meanes we can haue it otherwise, this only will we diligently prouide for, that we fall not into those opinions which diminishe the glory of God, and are repugnant vnto the holy scriptures Workes inward, & outward.

Workes morall and ceremonial.

Workes either go before, or els followe iustification.

In thre propositions this question is comprehended.

If good workes iustify not, it cometh not thorough their default.

Faith as it is a worke iustifieth not.

A similitude.

The doctrine of iustification, is the principal point of godlines.

Cap. ii. A Commentarie vpon the

tures, & also are hurtful vnto our conscience. Paradiuenture some wil loke that I should chiefly make answer to the cursed speakings, slaunders & reproches, with which the aduersaries do as touching this matter most vnfortunatly & tragicaly infame vs: but I am not so mad to thinke that these things are to be preferred before the setting forth and defence of the truth. Wherefore first of al I wil descend to the matter, and then when I haue confirmed our sentence, I will picke out such wicked obiections as are layd against vs, and will according to the strength that God hath geuen me ouerthrowe them. And to the end it may manifestly appere, that men are not iustified by woorkes, (which thing was our first proposition) I will reherse in a iust order the course of the reasons of Paul, which we hether to haue heard, whereby it may the easelper be perceaued, that I in all pointes agree with him, neyther do I one here breadth depart from his doctrine.

The first
reason for the first pro position.

In the first Chapter he began to reprove the Gentiles, because before they came to the knowledge of Christ, although by their philosophy they knew the true GOD, yet they worshipped him not as they shoulde haue done, neyther gaue they thanks vnto him as to the authoz of all good things: but became soles, and were frustrated in their reasons and cogitations, and chaunged the glory of GOD, and transferred it from him, and gaue it not onely to the Images of men, but vnto byrdes, fower footed beastes, and serpentes. Wherefore God deliured them ouer to the affections and desires of their owne hartes: by meanes whereof they lyued most filthily, and became (as it is there written) full of all iniquity, malitiousnes, fornication, auarice, and those vices which there followe. And if in case they were such, and lyued after that maner, vndoubtedly they could not be iustified by their woorkes, neither should Pauls reason agaynst the Gentiles haue bene of any force, to proue vnto them that it was necessary for them to receaue the religion of Christ, that they might be iustified, vnles he had tought, that they were vniuersally such as in the first chapter he painted them out to be. For who would thinke it to be any reason of efficacy, whiche appeareth to be true onely of some, and not of all?

The second

And in the second chapter he writeth in a maner the same thinges of the Jewes, Behold (saith he) thou art called a Iewe, and trustest in the lawe, and makest thy boast of God, and knowest his will, and allowest the thinges that are profitable, being instructed by the lawe, thou boastest that thou art a leader of the blind, a light of them which are in darknes, an informer of them which lacke discretion, a teacher of the vnlarned, as one that hath the forme of the doctrine that is by the lawe: thou therefore which teachest an other, doost thou not teach thy selfe? Thou which preacheest a man should not steale, doost thou steale? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, doost thou committe adultery? Thou that abhorrest images, doost thou robbe God of hys honour? And thou which makest thy boast in the lawe, doost thou by the transgression of the lawe dishonour God? For the name of God (as it is written) is euill spoken of among the Gentils thorough you. Such therefore were the Jewes without Christ, wherefore they coulde by no meanes haue bene iustified by their woorkes, or els they might haue answered Paul, that they were vniustly so greuously accused.

The third.

But in what case men were before they receaued the faith of Christ is more manifestly shewed in the 3. chapter for there we reade: There is none righteous, there is none that understandeth or seeketh after God, all haue gone out of the way, and are become unprofitable, there is none that doth good, no not one. Their throte is an open sepulchre, with their tongues they haue deceaued, the poyson of aspes is vnder their lippes whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness, their feete swift to shed blood, destruction and wretchednes are in their wayes, they haue not knowen the waye of peace, the feare of GOD is not before their eyes. &c. These testimonies Paule gathered together out of sondry places of the holy scripture, by which the nature of man being destitute of the grace of God is set forth in his coloures. And that no man should say that only the idolatrous and wicked Gentles are by these woordes sig-nifinified, the Apostle as it manifestly appeareth, sheweth that these things are also extended vnto the Jewes, who aboue all others thought themselves most holy, and therefore he addeth: We knowe, that whatsoeuer thinges the lawe speaketh, it speaketh vnto them which are vnder the lawe. And to the ende wee shoulde not doubt but that his entent was to bring an vniuersall reason: he addeth: Because by the workes of the lawe no fleshe shalbe iustified. And by fleshe he vnderstandeth a man not yet regenerate. I know there haue ben some, which by the flesh haue vn-derstand the inferior parts of the mynde which are grosse and wrapped with filthy lustes. But this sence Paul excludeth, when he saith, by the workes of the lawe, that is, by workes commaunded of God in the law, which must needes come of reason and not of the strength of the inferior soule. Farther the scripture after the Hebrew phrase, by the fleshe vnderstandeth the whole man: whiche thing we haue in an other place moze abundantly expessed. Afterward to the end he might the better confirme this sentence he saith: that euery mouth might be stopped, and that the whole world might be guilty before God. Undoubtedly if men should be iustified by workes, their mouthes should not be stopped, neither should they be guilty before God: for they should alwayes haue somewhat to say, namely, that they are therefore quite from sinnes, because they had deserued it by workes: but now whe men perceauie the contrary, they dare not once open their lippes. Farther he saith: But now without the lawe is the righteousness of God made manifest, whiche hath the testimonie bothe of the lawe and of the Prophetes. What man would appoint that thing to be the cause of our righteousness, without which righteousness may be ob-tayned: undoubtedly no wise man would so doo, when as suche is the nature of causes, that without them the effectes can not be brought to passe. To the same purpose also serueth that which followeth: Where then is thy boasting? It is exclu- ded. By what lawe? By the lawe of workes? No, but by the lawe of fayth. He woulde haue vs know that all iust cause of glozy is excluded and taken away from vs, for the whole glozy of our righteousness ought to geue place vnto God: but if we should be iustified by workes, then should it not be so: for the glozy should be ours, and euery man would count himselfe to be therefore iustified, because he hath lined vertuously and iustly. And how certaine and assured this was vnto the Apostle, those thinges which follow do declare: We thinke therefore that a man is iusti- fied by fayth without workes of the lawe. Wherefore, shall we then deny that which the Apostle with so great vehemency affirmeth? Undoubtedly it is a thing most impudent so to do. Wherefore let vs assent vnto him, and not resist so great a testimony of hys. But besides these thinges, let vs waighe and consider the pithe of Pauls meaning: If we should be iustified by workes (saith he) we should not only haue matter to boast of, but the occasion of glozying in God, and of publishing his fauour towards vs shoulde be taken away. For without doubt it is vnto vs a thing most prayse worthy and glorious to acknowledge, that the beneuolence and redy fauour of God towards vs through Christ is so great that he deliuereth vs miserable men from our sinnes, and receaueth vs into fauour, although we were coue-red ouer with neuer so great filthines and dragges of sinne. If (I say) we should be iustified by workes, then undoubtedly could we not truly boast, bragge or glozy hereof.

The fourth

The fifth.

The sixt.

The seventh

The eight.

The ninth.

But let vs go on and heare what the Apostle sayth in the beginning of the 4. chapter: What shall we say then that our father Abraham found according to the flesh?
For if Abraham were iustified by workes, he hath whereof to boast, but not before God, For what sayth the scripture? Abraham beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him for righteousnes. But vnto him which worketh a reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt. Wherefore to the end that so sweete a consolation of the loue and beneuolence of God towards vs shoulde not be taken away from vs, let vs constantly affirme with the Apostle, that we are not iustified by workes. And that he might the better persuaue vs hereof, he vseth this word λογίζαν, which we say signifieth to impute, to ascribe vnto a man righteousness, or to count a man for a iust

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the iust man, and setteth it as an Antithesis or contrary vnto merite or debt, so that he to whome any thing is imputed, deserueth not the same, neither receaueth it as a debt. But he which obtaineth any thing vnto himselfe as a debt, counteth not the same as imputed or ascribed vnto him: neither thought Paul it sufficient to haue alleadged y<sup>e</sup> scripture concerning Abraham, but also he citeth David: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, & whose sins are couered. Blessed is the man vnto whom the Lord hath not imputed sinne. By which wordes we do not only gather, that the righteousness by which we are sayd to be iustified, sticketh not in our mindes, but is imputed of God, & that it is such an imputation which consisteth not of woorkes, but of the mere clemency of God. Farther the Apostle doth by an other propriety of god woorkes confirme his sentence, namely, because woorkes are signes or scales of the righteousness already obtayned, wherefore he sayth of Abraham: And he receaued the signe of circumcision, a scale of the righteousness of fayth, which was in uncircumcision &c. Wherefore soasmuch as god woorkes are signes and scales, which beare witnes of y<sup>e</sup> righteousness already receaued, they can not be the causes thereof. Neither haue ceremonies only that property, but also euen those woorkes which are called mozell, when they are pleasant and acceptable before God, for they also are signes and tokens of our righteousness. Wherefore Peter exhorteth vs to endeour our selues to make our vocation sure, namely, by liuing vprightly, and by good woorkes. Yea and the forme also of y<sup>e</sup> promise is diligently to be weighed, which God made with Abraham, for vnto it is not added a condition of the law or of woorkes: And seing God added none, with what audacity shall we then presume to do it. And Paul saith, For not through the lawe was the promise made vnto Abraham or to his seede, that he should be the heyre of the world, but through the righteousness of fayth. For if those whiche pertayne vnto the lawe be heyres, then is fayth made wayne, and the promise is of no force, namely, because the lawe worketh anger. Wherefore if we fulfill not the lawe, the promise will take no place and it shalbe a thing bayne to beleue that promise which shall neuer be perfozmed: which undoubtedly must nedes vtterly be so, if it be geuen vpon thys condition that we should perfozme the lawe, when as no man can perfectly accomplish the law. But the Apostle proceedeth farther, & this iudgeth of the most mercifull counsel of God: Therefore is the inheritance geue by fayth, that it might bee according to grace, to the end the promise should be firme: as if he should haue sayd, our mynde should continually waiver, if the promise should depend vpon woorkes: none could appoynt any certainty of his owne saluation, for his conscience would euermore accuse him, that he had not perfozmed those woorkes, vnto which the promise should be made: to the end therefore we should not in such sort waiver, God would that our iustification should consist of fayth and grace, that the promise might be firme. The same thing also is gathered out of that which is declared of Abraham, how that contrary to hope he beleued in hope. He is sayd to beleue in hope contrary to hope, which either in himselfe, or in nature, seeth or faileth no maner of thing, which might persuade him to hope. As Abraham was an hundred yeres of age, his body was in a maner dead, his wife an old woman, and barren, all which thinges naturally feared him away from hoping: and yet preuailing against them all he hoped. But we if we should haue merites or good woorkes, by which we might obtaine righteousness, then should we not hope contrary to hope, but in hope, and according to hope. Wherefore our iustification is to be appointed no otherwise, the we read that it was in Abraham: For he is the father of vs all: as it was imputed vnto him, so shall it also be imputed vnto vs. But now let vs come to the 5. chapter. Where againe Paul plainly expreleth, in what case men are before they be regenerate, for he sayth: For Christ when we were yet weake, according to the consideration of the tyme, dyed for vngodly ones. And straight way, But God setteth out his loue towards vs, in that that when we were yet sinners, Christ dyed for vs: And he addeth: For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the deathe of his sonne, much more being now reconciled shall we be saued by his life. Whereby we gather that before

The tenth.

Mozall
woorkes also are scales of righte-ousnes before obapned

The ele-uenth.

The twelfth.

The thirteenth.

The fourteenth.

regene:

regeneration men are weake, sinners, vngodly, and the enemies of God. Who then can ascribe vnto such men power to attayne vnto iustice when they will, by bringing forth good woorkes? Others may beleue it, but the godly will neuer be so perswaded.

This is mozeouer an other profe, in that he setteth forth the cause of so greate an euill, when he sayd: Therefore euen as by one man synne entred into the world, and by sinne death, and so doath went ouer all men, forasmuch as all men haue sinned: as if he should haue sayd, we were euen the from the first beginning by the first man lost and condemned. And lest thou shouldest thinke that infantes are to be excepted, he sayth: Yea death hath raigned from Adam euen to Moses, ouer them also, which haue not sinned after the similitude of the transgression of Adam. The Masse or lombe of perdition comprehendeth all those that are bozne, from whiche corruption the holy scriptures teach that it is not possible for men to escape by their woorkes, & to claime vnto themselves iustification. Afterwarde in the 6. chapter thus speaketh our Apostle: What fruite had ye then in those things, whereof ye are now ashamed? For the end of them is death. But now being deliuered from sinne, and made the seruantes of God, ye haue your fruite to sanctification, and the end euerlasting life. What other thing meane these woordes, then that all things, whiche men do, before they beleue in Christ, deserue nothing els but ignominy and shame? And there is no fruit of sanctification but that which followeth regeneration. And who will say that we are iustified of those things whiche are full of ignominy and shame? But now let vs heare what is said in the beginning of the seuenth chapter: Knowe ye not bretherne (for I speake to them that know the lawe) how that the lawe hath power ouer a man, as long as it endureth? For the woman which is in subiection to a man, is bound by the law to the man as long as he liueth: but if the man be deade, she is loosed from the lawe of the man: Wherefore if whilest the man liueth she couple herselfe with an other man, she shalbe counted a wedlocke breaker: but if the man be deade, she is free from the lawe of the husband: so that she is no wedlocke breaker, though she couple herselfe with an other man: Euen so ye also my bretherne, are deade vnto the law by the body of Christ, that ye should be coupled to an other, namely to him which is risen againe from the deade, that we shoulde bring forth fruite vnto God. Paul would by this reason declare, that we before our faith in Christ were as it were to husbands coupled to the law, and to the flesh: of which copulation could come no fruites, but those that are pernicious and deadly. But now being deliuered by the grace of God, we are coupled vnto Christ by the spirit, vnto Christ (I say) being raysed from the dead: by which copulation, we shal now bring forth fruite vnto God, and not any moze to death and damnation. And the selfe same thing he affirmeth, or rather expoundeth, when he addeth: For when we were in the fleshe, the lustes of sinnes, which are by the law, were of force in our members to bring forth fruite vnto death. Here let vs note that so long as we were in the flesh, we were subiect vnto wicked affections, whiche by the lawe were of force in our members, how then could we be iustified by our woorkes? Further in the same chapter is written: For that which I do, I allow not. For what I would, that do I not, but what I hate, that do I. If now I do that which I would not, then is it not I that do it, but sinne that dwelleth in me. For I know that in me, that is, in my flesh dwelleth no good thing. Here as it manifestly appereth is entreated of the bodies of men, and although in interpreting these woordes I am assured that they are to be vnderstande of those woorkes, which are done of the godly, which haue already obtained iustification: yet now I leaue it fre vnto the aduersaries to take whether part they wil, and if they graunt, that these things ought to be vnderstand of woorks done before iustification, then forasmuch as they are neither allowed nor good, how shall they deserue righteousness: for they are called euil, & no man is iustified by an euil actio. But if we vnderstand woorks which are here described to be the woorks of those that are iustified, then wil I make mine argument a maiori, that is fro the greater. If those woorkes, which rather seeme to be acceptable vnto God, & iust & holy, are called euil, & by the iudgement of reason now renued are not allowed, howe can we affirme the, that those woorks which are done of sinners, are such, that they are able

The fiftene.

The sixtene.

The seuentene.

The eightene.

The 10.

The 11.

The 12.

The 13.

The 14.

The 15.

The 16.

to iustifye. And lest any man should say, y<sup>e</sup> we take our argumēt only of y<sup>e</sup>, which happeneth thorough the foolishnes of men, when as the disputation is of that which may be done, if mē would put to they<sup>r</sup> good will, for many are not iustified by they<sup>r</sup> good wo<sup>r</sup>kes, when as yet they might be iustified by them if they would: herunto we answere with the Apostle in the 8. chapter: who sayth. For that which the law could not performe, in as much as it was weake bycause of the fleshe, that performed God by his owne sonne being sent vnder the similitude of fleshe subiect vnto sinne, and by sinne condemned sinne through fleshe. This place admonisheth vs, that the iustice of God which is commaunded in the commaundementes, could not be performed by the helpe of the law, by reason of the vice and infirmity of the fleshe, and for that cause was Christ sent of the father, to performe that whiche could not be accomplished of vs. The same thing also teacheth he a litle after: for when he had sayd, that the lust of the fleshe is death, he addeth moreouer, That it is enmity agaynst God, for it is not subiect vnto the law of God, neither indeede can be. Wherefore whatsoeuer we do by our naturall strengths, which is called fleshe, the same resisteth God: for our corrupted nature can not be subdued vnder the law of God. And forasmuch as it is so, the can we not be iustified by y<sup>e</sup> dedes ther of. In the same chapter also we read, Vnto those that loue God all thinges worke to good, vnto those I say which are called of purpose. In which wordes the Apostle touched the beginning and chiefe poynce of all our goodnesse, namely the purpose of God, whiche is so the cause of our saluation, that all our other goodnes dependeth thereof, but it is not moued by any of our goodnesse. But the very causes of mans felicity are afterward orderly and distinctly described, amonge which there is no mencion at all of our good wo<sup>r</sup>kes. Those which he knew before, he also predestinated: and whome he hath predestinated, those hath he also called: And whome he hath called, them also hath he iustified: and whome he hath iustified them also will he glorify. This chayne is lincked together with all the meanes and helpes, by which God bringeth vs to saluation. But seeing there is no mencion made of the wo<sup>r</sup>kes of the law and of merites, it sufficiently appeareth, that by them we are not iustified. Farther when it is sayd: Who shall accuse against the elect of God? It is God which iustificeth, who shall condemne? It is Christ which dyed, yea which also is risen agayn, which also sitteth at the right hand of God, which also maketh intercession for vs: If by the iudgment of God we should be iustified by wo<sup>r</sup>kes, it had bene sufficient to haue sayd, the elect shalbe accused in dayne, forasmuch as they haue good merites, and seeing by they<sup>r</sup> vertuous and holy wo<sup>r</sup>kes they shall obteyne absolution. He sayth not so, But, sayth he, it is God which iustificeth. And it mought haue bene answered: No man shall condemne the elect, when as they<sup>r</sup> wo<sup>r</sup>kes are such, that they deserue both absolution and a reward. But he maketh no such answer, but sayth, It is Christ which dyed, &c. Why then should we take vpon vs to mingle our wo<sup>r</sup>kes therewithall, when as the scripture willet vs in no case so to doo.

Now come we to the ninth chapter wherein is entreated of the providence of God which directeth and ordereth all thinges, not for any other cause vndoubtedly, but that we should thinke that the nature of it and of iustification is all one, for either of them is geue freely, and not of wo<sup>r</sup>kes. For the Apostle writeth, that of two brethern which were not yet borne, and when they had done neither good nor euill, to the end the election of God shoulde abide according to purpose, not of wo<sup>r</sup>kes, but of the caller, it was sayd, The elder shall serue the yonger, as it is written, Iacob haue I loued, and Esau haue I hated. Here as we se are wo<sup>r</sup>kes most manifestly excluded.

Also vnto Moses it was answered, I will shew mercy to whomsoeuer I shew mercy, and will haue compassion on whomsoeuer I haue compassion. These wordes also declare, y<sup>e</sup> the forgiveness of sinnes, & the meanes whereby men are receaved into fauor, depend not of they<sup>r</sup> wo<sup>r</sup>kes, but of y<sup>e</sup> mere & merciful beneuolence of God. And y<sup>e</sup> same thing also do y<sup>e</sup> wordes following declare: It is not of him that willet, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Againe, He hath mercy on who he will, and whome he will he hardeneth. But if iustification might be gotten by our will, or by workes, then should it be both of him that willeth, and of him that runneth: neither should they be conuerted on whome God hath compassion, but they which should chiefly haue compassion vpon themselves: neither also should God harden any man, when as all men might promptly, easely, and at their pleasure by good workes be reconciled vnto God, and also be iustified. But it is farre otherwise for they which put their confidence in workes, do to farre erre from the true righteousness, whereof we now speake. Toward the end of the 9. chapter the Apostle sayth: Israel which followed the lawe of righteousness, attained not to the law of righteousness? And why? euen because they sought it not by fayth, but as it were by the workes of the lawe. And if the workes of the lawe were a let vnto the Iewes for the obtainment of iustification, what should we then hope for thereby? This selfe same thing the Apostle (although in other wordes) declareth in the 10. chapter: They being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and goyng about to establishe their own righteousness, are not subiect vnto the righteousness of God. These wordes signify nothing els, but that they fall from the righteousness of God, which attribute to much to their owne righteousness, namely, to workes. And so great is the contrariety betwene grace and workes, that the effect which procedeth from the one, can not procede from the other. For Paul sayth: There is a remnaunt left according to the election of grace. If it be of grace, then is it not now of workes, for then grace is no more grace, and if it be of workes, then is it not of grace. For this is the property of grace, to be geuen freely and of a mere liberality: but the property of a worke is, that the reward should be geuen of duty, and euen by very right. Lastly what shal we say, when the Apostle crieth out: Oh the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! Undoubtedly Paul by this affection declareth, that it is a thing most hard to be knowen, whether God deale iustly, which predestinateth whome he will, and iustificeth whome he wil, hauing no respect vnto condition and merites: there humane reason is very much offended, there our flesh ceaseth not to cry against: But if either of them, namely, iustification and election should happen by workes and merites, there should be no trouble, no offence, no stumbling block layde against vs. But forasmuch as it is farre otherwise, and that by vs can not be rendered a reason of the will of God, Paul therefore iustly, and worthely cryeth out, and it is mete that all men if they be wise should geue place to this his sentence. In the 14. chapter we find written: Blessed is he which iudgeth not himselfe, in that which he alloweth. But he which iudgeth, if he eate, is condemned, because he eateth not of fayth. For whatsoever is not of fayth is sinne. Hereby are we taught that they which want a true faith can do or perforce nothing which is not sinne. I know in dede that the aduersaries interprete these wordes of the conscience, but they are neuer able to proue that sayth signifieth conscience. And although peradventure Paul entreate of it at the beginning, namely, that we oughte not to doo any thing against our conscience, yet afterward after a sort he bringeth in a generall sentence when he writeth: Whatsoever is not of fayth is sinne. As though he should haue sayd: this is a generall rule, when men go about to do any thing, they ought to be perswaded by the spirite and word of God, that that which they are in hand to do, is acceptable vnto God, and pleaseth him, which persuation if they haue not then undoubtedly in doing that which they do they sinne. And if I should graunt that in this place sayth signifyeth the conscience, yet I suppose that this thyng also were to be added, namely, that the conscience oughte not to bee beleued vnlesse it be instructed by the worde of God. For as muche as there are many, whiche haue so superstitious a conscience, that whether they obey it, or not obey it, they sinne most grievously: but I will not at this present stand longe about the expounding of this place, forasmuch as I entreated of it before, and will afterward speake somewhat thereof when I shall come to the place. Farther let vs heare what is said in the 4. chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, where it is thus written, I know nothing by my selfe, yet am I not thereby iustified. These

will

The 16.

The 17.

The 18.

The 19.

The 20.

The 21.

- words Paul spake of his ministry, being now conuerted vnto Christ, being now an Apostle, & who as touching his function no man was able to accuse. And if so great a friend of God pronounced this of himselfe & of his workes, what should we attribute iustification to the workes of them that are not yet regenerate? The workes of the goodly, and of the chiefe Apostle of Christ could not deserue it, how then can it be graunted vnto those which are yet strangers from Christ? To the Galathians the second chapter Paul repeteth that sentence, which he had written in the 3. chapter to the Romanes: namely, that no flesh shalbe iustified by the workes of the lawe, which sentence forasmuch as it is playne ynough, & hath bene already before recited, needeth now no farther declaration. But in the third chapter is written: If righteousness come by the lawe, then Christ died gratis. In which place gratis signifieth nothing els, but vayne and to no purpose: which then vndoubtedly should be most true. For if true righteousness before God could by any other meanes haue bene attained vnto of men, why then dyed he, and why was he crucified? And a gayne: This thing only I desire to learne of you, receaued ye the spirite by the workes of the lawe, or by the preaching of sayth? And straight way: He therefore that ministrereth vnto you the spirite, and worketh miracles amongst you, doth he that through the deedes of the lawe or by the preaching of sayth. They which are iustified receaue the holy ghost, for without it, it is utterly impossible to be iustified, and if it be not geuen through workes, neither can iustification then come through workes. Farther it is not to be doubted of any man, but that iustification cometh of the good will and fauour of God, when as by it men are receaued into grace, adopted into his children, & made heires of eternal life. But such as before iustification are occupied in the workes of the lawe, are bound vnder the curse, so far is it of that they should haue the fruition of the fauour of God, for the Apostle addeth: As many as are vnder the lawe, are vnder the curse. But to the ende we should not thinke this to be his owne inuention, he sayth: As it is written, Cursed be he which abideth not in all the thynges that are written in the booke of the lawe. After this he argueth from the time. I speake after the maner of men: Though it be but a mans testament, yet if it be allowed, no man despiseth it, or addeth any thing thereto. Moreouer to Abraham were the promises made, and to his seede: he sayth not, to his seedes, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one which is Christ. This I say, that the lawe, which began afterward, beyond 430. yeares, doth not disanull the testament, that was before confirmed of God vnto Christ ward, to make the promises of none effect. First, saith he, the Testament of God, and the first promise offereth iustification without workes. Wherefore that testament confirmed, receaued and allowed, is not restrayned by the lawe which was so long tyme afterward geuen. If there had ben a law geuen which could haue geuen life, then should righteousness haue bene of the lawe. This reason of the Apostle is not full, for there should haue bene added the deniall of the antecedent, namely, that the lawe can not geue life. For as it is declared vnto the Romanes, It was weakened through the fleshe, although as touching it selfe it contayned commaundements, which pertayned vnto life. Wherefore seing it is for certayne that the lawe can not geue life, neither can it also iustifye. But before that sayth came, we were kept vnder the lawe, & were shut up vnto that faith, which afterward should be reuealed. Wherefore the lawe was our scholemaster vnto Christ, that we should be iustified by sayth. If the lawe be as it were a scholemaster, then should we do greates iniury vnto God and vnto Christ, which are vnto vs in the stead of parents, if we should ascribe vnto the scholemaster that which is proper vnto them. It is not the scholemaster which maketh vs heires, which adopteth vs, which geneth vs all thinges, but the father. Wherefore let vs ascribe our iustification vnto God & vnto Christ, and not vnto the lawe, nor vnto workes, nor to our merites. Tell me ye that would so faine be vnder the lawe: Do ye not heare what the lawe saith? For it is written that Abraham had two sonnes, one of an handmayden, an other of a free woman, and he whiche came of the handmayden, was borne accordynge to the fleshe: but hee which came of the free woman was borne according to promise, which thinges are spoken by an allegorye: for these are two testaments, the one from the mounte Sina, which geneth dreth unto bondage, which is Agar: for Agar is mount Sina in Arabia, & is ioyned unto the city which is now called Ierusalem, and is in bondage with her children. But Ie- rusalem which is aboue is free, which is the mother of vs all. In these words this thing is chiefly to be noted, y<sup>e</sup> the law gendzeth not, but as Agar did, vnto bondage. But if by the woorkes therof it could iustifie, it should gender to liberty (for what thing els is iustification, then a certain liberty from sinne?) But forasmuch as it is both called a seruant and gendzeth to bondage, we ought not then by it to looke for iusti-fication. In the .v. chapter it is w<sup>ri</sup>tten, If ye be circumcised, Christe shall nothing pro-fite you. And he bringeth a reason of the said sentence: For (saith he) he which is circumcised, is debter to kepe the whole law: So much doth Paul take iustification from circumcision and woorkes, that he saith, that Christe nothing profiteth them, if in case after they beleue they will be circumcised. And still he moze strongly confirmeth that which was said. Christ is become in vaine vnto you: for if ye haue iustification, as the fruite of your woorkes, then the comming, death and bloudshedding of Christe should not haue bene necessary. And I if I yet preach circumcision, why do I suffer persecution? Then is the offence of the crosse abolished: the office and slander of the crosse is, that me being wicked and otherwise sinners, are counted of God iust, throughe Christ crucified, and saith in him: here the flesh is offended, here doth reason vtterly resiste, whiche thing happeneth not, when iustification is preached to come of woorkes whether they be ceremonial or morall. But God would haue this offence to remaine, bicause it pleased him by the foolishnes of preaching, to saue them that beleue. Vnto the Ephesians the .2. chapter it is w<sup>ri</sup>tten: And ye when ye were deade to trespasses and sinnes, in whiche in time past ye walked accordinge to the course of this world, euen after the gouernor that ruleth the ayre, and the spirite that now woorketh in the children of vnbellef, among whome also we all had our conuersation in time past, in the lusts of our flesh, and fulfilling the will of the flesh, and of our thoughts, and as it is in the Greke ἐν τῷ δαιμονίῳ, and were by nature the children of wrath, euen as others are.

 Let vs note in these woordes, y<sup>e</sup> men at the beginning before they come to Christ, are dead in sinnes, and therfore are not able to moue themselves to this, that they should liue and be iustified: who euer saw that a deade man coulde helpe himselfe?
 Further by those woordes is shewed, that they were in the power of the Prince of darkenes, which woorketh and is of efficacy in the children of vnbellef. Seeing therfore they are gouerned by him, how then can they by their woorkes tende to iustifi-cation? And because we shoulde not thinke that he spake onely of some other certaine vngodly persons, he addeth, All we, comprehending also the Apostles, among them (saith he) were we. And what did we then? we were conuersante in the lustes of our flesh. And to the end we might vnderstand that these lustes were not onely the wicked affections of the grosser part of the soule, it foloweth: we doing the will of the flesh, and of the minde, or of reason did follow also the thoughtes or inuentions of humane reason. If we were all such, from whence then cometh saluation and iusti-fication? But God which is riche in mercy for his exceeding loue sake wherewith he loued vs, yea euen when we were dead in sinnes, hath quickened vs together with Christ. But what instrumente vsed he, to geue vnto vs our saluation? For by grace (saith he) were ye saued through faith, and that not of your selues. For it is the gifte of God: not of woorkes, least any man should boast. Could woorkes be moze manifestly excluded? In what place then shall we put them? Certainely they follow iustification. For the Apostle addeth: For we are his workmanship created in Christ Iesus, vnto good woorkes, which God hath prepared, that we should walke in them: but before they could not be in vs, which thing is very well thus described: Ye were at that time without Christe, being alienated from the common wealth of Israell, straungers from the testaments of promise, hauing no hope, and being without God in this world. Who can in this state faine vnto himselfe good woorkes, by which men may merite iustification? And to the Phillippians the .3. chapter: If any other man maye seeme that he hath wherof he might trust in the flesh, I haue more, being circumcised the eight day, of the kinred of Is- raell, of the tribe of Beniamin, an Hebrue borne of the Hebrues, as concerning the law, a Pharisey, as touching feruentnes I persecuted the church of God, as touching the righte-ousnes

The 39.

The 40.

The 41.

The 42.

The 43.

The 44.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

- ousnes which is of the law, I was vnrebukeable. Seeing that Paul had so manye and so great things befoze his conuersion, and that he had whereof to trust and boast in the flesh, let vs heare, what he at the lenth pronounceth of all these things. These things (saith he) if they be compared vnto the true righteousness, which is through the faith of Christ, I count losse, vile, and dounge. If we should thereby obtaine righteousness, should so profitable things be counted for losses, so precious and holy things for vile things, and things acceptable and pleasaunte vnto God, for dounge? Let Paul take heede what he saith here, or rather let the readers take heede that they beleue not Sophisters rather then Paul, And to the Colossians the first chapter: And you which were sometimes farre of and through euill workes, enemies in your harts, hath he yet now reconciled in the body of his flesh through death. Here ought euery word diligently to be noted, that we may see that they which are farre of from God ought not to haue a regarde to those things, thereby to come into fauor. Peace which is ioyned with iustification can not be obtained of those which are enemies in mind: there can not come good woorkes from those, which befoze they be chaunged are saide to be full of euill woorkes. But what manner of woorkes those were, is described in the ii. chapter, when as it is there witten: And ye when ye wer dead through sinnes, and through the vncircumcisiō of your flesh, hath he quickned together with him, forgiuing all your sinnes, and hath put out the handwritting that was against vs. In the 2. to Timothy the i. chapter, Who hath called vs with an holy callinge, not accordinge to our workes, but according to his purpose and grace, which is geuen vs through Christ Iesus. Here he speaketh of a calling ful of efficacy, by which men are iustified, and not of the common calling as touching the preaching of the word of God, which is set forth vnto all men. And forasmuch as this consisteth not (as Paul saith) of merites or woorkes, neither can iustification also come of them. Vnto Titus it is witten The goodnes and loue of God our Saniour towardes vs hath appeared, not by the workes of righteousness which we haue done, but according to his mercy hath he saved vs. Also vnto the Hebrewes is but one onely sacrifice and one oblation, namely, the death of Christ, by which sinnes are wiped away, and satisfaction made for men. Wherefoze iustification is not to be looked for of woorkes: and it ought to suffice vs, that the good woorkes which we do after iustification, are sacrifices of thankesgeuing, and let vs not make them sacrifices propitiatory, by which meanes we should do great iniury vnto Christe. But settinge aside the Epistles of Paul, let vs seeke testimonies also out of other places of the holy scriptures. Christe in the vii. of Mathew saith: Euery good tree bringeth forth good fruites, but a noughty tree bringeth forth euill fruites. And to the end the nature of those which are not regenerate might be the better declared, he addeth: A good tree cannot bring forth euill fruites, nether can an euill tree bring forth good fruites. Wherefoze seeing Christ saith y that cannot so be, how dare these men affirme that it may be: for they say that by woorkes men may be iustified. Christ bleth the selfe samie reason in the 12. chapter of Mathew. Either make the tree good, and his fruite good: or make the tree euill, and his fruite euill: for by the fruite is the tree knowen. O ye generation of vipers, how can ye speake good things when as ye your selues are euill? for of the aboundance of the harte the mouth speaketh. A good man out of the good treasure of the harte bringeth forth good things: and an euill man out of an euill treasure bringeth forth euill things. These wordes of Christ do declare, that men which are not yet regenerate are euill trees, which neither do bring forth good fruite nor can do: and they testify that the wicked can not speake good things, and much les can they worke good things, and that out of an euill treasure of the harte are euer euill things to be looked for. And seeing the matter is so, consider I pray you whether they which are alienated fro Christ, ought to be called euill or no? Andoubtedly vnles they be euill, none of vs y cleaueth vnto Christ can be called good. Also in Luke the 17. chapter. But which of you, hauing a seruaunt that goeth to plough, or feedeth your cattell, that will streight way say vnto hym when he cometh from the field, Go and fitte downe, and sayth not rather vnto him, prepare that I may suppe: gyrd vp thy selfe and serue me, till I haue eaten and dronken; and after ward eate thou, and drinke thou? doth he thanke his seruaunt, because he hath done those things which behath commaunded him? I trow not. So likewise ye when ye haue done
- The 45.
- The 46.
- The 47.
- The 48.
- The 49.
- The 50.
- The 51.
- The 52.

Done all those things that are commanded you, say: We are unprofitable servants, we have done that which we ought to have done. These words spake Christ vnto his disciples, vnto his Apostles I say; and which were now converted to salvation: who if they worke vnprofitable works, what shall we the iudge of those which haue not yet receaued the sayth of Christ? But the Sophisters haue made the world such fooles, that they say that workes before iustification do after a sorte merite it, and those workes which follow they say are most profitable: wherefore they would now haue men after a sort, to make accompt with God, and with beades to number how many prayers they haue said. For what other thing went they by the, then y they would by a certayne number recite so many Water noffers, or so many Ave Marias, thinking by y recital to haue God most assuredly bound vnto the. In y 15. of Iohn Christ is compared vnto a vine tree, & we to the branches thereof: wherefore he sayth: Euen as the branch can not bring forth fruit of it self, vntil it abide in the vine, no more also can ye vntil ye abide in me. I am the vine & ye are the branches, he which abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruite. And whosoever shal not abide in me, they are cast out of the doore, eue as the branches or cuttings of fro the vine, & they shal gather the, and cast the into the fire. Now that we haue recited these wordes of the lord, how agreeth it that men being straungers from Christ, & not yet regenerate, can worke good workes, by which they may be iustified: when as they are called by branches which shalbe cast into the fire: and it is sayd that they only can bring forth fruite which cleaue vnto Christ, as branches cleaue to the vine: And that we should the better vnderstand the will of Christ, there is added: Without me ye can do nothing. Which sentence some go aboute to darken, saying, that nothing can be done without Christ in respect that he is God, so much as he is the first cause of all thinges: as though the Word disputed then of the generall conseruation of naturall thinges and of that power, whereby God bringeth forth all thinges vniuersally. Christ came not into the world to teach this philosophie: he vndoubtedly entreated of the fruite of salvation and of eternall life, and spake of those, which should cleaue vnto his doctrine: or els should be strangers from it. Wherefore the sonne of God commanded that the saythfull should in they prayers say: Forgiue vs our trespasses signifying thereby y the saythfull also haue neede of forgiveness, in those things which they do, for our workes are imperfect, neyther are they able to satisfie. Wherefore if they workes which we doo after our regeneration neere expiation by the merite of Christ. And so much as we pray for the same, how can they be propitiatory: much more les then can we thinke of those workes which are done before regeneration, that they should be acceptable and pleasat vnto God. Wherefore no man can iustly say that he is out of the number of such when as God hath commanded all men to pray in that maner, and his will is not that a ny man should make a lye in his prayer. Yea and Iohn also writeth: If we shall say, that we haue no sinne, we deceiue our selues, and the truth is not in vs. And I suppose there is none that will iudge it a thing mete, that there should be many mediators brought in, when as there is but only one mediator betwene God and men namely, the man Christ Iesus. But if besides him and his merites our workes should also iustifie vs, then should they be set betwene God and vs, neyther should Christ be the only mediator. Wherefore the Prophetes do euery where pray, and David also, that God would wash, cleanse, expiate, and purge they sinnes, namely, in forgiuing and remitting them: but if they could haue attayned to that thing by they workes, then neded they not to haue requested it by prayer, or at the lest way not with so greate feruency. And in Job the 15. chapter: it is written, that neyther are the heauens cleane before God. And in that 4. chapter: he pronounceth the Angels not to be pure. In what case then shall men be, before they obteyne iustificatione David also in his Psalmes crieth: If thou lord looke freightly vpon iniquities, Lord who shal be able to abide it? Esay calleth them y thirst, vnto the waters, & commaundeth them to buy without silver. But our men forsooth will merite and be iustified

The 53.

The 54.

The 55.

The 56.

The 57.

The 58.

The 59.

The 60.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

both by merites, and by woorkes, and also by siluer. Moreouer in the 40. chapter the same Prophet, when he heard a voyce, wherein it was sayd vnto him, cry out, answered: What shall I cry: and it was sayd vnto him, thou shouldst cry, All flesh is grasse, and Chosod, that is, piety or religion or mercy, wherewith he succereth his neighbour, is as the flower of the field, that is, a thing vanishing away, which freight way fadeth away, neyther can it continue. The same thing also affirmeth he in the 64. chap. where he sayth: but all our righteousnesses are as a cloth steyned, with the naturall disease of a woman. Which sentence whether a man apply it vnto woorkes done after regeneration, or before, I passe not muche, for eyther way will make on our side. And in the selfe same chapter: he addeth, Our God, we are clay, and thou art our creator, & we are the worke of thy handes. And the same similitude of the clay and potter bleth Paul to the Romanes in the 9. chapter: wherein is notably declared, that so much are we able to do so towards our saluation, as can the clay, towards the potter, to cause him to make him after this maner, or that maner. We could also recite testimonies, which are written of the maliciousnes of our hart, both in Genesis & in Jeremy: but I suppose I haue already brought testimonies inough for the confirmation of our proposition. This thing only now wil I say, that there haue bene men so ralhe, that they haue not only attributed some merite of iustification vnto honest woorkes, and which are (as they terme them) morally good, but also vnto superstitious woorkes which they themselves haue imagined and inuented. For who is ignorant of y<sup>e</sup> crimes commonly set abrode of they<sup>e</sup> holy water. Aqua benedicta de leatur tua delicta, sit tibi laus & vita. That is, by holy water let thy finnes be blotted out, and let it bee vnto thee prayse and life. They ascribe also forgiveness of finnes vnto Donkes coules, vnto candelis, and vnto the oyle of boughes, and vnto the ashes of palme tree, and vnto pilgrimages. And from things which they so perversly interpreted in the holy scriptures concerning merites, they came vnto these so foolish and vngodly things. Undoubtedly none vnderstand but they which haue experience thereof, how hard a thing it is that a harte busied, overthowen, and laden with the burthen of finnes, should when it is grieved and oppressed quiet it selfe in y<sup>e</sup> free promises of God through Christ. For in that case it very much labourereth, that it may once at the length be with a firme sayth established. If we should with the Sophisters will a man to haue a respect vnto his woorkes, then should he neuer be in quiet, but should alwayes bee vexed, and alwayes doubt of his saluation, and at the laste be swallowed vp with desperation. I would not that any man should thinke, that when we reason of this matter, we take in hand a vayne matter, or a strife about woorkes. It is a thing whereby is defended the honour of Christe. And that which is proper vnto him onely, namelpe, to iustifie and to forgive finnes, we seeke, that the same should in no case be attributed vnto woorkes or to any other thing els of ours: we seeke, that the promise should be firme, and that afflicted consciences should receaue consolation in the wordes and promises of God. Lastly we seeke, that the Gospell should be distinguished from the lawe, and the lawe from the Gospell, which thing they can not do, which ascribe iustification vnto woorkes, and confound and perniciously mingle them together. And for the confirmation of this proposition, although I could bring a great many more reasons, and in a maner infinite, yet these which I haue already brought shall suffice, and I will omitte the rest: for they which are not moued with these reasons, neither will they be touched with any other. Howbeit I thinke it not good to passe ouer with silence, the trifling shifts and wily deceates, by which the Sophisters vse to auoyde and obscure this doctrine which we haue now put forth.

Into holy water is remission of finnes granted, & more also to other thinges.

It is a thing most hard to rest in the promises of God.

What is the end and fruit of this disputation

First they say that the holy scriptures, as often as they take away the power of iustifying from woorkes, do that only as touching the ceremonies of the old lawe, and not as touching iust and vpright woorkes, which commonly they call morall woorkes. In which thing how much men are deceived, euen the testimonies of the scriptures, and especially of Paul (whome they affirme to be most of all on their side

As touching that matter) will most plainly declare. For although this Apostle speaketh many things, which seeme to pertaine both to the rites and also to the ceremonies of the lawe; yet in his declaration he writeth a great many more other things: by which he declareth that he speaketh not onely of ceremonies; but also euen of the other lawes of righteousness and vertue, yea rather altogether of those which pertaine to maners, and euen vnto the table of the ten commandments. And in the first chapter when he reproveth the Gentils that without the faith of Christ they could not be iustified, he setteth before their eyes their iniquities, namely, idolatry, filthy lustes, and toward the end of the chapter he reheriseth a very long catalogue of vices, wherewith they were infected, neither speaketh he any thing of the ceremonies of Moses. Wherefore forasmuch as those things which he there reheriseth are repugnant vnto the ten commandmentes, and to the morall lawe, we can not but thinke, that of it also he vnderstandeth those things which he writeth. And in the second chapter he reproveth the Iewes for the like kinde of sinnes. For he saith. Thou which teachest an other, dost thou not teach thy self? Thou which teachest that a man shoulde not steale, dost thou steale? that a man shoulde not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? and thou which detestest idols, dost thou robbe God of his honour? Who saith not that these things are containied in the lawe of the ten commandmentes? And in the third chapter: he yet more manifestly entreateth of the same, when he writeth. There is none iust; there is none that vnderstandeth; or requireth after God; all haue declined, and are together made unprofitable; there is none that doth good, no not one. These things we see are of the same kinde, & pertaine vnto maners. If the apostle would haue spoken onely of ceremonial lawes, he would neuer haue made mention of these things. And this is also more evidently gathered, that when he had sayd, no fleshe is iustified by the works of the lawe, he addeth, For by the lawe cometh the knowledge of sinne. Wherefore that lawe iustificeth not, by which we know sinne. According to which meaning he said also in the 4. chapter: The lawe worketh anger; so farre is it of that it should iustify: but it is very manifest vnto al men that sinnes are knowen and the wrath of God prouoked against transgressors more by the ten commandmentes, then by the precepts of ceremonies. I will not speake also of that generall sentence, wherewith it is sayd in the 4. chapter: That vnto him which worketh a reward is not imputed according vnto grace, but according to debt. And also, that God would haue the inheritaunce to consist of grace, that the promise should abide firme, and not be changed, that our glorying might be excluded, which glorying cometh no les of good works morall, then of ceremonies. It is written also in the 5. chapter, that the lawe entred in, that sinne should abound, and where sinne hath abounded, there also hath grace more abounded. These things also can not be drawn vnto ceremonies onely. Moreover in the 6. chapter when it was objected vnto him, that by so depressing works and the lawe, he did seeme to open a gate vnto loose life; and vnto faultfulness, and vnto sinnes, as now dayly they object vnto vs, he answered: That we ought not to abide in sinne, forasmuch as we are now dead vnto it. By baptism (saith he) we are buried with Christ, that euen as he dyed and rose agayne, so also should we walke in newnes of life. And he admonished vs, that euen as Christ dyed once, and dyeth no more, so also should we thinke our selues dead vnto sinne, but liuing vnto God. And he addeth, that we must haue a diligent care, that sinne raigne not in our mortall body: and that we geue not our members weapons of iniquity vnto sinne, but geue ouer our selues vnto God, as men of dead flesh, yet liuing. And our members the weapons of righteousness to sanctification. These things which we haue rehearsed, and the rest which followe euen in a manner to the ende of the chapter, seeme they to pertaine vnto the ceremonies of Moses, or rather, vnto a iust, sincere, and morall life. The thing is so playne, that there needeth no question therein: yet those things which are written in the 7. chapter are yet much more manifest. The affection (saith he) which are in the members, were by the lawe made stronge and of efficacy, to bring forth fruit vnto death. But what other thing are these affections

Testimonies of Paul by whiche is proued that moral wor-
kes are excluded from
the power
of iustifying

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

ons, then lustes, filthy desires, anger, hatred, and enuy: which affections are rehearsed to the Galatians in that Cataloge; where the workes of the fleshe are separated from the workes of the spirit. And there is no doubt but that all these things pertain vnto the ten commaundementes. Which thing the better to vnderstand Paul addeth: What shall we say then? Is the lawe sinne? God forbid: but I had not knowne sinne but by the law. For I knew not what lust ment, vnles the law had said, thou shalt not lust. Also, the lawe in deede is holy; the commaundemente is holy and iust and good. Agayne, The lawe in deede is spirituall: but I am carnall sold vnder sinne. For that which I do, I allow not. For the good which I would, I do not, but the euill which I would not, that I do: wherefore it is not I now which worketh it, but sinne which dwelleth in me; For there dwelleth no good in me, that is, in my fleshe. I haue a delight in the lawe of God as touching the inward man: but I feele an other lawe in my member resisting the lawe of the mynde. Oh unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me from the lawe of sinne and of death? Wherefore in mynde I serue the lawe of God, but in fleshe the lawe of sinne. Whosoever shall diligently weigh all these testimonies, shall easily see, that the Apostle wholly speaketh of the ten commaundementes, whereof also he plainly maketh mention in those foresayd wordes. But these wordes which afterward follow in the 8. chapter. That which was impossible vnto the lawe, in as much as it was weake by meanes of the fleshe, God sending his owne sonne in the similitude of the fleshe of sinne, by sinne condemned sinne in the fleshe, these wordes (I say) can not be expounded of the lawe of ceremonies, and much les that which followeth in the same chapter. We are debtours not vnto the fleshe, that we shoulde liue according vnto the fleshe: for if ye liue according to the fleshe, ye shall dye. But if by the spirit ye shall mortifye the desires of the fleshe, ye shall liue. Neither can this be referred vnto ceremonies, eue as neither can that also which is written vnto the Galatians: The lawe was put because of transgressions: for where there is no lawe, there is also no transgression. And it is certayne, that neither boasting can be excluded, neither can the promise be firme, if our iustification should depend of the obseruation of the ten commaundementes, and of the mozell preceptes: howsoeuer thou take away the rites and ceremonies of Moses. But much more firme is this place out of the 11. chapter of this epistle vnto the Romanes: And if it be of workes, then is it not of grace: if of grace, then not of workes. This Antithesis is vniuersall, neither can it by any meanes be contraded vnto ceremonies. I will not speake of that also which Paul writeth vnto the Philippians, how that he, besides those precepts of Moses was conuersant without blame also as touching the righteousness which is of the law. For by which he writeth vnto the Ephe. the second chapter: Not of workes least any man should boast, he writeth vnto the Gentiles. Wherefore those workes which be excludeth from iustification can not be vnderstand of ceremonies: for the Gentiles obserued not them. But what will they say of the epistle vnto Timothe: where in the second chapter: we are simply & absolutely sayd to be called not for our workes but according to purpose and grace. Also vnto Titus. He hath saued vs (saith he) not by the workes of righteousness which we haue done, but according to hys mercy. All these things are so playne and manifest that they neede no interpretation. For there is no man so dull, but that as sone as he once heareth these things, easily perceaueth, that they can not without greate iniury be wrested vnto the ceremonies and rites of Moses. But I would fayne know of these men, why they take away the power of iustifying from the workes of ceremonies, and do so easily attribute it vnto mozell workes? Is it not a good and laudable maner to worshipe God which certayne appointed rites which he himselfe hath commaunded? Were not the rites and sacred seruices, which were at that time prescribed vnto the people of the Iewes, commaunded in the ten commaundementes? Undoubtedly where the Sabaoth is commaunded to be obserued, there are all these things conteyned. And eue these selfe same Sophisters doe they not at this day attribute the forgiveness of sinnes and collation of grace vnto theyr sacramentes, as in the old testament they were attributed vnto circumcision? What man of constancy is this, one while to say, that the rites of Moses haue no power to iustify, and an other while to graunt that the same were sacramentes of the old fathers, and that in circumcision originall sinne was forgiven vnto infantes? But this affirme not we, yea we rather utterly deny that any sacraments conferre grace: They do indeede offer grace, but yet by signification. For in sacramentes and wordes, and visibler signes is sette forth vnto vs the promise of God made thorough Christ: which promise if we take hold of by fayth, we both obteyne a greater grace then that was which before we had, and with the seale of the sacramentes we seale the gifte of God, which by fayth we embzased. But I can not inough meruaile at these men, which both affirme and also deny one and the selfe same thing. They graunte, but not with any great warines, as they accustomed maner is, that they utterly take not away from the sacraments of the elders, and chiefly from circumcision, the strength of iustifying: but onely since the time that the Gospell was published abroad: of which time onely say they the contention of Paul sprange, that the rites of Moses should no more be retayned. But here also according to they accustomed maner they are both deceiue themselves, & also they deceiue others. For when Paul teacheth, Abraham was not iustified by circumcision, but receaued it afterward being now iustified by fayth, vndoubtedly he taketh away the power of iustifying from that ceremony euen also in the time of Abraham, wherein it was first instituted. David also when he affirmeth, that blessednes herein consisteth, that sinnes should not be imputed (which thing, as we now reason is nothing els then to be iustified) speaketh he of his owne time, or of any other time? Abacuck also when he sayth, that the iust man liueth by his fayth, and excludeth woorkes from iustifying (as Paul manifestly expoundeth him) spake he onely of his owne time, thinke you? Vndoubtedly he spake both of our time and also of his owne time. Lastly when Paul expessedly writeth vnto the Galathians in the third chapter: As many as are of the law, are under the curse, and goeth on in prouyng that sentence, wherehence I beseeche you seeketh he a testimony? Vndoubtedly out of the law. Cursed sayth he, be he, which abideth not in all the thinges that are written in booke of the law. Being therefore the Law so speaketh, and that (as Paul sayth) it wrappeth in a curse all those which trasgresse the commaundementes thereof, then followeth it of necessity, that by those woorkes which pertayne vnto it, no man can be iustified. But these men go to an other shifte, for they say that all those which are to be iustified, are not of one and the selfe same condition: For such which come to christianity are eyther of Hebrewes or els of the Gentiles: certayne also, after they haue once receaued Christ, do fall into greauous wicked crimes, and haue neede againe of instauration. Nowe (say they) the state and consideration of both these partes is not a like. For they, which haue once professed the name of a Christian, when they are fallen, can not recover righteousness, but by good woorkes, as by almes geuing, teares, fasting, confessions and such other: which preparations and merites are not required of those, which, from infidelity are first conuerted vnto Christ. But I would first heare of these good wise men, out of what place of the holy scriptures they found this they distinction. And seing the maner of iustification is utterly one and the selfe same, and portayneth as well to the one as to the other, why ought the one to come vnto it one way, & the other an other way? Farther, why do they attribute this vnto those that are fallen in Christianity, by they woorkes to merite vnto themselves iustification, but vnto those which come from infidelity they attribute not the same. Are they which haue not kept fayth when they were in the Church, better then the Ethnikes? I thinke not vndoubtedly: for they which haue once tasted of the sweet word of God, and do afterward fall from it, are in worse estate then the other. And the seruant which knoweth the will of his master and doth it not, is greenoslier punished. Also, He which hath not a care ouer his, and especially ouer his house hold, the same man hath denied the fayth & is worse then an infidele. But they say, they deny not, but Paul they which are conuerted from infidelity, may do some good woorkes, yea and Paul they may if they do the after some sort, deserue iustification, at Paul least way of congruity: but that these

say

The inconsistency of the Sophists
Sacraments
conferre not grace.

In other
cauillation.

In other
cauillation.

They put a differēce betweene those
which are first conuer-
ted vnto
Christ, and those which hauing fallen are restored.

They whi-
che fall fro christia religion, are of worse estate then
infidels.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

these woꝝks are alike required as well of those as of y other they deny. But foras-much as al their woꝝks (as I haue els where taught) are sins, how ca they do good woꝝks before God? Howeuer how are not good woꝝks required of the before they come vnto Chꝛist & are baptised: Whē as none, which are regenerate by Chꝛist ca beleue truly, vnles he earnestly repent him of his former wicked life: For he aboudantly bewaileth the sins of his former life, & confesseth y he hath greauously erred.
Which thing if he do not, vndoubtedly he beleueth not saythfully and truly. This doth Augustine write of him selfe in his booke of confessions. And in the actes of the Apostles: the Ephesiāns, when they had geuen themselues ouer vnto Chꝛist, did not only confesse they sinnes, but also burnt those bookes which before they had vsed vnto supersticion. But I will declare vnto you what hath deceaued these men.
They read peradventure in the Fathers, that they attributed much vnto teares, fastinges, almes, and other godly woꝝkes of the penitent. But these men vnder-stand not, what the Fathers ment in those places. For they intreated of ecclesiastical satisfactions: and not of our woꝝkes, by which God should be pacified, or the forgeuenes of sinnes deserued. For the Church forasmuch as it saw not the inward sayth of the y sal, and there were many, which not abiding y shame of excomunica-tion, sometimes dissembled some shew of conuersion and repentaunce, thereby the rather to be reconciled, and receiued vnto the cōmunion of the other bꝛethern, the Church I say, to the end this should not happen, would haue a pꝛoofe of they sayth and conuersion, neyther would it admitte them that fell vnto the fellowship of the saythfull, before they had declared teares, fastinges, confessions, and almes, as witnessers of a true and perfect chāging. And bycause these men marke not this they confound all thinges, and build thereupon most detestable hypocrisye. But they haue yet an other shift: for they say, that the woꝝkes of infidels are not sinnes, although they be done without the sayth of Chꝛist. For they imagine, that there is a certayne generall and confused sayth towarde God: which sayth they which haue, although they beleue not in Chꝛist, yet may they worke many excellent woꝝkes, which euen for that selfe same sayth sake may please God, and after a sort deserue iustification. They geue (say they) large almes: they honoꝝr they parents: they exceedingly loue their countrey: if they haue cōmitted any thing y is euil, they are soꝝy for it, they liue moderately: and do a greate many other such like thinges, and that not rashly: but bycause they beleue there is a God which delighteth in such woꝝkes. Wherefore they apply them selues vnto them, to make themselues acceptable vnto him. Farther they paynt out and colour they sayned lye with a fringe similitude. A stake say, or a post being put into the earth, although oftentimes it take not roote, or life, yet draweth it some turpe out of the erth, & so byingeth forth some leaues and buddeth, as if it liued in very dede. So mē (say they) that are strāge from Chꝛist, although they liue not by the celestially spirite, yet by some inspiratiō of the spirite they worke those excellent woꝝkes which we haue described. But we that are instructed by the holy scriptures do acknowledge no other sayth, whereby we can please God, but only that which is in Chꝛist Iesus. For there is no other name vnder heauen geuen vnto men, whereby we ca be saued, but only the name of Chꝛiste our sauiour. And Paul as often as he maketh mencion of sayth whiche iustifyeth, alwayes declareth it to be that saythe: whereby we are godly affected towarde Chꝛiste and hys Gospell. But leaste Paul shoulde seeme to teach this thing peculiarly, and alone, I will a little more depely repeate the whole matter. Abraham beleued God, and it was counted vnto him vnto righte-ousnes. But what beleued he? Forsooth this: that he shoulde haue sēde geuen him, namely, that onely sēde (as Paul interpreteth it) wherein all nations shoulde be blessed, which is Chꝛist Iesus. This testament was confirmed of God vnto him in Chꝛist: yea the Lord himselfe, when he spake of him said: He saw my day and re-ioysed. Job also in the xix. chap. I (saith he) do know, that my redeemer liueth: which shall also rise in the last day ouer them that lye in the dust. And after the wormes shall destroy this body, I shall see the Lord in my flesh. Whome I my selfe shall see, and mine owne eyes shall

In what sense the fathers haue attributed
so much vn-
to prayers,
fastinges &
teares.

Whether
the woꝝkes
of infidels
be sinnes or no.

A simile
made.

We please God with no sayth, but with that which is in Chꝛist.

Abraham
was iusti-fied by faith in Chꝛist.

shall behold and none other for me. This faith exprest in those words is in no wise generall or confused. For in it are plainly described the principall pointes whiche pertain vnto Christ. For first he is called a redeemer, wherein is published the forgiveness of sinnes. Further his comming to iudgement is set forth, and also the resurrection of the deade, in whiche resurrection not other bodies, but euen the selfe same which they had before shalbe restored vnto men. There also put the humane nature of Christ, which may be seene with corporall eyes. Further what manner of faith I beseech you is that faith, which these men affirme infidels to haue: For a true and firme persuation, and a constant and an assured assent vnto the promises of God draweth with it (as I said at the beginning) all good motions of the minde. How then can they say, that these men haue faith which lie still weltering in idolatry, and in most filthy and grosse sinnes? They may indeede haue some certaine credulitye either by education, or by humane persuation, or by an opinion after a sorte rooted in them: but to haue a true faith, so long as they lead such a kind of life it is by no meanes possible: vnles they will graunte that the Turkes haue also faith: for they assente vnto many thinges, whiche we professe and beleue. But this place of Paul out of the first epistle vnto the Corinthians, If I haue all faith, so that I can remoue mountaines, and haue not charitie, I am nothing, this place I saye they will haue to be vnderstande not onely of the true faith, but they also saye that the same faith may be seperated from charitie: howbeit they graunte that if it so come to passe the same sayth can profite nothing. Seeing therfore they after that sorte expound that place, how agree they with Paul when they say: that a generall and confused faith, which is in men that are yet straunge from Christe, can bring forth good woorkes, which of congruity may merite iustification and please God, when as Paul saith, that euen the true faith also (as they interprete it) doth nothing profite without charitie: But that similitude which they bring of a stake or post fastened into the earth vtterly ouerthroweth their opinion. For although being deade it seemeth to liue, yet in very deede it liueth not. And a wise husbandman saith that that budding forth is vnprofitable: and therfore such leaues he casteth awaye and destroyeth as vaine and nothinge woorth. And of the same estimation are those woorkes with God, whiche these men so colour and adorne. They inuente also an other fayned deuyse not muche vnlike vnto the first: for they saye, that those woorkes of the infidels are not done without grace. For there is (say they) a certain generall grace laid forth vnto all men, and common vnto men euen not regenerate, wherewith they beinge after a sorte holpen may merite iustification, and do woorkes which please God. But in so saying, they fall into the heresye of Pelagius. For he also taught, that men without the grace of Christ might euen by the strengthes of nature and doctrine of the lawe worke good woorkes, by whiche they might be iustified. Neither doth this any thing helpe their cause, in that they saye, that they referre not these thinges vnto nature, but vnto grace, whiche the Pelagians vtterly denied: for in wordes they wil seme to disagree from them, when as in verie deede they altogether agree with them. For in that they assigne a grace, whereby they can attaine vnto righteousness without Christ, they are both against Christ, and also against the counsell Millenitanum and also against the holy scriptures. Further in that they make grace common vnto all men, they turne it vnto a nature: and so say that some vse it, and other some vse it not. And this grace they call a preuentinge grace: but that other whiche is moze absolute, they call an after following grace. Which diuision we deny not, so that it be rightly vnderstand. For we graunt that there is one grace which preuenteth and an other which followeth after: but that grace is nothinge els but one and the selfe fauor of God throughte Christ, wherewith we are both preuented, to will well, and wherewith we afterwarde being regenerate are holpen and stirred vp, to liue well. For who euer doubted, but that we are preuented of God, before we can be chaunged and renewed in Christ? He were worse then madde which would say that we in our conuersion do preuent the ayde and helpe of God. He first loueth vs before we can beginne to loue him: he first stirreth vs vp by his fauor and spirite, before that we can either

A true faith draweth with it all good motions of the minde. They whiche be strangers from Christ may haue a credulity, but not a true faith. The Turkes haue not a true sayth, although they beleue many true things that we beleue.

They put in infidels a grace, wherby they may doo good woorkes

An heresye of the Pelagians.

Grace preuenting, and grace after following.

will

Certaine
illustrations are geuen
vnto infir-
mits.

Why we ar
said to be iustified by faith, & that
by it onely.

Paul wrote
of iustifica-
tion vnto
the whole Church,
which consisted both of Jewes
and also of Gentiles.

will or thinke any thinge that is good. But herein is the error, if we thinke that men are endued with the grace of Christ, whē they are not yet regenerate, nor renued in Christ. There are in deede sometimes geuen vnto them certain illustrations: but if those be not so vehement and of such efficacye, to chaunge their mindes, then serue they vnto their iudgemente and condemnation, and not vnto their sal-uation: which thing we must thinke that eue the sinnes of them which are so illuminated do deserue. And lest any man should be ignorant, what these mens meaning is, this is to be knowen, y they affirme, that Paul excludeth from iustification those woꝝkes onely, which are done of them by free will onelye, and by the helpe of the law. But I would faine know of these men, what manner of woꝝkes those be which are so done of men. They are not vndoubtedly grosse and filthy sinnes, such as are murther, fornications, adulteries, theftes, and other suche like. For these thinges are not done by the helpe of the law, but rather by the impulsio of the flesh and of the deuill. Neither are they natural woꝝkes, as to play or pastime, to plough, to reape and to saile: for as touching these thinges there is nothinge commaunded in the law. Then there remaineth onely honest, ciuil, or moral woꝝkes: as to honoꝝ the parentes, to helpe the poꝝre, to be soꝝpe for wicked actes committed. For these thinges are both commaunded in the law, and may as these men thinke be perfoꝝmed by free will: from all these say they, Paul taketh away the power of iustifieng.
But what other good woꝝkes then are there remaining? vndoubtedly I se none: vntles peradventure they vnderstand those which are done of men alredy iustified: for befoꝝe iustification other woꝝkes haue we none, besides those whiche we haue now reherſed. Sithen therfoꝝe these men exclude both sinnes, and also woꝝkes naturall, and these moral woꝝkes which the law commaundeth, vndoubtedly they exclude all woꝝkes. Let them then shew, by what woꝝkes they would haue men to be iustified. If they had any consideration, they would haue this alwayes befoꝝe their eyes: If of grace, then not of woꝝkes: and if of woꝝkes, then is it not of grace: neither would they flye vnto this so foolish, false, and vaine cauillation, to say that Paul is to be vnderstand of those woꝝkes onely, which are destitute of any faith and grace whatsoener they be. How dare these men speake this, when as they cannot abide that a man should say, that men are iustified by faith only: We added (say they) that woꝝde, Onely, of your owne head: it is not found in the holy scriptures. If they lay this iustly, rightly against vs, why did they themselues commit the same faultes? why will they take that themselues, which they will not geue vnto others: Seing therfoꝝe Paul taketh away the power of iustifieng from woꝝkes not adding ther to this woꝝde, onely: how do they then adde that woꝝde vnto them? But we haue most firme argumentes out of the holy scriptures to adde vnto sayth this woꝝd, only: and we vse that kinde of speech, which as we shall declare is receaued and vſed of all the fathers. But let vs heare what they also bable as touchinge this matter.
Paul (say they) had most to do with the Jewes, which thoughte that they mighte so be iustified by woꝝkes, and especially by the woꝝkes of the lawe, that they had no neede of Christ. Wherfoꝝe the Apostle bendeth himselfe to that only. But I thinke that whatsoener thinges he wrote, he wrote them vnto the church, which consisted both of the Jewes and also of the Gentils, which with one assent confessed Christ.
Do they thinke that there were any among all these whiche promised vnto themselues saluation without Christe? vndoubtedly if there had bene any suche, the church would not haue suffred the. But yet there were some, which together with Christ would haue retayned ceremonies, vnto whiche they attributed ouer muche but that there were any which excluded Christ it is not to be thoughte. Further Paul when he teacheth these thinges, instructed not onelye the Jewes, but also the Gentils: as it most manifestly appeareth by the Epistle vnto the Ephesians, where he saith, that a man is iustified by faith: and that (saith he) not of your selues, leaste any man should boast: and in that place he by name calleth those Gentils, vnto whome he writeth and especially in the second chap. Wherfoꝝe this fond mencio of theirs is baine & ridiculous. But now let vs come to their godly strong anker hold. There are

ar two kinds of merits, say they, one of congruity, the other of worthines. And they confesse y the woꝝks which go befoze iustificatiō, merite not of worthines iustificatiō, but only of congruity. If thou demanda of the what they mean, whē they say, merite of congruity, they wil answer, that they ascribe it vnto those woꝝks, which in very dede of their own nature deserue not saluatiō: but so far forth as promise is made vnto the through a certain goodnes of God. And such say they are those moral actes, which many woꝝke befoze iustification. But the merite of worthines they call that for whose sake the reward is altogether deu: and this do they ascribe vnto those woꝝkes, which are done of the godly after regeneration. And by this distinction they thinke they haue wholly gotten the victoꝝy. But soasmuch as they haue it not out of the holy scriptures, there is no cause why they should so much delight themselues therein. What if we on the contrary side teach, that the same distinction is apartly and directly repugnant vnto the woꝝd of God: will they not then graunt, that this their so notable inuention, was by them found out and deuised only, to trifle out our argumentes? Paul when he spake of men iustified, yea euen of the martirs of Christ, which at that tyme suffered persecutions, and most greuous calamities, for their consolation wrote these woꝝdes: The sufferings of this tyme are not worthy the glory to come, which shalbe reueled in vs. These men say that such sufferings are woꝝthy: But Paul denyeth them to be woꝝthy: How agree these thinges together? or rather how manifestly are they repugnaunt one to the other? And because they say that in the merite of congruity are regarded only the promises of God, and not the dignity or nature of the action, let them shew what God euer promised vnto those woꝝkes which are done without fayth and the religion of Christ: Farther who seeth not how foolish this kinde of speach is? Undoubtedly they which are woꝝthy of any thing, the same is of congruency due vnto them: and such vnto whome by an vpright and sound iudgement any thing is of congruency due, ought to be iudged woꝝthy of it. Wherefoze it manifestly appeareth that this distinction was both ill framed, and also maliciously deuised to auoyde our reasons. And yet these men accuse vs, as though we neglect or rather utterly deny those woꝝkes which they call woꝝkes of preparation: which thyng undoubtedly we do not. For although we admitte not the preparations of those men, yet some preparations we both graunt and also allowe. For God the author of our saluation through Christ, vseth many and sundry meanes, and degrees, and wayes whereby to leade vs vnto saluation whiche by reason of his prouidence, and wonderfull power, and incredible loue towarde vs, may be called preparations: although if a man consider the nature of the thinges themselues, and consider also our mynde and will in doing of them, they haue in them nothing, why our saluation ought to be ascribed vnto them: yea they are rather repugnant vnto our saluation. For those godly actions, which they call moral, do geue vnto the wicked matter to puffe vp themselves, and are occasions, to make them to delight in themselves, and not to seeke any saluation either of Christ, or of sincere piety. But contrarily we see that it oftentimes happeneth, that they which haue fallen into grosse and haynous sinnes, are soner touched with an healthful repentance, and do more redely come vnto Christ. Wherefoze Christ sayde vnto the Scribes and Pharisees: Harlots and publicanes shall go before you in the kingdome of God. Neither also will any godly man say, that men are either restrayned from iustification by reason of wicked actes, or els helped vnto it by the strength of ciuile vertues. But the whole matter consisteth herein, because these meanes sometimes are destitute of the grace of God, and sometimes they are by hym conuerted vnto our saluation: so that although as touching vs, they are sinnes, & of their owne nature do helpe nothing, yet by the gouernment of God they are alwayes brought vnto a good end. A man shall see sometimes some men to liue vprightly & honestly as touching the iudgement of men: which yet soasmuch as inwardly they swell in pride and disdainfulness, are so forsaken of God, that they throw themselves hedlong into most filthy falles, and most haynous sinnes: and yet by that meanes it cometh to passe, that they more easely acknowledge themselves, and Meritum congrui, & meritum condigni.

Woꝝkes preparatory are not utterly to be denied.

*The means whereby we are brought vnto saluation, are by the grace of Christ made of efficacy.*

An example
of the prodigal sonne.

A simili-
tude.

Meanes &
preparations
of their owne nature nothing helpe vntles the grace of God be an-nexed vnto
them.

The difference be-twene God & phisitions.

An example of Iudas.

The lawe is not vnprofitable although it
cannot be fulfilled.

are amended, and do returne agayne vnto the fold of the sheepe of Christ. This is plainly set forth vnto vs in the Gospell. The prodigall sonne leauing his father, and hauing spent and wasted his patrimony, was at the last driuen to this point, that he became a bondman, and also a swineherd: which thing vndoubtedly he could not do without great shame. For being bozne of so noble a blood, he should neuer haue so embased himselfe vnto such vile thinges. But he being in this state, began to thinke with himselfe that he should be happy, if that he might but eate coddies with the swyne: of which coddies yet he had not his beelly full. All these thinges vndoubtedly were to be counted a reproch vnto him. And yet thereby came to passe, that he began to thinke with himselfe: Ab how many hyred seruantes are in my fathers house, which haue plenty of bread and good meate: but I perishe here for hunger. And by this meanes was stirred vp in him a iust repentance: wherefore he wisely and godly went agayne vnto his father, from whome he had rashly departed. For who knoweth the secret counsellis of God, and the most deepe bottomles pitte of his prouidence? He oftentimes prepareth men vnto saluation by those thinges, which of their owne nature should be hurtfull and deadly, but that he of his goodnes turneth them to an other end. This wil I declare by a similitude so plaine and manifest, that there is no man but he may vnderstand it. A phisition sometimes commeth to a man that hath a rotten legge, which can by no meanes be cured vnlesse it be cutte of. He cutteth it of: afterwarde he addeth playsters and medicines, and at the length healeth the man. Here I demaunde, whether that cutting of may seme to be a preparation to recouer health or no? Thou wilt say, it may: but whether hath it that of his owne nature, or els, by some violence and condition of the sicke person? It hathe not that vndoubtedly of his owne nature: for if the sicke person being so cut had ben left of the phisition, without doubt he had perished. For he that was so payned had neuer ben able by his owne wit, or by his owne strengthes to come to health: yea rather for very payne and anguish he should haue dyed. Wherefore in that the cutting of was a preparation vnto health, the same is to be ascribed vnto the phisition, and vnto his art. So if God should leaue a man in those wayes and degrees, by which some are brought vnto saluation, he should miserably perishe in them. But forasmuch as God by his most healthfull art and wisdom vseth them, they are made preparations vnto iustification: although of their owne nature they nothing helpe vs, but through our default, & corrupt nature do exceedingly hurt vs, vnles the grace of God be ioyned vnto them. But this similitude in this part sayeth, for that the phisition can not paradventure heale the sicke person without that cutting of: but God can by infinite other wayes and meanes bring vs to saluation. The selfe thing I will now declare by examples. Iudas when he had betrayed Christ, acknowledged his sinne and confessed it plainely. For he sayde openly, that he had sinned and betrayed the iust blood. This acknowledging, and confession of his sinne, should haue ben vndoubtedly preparations vnto iustification, if God would haue bled them. But forasmuch as God bled them not, what other thing shal we thinke that Iudas therein deserued, but only damnation? For certaine it is that afterward he honge himselfe, and perished for euer. This selfe thing we see happened in Cayn, for he also confessed his sinne, and yet was he swallowed vp with desperation. This is the strength and nature of these thinges if they be not gouerned and ordered by God. Farther our aduersaries accuse vs, that we haynously slander the lawe of God, and make it vnprofitable, when we affirme that it can not be obserued of men by naturall strengthes. But these men do right well declare, that they neuer thoroughly considered in the scriptures what are the offices of the lawe. For if they had peyled them, they would neuer iudge it vnprofitable, although it can not fully be obserued of vs. The first office thereof as Paul teacheth, is to shew sinne: For by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne. Againe it prouoketh & wroth of God: For the lawe worketh anger. Moreover it augmenteth the haynousnes of sinne: For the lawe entred in that sinne should abound. It bringeth also a curse: For as many as

are...

are under the lawe, are under the curse. But to what end are these thinges? That it might be as it were our scholemaster vnto Chyist. For they which acknowledge their sinnes, do see that the wrath of God hangeth ouer them, and fele that they sinnes do dayly encrease, and that they are continually more and more vnder the curse: at the length when the spirite of God shall breathe vpon them, they beginne to longe for Chyist, that they might by him be deliuered from so great euils. And this is the schooling of the lawe vnto Chyist. And seeing it is so, how can the lawe seeme vnto any man vnprofitable? Farther who will say, that Aristotle labored vnprofitably, when with so great conning he did set forth in his booke called Aualytica posteriora, the nature of a syllogismus demonstratiue? When as yet notwithstanding there are scanty founde any reasons framed wyth so great conning in any faculties or sciences of wyse men? For seinge we are ignorant of the last differences of thinges we can not either perfectly define, or make a perfect demonstration. But yet notwithstanding Aristotle bestowed good and diligent labour: for by those his most excellent rules he sheweth, whereunto at the lest we should leuell, if a man will surely and firmly proue any thing. Cicero also when he describeth vnto vs such an Orator, as there neuer hath bene or shalbe, yet loseth he not his labour. For this at y least way he sheweth, what paterne he ought to set before him which desireth to excell in that arte. So God hath set forth his lawes, that men should alwayes haue an example before they eyes, whereunto they should frame they life. Besides this, vnto men that are regenerate in Chyist the lawes of God are not utterly impossible to be obserued. For forasmuch as they by the spirite of God haue they strength after a sorte renewed, and the violence of the flesh somewhat repressed, they may accomplishe many thinges which are grateful and acceptable vnto God. Farther also men not yet regenerate, may notwithstanding as touching outward discipline after a sorte apply themselves vnto the lawes of God. Which thing where it is practised, there pub. welth flourisheth and the wrath of God is not so much kindled agaynst men, and the punishmentes which God vseth sometimes to poure vpon open sinners, are for a time auoyded. And these are no smal or vulgare vtilities of the law, which they seme to be ignorant of, which make those obiections vnto vs. But they not being content with this, say farther, y the law may be kept euē of men not yet regenerate. And if a man object the excellency and difficulty thereof, they answer, that our righteousness, if it be compared with the righteousness of God which is on euery side absolute and perfect, or be applied vnto the law being take by it selfe, is no righteousness. But if our righteousness be so compared with the law, as God of his goodnes condescendeth vnto our infirmity, after that maner we may obserue it and be iustified by good workes. But to the end thou shouldest not be ignorant, know y this is a Sophistical distinction of Pighius, whereby he tooke vpon him authority to moderate the law of God: which authority vndoubtedly can pertaine vnto no mortall man and this may we proue both by the law of man, and also by the law of God. For it is writtē in the digestes, de Legibus, & Senatufconsultis: As touching those thinges which are first ordeyned in a common wealth, decrees ought to be made certayne, either by the interpretation, or constitution of a good prince: namely, that it be not in the hand of any man, or iudge, to mitigate the lawes at his pleasure, or to transgresse them vnder the name of any equity. For so lawes should be made Lex via regula: that is a rule of lead, and all thinges should be confounded at euery mans pleasure. Yea rather this rule is therefore geuen, that if the extremity of the law be set forth in any decree, and the equity and moderation of the same extreame law be no where exprested, the iudge ought to follow the extreame law, and ought not to adde equity: which equity yet he may the follow if it exprested in any law. As for example: All lawes agree, that if a debiter pay not his money at his day, and the creditour by that meanes susteyne losse, the debitor is bound to beare the losse. And this they call to pay the interest, or as other speake, to pay the damage.

But because it is had in the digestes de Regulis Iuris, In all causes that thing

¶¶¶.

19

An example of Aristotle

The law of God is alter a sorte obserued of the godly.

By civile discipline
the scour-
ges of the wrath of God are a-uoyded.
It lieth in no man to adde an equity vnto
the law of God.

An argument taken
of the Ro-
mane law.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

The law of God more firme then
the law of man.

There may nothing be added vnto
the law of God, nor anny thing taken from it.
The law of God is impossible to be obserued
by humane strengthes.

An obiectiō touching the repen-
taunce of Achab.

How Achab
is said to be humbled before
God.

is taken for a facte, wherein it cometh to passe that by an other mans meanes there is a stay why it is not done: wherefore if the debter can proue, that the fault was not in him why the money was not payd, for he had the money and offerd, it but the credito: was in the faulte why payment was not made, although the credi- to: sustayne neuer so much losse by forbearing of his money, yet is not the debter bound to make recompence by equity. For by equity written it is counted for a deede, when the let came by reason of an other. Wherefore it manifestly appeareth that it is not in the power of a iudge or of any man, to moderate lawes as he lust himself. And if the case be so in the Romane lawes inuented and set forth by men, what shall we thinke of the law of God? For it ought infinitely to be more firme then the law of man. Neither is it lawfull for vs to sayne in it any equity, vnles when we se it expressed in writing. As for example. The law is, He which shall shed mans blood, his blood shall also be shed. Here we haue the extremity of the law, which vndoubtedly we ought alwayes to follow, vnles in some other place equity teache y the same extremity ought to be mitigated. But in an other place it is thus writt: If two go forth together into the wood to cutte downe wood, and the axe by chance falleth out of the hand of the one, and killeth him that standeth by him, let there be some cities of refuge, vnto which this manqueller may fly, and in which he may line safely, till such time as the matter be tried: so that if he can proue his innocency, then let him be let go free at the death of the Highe priest. This equity mought the iudges vse, bycause it was written in the lawes of God: yea they ought also to vse it, so often as they saw that the matter which they had in hand so required. But that it was lawfull for them by they: authority to bend the lawes of God, or to mitigate them, it ca not be proued by any testimony of the holy scriptures. Yea rather contrarily they were com- maunded, that they should not decline neither to the lefte hand, nor to the right hand: and that they should not adde any thing vnto the law of God, nor diminish any thing from it. And we nede no long discourse to teach, that the law is impos- sible to be obserued as touching our strengthes: and especially before we are rege- nerate. For that the scripture it selfe manifestly testifieth. For Paul thus writeth in the 8. chapter, vnto the Romanes. That which was impossible vnto the law, in as much as it was weakened by the flesh: Also in the same chapter: The wise dome of the flesh is enmity agaynst God. For it is not subiect vnto the law of God: yea neither can it vndoubtedly. And in the first to the Corinthyans: The carnall man vnderstandeth not those thinges which are of the spirit of God: for neither can he: for vnto him they are foolishnes. Christ also: An euill tree (sayth he) can not bring forth good fruits: Also, How can ye speake good thinges, when ye your selues are euill? All these thinges do manifestly teach, that it is not possible that the law of God should be obserued by humane strengthes being as they are now vitiate and corrupted. But as touching these cauil- lations and subtle euasions of the Papistes, let this suffice.

Now let vs come to certayne singular obiections, which they make whereby they labour both to trouble vs, and also to establishe they: owne fond lyes. They say that Achab the vngodly king did rent his garmentes at the threathnings of E- lias, did putte on sackcloth, and so lay on the ground, and fasted, and wente bare- fote: and for that cause the lord sayd vnto the Prophet: Hast thou not sene Achab humbled before me? In his dayes I will not bring the euill, but in the dayes of his sonne. Behold (say they) the wo:kes of an vngodly king, and one not yet iustified do so please God, that they pacified God towarde him. But we say on the contrary that Achab was by these factes iustified. For if he had had that true sayth whiche iustified men, he would not haue abiden still in idolatry, and other most grosse sinnes: indeede he was somewhat moued at the threathnings of the Prophet: but that thing which he did pertayned only vnto a certayne outward and ciuill disci- pline rather then to true repentaunce. But God sayth that he was humbled before him I answere, that that word, Before me, may be referred either vnto the wo:ds of God which were spoken vnto Achab by the Prophet: so that the meaning is, Be fore me, that is to say, at my wo:des: or ells, Before me, that is to say, in the Church of the Israelites. And by that facte Achab testified that he repented of the wicked facte facte which he had committed: and that was a good and sound example befoze the multitude. But God which beheld the inward part of his hart, saw that that repentaunce was fayned and vnfruitfull. And for that cause he promised that he would only differre the punishment: so that that punishment which other wise should haue happened in his dayes, should happen in the dayes of his sonne. Neither is this strange, neither ought we to be ignorant thereof, that for the keeping of outward discipline, plagues are differred, and most greuous punishments of this present life are alioyed. For our doctrine is not that all sinnes are alike: God also wayted till the sinnes of the Amosites were full. And then at the length is his wrath wont to be powred out when filthy lustes and wicked actes impudently & without any brydle range abyode. Yea where outward discipline is kept, God oftentimes geueth many good thinges: not in dede for the merite of the factes, but by an order appoynted by God in nature. For God for the conseruation & good order, of thinges, will that this by a certayne connerion should follow of the other. But I meruaile what these men meane, when out of the bookes of the Chronicles they say, that Roboam the sonne of Salomon did euill, in that he prepared not his hart to enquire of the Lord. They inought easily haue sene that this serueth nothing to this present purpose, vnles they be (if I may so terme them) table doctors, which haue moze skill in the tables, then in the bookes. For as often as they finde in the table of the holy bookes this woorde, to prepare, or preparation, that straight way whatsoeuer it be they snatche, and thinke that it maketh for theyr purpose, and pertayneth vnto theyr preparatory woordes. But the holy history, when it declared, that the kinge behaved hymselfe wickedlye, addeth by exposition (as it oftentimes doth) that he had not an vpright hart & redie to seeke the Lord. Neither doth this any thing helpe theyr cause which is written in the 16. chapter of the pro-uerbes: It pertaineth to a man to prepare the hart: but the answere of the tounge is of the Lord. For we ought by those woordes to vnderstande nothinge els, then that men in dede are wonte to purpose wth themselves manye thinges: but the e-uent and successe is not in their power, but dependeth of God. Men oftentimes appoynte wth them selues what they will saye in the senate house, in the iudge-ment place, befoze the kinge, vnto the souldiours, and vnto the people: But what shal come to passe, lieth in the pleasure of God. They in dede prepare the hart: but God ordereth the answere of the tounge according to his prouidence. Such an other waighty reason they cite out of the 10. Psalm: The Lord hath heard the desire of the poore: thy eare hath heard the preparation of their hart. But in this place these good masters make two flat errors. For first they vnderstand not that which they speake: secondly they cite not the place according to the truth of the Hebrew. For the sence is, That God despiseth not the prayers of the poore: but according to his great goodnes accomplisheth for them those thinges which they had determined in their mind to desire of him. And this is the preparation of the hart. For there is none that is godly desireth any thing of God, but first he deliberateth in his hart, that the same thing is to be desired. Other wise he should come rashly vnto God, & should pray foolishly. But these men wheresoeuer they finde in the holy scriptures this word to prepare, straight way snatch it vp even against the nature thereof to establishe woordes preparatorye. But now let vs see what the sentence is after the Hebrew veritie: Taauah anauin thamaia ichouah, tachin libbam taefhib ofuecha.

That is, Thou hast heard the desire of the poore, Lord: thou hast prepared, or shalt prepare their hart: thy eare shall heare. Here we see that David affirmeth that God heareth the desires of the saintes whom he calleth poore. And he addeth a cause, namely, because God prepareth their hart to require those thinges whiche may serue to their saluation and please God. But by whome God woorketh such a preparation in the hartes of the faithfull, Paul teacheth in this Epistle, when he thus writeth: What we should aske as it behoueth vs, we know not. But the spirite prayeth for vs with unspeakeable sighes. But it is God which searcheth the hartes, he seeth what the spi-rite will aske for the saintes: We see therefore both by David and also by Paul that God holds beth backe

his scour-
ges for the obseruing of outward discipline.

God will haue an order to be kept in outward
thinges.
Now Ro-
boam is said
not to haue
prepared
his hart.

Why it is said & it yet cometh to man to prepare the hart.

The preparation of the hart of the
poore.

God prepa-
reth the hart of the saintes.

God prepa-
reth our hartes by his holy spirits.

Cap. 11 A Commentarie vpon the

A concil-tion of places of Jeremy and E-zechiel.

Of the fact of the Antinites.

A profitable rule for the right
understanding of sentences of the fathers
touching iustificatio.

A simili-
tude.

A simili-
tude.

How this sentence is to be understand. God reneweth to every man
according to his works

Iuxta.

God heareth those prayers of them that pray vnto him, which are by the impulsio of his spirite stirred vp. We learne also of the Ethnike Philosophers, and that in no places then one, that those are worthy of reproue, which without consideration and rashly require any thing of God. But they which professe Christ, euen as they beleue that he is the autho<sup>r</sup> of their prayers, so also do they close them vp in thys sentence: Thy will be done. But (say they) Ezechiel saith in his 18. chapter. Walk in my wayes and make ye a new hart: Ieremy also saith: Be ye conuerted vnto me saith the Lord. Wherefore a man (say they) may of himselfe prepare himselfe to the obtey-ning of rightconnes. But these men should remember, that it is no vp<sup>r</sup>ighte dealing to cite some places of the scriptures, and to ouerhippe & leaue vnspoken other some. Let them goe therfore and see, what Ezechiel writeth in the 30. chap<sup>t</sup>: I saith the Lorde will bring to passe that ye shall walke in my wayes. Agayne: I will gene vnto you a fleshy hart, and will take away from you your stony hart. Ieremy also in the 31. chap.
Conuert me O Lord, and I shall be conuerted: Wherefore Augustine very wel sayd: Gene what thou commaundest: and commaund what thou wilt. They abuse also an other place out of the Prophet Jonas to confirme their erro<sup>r</sup>. For in him it is writte, that God regarded the woorkes of the Fininites. Beholde (say they) the affliction of the Fininites wherby they afflicted themselues with fastings, and cried vnto the lord, prepared they<sup>r</sup> mindes, and made them apte to obtaine pardon. As though it beho-ued not the Fininites first to beleue the woorde of God before they coulde epyther pray healthfully, or els repent. Seeing therfore they beleued before they did any woorkes, they were iustificd by faith, and not by woorks which folowed afterward.
And God is sayd to haue regarded their woorks, because they pleased him. Neither did we euer deny, that the woorkes of men being now iustificd are acceptable vnto God. So often as we finde in the scriptures such places which seeme to attribute righteousnes vnto our woorkes, we muste according to the doctrine of Augustine, haue a consideration, out of what foundation those woorkes procede. And when we perceauie that they springe out of faith, we oughte to ascribe vnto that rote that which afterwarde is added as touching righteousness. And how soeuer these men erre in their reasoning, hereby we may perceauie, for that they take vpon them to transferrre those thinges which are proper vnto one kinde of men, vnto an other: Which thing eu<sup>e</sup> humane lawes wil not suffer. For as it is had in Code. As touching testaments or last willes, If rusticall and vnlearned men, which dwell out of cities, and haue not store of wise and learned men, do make their last willes without a solem-nitie required thereunto, and without a sufficient number of witnesses prescribed, whiche yet other wise were necessary, such testaments ought to be allowed. Now if a ma would transferrre this prerogative vnto citetins, who for that they haue their abidings in cities, haue store of men of vnderstanding, he should exceedingly erre. For if their testamentes should be so made, they are refused, neither are they counted firm. So we say that the woorkes of men iustificd may please God: which thing yet neyther can nor oughte to be graunted vnto them whiche are without faith, and without Christ. Farther let vs marke the accustomed fond kind of reasoning of the aduer-saries, whiche the Logicians call, A non causa, vt causa. that is, from that whiche is not the cause, as the cause. For they alwayes appoint good woorkes to be the causes of righteousness when as in very dede they are the effects of righteousness & not causes. For it is as though a man should say, the fire is therfore hot, because it maketh hot. But it is cleane cotrary: for therfore it soe maketh hot, because it is hot. So also we, because we ar iustificd, therfore do iust thinges: and not because we do iust thinges, therfore we are iustificd. Somtimes also they make this obiectio, that God will reder vnto euery man according to his woorks. Wherefore woorks (say they) are his causes of our felicity. But here also as they<sup>r</sup> woted maner is, they are very much deceiued. For vnles they haue found out some new grammar vnto themselues, vndoubtedly this word according, signifieth not his cause. But Christ (say they) in his last iudgement seemeth to expresse these thinges as causes wherfore the kingdome of heauen is geuen vnto them. For thus will he say: I was hungrye, and ye fed me: I was thursty, and ye gaue me drinke. But Christ doth not in very dede rehearse these thinges

things as causes: but rather those things which wente before: Comye blessed of my father, possesse ye the kingdome which was prepared for you from the beginning of the world. For the true cause of our felicitie is, because we are elected and predestinate of God to y eternal inheritance. For they which are in this number are when time seruethe adozned with faith, whereby being iustified they haue right vnto eternall life. But because this faith is hidden, neither can be seene, and Christ will haue all men to vnderstand, that none but the iust are receiued into the kingdome of heauen, therefore reherceth he these outwarde workes, that by them it might plainly be perceaued that righteousness is geuen vnto men by faith. For there is no man that can be so ignorant, but that he knoweth that there are two grounds of things the one is, whereby they are, the other, whereby they be knowne. Againe they obiect out of the first of Samuel: Those that honor me, I honor, & those that loue me, I loue. Here say they the promise is made vnto the worke. But if they would make a distinction betwene the promises of the Gospel and the promises of the lawe (as we haue els where abundantly taught) they should easily vnderstand that that place is nothing repugnant vnto our sentence. For if we coulde of our selues satisfie the commaundement of the law, then might it be the cause, why the promise should be geuen vnto vs. But soasmuch as no man is able to performe it, all men flye vnto Christ and are through faith towardes him iustified. Then by a certaine obedience begonne we begin to worke: which although it be not exactly done according vnto the rule of the commaundement, yet it pleaseeth God. And he of his mere liberality performeth the promise whiche was adioyned vnto that worke. And so those conditions whiche are adioyned vnto the preceptes are not vnpromisable. For they that are iustified attayne vnto them. Neither are those men ashamed to cite these wordes out of the 25. Psalme: Looke vpon my labour, and my vtility, and forgiue me all my sinnes: as though our labours, or afflictions are the causes of the remission of sinnes. But in this place David being in most greivous calamities desired of God, to forgiue him his sinnes: that if he should be angry for his sinnes, the cause of punishments might be taken away. For here is not entreated of labours which a man taketh vpon him of his owne voluntary will, but of punishments inflicted by God. We see also that children, whilst that they are beate[n] of their maisters, do desire forgiveness and pardon. If thou geue an almes vnto one that is leproous, the leprosy can not properly be called the cause of thy compassion or mercy. For otherwise all that passed by the leper should do the same. But the true cause is the louing affection in thy minde. But they say moreover that in the holy scriptures much is attributed vnto repentance: which thing we deny not. But we on the other side would haue them to vnderstand that repentance is the fruite of faith: and that no man can with profite repent hym of his sinnes, vntill he first beleue. They also vainely boast of many things touching confession. But touching it we make a distinction. For either it is seperated from hope and faith, as it was in Judas which confessed that he had sinned in deliuering the iust blood: and so farre is it of, that that confession should bring any profite, that it is a preparation also vnto desperation and vnto destruction: or els it is ioyned wyth faith and hope, as it was in David and Peter: and so is it not the cause but the effect of iustification: for it followeth faith, and goeth not before it. The auricular confession also of the Papistes is utterly superstitious, wherfore we utterly condemne it. For they obtrude it as a thing necessary vnto saluation, and as a cause why sinnes should be forgiven, which they are neuer able to proue by any testimony of the holy scriptures. They violently wrest this also out of the Lordes prayer: Forgiue vs our trespasses as we also forgiue them that trespass agaynst vs: Agayne, Forgiue, and it shalbe forgiuen you. Ergo (say they) the forgiveness of iniuries is the cause why our sinnes are forgiven vs. This their reason, as the common saying is, with the one hand stroketh the head and with the other geneth a blowe. For if the forgiveness of iniuries should (as these men would haue it) deserue remission of sinnes, then that remission were no remission. For after thou Why Christ in the iudgement will make mention of outwarde workes. There are two beginnings of things.

A similitude.

A distinction of confession.

Auricular confession.

Forgiveness of our trespasses is recompounded.

Cap. 11 . A Commentarie ypon the hath once payd the price; there is nothing that can be forgiven thee: but then hath remission place, when the price is not payde. And as touching that place, we first desire that our sinnes should be forgiven vs. And because that by benefites receaued men are encouraged to hope, that they shall receaue other and greater benefites, therefore is this the meaning of that sentence: O father which hast of thy goodnes geuen vs grace to forgene iniuries vnto our trespassers, forgive vnto vs also our sinnes: by these wordes also is not signified a cause but a similitude: although that similitude be not perfect and absolute. For there is none that is wise, that will haue his sinnes so forgiven him of God, as he hath forgiven his neighbour the iniuries that he hath done vnto him. For euery one by reason of the fleshe, and that infirmity whiche it carrieth about, forgetteth much les vnto his brother then he ought. For there alwayes sticketh in his minde some offence, which although it burst not forth, yet his owne conscience is a sufficient witnes vnto himselfe, that his minde is not very perfect towards him, by whome he hath ben hurte. But the former exposition teacheth, that the similitude is to be referred not vnto remission, but vnto the liberality of God: that euen as he hath geuen the one, so also he will vouchsafe to geue the other. But whereas it is sayd: Forgene and it shall be forgiven, that is a commaundement and therefore pertaineth vnto the lawe. But thou wilt object that that sentence is written in the Gospell, and not in the lawe. What is no thing at all: for the lawe and the Gospell are not separated a sonder by volumes or bookes. For bothe in the olde Testamente are containd the promises of the Gospell, and also in the Gospell the lawe is not only comprehended, but also most perfectly by Christ expounded. Wherefore by those wordes we are commaunded to forgive iniuries done vnto vs. And so far as much as we are bound to do according to the prescript of the law, & that law dependeth of this great precept, Thou shalt love the lord thy God with all thy hart, with all thy soules and with all thy strengthes, according to & forme therefore we ought to forgive our enemies: which thing because no man hath at any time performed, neither can performe, it followeth, that we ought to fye vnto Christ, by whome we may be iustified by faith, and after ward being iustified, may after a sort accomplish that which is commaunded: which although we do not perfectly performe yet it pleaseth God: and he freely geueth vnto vs the promise annexed vnto it, not because of our workes or for our merites, but only for Christes sake. They go about also to blind our eyes with the wordes of Daniell wherein he exhorted the king, to redeme his sinnes by almes. But in that place by sinnes we may vnderstand the paynes and punishments due vnto sinne. For the scripture bleseth oftentimes such phrases of speach, which thing we neuer denyed. Yea rather we willingly graunt, that to workes which procede from faith, God is wont to geue many thinges specially as touching the mitigation of plagues and punishments. They object also this sentence out of the first chapter of Iohn: God gaue them power to be made the sonnes of God. Wherefore they say, that those which haue already receaued Christ, that is, haue beleued in him, are not yet iustified, and regenerate, and made the children of God, but only haue receaued power to be made the children of God: namely, as they thinke, by good workes. And in this argument Pigghius the great champion and Achilles of the Papistes, putteth great affiance: but yet in hayne. For he thinketh that of necessity, he to whome power to haue any thing is geuen, hath not as yet the same thing. As though we should here deale philosophically, that power excludeth acte, which yet euen amongst the Philosophers, also is not vniuersallye true. For when they define the soule, they say, that it is an acte of a body naturall hauing members or instrumentes, and also hauing life in power. By which definition appeareth, that our body hath life in power, when as yet it hath life in acte and in very deede. But that worde power, here signifieth that the body hath not of it selfe life, but of another, namely, of the soule. Which thing we in this matter at this present may also affirme, namely, that those which haue receaued the Lord, and haue beleued in him, are regenerate and made the children of God: and yet not of themselves,

but the law & the Gospell are not separated by volumes or bookes.

In what manner we ought to forgive iniuries.

Redeme thy sinnes with almes is expounded.

Redeme thy sinnes with almes is expounded.

He hath geuen them power to be made the sonnes of God, how it is to be vnderstand.

He hath geuen them power to be made the sonnes of God, how it is to be vnderstand.

He hath geuen them power to be made the sonnes of God, how it is to be vnderstand.

but from some other waye, namely, of the spirite and grace of God. For so signifieth this word power. Although the Euangelist in that place spake not peripatetically, but simply and most plainly. For a little before he sayd, His receaued him not. By this word his, he ment the Jewes, which peculiarly professed the knowledge of the true God. But when they had refused the truth offered vnto them, God would not be without a people: but appointed the to be his peculiar people which should beleue and receaue Christ. Wherefore he gaue vnto them power, that is, a right, and a prerogative, that when they had receaued the Lorde by faith, they should be made and be indeede the sonnes of God. And therefore Cirillus expounding that place, saith, that this power signifieth adoption and grace. Farther Pigghius, although he thinke himselfe very sharpe of witte, yet saith not that when he thus reasoneth, he speaketh thinges repugnant. For how is it possible, that any man should haue life in himselfe, and yet not lyue. Assuredly if they in beleuing haue receaued Christ, it must needes be, that straight way they haue righteousness. For as Paul writeth in the first epistle vnto Cor. He is made of God vnto vs, wisdom, righteousness, holynes, and redemption. But what nede we so long a discourse? The Euangelist himselfe declareth vnto vs, who those be, which haue receiued such a power: namely, which are not borne of bloud, nor of the wil of the flesh, nor of the wil of man, but of God. And if they be borne of God, then followeth it of necessity that they are iustified and regenerate. They object also vnto vs a seruile feare, which goeth before charity: as though by it we should be prepared vnto iustification, and the more easely to receaue charity. Vnto whom we aunswere, that such a feare without charity is sinne: they replye agayne, and say, that Christ commaunded that feare: But God commaundeth not sinne. And he commaunded such a feare (say they) when he sayd: I will shew vnto you whome ye ought to feare: feare him, whiche, when he hath killed the body, can also cast the soule into hell fire. And that this feare prepareth vnto iustification, they thinke may hereby be proued, for Augustine (expounding this place out of the first epistle of Iohn, Perfect charity casteth out feare) sayth, that this seruile feare is not unprofitable: for euen as a bristle being put by the shoemaker draweth the threade after it, so this feare draweth with it charity. As touching the first, I answere, their ground is false: namely, that God hath euer in any place commaunded such a feare which wanteth charity & faith. Which thing, I know right wel, these men are neuer able to find. But as touching Augustine. We answer, in the place of Iohn (Herein is charity perfect in vs, that in the day of iudgement we haue confidence, for as he is, euē so are we: In this world there is no feare in charity, but perfect charity casteth out feare) by charity is not to be vnderstanded our loue towards God, but the loue of God towards vs. For he speaketh of perfect charity, such a one as we haue not in this life. And the meaning of Iohn is, that after we are perswaded of the perfect loue of God, wherewith he embraaseth vs, we haue confidence that in the day of iudgement we shalbe in safety. And this perfect charity of God, after we once know it, casteth out feare bicause it suffreth vs not to feare. Wherefore that interpretation of Augustine touching our loue towards God, maketh nothing to the purpose. But suppose, that Iohn spake of our loue towards God, as that place is commonly taken. In that sence also may the wordes of Augustine be true, but yet not vniuersally, that charity alwayes followeth such feare (for we know, if it otherwise happened in Cayn and Iudas) but only in men which are to be iustified. For God bleseth this meane, first to perce them with greate feare of theyr sinnes: and then by it to bring them vnto fayth and charity. In the meane time yet we nothing doubt but that that feare is sinne, Howbeit the sayd feare may be called profitable, not worthely of his owne nature, but bicause of the order instituted by God, whose will is so to vse it to our saluation. And this thing also we adde, that that charity the more it increaseth in vs so much the more and more doth it cast forth feare, not only seruile feare, but also the feare which men that are iustified haue. For whosoever is thoroughly perswaded of the loue of God towards him, can neuer feare his owne damnation. For that doubting wherby we feare eternall punishments

This power is adoption & grace

A simile.

A place of Iohn.

Charity doth not alwayes followe a seruile feare.

How a seruile feare is called profitable.

How this is to be vn-derstand.
The and ye shall re-
ceane.

Geue
almes and all thinges
are cleane
vnto you.

What be the keyes
that are de-liuered vnto
the Church.

Many
sinnes are forgeuen
her, bicause
she hath lo-
ued much.

is sinne. And yet that doubt somewhat alwayes sticketh in our mindes: for we neuer in this life beleue so much as we ought, nor so much as we should. And by reason of this weakenes of charity, wherewith we should loue our neighbour: and also by reason of the infirmity of the perswasion, whereby we ought to beleue in God, so long as we are in this life, we neuer cleane put of all this vicious feare. This also they take and obiect agaynst vs, Aske and ye shall receane. Seke and ye shall finde: knocke and it shalbe opened vnto you. But they oughte to remember, that prayers proceede from fayth and cleaue vnto it only. For otherwise they can not be heard.
But I meruaile why they lefte this vnspoken of, Whatsoeuer, ye shall aske beleuing, it shalbe geuen you. For by these wordes it appeareth, that whatsoeuer is geuen vnto them y<sup>e</sup> aske, is geuen vnto fayth. Hereunto also they adde a sentence out of Luke: Geue almes and all thinges shalbe cleane vnto you. But these wordes may be expounded th<sup>re</sup> manner of wayes, of which yet neuer a one serueth for they<sup>r</sup> purpose. The first way is, to say y<sup>e</sup> that kind of speach was any Irony, as if Christe should haue sayd vnto the Pharisees: ye geue almes, and ye thinke straight way, that all thinges are cleane vnto you. Whiche is not so: for we ought first to make cleane those thinges which are within. An other way is which Augustine followeth in his En- cheridion to Laurentius: Certayne had perswaded themselues, that if they gaue almes they should be saued, though they ceased not fro sinning. And they<sup>r</sup> chiefest anker hold was these wordes of Christ. Augustine answereth, that those wordes of Christ are to be vnderstand of the true and approued almes: of which is w<sup>ri</sup>tten in Ecclesiasticus the 30. chapter: Haue compassion of thy soule and please God. Wherfore thou oughtest to beginne true almes at thine owne selfe: that hauing compassion of thy selfe thou mayest be conuerted vnto God, and cease of from sinnes, and afterward haue compassion of others. And the third way is this, which in my iudge-ment moze agreeth vnto the purpose: Christ being at dinner with the Pharisees began to eate with vnwashed handes: for which thing when they were offended, Christ began to reprove they<sup>r</sup> ignoraunce, which would haue they<sup>r</sup> dishes, handes, and all outward thinges made cleane and beaotiful, but as touching that which they had inwardly, that is, in they<sup>r</sup> mind, they were nothing careful. Wherfore he first exhorteth them to purifye the hart which is inwardly: whiche thing is done by fayth: For in the Actes it is w<sup>ri</sup>tten, By fayth purifying theyr hartes. Afterward as touching outward thinges he addeth, Geue almes and so all thinges shalbe cleane vnto you. Farther as Theodorus Beza a man of greate learning and iudgement hath in his adnotations, very well considered Christ spake not of all maner of cleanes, but of that which pertayneth vnto meate, whereunto Christe applieth a double commaundement, one is that they should eate nothing gotten by rapine or stealth: an other is, that of those thinges which are within, that is, which are contayned in the dishes, somewhat should be taken out for the almes of the poore, whereby what soeuer is left might be clensed and sanctified. But of all this there is nothing which furthereth our aduersaries opinion. There are others which thinke to establishe this they<sup>r</sup> erro<sup>r</sup> by the ministry of the keyes, by which other thinke that men are absolued from sinnes. But they are farre deceaued: for they vnderstand not what those keyes are, which Christ hath commended vnto the Church. The preaching of the word of God touching the remission of sinnes to be obtained by Christ, is the only key to open the kingdom of heauen. And if he which heareth this word, do also adioyne a true fayth, and geue full assent vnto those wordes, then cometh also y<sup>e</sup> other key. With these two keyes is the kingdome of heauen opened, and the forgeuenes of sinnes obteyned. Wherfore Christ sending forth his Apostles, sayd: Go ye, and preach the Gospel. Then he addeth, He which beleueth shalbe saued. By these few wordes he exprested the keyes which he deliuered vnto the Church. In which wordes thou shalt find no worke wrought, as they cal it. For Christ spake only of the hearers, & of the word of God which is preached. But how shal we at the length confute this sentence which is neuer out of they<sup>r</sup> mouth: Many sinnes are forgeuen her, bicause she hath loued much? If the place be diligently considered, it wil be an easy matter

matter to do. We ought to know, that some reasons are taken of the causes, and some of the effectes. Christ a few wordes afterward sheweth the cause of saluation when he sayd vnto the woman, Thy fayth hath made thee safe. But bycause that fayth was hidden in her minde, neither could it be sene of those which were present, therefore putting forth a parable he sheweth, that they loue moze, which receaue greater gifts of any. And that this woman receaued a very greate gifte, that is, iustification, he sheweth by the effectes: namely, bycause she washed his feete with her teares, and wiped them wyth her heare, because she kysed them, because she annoynted them. Which thinges soasmuch as that Pharisey did not, it may be a very greate token or signe, that he had not receaued the like gifte. They cite also out of this epistle vnto the Romanes, Not the bearers of the law shall be iustified, but the doers. But Paul in that place, when he reproveth the Jewes, bycause, when they had receaued the law, and boasted therof, yet they liued contrary to the law, ment therby nothing ells, but that if righteousnes were to be sought for by the law, it is not sufficiēt either to haue it, or to heare it: but it behoueth also in actes and dedes to perfoyme it. Which thing we neuer denied, that a man may be iustified by the law, if he can perfectly and fully accomplishe it. But soasmuch as the same is by no meanes possible we say, that by it righteousnes can not be hoped for. That also which they object out of the epistle vnto the Phillippians, With feare and trembling worke your saluation, nothing helpeth them. Undoubtedly they which know that they haue all that they haue from God, are of a moderate and humble minde: and are euer moze afrayd of themselves. For they se, that in themselves there is nothing that is good: but that helpe is to be looked for at the handes of God only. And therefore Paul biddeth a godly man alwayes to feare, and tremble. But they which thinke, that it lieth in theyr owne power, to iustifie and saue themselves (such as are those, which in this matter contend agaynst vs) they say haue nothing that they nede to be aferd of, or to tremble for. For they boast that theyr saluation consisteth in themselves. Which saluation though Paul do in this place name, yet he therby vnderstandeth not iustification. For he writeth vnto those which were already before iustified. Wherefore this place maketh nothing for them. But Paul meaneth by saluation that renuyng, by which we alwayes profit and go forward to things better and better. Lastly as though now they had gotten the victory, they object this out of the third chapter of the Apocalips: Behold I stand at the dore, and knocke. And if any man open vnto me, I will enter in and suppe with him. But we plainly affirme, that by these wordes is signified, That God at the beginning calleth and stirreth vp, and instigateth vs to saluation, vnto which no man can by hys owne strenghts be led wythout the impullsion of God. But that we of our owne accord, wythout the Grace of God penetrating and changing y<sup>e</sup> mind, can open our harte vnto God, we vtterly deny: neither can these men euer proue it by y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures. But because we haue certain aduersaries, which passe very little or els nothing at all vpon the holy scriptures, but measure al their religiō by fathers and counsellors, so that they may rather be called Patrologi, then Theologi, and that which is moze intollerable they gather certaine pretie sentences out of y<sup>e</sup> writings of the fathers, and obtrude the vnto the people and the easlier to obscure the truth, and to blinde poore simple men: they adde taunting speeches: & especially soasmuch as certaine of the thinke themselves cōing craftes men in rethorickall speech, and haue in that kinde of study spent the greatest part of theyr time, I shall desire the indifferent reader, not to iudge any thinge rashly agaynst the truth, but rather attentively to consider those thinges, which we also will alleadge out of the fathers: for by that meanes he shall easily vnderstand, that the fathers make not so much on our aduersaries side, as they do on ours. But least we should alleadge any sentence out of the fathers confusedly and rashly, we will vse a methode or compendious way which methode that it may the easlier be vnderstand, if shalbe good, first to put forth a demonstration or a certain proue out of those testimonies of the holy scriptures which we haue before cited. Whiche shalbe in this manner: They which do worke according to the prescript of the law, that is as the very law requi-

Not the
bearers of the law shall be iustified
but the do-
ers.

With feare and trembling worke
your salua-
tion, how it is to be vnder-
stand.

A place of the Apoc.
Beholde I
stand at the dore and knocke.

A methode
in citing of the fathers.

reth

Cap. ii. A Commentarie vpon the

reth are iustified by woorkes. But none, & especially before regeneration can do such woorkes, as the law requireth. Wherefore none are iustified by woorkes. The maior or first proposition is so plaine, that it needeth no exposition: For he whiche doth any thing contrary to that which the law prescribeth, vndoubtedly committeth sin: so farre is it of that he can thereby be made iust. But the minor or second proposition although it be proued by testimonies of the scriptures, yet wil we also declare by the Fathers. Farther seing the conclusion is, that iustification is not of woorkes, it must then of necessity be of grace. Wherefore secondly we will shew out of the Fathers, that men are iustified freely, and without all consideration of merites. And because we reiect not good woorkes, but say that in their place they are to be had in estimation, as which by a most straight bond follow iustification alreadye obteyned, we will lastly teach this also out of the sayings of the fathers. That good woorkes follow iustification, but go not before. And those places will we chieflie cite out of the fathers, which are founded vpon the holy scriptures.

Basilus.

And first comeneth in place Basilus who in his firste booke de Baptismo, bringeth these wordes out of the Gospell, Many shall say in that day, Lord in thy name we haue prophesied, we haue caste out deuilles, we haue done many miracles. But these men (saith he) God will not onely cast out of his kingdome, but also call them woorkers of iniquitie. Wherefore they which worke miracles, and seeme to obserue the commaundments of God and his iustifications, if they appoynt theyr minde, and end to any other thing, then they ought to do are said to sinne: namely because they follow not the precept of God published by the Apostle Paul. Whether ye eate, or drinke, or whether ye do any thing els, do all thinges to the glory of God. And it is moste certaine that this cannot be done without faith and charity. Which faith and charity sozall much as men not yet regenerate do want, it necessarily followeth by the woordes of Basilus, that their woorkes are sinnes. Of which selfe same sentence he writeth in his 2. booke de Baptismo, the 7. question. And of purpose he demaundeth, whether any man so long as he abideth in sinne, can do any thinge that is acceptable before God. Whiche thing he affirmeth to be impossible, and that by reasons both manie in number, and also taken out of the holy scriptures. First (saith he) the holy ghost testifieth, that he whiche worketh sinne is the seruante of sinne: further Christ saith, ye cannot serue God and Mammon: for no man can serue two masters. Paul also saith, that light hath no fellowship with darkenes, neither hath God any agreement with Beliall. Whiche thing also he proueth out of the booke of Genesis, althoughe he follow the interpretation of the seuenthy. Thus saith he) spake God vnto Cain, if thou offer well, and deuidest ill, thou hast sinned: be content. The sence (saith he) is, if thou offer sacrifice as touching the outward shew, and thy minde be not right, neither regardest thou the end which thou oughtest to do, then is thy oblation sinne. With which saying agreeth that also which Esay writeth in the 66. chap. He whiche killeth an ox, is as if he should kill a man: and he which sacrificeth a beast, as if he should kill a dogge. It is not inoughe to do a worke which is goodly and a beautifull to the eye: but it behoueth also that thou apply it vnto the prescript of the law of God: which is, that whatsoever thou doost, it be doone in such manner and in such condition as the lawe requireth. And therefore saith he, Paul sayd, None shalbe crowned, but he which hath wrestled lawfully. And it is not sufficient to wrestle, vnles thou wrestle lawfully. Christ also in the Gospell saith: Blessed is that seruant, which when his lord commeth shall finde him thus doing. By which wordes it appeareth that it is not sufficient to do, but behoueth also to do after such, for namelye, as he hath commaunded. Whereouer he sheweth out of the old testamente, that he committed sinne, which did sacrifice vnto the true God, out of the temple, or not in that place where the tabernacle was. For although that were sacrificed, which was commaunded in the law, yet was the condition of the place absent, which the law also required. And if any man had either in the temple, or in that place where the tabernacle was, killed an offering, whiche had any spot, the same man also had committed sinne, because he neglected a necessary condition. He citeth that also out of the Gospell which is taken out of the Prophet: This people honoureth me with their lippes: but their hart is farre from me. And he thinketh that to the same ende tendeth that that which Paule writeth in this Epistle, they haue indeede the zeale of God, but not accordinge to knowledge: and that which he writeth of himself vnto the Phillipians, That he counted for outcastes, and downge, and losses all those his woorkes, which he did, when he liued vnder the law, yea and that without blame. When as therfore the affect and scope is taken away from woorkes which oughte to be in them, what then re- steth, but that they are sinnes, and are displeasaunt vnto God: And to this ende he thinketh serueth that which Paul writeth vnto the Corinthians: If I deliuer my body to be burnt, and if I distribute all my goodes vnto the pore, yet if I haue not charity, I am nothing. Wherefore vnles these men will ascribe vnto men not yet regenerate faith and charity, they must of necessity graunt, that they can do nothing which is not sinne, or is not displeasaunte vnto God. And thus farre out of Basilius.

Gregorius Nazianzenus in that oration, which he made after he returned out of the campe, and when those thinges were finished whiche were done against Maximus saith, That there is no worke accepted or allowed before God without faith: Whether it be done through the desire of vayne glory, or by the instinct of nature for that a man iudgeth it to be honest. Here is this worthy to be noted, that he saith, that the worke which is done by the instinct of nature, that is, in that respect, because it seemeth to be honest, is dead, neither can it please God. The selfe same sentence hath he in his oration de sancto Lauacro, toward the end. And in both places he addeth, Euen as faith without woorkes is dead, so is a worke also without faith dead. And if it be dead, how can it (as these men woulde haue it) merite iustification: By this we see that these two fathers, although otherwise they were greate iustificers by woorkes, and patrons of free will, yet as touching this thing they were wholye of the same minde that we are of.

Gregorius Nazian-
zenus.

But Augustine most manifestly of all teacheth the same in his fourth booke against Iulianus in the 3 chapter. In which place he entreateth vpon these words of Apostle, The Gentiles, which haue not the law, do by nature those thinges which are of the law. These wordes (saith he) are to be vnderstand, either of the Gentils conuerted vnto Christ, who now fulfilled the law by the grace of the Gospel: & so that which he saith, by nature, is no otherwise to be vnderstand, then that the law is excluded: but he meaneth such a nature as is now corrected and amended by the spirit which regenerateth. Or (saith he) if thou wilt haue those woordes to be vnderstand of the Gentils being yet unbeleuers, thou must say, that they by nature fulfilled the law, not in deede so muche as it required, but after a sort: neither did that outward & ciuill righteousness any farther profite them, but to be more tollerably punished then others: which utterly casting away all discipline liued wickedly and filthely: for we iudge that Fabritius, is lesse punished then Cateline: vnles peradventure (saith he) the Pelagians haue prepared for the Fabritians, Regulists, Fabians, Canelistes and Scipios some middle place betwene the kingdome of heauen, and the hell of the damned: such a place as they haue framed for yong infants which depart without Christ. In summe, he concludeth, that forasmuch as without faith it is impossible to please God, infidels can by no meanes haue true vertues. Which sentence the Pelagians derided, that they said, if chastitie of infidels be not true chastitie, neither are they bodies true bodies: neither is the corne which groweth in theyr fieldes true corne. Augustine confuteth them, and sheweth, that this is no apt similitude: for the bodies of infidels, forasmuch as they are made of God, are true bodies, their corne also (for it is his worke) is true corne: but theyr chastitie, forasmuch as it proceedeth out of their corrupt & vitiate wil, can by no meanes be counted true chastitie. And he addeth that vniuersal sentence, wherof we haue much spoken before: Whatsoeuer is not of faith is sinne. The same Augustine vpon the 30. Psalme, expounding these woordes: Deliuer me in thy righteousness: who is he (saith he) which is saued freely? Euen he in whome our Sauour findeth not any thing worthy to be crowned, but findeth much worthy to be condemned: in whome he findeth not merites of good thinges, but merites of punishments. Hereby we see what is the nature of humane woorkes before iustification. The same father in his first booke & 30. question to Simplicianus saith, that we are commaunded to lyue vprightly and that by a reward set before vs: namely, that we may merite to liue blessedly for euer. But who (saith he) can liue vprightly, and worke well, vnles he be iustified by faith? Here we are taught, that there mought be in men a merite and deservng of happy and eternall life, if they could accomplishe that which is commaunded. But forasmuch as that is impossible for vs to do, therefore we fall away from merite. The same Augustine in his Enchiridion: ad Laurentium, the 121. chap. The end (saith he) of the commaundement is of charity out of a pure hart, a good conscience, and an unsayned fayth. The ende of every precept is charity, and is referred vnto charity. And whatsoever is done without such charity is not done as it ought to be done. Wherefore if it be not done as it ought to be done, it can not be denyed, but that it is sinne.

Augustine.

Chrysostom Chrysostome expounding these wordes of Paul, The ende of the law is Christ: If the ende of the lawe (saith he) be Christ, it followeth, that he which hath not Christ, though he seeme to haue the righteousness of the lawe, yet hath he it not in very dede. By these wordes we gather, that he which is without Christ, may indeede haue workes which may seme good, which yet in very dede can not be iust. And straight way he saith: Whosoever hath fayth, the same also hath the end of the law, and whosoever is without fayth, is farre from either of them. Whereby we gather, that they which haue not fayth are straungers, not only from Christ, but also from the righteousness of the lawe: which herein consisteth to do that which is commaunded. And straight way: For what desireth the lawe? To make a man iust: but it can not: For no man hath fulfilled it. But because a man might obiecte, although a man not regenerate can not fulfill the lawe, yet if he take paynes therein and go about, and trauaile, he may attaine vnto righteousness: this thing also Chrysostome excludeth. And a litle before when he expounded these wordes: Being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and willing to establishe their owne righteousness they became not subiect vnto the righteousness of God: This (saith he) he calleth the righteousness of God: which is of fayth: because it is altogether of the heauenty grace, wherein we are iustified, not by our labours but by the gift of God.

Ambrose. This selfe same thing also writeth Ambrose when he expoundeth these wordes of Dauid, Blessed, are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sinnes are couered. He calleth (saith he) them blessed, of whome God hath decreed, that without labour or any obseruation they shalbe iustified by fayth only. And vpon those wordes of Paul: Being iustified freely by his grace They are iustified freely (saith he) because by the gift of God they are iustified by fayth only, they themselves working nothing, nor making any recompence. The same Ambrose vpon these wordes of Paul: Wherefore death hath reigned vpon them which haue not sinned, after the similitude of the transgression of Adam. He wrote this (saith he) because it is impossible for a man not to sinne. Which thing seing he peradventure spake of men regenerate, what is to be thought of men that are straungers from Christ?

Cyprian. Cyprian also ad Quirinum, We ought (saith he) to boast in nothing: because we haue nothing of our owne. I suppose it sufficiently now appeareth, that that is true which we affirmed, namely, that men before iustification can not frame their workes according to the prescript of the law: and therefore are they sinnes, neither can they merite iustification. But if our aduersaries will obiect and say, that they affirme not that those workes which they call preparatory do merite iustification, but only are certayne preparations, by which men are made more apt to attaine vnto iustification, we may thus aunswere them: If they merite not, why saye ye vnto them that your merite of congruity? Farther why call ye them good, when as (as we haue taught) they neither please God, nor are done according to the prescript of the lawe? Lastly forasmuch as they want their end, and not only are, but also by god right are called sinnes, how teach ye, that men by them are prepared vnto righteousness, when as they should much rather by them be prepared vnto punishments. Wherefore let them once at the length cease to adorne them with these goodly titles. For though peradventure God sometimes by these workes bringeth men to saluation, he doth it because of his mercy towarde men, which is so great that he will vse workes, whiche are of themselves euill and sinnes, to their good.

Now let vs see, if iustification be not geuen vnto workes, how it is then geuen uen freely, and it wholly dependeth of the mere grace of God. For no manner of way it dependeth of merites. Which thing Origen saw: for he vpon this Epistle expounding these wordes of Paul, Vnto him which worketh the reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt: But I (saith he) when I desire excellency of speech, whereas he sayth, that vnto him that worketh is rendred a debt, can scarcely perswade my selfe, that there can be any worke, which can of duty requyre a recompence of God: forasmuch as auen thys, that we can do or thinke, or speake any thing we do it by hys gift and liberality: What debt then shall he owe vnto vs whose grace preuenteth vs? A little afterward he rendreth a reason of hys saying, which reason Augustine oftentimes vsed. For he bringeth that place of Paul, The stipend of sinne is death: But the grace of God is eternall life. For here the Apostle added not, But the stipend of righteousness is eternall life: which yet the nature of the Antithesis required. For Pauls meaning was to declare that our wicked workes of duty deserued death, and that euermore death: but eternall life is not geuen but only by grace: wherefore in the second part he left out the name of stipend, and of righteousness, and in steede of them put in the name of grace. Neither do I greatly passe that Augustine in an other place writeth, that Paul mought haue sayd, the stipend of righteousness is eternall life: and yet he would not say so, least he should haue geuen occasion of erring. For how Augustine thought that Paul mought haue sayd it, vndoubtedly I see not: vnles peradventure by righteousness he vnderstand the workes of men regenerate, forasmuch as with those workes the merites of Christ are ioyned. For so it might be true, that eternall life is the stipend of such a righteousness. Farther Origen goeth on and sheweth, that men are so iustified freely, that good workes are not required to go before. For, expounding this sentence, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. The soule (saith he) whose sinnes are forgiven must needes now be in good state: for it is called blessed. Wherefore it hath righteousness, which God imputeth vnto it: although it haue not yet done any workes of righteousness: but only for that it hath beleued in him, whiche iustifieth the vngodly. Out of these wordes we gather many thinges: First that God for workes sake is not made debtor vnto any man. Secondly, that not only iustification, but also eternall life is geuen freely. Lastly, that righteousness is imputed vnto the mindes of the beleuers, although no good workes went before in them.

Basilus vpon these wordes of the 114. Psalmie. Be thou conuerted my soule into thy rest for the Lord hath done good vnto thee. For (saith he) eternall rest is set forth vnto them, which in this life haue wrestled lawfully: which yet is not rendered according to the merite of workes, but is geuen according to the grace of the most liberall God vnto them, which haue hoped in him. Saying these thinges are spoken of the workes of men already iustified, as touching eternall felicity, then are they to be counted much more true if they be referred vnto the workes of them which are yet strangers fro Christ. Wherefore euen as those merite not an eternall reward, no more also can these merite iustification. For both these thinges are geuen freely.

Augustine in his booke De dogmatibus ecclesiasticis, chap. 48. If by the law (saith he) cometh righteousness, then dyed Christ in vayne: So also may we say, if by nature cometh righteousness, Christ dyed in vayne. This spake he against the Pelagians, who affirmed that the liberty of man was so great, that by nature onely it could do thynges acceptable vnto God. And Augustine warely transferreth vnto nature that, which Paul spake of the law: and sheweth that the selfe same absurditie followeth either: namely, that the death of Christ is made in vayne. For in very dede there is no other cause why the law bringeth not righteousness, but onely because nature is vitiate and weake. Wherefore that which is spokē of the one, may rightly agree with the other. The same Augustine vpon the first chapter of Iohn expounding these wordes: Grace for grace: what (saith he) is grace? He answereth, That which is freely geuen. What is grace freely geuen? That which is not rendred, (saith he) as due. For if it were due vnto thee, then it is a reward rendred. If it were due, thou wast before good. And in his booke de predestinatione sanctorum, the 7. chap. Let no man extoll himselfe, as it is customably said: Therefore deserued he to beleue, because he was

How et: r
nall life
may be cal led the sti pend of rig
hteousnes.

Cap. 11.

A Commentarie vpon the

Chrysostom a good man, and that before he beleued, which thing seemeth so be written of Cornelius: When as yet he had sayth when he did good workes. These wordes are so playne that they haue no neede of declaration. Chrysostome in his 2. homely vpon the first epistle vnto the Cor. Where grace (saith he) is, there are not workes: and where workes are, there is not grace. Wherefore if it be grace, why are ye proude? by what meanes are ye puffed up? Chrysostome according to the maner of Paul so opposeth grace against workes, that the one excludeth the other: so far is it of, that he will haue grace to be geuen for workes.

Jerome Jerome vpon the epistle to Philemon. Grace (saith he) is whereby ye are saued and that by no merite or worke. The same Jerome vpon the epistle vnto the Ephes. expounding these wordes: By grace ye are made safe through fayth, and that not of your selues for it is the gift of God: Paul (saith he) therefore spake this, least some hidden thought should crepe into vs, if by our workes we be not saued, vndoubtedly yet by fayth we are saued, so that in an other kinde it commeth of vs that we are saued. All these testimonies sufficiently declare, that iustification is geue freely, neither can it be gotten by any merites or workes goyng before. Now resteth to declare out of the fathers how good workes are to be esteemed. Vndoubtedly they follow iustification, as the fruites therof, which spring and burge forth out of true fayth. Wherefore Origene sayth in that place, which we haue before cited, expounding these wordes vnto the Romanes: But vnto him which worketh, the reward is not imputed according to grace, but according to debt: Wherefore (saith he) not out of workes commeth the roote of righteousness: but out of the roote of righteousness encreaseth the fruite of workes. Whiche selfe thing Augustine affirmeth vnto Honoratus, saying: Hereout spring good workes for that we are iustified: and not because good workes went before, therefore are we iustified. And in his first booke & second question ad Simplicianum: Tea and workes (saith he) if there be any that be good, do follow (as it is said) that grace, and go not before it. And therefore he addeth, If there be any good, because euen the workes of the regenerate haue in the much imperfection: and vnles the righteousness of Christ which is imputed vnto the beleuers, were ioyned with those workes, they should not in very dede be good. The same father in his 26. chapter: de spiritu & Litera at large en-treateth this place vnto the Romanes, Not the herers of the law shalbe iustified, but she doers: and by many reasons he proueth that good workes follow iustification and go not before. To this also tendeth that which Basilus writeth in his second booke De spiritu sancto, the 7. chap. of the wordes of the Lord, that first it behoueth that the tree be good: & then his fruites to be good, & that the Phariseis were repro-ued, which int hey? dishes & cups made cleane & which was without, Make cleane (sayth he) that which is within, and that which is without shalbe cleane, otherwise ye shalbe compared vnto painted sepulchers, which in dede without seme beautiful, but with in are uncleane and full of dead mens bones.

What counsels are to be harkned
vnto.

Concilium
Africanu

Now let vs come vnto the Counsells, which yet are not without choyce and iudgement to be harkned vnto. We ought to receaue and reuerence those Counsells only, which haue framed they? doctrine to the rule of the holy scriptures. Demosthenes in an oration against Androtion sayth, that decrees of the senate ought not so be made but according to the prescript of those thinges, which are already determined in the lawes. So in ecclesiastical counsells ought not new decrees to be made as touching doctrine, but of those thinges only, which are either had expessedly in the word of God, or ells may assuredly and evidently be gathered out of it. First we will begin with the Counsell of Aphricke, in which in the 80. chapter, a curse is pronounced agaynst the Pelagians, who sayd, that the grace of iustification is therfore geuen, that by grace we may the easelyer fullfill that which we are commaunded to do: as though also without grace, although with more difficulty, we might by our free will fullfill the commaundementes of God: when as yet the Lord speaking of the fruites of the commaundementes, sayde not, Without me ye can hardlye doo anye thing, but without me ye can vterly doo nothing. By these wordes are repro-ued the Papistes of our time, which are not ashamed to say, that a man before iustification can do the workes, which are commaunded in the law, and which do please God, and prepare a man to regeneration. For what thing ells is this, then with the the Pelagians to say, that a man may indeede also before iustification performe the law, although not so fully and easely as after he is iustified. And that is not hing which they say, namely, that they put a certayne grace preuenting, whereby men not yet regenerate may do those woorkes which they call preparatory. For in this saying they differ in name only from the Pelagians. For they also taught no les then these men do, that there goeth before a certayne grace of the law, and of the knowledge of the will of God, and of illumination, whereby a man vnderstandeth what he ought to do. But as for the rest, they attributed it vnto free will, which thing these men also do. And that the Pelagians were of that opinion, the counsell Mileuitanum declareth, wherein it is thus witten in the 4. chap. We curse all them which say that the grace of God through Iesus Christ our Lord helpeth vs onely, for that by it, is reueled and opened vnto vs the vnderstanding of the commandements of God: that we may know what we ought to desire, & what to auoyd: and that by it is not geuen vs also to loue & to be able to do that which we know ought to be done. For forasmuch as the Apostle sayth, knowledge puffeth up, but loue edifieth, it is very wicked to beleue, that we should haue that grace of Christ which puffeth up: and not that grace which edifieth: especially seying it is witten in the 4. chapter of the 1. epistle of Iohn: Loue is of God. In the second counsell also of Arauficanum the 4. chap. it is thus witten, That they resist the holy ghost, which say, that the Lord wayteth for our will; when as Salomō sayth: The will is prepared of the Lord: and also when as Paul saith vnto the Philippians, It is God that worketh in vs both to will and to performe according to his good will. And in the 5. chapter are reprobued those which affirmed, that of the grace of Christ is geuen an increase of faith, & not the beginning. For the beginning also of faith commeth of the inspiration of the holy ghost, which correcteth our infidelitie, bringing it from infidelitie to faith, and from vngodlines to godlines. And the pꝛofe hereof is brought out of sundry places of the scriptures. For Paul sayth vnto the Philippians: I trust that he which hath begonne the good worke in you, shall accomplish it euen to the day of the Lord. And againe in the same epistle. Vnto you it is geue not onely to beleue in hym, but also to suffer for him. And vnto the Ephes. By grace ye are made safe through faith, and that not of your selues. For it is the gift of God. Moreover they are there subiect vnto the curse which would say: What the mercy and grace of God is geuen vnto the willing, vnto the beleuers, vnto them that are desirous, vnto them that go about it, vnto them that labour, vnto them that watche, vnto them that study, vnto them that aske, vnto them that seeke, vnto them y knocke: but confessed not that by the infusion and inspiration of the holy ghost, and by the gift of God is geuen vnto vs, to haue a will, to beleue, to endeuour our selues and to labour. They cite these testimonies out of the scriptures. What hast thou, that thou hast not receaued? And if thou hast receiued, why boastest thou as though thou hast not receaued? And the Apostle writeth of himselfe: By the grace of God I am that I am. In the 7. chap. are condemned those which thinke that by the strength we can thinke, or attaine vnto any thinge that serueth to saluation: or that we can without the illumination of the spirite geue credite vnto the worde of God preached. This may be confirmed by the scriptures. For Paul saith: that we cannot thinke any thing of our selues as of our selues, but our sufficiency is of God. Christ also saith: Without me ye can do nothing: Also, blessed art thou Simon Bariona: for flesh and bloud hath not reueled this vnto thee. They also are cursed which graunt that free will is in dede in some maner weakened and hurt: but yet not so, but that men by it may be conuerted vnto saluation. The scriptures are apertly repugnant vnto that sentence. For the Lord saith: No man commeth vnto me vnles my father shall draw hym: Paul also vnto the Corinthians: No man can say the Lord Iesus but in the spirite of God. This is an excellent sentence. God loneth vs beying such as we shall be by his gift, and not such as we are by our owne merite. And in the 13. chapter it is thus witten. Free will beying lost in the first man cannot be repayed: and because it is lost it cannot be restored, but by him, by whome it was geuen at the beginning. Wherefore the truth it selfe sayth: If the sonne shall make you free, then are ye truly free. Farther in the 17. chapter is decreed, that the strength of the Ethnikes cometh of woꝛldly lust:

Concilium
Mileuita-num.

Concilium
Araufica-
num.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

which wordes declare that their vertues (as we haue befoze shewed out of Augustine and other Fathers) were not true vertues: chiefly forasmuch as they sprang out of an euill ground. But humane lust comprehendeth whatsoeuer is possible to be found in men not regenerate. It folloiweth in the selfe same chap. that the loue of God maketh the force and strength of Christians, which loue is poured into our hartes, not by free wil, but by the holy gost which is geuen vs, whereas no merites go befoze that grace. And in the 25. chapter: We ought to preach and to beleue, that by the sinne of the first man free will is so decayed and diminished, that no man afterwarde can either loue God as he ought to do, or beleue in God, or for Gods sake to worke that which is good: vnles the grace and mercy of God preuent him. Wherefore iust Abell, Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the saintes in the olde tyme, are in the Epistle vnto the Hebrues sayd by faith to haue done those thinges which are in the holy scriptures mentioned to haue ben done by the: which faith we haue before taught to come of God. And Paul writeth of himself: I haue obtained mercy that I might be faithfull. But he saith not I haue obteyned mercy, because I was before faithfull: but contrariwise. And in the selfe same chapter: This also we plainly confesse and beleue, that in euery good worke it is not we our selues that do first begin, and afterward are holpen wyth the mercye of God: but that he first inspireth in vs both sayth and the loue of hym, and that without any of our merites goyng befoze. Wherefore we must without all doubt beleue, that both Zachary and the thiefe, and also Cornelius attayned not to beleue by nature, but by the gift of the goodnes of God. These thinges haue I alleaged out of the Synode of Araucanum, peraduenture moze largely then may seme to be conuenient for this place, but for this cause haue I the willinglier done it, so that I saw that al those thinges which are there affirmed, are confirmed by the holy scriptures, and do exceedingly muche serue for our purpose. Such Councils vndoubtedly (gentle Reader) are to be harkened vnto, which leane vnto the worde of God. For whatsoener commoditie or discommoditie the church hath, the same ought wholly to be ascribed vnto the obseruation or contempte of the worde of God. For in the olde and auncient councils, how were Arius, Eunomius, Nestorius, Eutiches, and other pestiferous heretikes overcome, but by the worde of God? For without doubt they could neuer by any other engines be overcome and vanquished. And contrariwise, when began the church to geue place vnto abuses & superstitions, but when the word of God was contened? And now in our times, vnles the word of God had bene sought for, and called agayne in a maner out of exile, how could we euer haue bene deliuered from the tyranny of the Pope? Let these few thinges be a warning vnto vs, not rashly to beleue euery counsell: but let vs receiue those counsels only, which haue soundly confirmed the decrees of their doctrine by the scriptures. But to make that which I say moze manifest, I will speake somewhat of the Council of Trent: that by the contrary the truth may better be vnderstand. In that Council the 5. Session from the 5. chap. vnto the 11. chap. is entreated of iustification. Where these good holy Fathers, namely, the hirelinges of the Pope do thus decree: That the beginning of iustification is of grace. But what grace they there vnderstand, they straight way make plaine. For thus they say: It calleth and it stirreth vp: they which are to be iustified, are so holpe by it, that beyng called and stirred vp, they geue assent vnto this grace, and worke therewith, and are made apt to regeneration: but this assent, and working together they affirme (as the wordes declare) to be done by free will. What moze could Pelagius say if he were now on lyue? For neither did he also deny grace, if thou take it for an admonition, calling, and stirring vp. He also attributed this vnto free will, that it had power to assent and to obey the commaundements of God. But the grace which the holy scriptures set forth vnto vs, reneweth our vnderstanding and will, and in stead of a stony hart geneth vs a fleshy hart. For it doth not only counsel our reason, but also fully perswadeth it, and boweth and changeth the will. Our men of Trent graunt in dede that God toucheth the hart of man by the illumination of the holy ghost: but lest a man himself should do nothing, they adde, he receiveth the inspiration: as he which may also refuse it. Wherefore they fully conclude, that it pertaineth to man to receaue: although they confesse that he can not

Tridentinum council.

*What is the worke
of grace in iustification.*

do that vnles he be called and stirred vp by grace. But how can the hart of man, vnles it be renued by the spirite and grace of God, receaue those thinges agaynst which, by reason of his nature being yet corrupt and vitiate, it resisteth? Answeredly, though it be neuer so much stirred vp, taught, and moued, yet vnles it be utterly chaunged, it wil continually withstand and resist. Wherfore Augustine ad Simplicianum writeth very well: That it is not in our power, that those thynges which are set forth vnto vs, should be acceptable and pleasant vnto vs. But we chuse not that thing which is neither acceptable nor pleasant, though we haue neuer so many admonishers to stirre vs vp. As if there should be offered vnto a sicke man good healthfull meates, and very pleasantly drested, yet because they are neither pleasant nor acceptable vnto him, he refuseth them: though there stand many by, and say vnto him, that those meates are wholesome, and very well drested. The selfe same thing vndoubtedly happeneth vnto a minde not yet regenerate: but that as touching the receiuing of the grace of God, there can be done no violence vnto the minde: but the sicke person may be compelled to take meates that are vnto him vnpleasaunt. Wherfore so long as our will and vnderstanding is not changed by the spirite of God, it will not admit any healthfull admonitions. And euen as a sicke person before he be restored to health, neither abideth nor gladly receiueth meates when they are offered him, so also the minde of man vnlesse it be chaunged from infidelitie to faith, from impietie to godlines (as saith the Synode of Arausicanum) it neither obeyeth nor geueth place vnto grace which calleth and stirreth it vp: which thing yet the good Fathers of Trent affirme. But lest they should seme to speake without scriptures, they bring forth two testimonies: The one out of the first chap. of Zacharie. Be ye conuerted vnto me, and I will be conuerted vnto you. This (say they) hath a respect vnto the man, who is commaunded, that euen in iustification he shoulde doo some what. But Jeremy sayth: Conuert vs Lord, and we shall be conuerted: by which word is declared, that vnto this conuersion is also required the helpe of God. And by this meanes they deuide the whole matter betwene God and man. But Augustine & many other of the Fathers ascribe the whole aete of our iustification vnto God onely. But, as touching this place of Zachary, it may be expounded two manner of wayes: First, that those are the wordes of the law commaunding, & yet by the cannot be proued, y a man can be conuerted vnles God conuert him. For of it Augustine thus writeth: Lord geue that which thou commaundest, and commaund what thou wilt. An other exposition is this, in iustification are two inward motions: of which the one pertayneth vnto reason, which (as we haue said) hath nede not onely to be taught, but also to be perswaded and to be drawen into the sentence of the holy ghost: the other motion pertaineth vnto the will, that it may be bowed, to receiue al those thinges which the holy ghost promisseth and offereth. And this is the faith, by which we are iustified, and wherby our sinnes are forgiven vs. But soasmuch as these thinges are done secretly in the inward partes of the mind, the Prophet speaketh not of them: but rather spake of those thinges which follow. For man after he is once iustified, beginneth to be conuerted vnto good woorks. Wherfore he which before liued dissolately and wickedly, now behaueth himselfe wel and orderly: and being renewed with grace and the spirite, woorketh together with the power of God. Of this conuersion the Prophet speaketh, when he sayth: Be ye conuerted vnto me. And God promisseth to heape them vp with great benefites: which is signified by this, And I will be conuerted vnto you. For before, when he withdrew from them his benefites, and afflicted them with captiuities, and other miseries, he seemed to be turned away from them. Wherfore the Prophet spake not of the inward iustification, but of the outward conuersion vnto good woorks. But Jeremy when he said: Conuert vs Lord and we shall be conuerted, had a respect vnto those inward motions of the mind, which we haue now described. But our men of Trent, when they thus say, although they saie that they differ from the Pelagians, yet in very deepe they

It is not in our power that those thinges which are set forth vnto vs should please vs.

A place of Zachary is cleared.

What are the inward motions in iustification

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

Degrees
of iustifica-
tion appointed by the Synode of Trent.

The degrees of Trent beforebrought
are confuted.
What causes of iusti-fication they
of Trent allege.

In herin iu-stification
properly
consisteth.

Iustification cannot consist in that righteous-
nes which cleaueth in the iust.

can neuer proue it. They say that they deny not grace: but in very deede they put that grace which the Pelagians would neuer haue denied. But let vs see what degrees, and what preparations these men appoynt to iustification. First (say they) a man which is to be iustified, being called & stirred vp by the grace of God, beginneth to beleue those things which are written in the holy scriptures: then is he smitten with the feare of the sinnes which he hath committed: afterwarde looking vnto the mercy of God, he beginneth to haue a good hope: this hope being conceived, he loneth God: out of which loue springeth in him a certaine detestation of sinnes, and a purpose to liue wel: lastly he receiueth baptism or the sacrament of repentance: and herein say they consisteth iustification. For all other things which went before, were only preparations. But these men see not that we ought farre otherwise to iudge of baptism. For the holy scriptures teache, that Abraham was first iustified by faith in vncircumcision: and then he receiued circumcision, as opayda, that is, a seale of righteousnes already receiued. This selfe same consideration according to the Analogy is to be kept in baptism. For our baptism answereth vnto the circumcision of the elders. When these men put, that faith, the feare of God, hope, charity, detestation of sinne, and a new purpose of liuing vp rightly, are only certaine preparations vnto iustification, they decree that a man may be perfect before he be iustified. Then they adde the causes of our iustification, and beginne at the finall cause: and that say they, is the glory of God and our salvation. The efficient cause, they say is God himselfe of his mercede. The meritorious cause (as they call it) they put to be Christ Iesus by his death on the crosse, and the shedding of his blood. And hitherto in deede all is wel. The forsmall cause they say is the iustice of God, not that iustice whereby he himselfe is iust, but that which he communicateth vnto vs, whereby we truly bothe are counted iust, and also are so in deede. By which wordes they vnderstand the renewing of a man now regenerate, and his new forming by grace and the holy ghost. And that these things are done in a man already iustified, we deny not: but that iustification consisteth there in, we can not graunt. For Paule affirmeth it to consist herein, that our sinnes are forgiven vs, and that they are no more imputed vnto vs. And to confirme this, he citeth a testimony out of Dauid: Blessed are they, whose iniquities are forgiven: and that testimony also out of Genesis: Abraham beleued God, and it was counted vnto him for righteousness. And to the end he would expresse the thing more plainly, he oftentimes in that selfe same place bleth this word Imputation. And therefore say we, that in that righteousness and instauration whereby we are reformed of God, can not consist iustification, for that it through our corruption is imperfect, neither can we with it stand before the iudgement seat of Christ. Farther they say that this righteousness, whereby they will haue vs to be iustified, is distributed vnto euery man by the holy ghost, as it pleaseth him, which saying in deede may be suspected. For the holy ghost is the disposer in the distribution of the gistes of God. But they goe on farther and say, According to the measure of the preparation, but this can by no meanes be borne with all. For we haue before shewed out of the fathers, and chiefly out of the holy scriptures, that all those things which are done before iustification, are sinnes: so farre is it of, that they can merite and prepare vnto iustification. Farther these men teache, that iustification being once had, men ought neuer to be thereof assured and certaine, but ought to be doubtfull and carefull. And when we object, that this is to derogate & trunche of the promises of God, and the dignitie of grace, they deny that to be true. For they say that they doubt not of the promises of God: but when they looke vpon their owne indispositions, (as they call it) then at the length they begin of necessity to doubt. And doubtedly this is not to be interailed at, for if a man haue a regarde to his owne unworthinesse, he shall not only doubt of the promises of God, but also shall be most assured, that he can not be iustified. But the holy scriptures scriptures teache farre otherwise. For they set forth vnto vs the example of Abraham, how that he contrary to hope, beleued in hope: and that he, when now he was in a maner a hundred yeares of age, had no regarde to his body, being past getting of children, nor to the wombe of Sara, being past childbearing: and that he staggered not by reason of distrust, but was by faith confirmed, & most certainly perswaded that God was able to performe what so euer he had promised. This example teacheth vs, that we ought not to haue a regarde vnto those things, which either may, or seeme to hinder our iustification: but our faith ought vnto be fixed in the wordes and promises of God, but contrariwise these men will call vs backe to our owne indispositions (as they call them) and will haue vs therefore alwayes to be in doubt of our iustification. In dede we ought not to dissemble whatsoeuer imperfection or fault is in vs: and that for this cause, that it may be daily amended and corrected. Yet ought we not therefore to be in doubt and wauering, touching our iustification, and the grace of God.

A man being iustified doubtech not of his iustification

Now haue we to proue the second proposition, namely, that a man is iustified by faith. Which thing we entend first to proue by testimonies of the holy scriptures. Paule in the first chapter of this Epistle thus defineth the Gospell, that it is the power of God to saluation to euery one that beleueth. In these wordes is touched the efficient cause of our iustification, namely, the power of God: and the ende, which is our saluation: and also the instrument wherby it is receiued, namely, faith: for he addeth, vnto euery one that beleueth. And this he confirmeth by a testimony of Abacuc the Prophet. In which sentence he so much delighted, that he vsed it both to the Galathians, and also to the Hebrues in the self same sense. He addeth moreover that the wrath of God was reueled from heauen, by reason of the knowledge of the Philosophers, which withheld the truthe of God in vnrightheousnesse, and which when they knew God, glorified him not as God: but fell to the worshipping of Idols. But contrariwise in the gospell, is reuealed the rightheousnesse of God, namely that rightheousnesse, whereby men are iustified from faith to faith, which phrase of speache we haue in his due place sufficiently expounded in the third chapter. Now is the rightheousnesse of God (saith he) made manifest without the law: the rightheousnesse (I say) of God by the faith of Iesus Christ in all, and vpon all them which beleue in him. And a little afterward, wherefore being iustified frely, by his grace, by the redemption which is in Christ Iesus: whome God hath set forth a propitiator by faith in his blood. Here also is not onely shewed the grace, by which God frely iustificieth vs, but also Christ & his deathe is set forth, that it may manifestly appeare, that he is the reconciliator and the mediator. Wherunto also is added faith, wherby we receiue the fruit of his redemption: to the shewing forth also of his rightheousnesse in this time, that he might be iust, and iustifying him which is of the faith of Iesus Christ. If men coulde by theyr workes get vnto themselves rightheousnesse, the rightheousnesse of God shoulde not then be so declared. But seeing we see that it is communicated vnto vs by faith, without any preparation of workes, it must needes seeme vnto vs very great. And amongst other things which God requireth of men, this is the chiefest, that they should not any thing glory of themselves. But if iustification should consist of workes, men might boast of their owne endeuor and industry. But seeing we are frely iustified by faith, there is no place left for boasting. Wherefore Paule saith. Thy boasting is excluded: by what law? by the law of workes? No, but by the law of faith. Wherefore he concludeth after this manner. We iudge that man is iustified by faith without workes. And that we should not think that that proposition is particular, he declareth that it is vniuersall. God (saith he) is he the God of the Iewes only, is he not the God of the gentiles also? Yea of the Gentiles also. For it is one God which iustificieth vncircumcision through faith, and circumcision by faith. Wherefore euen as there is but one God ouer all men, so iustificieth he all men by one, and the selfe same way,

A confirmation that we are iustified by faith.

And

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

And in the fourth chapter he saith: but vnto him which worketh not, but beleueth in him, which iustificeth the wicked, faith is imputed vnto him vnto righteousness. By this sentence are bothe woꝝkes excluded, and also faith is set foꝝth, by which is imputed righteousness vnto men. And straight way he addeth of Abraham, that he is the father of all them that beleue by vncircumcision, that it might also be imputed vnto them, and that he is the father of circumcision, not only vnto them which are of circumcision, but also vnto them which walke in the steps of faith which was in the vncircumcision of Abraham our father. Afterward by the nature of the promise, he sheweth that iustification is by faith. Foꝝ he saith, by the law was not the promise made vnto Abraham, and vnto his seede, to be the heire of the worlde, but by the righteousness of faith, for if those which are of the law should be heires, then should faith be abolished, and the promise made voide. In these woꝝds are two excellent things to be noted. The first is, that the promise is free, neither is it toynd with the condition of woꝝkes: and therfoꝝe seing faith is as a correlative referred vnto the promise, it must needs follow, that it is such as the promise is: and therfoꝝe it hath a respecte vnto the promise by it selfe, and not to the conditions of our vntowardnesse oꝝ indisposition, as the good holy Fathers of Trent teache. The second is, that if the inheritance and righteousness should depend of that condition of woꝝkes, then had there bene no neede of the promise. Foꝝ me might haue sayd, why is that freely promised vnto vs, which we can claime vnto our selues by our owne endeuoꝝ and laboꝝ? Oꝝ why is it so necessary, that we should beleue, when as by our owne woꝝkes we can attaine vnto righteousness: Afterward Paule addeth the finall cause, why iustification commeth by faith. By grace (sayth he) that the promise might be firme: foꝝ if by our owne woꝝkes and preparations we should be iustified, the promise should alwayes be vnstable: neither could we appoint any certaintie of it. Afterwarde he putteth the example of Abraham: who (as it is befoꝝe said) contrary to hope, beleued in hope: neither had he a regarde vnto those things, which as touching his owne part, mought haue bene a let vnto the promise of God, namely, his owne body, being now as it were dead, and an hundred yere olde, and the age of Sara his wife. These things sufficiently declare what maner of faith that was, by which vnto Abraham was imputed righteousness, so that thereby we also may vnderstande the power and nature of faith which iustificeth. Paule also addeth, that by suche a faith, is muche aduanced the gloꝝy of God. Foꝝ when as nothing is attributed vnto our merites and woꝝkes, it must needs be, that the whole gloꝝy redoundeth vnto God. Therefore Paule saith of Abraham: he gaue the gloꝝy vnto God, knowing this most fully, that what soeuer he had promised, he was able also to performe. And the moꝝe to expresse the certaintie of faith, he vsed this participle, παροφωρισ: whereby he signifieth that Abraham with a certaine most full assured embꝝased the promise of God. And least any man should thinke that this was a proper and peculiere prerogative geuen vnto Abraham, the Apostle addeth an vniuersall rule, and saith: that it was not written for him only, that it was imputed vnto him for righteousness: but also for vs, vnto whome it shall be imputed so that we beleue in him, which raised vp Iesus Christ from the dead: which was deliuered for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification.

Farther out of the v. chapter we haue also an other testimony: wherfore seing (saith he) we be iustified by faith, we haue peace towards God, through Iesus Christ: by whome we haue acceſse through faith into this grace wherein we stand. Here are two things to be noted: the one is, that we are iustified by faith, and that by grace: the second, that vnto this grace is not an entraunce made open by preparations, oꝝ woꝝkes which dispose vs, but only by faith.

In the viij chapter are set foꝝth as it were certaine steppes and degrees, by which we must come to eternal saluation. Who be hath foreknown (saith he) those also hath he predestinate, that they should be like fashioned vnto the image of the sonne of God, that he might be the first begottē amongst many brethren. And who be hath predestinate, those also hath he called. And who be hath called, those hath he iustified: and who be hath hath iustified, those also will be glorified. Here are reckoned by. v. degrees, for knowledge, predestination, vocation, iustification, and glorification, in which as touching our purpose, let vs consider what cometh betwene vocation and iustification. And that is nothing else but faith. For for as much as vocation is done by the promise of iustification, and of saluation, the same is received by faith, geuing assent thereunto.

Towards the ende of the. ix. chapter, is set forth a difference betwene the Iewes and the Gentiles: and a reason is geuen why the Gentiles obtained righteousness, and not the Iewes. For thus Paule saith: What shall we say then? That the Gentiles which followed not righteousness, haue taken holde of righteousness, which is by faith. But Israel which followed righteousness, attained not vnto the law of righteousness: because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by works. What can there be more manifest then these words: for they declare that they which will be iustified by faith, doe obtaine righteousness, but those which doe aspire vnto it by works, doe labor but in vaine.

This self thing he prometh euen from the beginning of the. x. chapter, where he describeth two kindes of righteousness: the one which he calleth ours, which consisteth of works, the other which he calleth the righteousness of God, which is taken holde of by faith. And thus he writeth: They being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and going about to establish their owne, are not obedient vnto the righteousness of God. Whereby it is manifest, that they which will establish their owne righteousness, that is, the righteousness of works, do fall away from the righteousness of God. Paule goeth on, and more plainly openeth the nature of these two kinde of righteousnesses. Moses (sayth he) thus writeth of the righteousness which cometh of the lawe: The man which dothe these things shall liue in them. By these words he sheweth, that the righteousness of the law consisteth in works. But of the righteousness which cometh of faith, he thus speaketh: Say not thou in thine heart, who shall ascend vp into heauen, to fetch Christ from thence: or who shall descend into the deepe to fetch vp Christ againe from the dead? But what saith he? The word is nigh thee, euen in thy mouth and in thine heart. The same is the word of faith which we preach, which word he which beleueth in his heart, and with his mouth confesseth the Lord Iesus Christ, shall be saved. Whereby we see that not the righteousness of the lawe which is had by works, but the righteousness of faith is it which bringeth saluation. And this is by the latter words more manifestly confirmed. For in that there is added, With the heart we beleue vnto righteousness, and with the mouth is confession made vnto saluation, the later clause touching confession, which seemeth to be an outward worke is therfore added, least we should thinke that the faith wherby we are iustified, should be idle: for it is not a barren & barren faith: such a one as our aduersaries dreame that we obtrude. It hath most plentifull and most abundant fruits, amongst which the confession of psony obtaineth the first place, and is most necessary. Hereunto Paule addeth a testimony out of the Prophet, he which beleueth in him shall not be made ashamed. They are commonly ashamed, which contrary to their expectation are frustrated of that, which they hoped to haue obtained. Wherefore the meaning is. He which beleueth in Christ, and by this faith waiteth for saluation, shall not be put to shame: because he shall not be frustrated of his hope. He addeth also an other testimony taken out of the Prophet Isaiah: Whosoever doth call vpon the name of the Lord, shall be saved: in which words the promise of saluation seemeth to be ascribed vnto inuocation. But Paule profitably teacheth (as I haue before oftentimes said) where promises seeme to be adioyned vnto works, we must alwayes run from them vnto the roote and foundation, namely vnto faith. So Paule in this place when he had sayd, Whosoever calleth vpon the name of the Lord, shall be saved, straight way addeth, how shall they call vpon him, in whom they haue not beleued? So he resolueth the whole matter from inuocation into faith. And that we should not thinke that faith by his owne power, hath any thing wherby it can iustifie, he againe pers

Note that the scriptures teach a resolution fro works; vnto faith. And againe from faith to his object

sceth

Cap. ii. A Commentarie vpon the seth from it vnto the obiect, saying: how shall they beleue without a preacher? and how shall they preach, except they be sent? Also, faith commeth by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. Wherefore the uttermost point of the resolution, is the word of God, and promise touching Christ: from whence as from the fountaine, is deriued our saluation and iustification.

Whereby is proued that the restoring of the
that fall, cometh by faith.

In the .xj. chapter is set forth the Antithesis betweene incredulitie and faith: which serueth very muche to confirme that, which we now teache. The branches were broken of, that I might be grafted in. This was an obiection of the Gentiles against the Iewes. Paule answereth, thou sayest well, because of vnbelieve they were broken of: but thou standest by faith. Here is geuen the reason of the fall and destruction of men, and on the other side of saluation and constancie, namely vnbelieve & faith. And of the Iewes which should one day be restored, he addeth, And if they abide not stil in their vnbelieve, they shalbe againe grafted in for God is of might to graft the in. Where we see, that by departing from vnbelieve, which consisteth in beleuing, men that haue fallen are restored. This maketh very muche against the error of those, which although they after a sort confesse that the first iustification is giuen freely without any workes going before, yet vnto men that haue fallen, they graunt not restitution vnto iustification, but by satisfactions, and many workes preparatory. These things haue I gathered out of the Epistle vnto the Romanes, now will we in order prosecute the other Epistles.

In the first Epistle to the Cozinthians the first Chapter, it is thus written, because the world in the wisdom of God knew not God by wisdom, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching, to save them that beleue. Because the wise men of this world saith the Apostle, by their naturall searching out, could not take hold of the wisdom of God, whereby they might be saved, God of his goodnesse hath instituted a contrary way: namely the preaching of the Gospell, which vnto the flesh seemeth foolishnesse, that by it saluation should be geuen vnto men: but yet not to all sortes of men, but to those only that beleue.

Wherefore in the .ij. to the Cozinthians the .i. chapter, it is thus written, by faith ye stand: by which wordes we vnderstand that the foundation wherby we are confirmed and established in the way of saluation, is faith.

Farther Paule to the Galathians the .ij. Chapter, where he reproveth Peter for his dissimulation, wherby he seemed to lead the Gentiles to obserue the Ceremonies of the Iewes, thus speaketh: If thou being a Iewe, liuest after the maner of the Gentiles, and not as doe the Iewes, why compellest thou the Gentiles to liue as doe the Iewes? For we which are Iewes by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, knowe that a man is not iustified by the workes of the law, and we beleue in Christ, that we might be iustified by the faith of Christ, & not by the workes of the law, because by the workes of the lawe shall no fleshe be iustified. Where we see that the Apostles therefore folowed Christ, & they might be iustified by faith, which they could not obtaine by workes.

And after ward, the life which I now liue in the flesh, I liue by the faith of the sonne of God, which is all one, as if he should haue said: As yet in deede sinne sticketh in my flesh: and in it I cary death about: but yet notwithstanding I haue life, not through mine owne merite, but by the faith of the sonne of God.

In the .iiij. chap. he thus wryteth, I would know this of you, receiued ye the spirit by the workes of the law, or by the hearing of faith? And straight way he addeth, he which ministrerh vnto you the spirit, & in you worketh miracles, doth he the same by the workes of the law, or by the hearing of faith? By these wordes we see, that it is faith and not workes, wherby we take holde of the gifts of God: and he addeth, ye know that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham, and that vndoubtedly for no other cause, but because in beleuing, they imitate him. Wherefore sayth he, the scripture foreseeing that God would iustifie the Gentiles by faith, shewed before hande glad tidings vnto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed. This blessing spread not abroad vnto them, because they had their beginning of the flesh of Abraham, but because they folowed the steppes of his faith. Otherwise of Abraham as touching touching the flesh came not, as farre as we can read, any other nations, then the Ismaelites, Edomites, and Israelites. Then foloweth the conclusion, Therefore they which are of faith, shall be blessed with faithfull Abraham. But to be blessed, in the Hebrew phrase, is nothing else, then to receiue the gifts of God, among which iustification is the principallest. Wherefore it followeth, That vnto the Gentiles through Christ might come the promise made vnto Abraham, that we might receiue the promise of the holy Ghost through faith. We see therefore that the promise of the holy ghost is not taken hold of by workes, as many saie it is: which thing euery reason sufficiently declareth. For seeing the Lord (as it shall a little after ward be declared) had by promise geuen this blessing vnto Abraham, we must see, what is referred vnto the promise as a correlative. Which (as we haue sayd) can be nothing els but faith: for faith setteth forth vnto it selfe the promises of God as an object.

Paul furthermore addeth, that the scripture concludeth, all things vnder sinne, that the promise by the faith of Iesus Christ should be geuen to them that beleue. This is the cause why the holy scriptures so diligently shew vnto men, how they be guilty of sinnes: namely, that they should be the more stirred vp to embrace the promises of God at the least way by faith, when as they haue not good workes, by which they may take hold of them.

And this vnderstand we by that which is after ward writtten, The law is our schoolemaister vnto Christ, that we should be iustified by faith. These wordes signifie nothing els, but that the law therfore sheweth sinnes, & setteth forth vnto me their infirmity, and stirreth vp theyr lustes, wherby sinnes are more and more encreased, that they being thus admonished should returne vnto Christ, and might from him thorough faith receaue righteousness. Which thing they vndoubtedly did, of whome it is sayd, Ye are all the children of God by the faith of Iesus Christ. For what is it to be the sons of God, but to haue now obteyned adoption: which we obtaine only by regeneration or iustification.

And in the 4. chapter. Brethern (sayth he) we are after Isaake, children of the promise. But to be children of the promise is nothing els, but to beleue those things which God promiseth wherby we are made his children according as he hath promised we should be. For so was Isaake borne vnto Abraham, not by the strength of nature, but by the benefit of the promise of God.

In the 5. chapter: he writteth, We in the spirit looke for the hope of righteousness by faith. In this place are two thinges touched: the spirit of God, whereby we are new fashioned, and renewed vnto saluation and faith wherby we apprehend righteousness. Wherefore in this matter of our iustification, although there be in our minds many ther workes of the holy ghost, yet none of them except faith helpe to iustification.

Wherefore the Apostle concludeth, Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but onely faith, which worketh thorough loue. Of this onely dependeth iustification: of this faith (I say) not being dead, but liuing and of force. And for that cause Paul added, which worketh by loue. Which yet ought not so to be vnderstand, as though faith should depend of loue, or hath of it (as they vse to speake) his forme: but for that when it bursteth forth into act, and will shew forth it selfe, it must of necessity doe it by loue. So the knowledge of a man dependeth not hereof, for that he teacheth other men: but therein is it most of all declared. But if any perfection of these actions of louing and teaching redound vnto faith and knowledge, that cometh of an other cause, and not for that that they depend of it or therof haue theyr forme: as many Sophisters dreame.

In the Epistle to the Ephesians the 2. chapter it is thus writtten, By Grace ye are made safe thorough faith, and that not of your selues: for it is the gift of God.

And moreover in the third Chapter, That according to the riches of his glory he would graunt you, that ye may be strengthened with might in the inward man by the spirit, that Christ may dwell in your harte by faith. He that hath Christ in him, the same hath without all doubt righteousness. For of him Paul thus writteth vnto the Corinthians: in the first Epistle and second chapter: Who is made vnto vs wisdom,

Cap. ii. A Commentarie vpon the

righteousnes, holines, & redemptiō. Here therfore is shewed by what meanes Chriſt dwelleth in our harts, namely, by fayth.

Agayne Paul in the third chapiter to the Phillippians, That I might be found (ſaith he) in him, not hauing mine own righteousnes, which is of the law, but that which is of the fayth of Ieſus Chriſt. Here that righteousnes, which is of woꝝkes, and of the law he calleth his: but that which is of fayth, and which he moſt of all deſireth, he calleth the righteousnes of Ieſus Chriſt.

Vnto the Hebrues alſo it is wꝛitten in the ii. chapter: The ſaynts by fayth haue overcome kingdomes, haue wrought righteousnes, and haue obteyned the promiſes. Theſe woꝝdes declare how much is to be attributed vnto fayth: for by it the ſaints are ſayd not only to haue poſſeſſed outward kingdomes, but alſo to haue exerciſed the woꝝkes of righteousnes, namely, to haue liued holily and without blame, and to haue obteyned the promiſes of God.

And Peter in his firſt epiſtle and firſt chapiter, In the power of God (ſaith he) are ye kept vnto ſaluation by fayth. In theſe woꝝdes are ſignified two principal grounds of our ſaluation. The one is the might and power of God, which is wholly neceſſary for vs to attayne ſaluation. The other is fayth, wherby as by an inſtrument is ſaluation applied vnto vs.

John in his firſt epiſtle and 5. chapiter, Euery one (ſaith he) which beleueth that Ieſus is Chriſt, is borne of God. But to be borne of God is nothing els then to be iuſtified, or to be borne agayne in Chriſt.

It folloiweth in the ſame chapiter. This is the victory which ouercommeth the world, our fayth. By which testimony is declared, that the tyranny of the Deuill, of ſinne, of death, & of hell is by no other thing driue away from vs but by faith only.

And toward the end of the ſelfe ſame chapiter it is ſayd. And theſe things haue I wꝛitten vnto you which beleue in the name of the ſonne of God, that ye might know that ye haue eternall life, and that ye ſhould beleue in the name of the ſonne of God. Now let vs gather alſo out of 4. Euangelists as much as ſhall ſerue for this preſent queſtiō.

Matthew in his 8. chap. ſaith, That Chriſt exceedingly wondꝛed at the faith of 4. Centurian, and confeſſed, that he had not found ſuch fayth in Iſraell. And turning vnto him ſayd, Euen as thou haſt beleued, ſo be it vnto thee. Here ſome replie, that this hiſtoꝝy and ſuch other like entreat not of iuſtification, but only of the outward benefits of the body geuen by God. But theſe men ought to conſider that ſinnes which are in vs are the cauſes of the griefes and afflictions of the body. For only Chriſt except, who vtterly died an innocent, all other, for as much as they are obnoxious vnto ſinne doe ſuffer no aduerſitie without iuſt deſert: and although God in infliting of calamities vpon vs, hath not alwayes a regarde hereunto, for oftentimes he ſendeth aduerſities to ſhewe forth his glory, and to the triall of all thoſe that are his, yet none whileſt he is ſo vexed, can complaine that he is vniuſtly dealt with: for there is none ſo holy, but that he hath in himſelfe ſinnes, which are woꝝthy of ſuche like, or elſe of greater puniſhmentes. And where the cauſe is not taken away, neither the effect is nor can be taken away. Wherefore Chriſt forasmuch as he deliuered men from diſeaſes of the bodies, manifeſtly declared, 4. it was he which ſhould iuſtify the from ſinnes. And that this is true, the ſelf ſame Euangelist teacheth in the 9. chapiter. For when he that was ſicke of the Palſey, was brought vnto Chriſt to be healed, he ſaith 4. Chriſt answered, Arise my ſonne, thy ſinnes are forgiven thee. At which ſaying, when as the Scribes and Phariseis were offended, to the ende they ſhould vnderſtand, that the cauſe of euils being taken away, euen the euils themſelues alſo are taken away, he commaunded him that was ſicke of the Palſey to ariſe, and to take vp his bed, and to walke. Wherefore it manifeſtly appeareth that Chriſt by the healings of the body, declared that he was he, which ſhould forgive ſinnes: and euen as thoſe healings were receiued by faith, euen ſo alſo by the ſame faith are men iuſtified, and receiue the forgiveness of ſinnes.

And in the ſelfe ſame. ix. Chapter is declared that Chriſte answered vnto two blinde blinde men which were very importunate, and most earnestly desired to be healed, Doe ye beleue that I can doe this for you? And when they had made answer that they beleued, he sayd: Euen as you haue beleued, so be it vnto you.

And when our Saviour was going to the house of the ruler of the sinagoge, to raise vp his daughter from death, there followed him a woman, which had an issue of blood, which woman was endued with so great a faith, that she thought thus with her selfe, that if she might but touche the hemme of his garment, she should straight way be made whole. Wherefore Christ answered her, be of good confidence daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole. But why Christ adioyneth confidence vnto faith, we haue before declared in the beginning of this question, where we declared the nature of faith. For we taught that that assent wherewith we take holde of the promises of God is so strong & so vehement, that the rest of the motions of the minde which are agreeable vnto it, doe of necessitie follow.

In Luke also is set forth the history of that sinfull woman, vnto whome the Lord thus answered, thy faith hath made thee safe, signifying that he for her sayth sake, had forgiven her her sinnes. And that the faith of this woman was very fervent, she declared by the effectes, in that she loued much, in that she kissed his feete, in that she washed them with her teares, and wiped them with her haire.

In the Gospel of Ihon the. iij. chapter, Christ sayd vnto Nicodemus: So God loved the world, that he gaue his only begotten sonne, that he which beleueth in him should not perish, but haue eternall life. And in the selfe same Chapter Ihon Baptist, thus speaketh of Christ, He that beleueth in the sonne hath eternall life, but he that beleueth not, hath not life, but the wrath of God abideth ouer him. Out of which place we gather not only that we presently entreat of, but also this, that they are strangers, from Christ, and those which beleue not, can doe nothing that may please God, and therefore they can not merite of congruities (as they call it, and as our aduersaries affirme) the grace of God. And in the. vi. chapter Christ saith, This is the will of him which sent me, that he which seeth the sonne, and beleueth in him hath eternall life. And I (sayth he) will raise him up in the last day. And when as he had before said, No man cometh vnto me vnles my father draw him. Also, He that hath heard of my father, and hath learned, cometh vnto me, afterward he addeth: And he which beleueth in me hath eternall life. In the. xi. chapter, when Christ should raise vp Lazarus, he said vnto Martha, He which beleueth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he liue: and he which liueth and beleueth in me, shall not die for euer. And in the. xviij. chapter, this is eternall life, that they acknowledge thee the only true God, and whome thou hast sent Iesus Christ. But this is to be noted, that here he speaketh not of a cold knowledge, but of a mighty and strong faith. Wherefore if it be eternall life, then shall it also be iustificatio. For as we haue before taught where we expounded this sentence of Abacuk the Prophet, The iust man shall lyue by faith, Iustificatio and life are so ioyned together, that the one is oftentimes taken for the other. And in very deepe Iustificatio is nothing els then eternall life now already begonne in vs. And in the. 20. chapter, Those things (saith he) are written, that ye should beleue that Christ is Iesus, and that in beleuing ye should haue eternall life. In the Actes of the Apostles the. 15. chapter, it is thus written, by faith purifying their hearts. In which place Peter speaketh of the Gentiles, that they should not be compelled vnto the works of the lawe of Moses: for Christ had without them, geuen vnto them the holy Ghost, and had by faith made cleane their hearts from sinnes. Paule also in his Oracion to king Agrippa said, that he was called of Christ to be sent vnto the Gentiles, which should by his ministry be illuminated, and by faith receiue remission of sinnes, and lot amongst the saintes. And these testimonies hitherto we haue gathered out of the New testament.

But if I should out of the old testament reherse all that which maketh to this purpose, I should then be ouer tedious. And if there be any of so obstinate a heart, that those things which we haue already spoken, can not bryge them to confesse the truthe, neither should it any thing profite suche men, if we should bryng many mo testimonies. Wherefore a few shall suffice, and besides those testimonies which Paul hath cited out of the. 15. Chapter of Genesis, Abraham beleued God, and is was counted vnto him for righteousness, out of Abacucke. The iuste man shall liue by his faith: out of David, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven: out of Esay, Euery one that beleueth in him, shall not be confounded, and a fewe others suche like, besides these testimonies (I say) I will cite the. 53. chapter of Esay, wherein Christ is by most expresse wordes painted forth. For there he is sayd to haue taken vpon him our sorowes: and to haue bozne our infirmities, to haue geuen his soule a sacrifice for sinne, and many such other things: which are so plaine, that they can be applied vnto none other, but only vnto Christ Iesus our sauoure. And it is sayde moreover, and by the knowledge of hym, shall my righteous seruant iustifie many, and he shall beare their iniquities. These wordes teache that Christ iustificeth many, namely the elect by the science and knowledge of him, which knowledge vndoubtedly is nothing else, but a true faith. And that he in suche sort iustificeth them, that he taketh vpon himselfe, and beareth their iniquities. And Jeremy in the. 17. chapter wryteth, O God haue not thine eyes a regarde vnto faith? vndoubtedly they haue: As if he should haue said. Although thou seest al things, and there is nothing pertaining vnto man hidden from thee, yet hast thou chiefly a regarde vnto faith, as vnto the roote and foundation of all good actions. And as touching the oracles of the scriptures, this shall suffice.

Here is proved that they which are strangers from Christ, can do no good thing that may please God.

Whether
iustification
may be sepe-
rated from faith.

The iudge-ment of E- pictetus concerning his owne booke.
A simili-
tude.

Now will I answer vnto such obiections which are commonly brought against this second proposition. And we will beginne first with Pighius, because our aduersaries count him for their Achilles or chief champion, and thinke that he only by his subtil sharp wit hath perled even into the inward misteries of the truth. And this man vseth this cauillation: we are not iustified by that from which this iustification may be seperated: For it is not possible that the causes should be pulled away or seperated from their effects. But faith is seperated from iustification: for many that beleue do not withstanding liue most filthely: so farre is it of, that they should be iustified. But because he thinketh that this may be denied, he bringeth a reason to proue, that it is not against the nature and definition of faith but that iustification may be seperated from it. And he maketh an obiection out of the. 13. chapter of the epistle to the Corinthians, If I haue all faith, so that I can remoue mountaynes, and haue not charity, I am nothing. By these wordes he concludeth, that faith may be seperated from charity, and therefore from all good works.
He citeth this also out of Mathew, many shall come in that day, and shall say, Lords in thy name we haue prophesied, and haue cast out devils, and haue wrought signes.
But vnto them shall answer bee made, I know you not. These signes, sayth Pig- ghius can not be done without faith, wherefore seing that they are shut forth from the kingdome of heauen which yet do these things, it is cleare that they were not iustified. Wherefore in them faith was seperated from righteousness. But this he thinketh is much more plainly confirmed by Iohn, For he saith, that many rulers of the priestes beleued in Christ, whiche yet durst not openly professe hym. But they which abhorre from the confession of the name of Christ, are farre from saluation: For Christ himselfe sayth, he that is ashamed of me before men, of hym will I be ashamed before my father. These arguments although at the first sight they seeme to haue some shew, yet if a man more narrowly examine them, he shall see, that that very wel agrath with them, whiche Epictetus pronounceth of his booke: ταυτα δε εστιν ουκ ειναι ορασις οφθαλμων οφθαλμου αλλα οφθαλμου οφθαλμου: It is, these are but sights or ghosts of the dreames of hell. Wherefore we must diligently ponder these reasons and not iudge of them by the first sight. And euen as in coynes of money we vse not so much to haue a regard vnto the inscriptions or Images as to the godnes and waight of the matter, so also in arguments ought we to weigh and regard not so much the shew and colour of them, as the thing it selfe and the strength of them. We first deny that faith can be seperated from iustification. And whereas Pighius sayth, that that is not repugnaunt vnto the nature and definition of faith, we in no wise admit it

it: For agaynst that sentence are all the holy scriptures, and the true sense of the definition of sayth, and also the fathers: For as touching the scriptures, John saith, he that beleueth that Iesus is Christ the sonne of God, is borne of God: And he which is borne of God sinneth not. For so long as faith beareth sway in our hart, we commit not those sinnes which destroy the conscience and alienate vs from God. Now the sayth Pighius that it is not agaynst the nature of sayth to be seperated from iustification and from good woorkes: especially seing John saith, he which sinneth knoweth not God? This thing also saw the fathers. For Ciprian de Simplicitate Prelatorum, where he complayneth of the infelicity of his tyme, for that charity, feare, good woorkes, and such like things were wahren very cold, thus writeth, No man thinketh vpon the feare of things to come, no man considereth the day of the Lord, and the wrath of God, and that vpon the vnbeleuers shall come punishments, and that everlasting tormets are appointed for the vsaythfull. Of which things our conscience would be aserd if it beleued: because it beleueth not, therefore is it vterly without feare: but if it beleued, then also would it beware, and if it did beware, then also shoulde it eschape. These words declare that with true sayth is ioyned the feare of God, and the eschewing of eternal punishments, and auoyding of sinnes. Now let Pighius go & say, that true faith can be seperated from holy motions of the mynd, and from good woorkes. This self same thing together doth Ierome & Ciprian affirme agaynst the Luciferians. And if (sayth he) I beleued truly, I would clense that hart wherewith God is sene, I would with my hands knock my brest, I would with teares water my chekes, I would in my body haue a horror, I would in mouth waxe pale, I would lye at the feete of my Lord, and would washe them wyth weeping, and wipe them with my beares, I would vndoubtedly cleue fast vnto the stocke of the crose, neither would I let go my hold thereof, before I had obtayned mercy. Hereby also it is manifest that with true faith are ioyned good woorkes and repentaunce. But as touching the definition and nature of sayth, it may easely be proued, that it can not be seperated from iustification and from good woorkes, that is, from his effects. For sayth is no common but a firme and vehement assent, and that proceeding from the holy ghost. And if in case a poore miser being condemned to dy, should receaue a promise only at the hand of a mā that he should be deliuered, and should geue credit vnto those words, straight way his mynde would wholly be chaunged to mirth, and would begin to loue him that promised hym such things, and would pleasure him in what thing so euer lay in his power. Now much moze is to be attributed vnto the true faith, which is geuen vnto the word of God, and is inspired by the spirit of God: Wherefore if that human sayth do draw with it wonderfull motions of the mynd, how can we say that the true and Christian sayth is naked without good woorkes, and destitute, & alone. Wherefore we now playnly see both by the holy scriptures, and by the Fathers, and by the definition and nature of sayth, that it can not be seperated from righteousness and from holy woorkes.

The definition of faith declareth that it can not be separated from iustification. & similis vide.

Now let vs come vnto Paul. He sayth, If I haue all sayth &c. But how knoweth Pighius that Paul there speaketh of that generall sayth which cleaueth vnto the promises of God and iustifieth: and not rather of a perticular fath wherby are wrought miracles, and which is a free or gracious gift of the holy ghost? This faith is not applied vnto all thinges which are found in the holy scriptures, but only is a certayne vehement confidence, wherby we certaynly beleue that God will do this miracle or that miracle. Of this sayth Chrysostome interpreteth Paul in this place. And to the end of this distinction either part should haue a distinct name, the one calleth the sayth of doctrine, the other, the sayth of signes. And vnto this latter sayth, Chrysostome applieth those wordes, If ye haue of sayth as a grayne of mustard seeds, and shall say vnto this mountayne, Get thee hence, and hurle thy selfe into the sea: it shall be done. Neyther vndoubtedly can it be denied but that there is such a kind of sayth. For Paul in the 12. chapter of the first epistle vnto the Corinthians, wher he reherfeth by the free gifts which the holy ghost distributeth vnto euery man as it pleaseth him, thus writeth: Vnto one is by the spirit geuen the word of wisdom

The sayth of doctrine & the sayth of miracles.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

and to another the word of knowledge by the same spirit: and vnto another is giuen faith by the same spirit: and vnto another the gift of healing by the same spirit. Here we see that amongst the free gifts of the holy ghost is reckoned faith, and that in the third place: because Paul spake not there of the generall faith, wherby we are iustified. And if we diligently peruse things, we shall see that Paul keepeth the selfe same order in the 13. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, for as here in the first place he putteth the word of wisdom, so there he putteth prophesying: and as here in the second place he putteth knowledge, so there also in the selfe same place he putteth knowledge: and as here, so also there he putteth faith in the third place: and as here the gift of healings and of miracles followeth faith, so both there the removing of mountaynes: wherfore those things which Paul hath spoken of a particular faith ought not to be wrestled to the vniuersal and iustifying faith. For, that is to make a false argument, A secundū quid ad simpliciter. As if a man should say, this faith may be separated from iustification, which is called faith secundum quid, ergo, the true faith and the iustifying faith, which is called faith simpliciter, that is to say, absolutely, may be separated from iustification. If a man should so compare two severall kindes, that he will ascribe one and the selfe same propriety vnto either of them, he shall soone be deceaued. But Pighius saith that by this easy and playne exposition all his reasoning may be ouerthrowen, and therfore went he about by violence to take it from vs, forgetting in the meane time, that the author and patrone therof is Chrysostome. And to infring it he vseth this argument: Paul manifestly saith, All sayth: Wherfore we may not vnderstand it of any singular faith. For the Apostle maketh an vniuersall proposition. But this man ought to remember, that vniuersall propositions are to be contracted or drawen vnto that matter wherof is at that time entreated. And although this might be declared by many examples, yet at this present only one shall suffice vs. Paul in that selfe same epistle vnto the Corinthians the first chapter, saith, that he geueth thanks vnto God for them, for that they were enriched in all kind of speach and in all knowledge. And yet it is not very likely that they were by the spirite of Christ endued with naturall philosophy, with Metaphisicall and Mathematicall knowledge, with knowledge of the law, and with other liberall sciences: but only with all knowledge which pertayned vnto piety and vnto the Gospell. Neyther is it likely, that they by the power of the holy ghost were adorned with all kind of Rhetorical, Logickall, Poeticall, and historickall speeches: but onely with those which pertayned vnto the edification of the church, with sounde doctrine, and godly admonitions. Wherfore propositions although they be vniuersall, yet are not alwayes to be vnderstanded simply, but ought sometimes to be drawen vnto the matter wherof is at that time entreated. Wherfore that which Paul saith: If I haue all faith, we vnderstand of all that faith, which serueth vnto the working of miracles. And that this contraction is of necessity, the wordes which followe do declare. For Paul straight way addeth: So that I can remoue mountaynes. Chrysostome also saith: that he in that vniuersalitie saith, y this perticular sentence is of necessity to be vnderstand. For he saith: that it may be doubted, how Christ saith that to remoue mountaynes a little faith is sufficient, which in his smalnes of quantitie resemblith a grain of mustardsede, wher as Paul saith: If I haue all faith so that I can remoue mountaynes: as though to bring y to passe is required a wonderful great faith. He thus dissoluth the question, and saith: that Christ spake of the truth & nature of the thing: for the gift of faith though it be neuer so small is sufficient to worke miracles be they neuer so great: but Paul had a respect vnto the common opinion and iudgement of men, so they when they loke vpon the greatnes and hugenes of a mountaine, thinke that it cannot be remoued without a certaine incredible efficacy and greatnes of faith. Neither helpeth it much Pighius cause, that Erasmus making answer vnto the Scholasticall doctors, reiecteth this our interpretation. For first his reason is very weake, and secondly false: for he saith that the purpose of the Apostle was to prayse charity by comparison. But what prayse should that be (saith he)

Uniuersall propositions are to be drawen vnto, the matter wherof is at that tyme entreated.

Erasmus opinion.

he) if it should be compared with faith, which is one of the free gifts of the holy ghost, and may light as wel vpon the wicked, as vpon the goodly. For he should but coldly prays a man, which should say that he is better the a dogge or a beare. First this is false, that Paul compareth not charity with free gifts of God. For he maketh mention of prophesying, of knowledge and of the gifts of tongues: and preferreth Charity before them. Secondly it is weake that he sayth, that if our interpretation be receaued, the Apostle should compare Charity ouerly with free gifts. For we confesse that toward the end he compareth it with the true sayth. For Paul saith, there are three things, faith, hope, and charitie: but the chiefest is charitie. And he bringeth a reason why, for it abideth, and the other shall cease. Farther it is a full comparison, if as we haue sayd, we begin at the free gifts, and so afterwarde come in order to the vertues Theological, yea rather by that, that Paul toward the ende of the chapter, compareth charitie with true faith, it is most likely that he did not so before. But if we should fully graunt this vnto Pighius, that that faith wherof Paul speaketh, is y vniversal faith wherby men are iustified, yet neither so vndoubtedly should he obtain his purpose. For y Apostle going about by al maner of meanes to set forth the charitie, thought to amplifie y same by a fiction or faining, which is a figure of Rhetorike, known euen vnto children. And yet doth not Paul therefore bring a false proposition: for he vseth a conditional proposition, which we may not resolute into a categoricall proposition: yet notwithstanding is the truth in the meane time kept. As if I should say vnto a man, if thou haddest the life or vse of the reasonable soule without the life or vse of the sensible soule, thou shouldst not be affected with perturbations of minde, no man coulde reprove this kinde of speache to be false. And yet it is not possible that in a man the reasonable life should be seperated from the animall life. Such kinde of speeches also are found in the holy scriptures: As for example, If I shall ascend vp into heauen, thou art there, if I shall descend down into hell, thou art present. And if I take the fethers of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost endes of the sea, thither shall thy right hand leade me. These sentences are true, and yet is it not possible, that a man should take vnto him the fethers of the morning. After the same manner we say, if a man should seperate faith from charitie, he should make it vnprofitable; although in very dede it can not be seperated from charitie. And that Paul in that place vseth suche an Hyperbole or fiction, that manifestly declareth, which he a little before spake: Though I should speake with the tongues of men and of Angels, and haue not charitie, I am made as a sounding brasse, or a tingling cymball. But we knowe that Angels haue neyther bodyes nor tongues. And yet notwithstanding Paul speaketh truth, that if they had tongues, and I should speake with them, yet that should nothing profite me without charitie. And this exposition Basilus confirmeth in an Epistle to the Neocaesarienses. For he saith, that the Apostle minded in this place to commend charitie: and he saith that he vseth those reasons, not that al those things, which he here maketh mention of, can be seperated from charitie. Wherfore of the former interpretation, we haue Chrysostome for an author, and the latter interpretation Basilus confirmeth. Let Pighius goe now, and of this saying of the Apostle, conclude if he can, that which he so much contendeth for.

*Figura
fictionis.*

But as touching those wordes of Mathew, Lord haue we not in thy name prophesied, and in thy name cast out Devils. &c. which things Pighius denieth, can be done without faith, and yet they which haue done them are not iustified, when as they are excluded from the kingdome of heauen, we may answer with the selfe same solution which we haue now brought: namely, y they whō Mathew maketh mention of, had the faith of signes or a deade faith, but not a true and iustifying faith: moreover I see not, how true this is, that miracles can not be done without faith. For God sometimes worketh miracles, not for his faiths sake, by whō they are done, but either to illustrate his glory, or to beare testimony vnto true Doctrine. Vndoubtedly Moses and Aaron when they strake water out of the rocke of Arise, waivered in faith. And yet God, to the ende he would stand to his promise, with a

*Abstracts are not always done for sayth
sake.*

great miracle, gaue water vnto the people, and repproued Moses and Aaron of infidelitie. And Naaman the Syrian, doubted of recouering his health in the waters of Jordane: yea also he would haue gone his way, for that he sayd that the riuer of his countrey were muche better then Jordane. And yet notwithstanding God lest not his miracle vndone. And when the dead body was cast into the sepulchre of Elizeus, by a great miracle it came to passe, that at y<sup>e</sup> touching of the dead bones of the Prophet, life was restozed vnto it. But there was no faith there, neither in the dead corpes, nor in the bones of the Prophet, nor in them which brought the dead man thither. And yet not alwayes when faith is absent, is graunted vnto the that aske, to doe miracles. For in the Actes we read, that when the sonnes of the high priest Skeua, the exorcist would haue cast out Devils in the name of Christe, whome Paul preached, the Devill answered, Iesus I know, and Paul I knowe, but who are ye? And straight way ran vpon them. Here we see that God woulde not geue a miracle when it was asked, as it is most likely of wicked and vnbeleuyng men. Notobest contrariwise we haue in Mark the 9. chap. that a certayne man did cast out Devils in the name of Christ, who yet followed not Christ: and when John would haue repproued him, Christ allowed him not. By this Pighius myght haue seene that to the working of miracles, is not alwayes required faith. And yet if I should graunt him, that faith is of necessitie required, thereunto were sufficient either the faith of signes, or also a dead faith. Wherefore Pighius in his second confirmation proueth nothing, for it hath nothing in it that is sincere.

There is a
certaine
faith which is humane
and is not inituled of God.

Two places concili-
ated which seeme at the first sight to be repugnant.

A dead faith
is not faith.
D. Smith.

Now let vs examine his thirde proue. John saith, many of the princes beleued in him. But they confessed him not, for feare they should haue bene cast out of the synagoge. Wherefore they were not iustified by faith. This reason is but a watrish reason, & not so ströng as he thinketh it to be. For we deny y<sup>e</sup> they had y<sup>e</sup> true faith truly. For y<sup>e</sup> assent of theirs, was nothing but an humane assent. For when they saw, y<sup>e</sup> by Christ wer wrought wöderful woorks, & that his doctrine was confirmed by most euident signes they began by a certayne humane perswasion to geue credit vnto hym. The Devil also for y<sup>e</sup> he certainly knoweth of many things done by God, assenteth vnto y<sup>e</sup> truth and beleueth it. And yet it is not to be thought that he is by a true sayth induced to beleue. And that these rulers had not the true and liuely sayth, hereby it is manifest, for that Christ sayde vnto them, How can ye beleue when as ye seeke for glory at mans hand. By which woordes we vnderstand that that they which more esteeme humane glozy then piety, can not beleue truly in God. And those Princes were to be numbred amongst them: for they so much did set by their estimations and the iudgement of men, that rather then they would be cast out of the Synagoge and be noted of any infamy with the people, they would forsake the confession of the name of Christ. Wherefore when as the Lord saith, that such could not beleue, and John affirmeth that they did beleue, it is manifest that they spake of a diuers and sundry sayth: vnles we will say that two contradictories may both at one and the selfe same tyme be true. Wherefore John spake of an humane sayth, but Christ of the sincere and true sayth. Which true sayth ought to be ioyned with confession, as Paul declareth saying, with the hart we beleue vnto righteousness, and with the mouth is confession made vnto saluation. He which seeth the connerion betwene righteousness and saluation, must nedes also see the coniunction which ought to be betwene sayth and profession. Wherefore we say that their faith was a dead sayth. But a dead sayth is not sayth no moze then a dead man is a man. Although one Smith, in a certayne litle booke of his Iustification which he wrote agaynst me, contendeth that a dead sayth is sayth: which he proueth chiefly by this argument, for that the body of a dead man although it be dead, is notwithstanding a body. And this good wise man wonderfully delighted in this his similitude. In which yet he hath vttered a sophistical argument not vnmete for his diligence and wit. For let vs a litle examyne this notable similitude I would haue him to answer me, whether a carcase be the body of a dead man, or simply the body of a man I thinke he will not answer, that it is the body of a man: for the body of a man & a dead a dead carke differ much the one from the other: and that in very dede moze the two formes of one and the selfe same general word: for that they are containned vnder diuerse generall wordes being next together. I graunt that the carke of a dead man is a body in the generall word of substance, as are stones, stockes and such other like. But that it is in very dede the body of a man. I utterly deny. For death taketh away from the body of a man the proper forme, which he had before: but it leaueth, the generall word, so that it can only be called a body. So, true and iustifying sayth when it is lost, ceaseth to be the true and proper sayth, it may in dede as touching the generall word be called a certayne cold assent sprong of humane perswasion and not such as cometh of the holy ghost, and which hath the selfe same strength and efficacy that it had before. Wherefore if on either side be kept the selfe same proportion of the similitude, this wonderfull strong buttresse shal make nothing against vs. For as we confesse that a dead body is a body, so also do we graunt that a dead sayth is sayth: so that by sayth we vnderstand the generall word of sayth: and not that liuely and true sayth whereby we are iustified. It is paralogismus æquiuocationis, that is, a false argument comming of diuers significations of a word.

Whether a carke be the body of a man.

We addeth mozeouer that sayth cannot iustify, because of his owne nature it is a thing dead, and receaueth life of an other thing, namely, of charity, and of good woorkes. These obiections are vayne and trispyng. For none that is in hys right wit will graunt that true sayth is a dead thing. For the iust man is sayde to liue by his faith. And if out of sayth we draw life, how can it then vnto any man seme dead? But that it taketh life of an other thing, we deny not: for it hath it partly of those things which it beleueth, namely, of Christ and of the promises of God, and partly of the holy ghost, by whose breathing it is inspired. In this sort we will graunt that it hath life of an other thing, but not in that sort that this man well: namely, that it hath it either of charity or of good woorkes. For what man that is well in his wits will euer say, that either the stocke of a tree, or the branches, or the frutes or the flowers geue life vnto the rotes? And sayth is before either hope or charity. Wherefore of them it receaueth not life: for in very dede sayth can not be the matter of these vertues. And euen as that faculty or power which they call vegetatiue, geueth life vnto the body and receaueth not life of the faculty or power sensitive or rational which foloweth: so faith geueth life vnto the soule, but taketh not that life either of charity or of good woorkes. Howbeit I graunt that that life of sayth is made so much the greater & ampler, as it hath mo & better woorkes, and moze seruenter charity bursting forth out of it: and not that it is increased of many and often repeticion of actions as it is sayd of vertues which they call moral, but because God of his grace and mercy multiplieth the talent for that it was not idle: and because God by his power bringeth to passe, that sayth when it woorketh through loue is stronger then it selfe when it is remisse in woorking.

True sayth
is not a dead sayth.

From whence faith hath life.

A similitude.

How sayth is increased by good woorkes.

But omitting these things let vs returne agayne to Pighius. He as much as lieth in hym contendeth that a man can not be iustified by that sayth which is in Christ and in the remission of sinnes. For, that sayth (sayth he) whereby Abraham was iustified, was not applyed vnto these things. For God promised vnto hym onely a plentifull seede, and possession of a countrey. And straight way it is added, that Abraham beleued God, and it was imputed vnto hym for righteousness. In this argument Pighius triumpheth, and is violent agaynst the truth and utterly derideth our sentence. But this is nothing ells then to deride Paul himselfe. For he by most expresse wordes affirmeth, that we are iustified by sayth in Christ and by the remission of sinnes. Neyther is there any thing ells in Pighius then a mere madness, and a wicked desire to confute. But let Paul come forth, and answer for him selfe, what he thought is to be vnderstand by the seede promised vnto Abraham. Undoubtedly in his epistle vnto the Galathians the third chapter, he calleth that seede, Christ. Vnto Abraham sayth he were made the promises, and vnto his seede: He sayth not, and vnto the seedes, as speaking of many, but as it were were of one, and in thy seed, which is Christ. And this testament I say was confirmed by God towards Christ. Let Pighius now yet beleue Paul, that in that s<sup>er</sup>mon which was promised vnto Abraham was Christ comprehended and declared, neither let him euer from hence forth with such malepertnes and desire of victo<sup>ry</sup> take vpon him to say, that y<sup>e</sup> sayth wherby Abraham was iustified was not sayth in Christe. But as touching the remission of sinnes, forasmuch as vnto vs is promised the blessing, we ought to remember, that the chiefe and principall poynt therof herein consisteth, that we should be receaued of God into fauour, and that our sins should be forgiven vs.

At what tyme Abraham was iustified.

Why God
repeteth the selfe same
promises.

In the 11.
chap. to the Hebrewes,
faith is said
to iustify.

But Pighius goeth on manifestly to oppunge y<sup>e</sup> doctrine of the apostle touching y<sup>e</sup> iustification of Abraham. For he sayth, y<sup>e</sup> before Abraham was circumcised & had a testimony of the scripture, that his sayth was imputed vnto him vnto righteousness, he beleued God, as it is manifest by y<sup>e</sup> 12. chapter of Genesis. Wherfore (sayth he) according to this your sentence, he was then iustified, neither was his righteousness deferred vntill that histo<sup>ry</sup> which is had in the 15. chapter. It is wonderfull, to see how much he attributeth vnto these his arguments, as though by them were take away from vs al possibility to answer: what I beseech you letted, but that Abraham might be iustified at that first time, when God spake vnto him first, to go out of his countrey and from his kindred. For euen in the selfe place at the beginning of the 12. chapter are had the selfe same promises which are had in the 15. chapter. For thus God promised him: I will make of thee a great nacio, and will blesse thee, and will make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing: I wil also blesse those that blesse thee, & wil curse those that curse thee: and in thee shall all thee families of the earth be blessed. Undoubtedly in these words is conteyned the promise of Christ, and the remission of sinnes. And therfore there shalbe no absurdity, if we say that Abraham by beleuing of those wordes also was iustified. But bycause the scripture in that chapter did not playnly set forth this, therfore Paul with great wisdom hath cited those wordes which are had in the 15. chapter, where it is expessedly w<sup>ri</sup>tten, that sayth was imputed vnto him vnto righteousness: which sentence was most necessary to confirme the sentence of the Apostle, namely, that a man is iustified by sayth. But why God would reperate the selfe same promises it is not hard to see. For so weake is our minde, that except the wordes of God be repeted, and agayne and agayne inculcated, it easely starteth backe fro<sup>m</sup> sayth. Neyther is iustification only once taken hold of, but so often as we truly and mightely assit vnto the promises of God. For forasmuch as we continually slide and fall into sinnes, we haue nede euermore that our iustification should be repeated.

Afterward he maketh a caueling that in the epistle vnto the Hebrewes are many thinges had touching sayth, and many wonderfull factes made mencion of, which haue bene by it obteyned: but yet not one word spoken, that iustification is to be ascribed vnto it. But this man with an vnjust pay<sup>er</sup> of balance weigheth the wordes of the holy scripture: neyther sufficietly considereth him what those wordes meane: The iust haue by sayth overcome kingdomes, haue wrought righteousness, haue obteyned the promises. For these are so to be resolued, that from the last effect we must returne vnto the first: The last is to overcome kingdomes: the next to worke righteousness: the first is to obtaine y<sup>e</sup> promises: amongst which promises are reckoned blessing, life, remission of sinnes and such other like, which serue to iustification. Wherfore that which is first made mencion of, sayth apprehendeth, & by it we are iustified: afterward follow good wo<sup>r</sup>kes: & therfore it is sayd, and they wrought righteousness: lastly by the selfe same sayth we obteyne also temporall good thinges and for that cause it is sayd, They haue overcome kingdomes. Wherfore Pighius falsly affirmeth, that in the Epistle vnto the Hebrewes among the effectes of sayth is no mencion made of iustification. For although that word be not there read, yet is it of necessity and manifestly gathered of those thinges that are there w<sup>ri</sup>tten. For neyther are we Arrians (as some wickedly belie vs) that we will graūt nothing, but that which is by playne and expresse wordes read in the holy scriptures. For
we

We graunt those thinges also which are by euident and playne arguments gathered out of them.

But Pighius afterward demaundeth, why we take away from woꝝkes the power of iustificieng. Unto this we could make answere with one word, that we do it bycause the holy ghoſt in the holy ſcriptures ſo teacheth vs: namely that men are iuſtified by ſayth without woꝝkes. But to the end we ſhould not ſo briefly diſpatch it, he hath layd a blocke in our way, ſo he anſwereth vnto him ſelfe, that the cauſe therof is, ſoꝝ ꝑ our woꝝkes are imperfect, neither ſatiſſie they ꝑ law of god, neither alſo can they ſtand ſure befoꝝe the iudgment of God. But by this meanes alſo (ſayth he) we may affirme that iuſtification is not of ſayth: ſoꝝ it alſo is imperfect. Foꝝ there is no man that beleueth ſo much as he ſhould doe. But vnto this we anſwere as we haue in other places oftentimes answered, that ſayth, as it is a woꝝke iuſtifieth not. Foꝝ that effect commeth vnto it, not by any his owne power, but by his obiect. Foꝝ from the death of Chꝛiſt and promiſes of God is righteousnes deriued into vs. So a beggar receaueth almes with a leproꝝus, weake, and ſoꝝe hand, and yet not in that reſpect that his hand is in ſuche ſoꝝte weake and leproꝝus. But thou wilt ſay, why doe not other good woꝝkes alſo by theyꝝ obiect, namely, by God ſoꝝ whoſe ſake they are done, apprehend righteousnes as well as ſayth? I anſwere that ſayth was to this vſe made and inſtituted of God. Foꝝ ſo alſo in the body of a man, although it haue diuers and ſondꝝy members, yet the hand only taketh hold and receaueth. And ſo is eaſely diſſolued that common paralogiſme, we are iuſtified by ſayth: ſayth is a woꝝke: ergo, we are iuſtified ſoꝝ woꝝke ſake. Here in the concluſion is ſtuffed in this word, For, which was not in the premiſſes, and therfoꝝe the collection is not good. Farther the ſoꝝme of the reaſon is ab Accidenti. Foꝝ it is accident oꝝ happeneth vnto ſayth, to be our woꝝke in that it iuſtifieth vs. Wherefoꝝe it is a fallacie oꝝ deceite (as they call it) of the Accident.

Farther Pighius objecteth, that charitie iuſtifieth rather then ſayth, ſoꝝ ꝑ it is the nobler & excellenter vertue. But this reaſoꝝ we haue befoꝝe confuted as ridiculous: charitie is moꝝe nobler the ſayth, therfoꝝe it iuſtifieth rather the ſayth. Foꝝ nobilitie oꝝ dignitie ſerueth nothing to iuſtification. Foꝝ it is al one, as if a man wold thus reaſon. The eyes are moꝝe excellenter then the mouth, and the hands, Ergo, meats are to be receiued with the eyes, and not with the mouth oꝝ the hands. Which alſo we ſee happeneth in naturall things, that things which follow, are of moꝝe perfection, although they geue not life. In the childe conceived, nature aſcendeth as it were by degrees from the power of begitacion, to the power of feeling, and from the power of feeling, to the power of vnderſtanding. And yet doth it not therof ſollow, that ꝑ powers of vnderſtanding oꝝ of feeling, ſoꝝ that they are moꝝe noble than the power of begitacion, doe therfoꝝe geue life vnto the childe. And that to iuſtifie rather pertaineth vnto ſayth then vnto charitie, beſides that the holy ſcriptures doe teache the ſame, it may alſo be ſhewed by good probable reaſon. Foꝝ the power of knowledge which pertaineth vnto vnderſtanding, conſiſteth in perceiuing. And therfoꝝe they which are taught any thing, after they once vnderſtand it, are accuſtomed to ſay, Accipio, oꝝ teneo, that is, I take it, oꝝ I holde it. Foꝝ in very deepe by knowledge a thing is after a ſoꝝt receiued into the minde. Wherefoꝝe it ought not to ſeeme marueilous, if by ſayth we are ſayd to take holde of the promiſes of God, and the merites of Chꝛiſt. But charitie conſiſteth in pouring out, beſtowing and communicating our goodes vnto others. Which thing ought to follow iuſtification, and not to go befoꝝe. Foꝝ befoꝝe that we are regenerated, we are euil, neither can we byꝑrightly oꝝ in ſuche ſoꝝt that God ſhould allow it, communicate any good thing vnto others.

Hereunto Pighius addeth, that if that ſayth which iuſtifieth ſuffreth not with if hainous ſinnes which may trouble the conſcience, and which may alienate a mā from God, it muſt needes follow, that if a man which beleueth doe chaunce to fall into any greuous wicked crime, he is ſtraight way deſtitute of ſayth, and ceaſeth to beleue that there is a God: when yet notwithſtanding we ſee that wicked men

Faith as it
is a woꝝke iuſtifieth
not.

The nobilitie of the vertue ſerueth
nothing to the power of iustificieng.

A ſimilitude.

It is declared by reaſoꝝ
that ſayth
iuſtifieth &
not charitie

Faith abideth with such sinnes as are most greuous and do wast the conscience.

The deuill is not endued with true faith. A similitude.

Faith is very far from the last perfection.

doe not only beleue, that there is a God, but also doe confesse all the articles of the faith. This argument at the first sight seemeth to be very terrible. But suffer not thy selfe gentle reader, to be deceiued with a vaine shew. Examine it wel, and try it diligently, and thou shalt finde that it is a weak and ridiculous argument. We graunt that a man that is by sinnes and wicked factes alienated from God, may assent vnto the articles of the faith, and beleue that there is a God. But this good man should haue taught farther, that the same is done by the motion and impulson of true faith. There may in dede be left to a wicked man, a certaine humaine persuasion, either by education, or by opinion, because he thinketh it to be most likely. But lest any man should thinke y<sup>e</sup> this that I say, is of mine owne inuenting, namely that a man which greuously sinneth, is destitute of the true and iustifying faith, let him rather consider what Paul saith. For he vnto Timothe saith. He which hath not a care ouer his owne, and especiall ouer his household, hath renounced faith, and is worse then an infidell. Doubtlesse he which hath renounced faith, hath not faith. And vnto Titus he saith: They cōfesse that they know God, but in dedes they deny him. To confesse and to deny, are things contrary: wherefore it must needes be, that soasmuch as bothe are spoken of one, and the selfe same men, they are to be taken in a diuers sense. Wherefore they may haue faith, that is a certaine humaine opinion such as it is: but yet not that firme and mighty assent inspired by the holy Ghost, wherof we now intreat. John saith in his first Epistle and seconde chapter, he which saith that he knoweth God, and kepeth not his commaundements, is a liar, and the truthe is not in him. Wherefore the true faith, wherby we beleue truely in God, is not without good workes. Neither ought it to seeme vnto any man absurd, that one and the self same thing may be known diuers wayes. For the deuill also as well as we, both knoweth and confelleth many things touching Christe: whome yet neither Pighius doubtlesse (as I suppose) will graunt to be endued with the true faith, whereby we are persuaded to beleue those thinges, which we confesse of Christ. It is possible also, that one skilful in the Mathematicall sciences may assent vnto some one conclusion confirmed & proued by demonstration, which demonstration if he chaunce after ward (as oftentimes it happeneth) by reason of age or of some disease to forget, he wil not yet for al y<sup>e</sup> cease to affirme y<sup>e</sup> propositiō which he before knew: but this doth he by opiniō, or some probable argumēt, & not (as before he did) by demonstration. Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> knowledge of one, & the self same thing doth not of necessity infer y<sup>e</sup> self same ground of knowledge. And those things suppose to be spoken only by supposition, vpon that sentence which holdeth, y<sup>e</sup> after a man hath committed any great haynous wicked fact true sayth is lost, which yet in y<sup>e</sup> elect is afterward by the benefite of God again recovered: other wise it may be sayd, that in men iustified and appointed of God vnto saluation, sayth can not thro-rough the committing of any haynous crime be vtterly extinguished, but is as it were in dead slepe, and lieth hidden, neither bursteth it forth into act, vnles it be agayne stirred by the holy ghost: for in such men that haue so fallen the seede of God still abideth, although for that tyme it bringeth not forth fruit.

But Pighius goeth on and sayth. Sayth is the foundation: therefore it is farre from the perfection of the building: wherefore it iustifieth not. For vnto iustificatimany other preparations are required. If by this perfection of the building he vnder-stand the blessed resurrection, and chief felicity, wherein we shall see God face to face, we graunt that sayth is very farre from it. For we must by many tribulations, aduersities, and greuous labours come vnto the kingdome of heauen.
But after the self same maner we may say, y<sup>e</sup> iustification also is only the foundation of that eternal saluation: and that it also is farre from y<sup>e</sup> blessednes which we looke for. For the first degree vnto saluation is, to be receaued of God into fauor, and to be regenerated through Christ: And afterward follow other degrees, by which we come vnto that chief goodnes which we looke for. But where this man found that sayth is only the foundation he can not teach out of the holy scriptures: except peraduenture he wil bring that out of the Epistle vnto the Hebrues: Faith is the substance of things that are hoped for. But by those wordes is nothing els met, but that those things which we hope for, are by sayth upholden and confirmed in our minds: which would otherwise wauer, neither should they by any meanes stand fast. But this maketh nothing at all to this purpose. And if in case he will cite this also, That he which will come vnto God ought to beleue, we haue already befoze answered therunto: & peraduenture we will after ward in due place speake somewhat moze as touching that.

But goe to, seeing he by so many meanes goeth about to ouerthrowe our sentence, let vs heare what he himselfe at the length affirmeth, and vnto what thing he attributeth the power of iustifying. There are (sayth he) many preparations and dispositions required in vs to be iustified. First (sayth he) we beleue the wordes of God: afterward we are asfeard of his wrath: after y we hope for mercy: then we detest sinnes. To be brieft, he reckeneth by all those things which we befoze declared vnder the name of y Synode of Trent, but in the last place he sayth, succedeth a sincere & pure loue of God, which altogether beareth dominion in our heartes: and vnto this he sayth, is ascribed iustification. I can not inough meruaile at the deuise of this man. For he affirmeth that a man is in a manner perfecte befoze he can be iustified. For he which beleueth, feareth, hopeth, repenteth, and sincerely loueth God, what wanteth he to perfection? But this man holdeth, that a man without Christ, a straunger from God, and not yet iustified, is able to accomplish those things: which vndoubtedly in no wise agreeth with y holy scriptures. For they teach that a man befoze he is iustified, is occupied in euill workes, & wandreth in the hatred of God: as it is manifest in the Epistle to the Colossians the first chapiter, and to the Ephesians the seconde chapiter. But how can they by whome are wrought so excellent workes, as this man maketh mention of, be the children of wrath: how can they be sinners: how can they, as it is written vnto the Romaines, be the enemies of God?

Pighius
sentence.

But omitting those things, let vs see what are the groundes of this opinion. First he citeth that out of John, he which loueth not, abideth in death: and therby he concludeth, that of loue is had iustification & life. This is al one, as if a man should say, he which can not laugh, is not a man: Ergo, by the power of laughing, a man obtaineth to be a man. But how absurd this is, euery man may easely perceiue. For to be men, we haue it of the soule endued with reason. Vnto which soule, for as much as the power of laughing, is of necessitie ioyned, this proposition which we haue brought, is ever true. He which can not laughe, is not a man. So is that most certaine which John saith, That he which loueth not, abideth in deathe: although he haue not life of loue but of faith: where with loue is of necessity ioyned.

He citeth also those wordes of Christ: If ye had God to your father, doubtlesse ye should loue me. Therfoze (sayth he) of loue we haue the adoption, whereby we are made the childre of God. But here also he vseth the self same forme of reasoning. For they which loue not Christ, are not the children of God: and yet haue we not of loue to be the children of God, but of faith, out of which loue springeth. After the selfe same maner a man might say: if thou wert liberall, thou shouldest also be prudent. And this in dede is a true proposition. And yet it foloweth not, that a man is by liberalitie made prudent. Yea much rather of prudence springeth liberalitie. To be brieft, these arguments and such other like conclude nothing else, then that iustification can not consist without loue, and other christian vertues. And yet can not thereof be rightly gathered, that a man is iustified for these vertues sake. Pighius addeth mozeouer this sentence of Christ: If any man loue me, he will keepe my commandementes, and I and my father will come to him, and make ou, abiding with him. By these wordes it appeareth, saith he, that iustification foloweth of loue, and the obseruing of the commandementes of God. For those being obserued, Christ promiseth, that he will come with his father, and abide with vs. For he thinketh that to receiue and to retaine Christ, is nothing els then to be iustified. We confesse, that when Christians being now regenerate and iustified do liue by right, and by good woorkes do the to forth they sayth, God commeth vnto them, and bepeth them by with greater giftes and a moze ample grace. For God, although otherwise he be euery where, yet is expessedly sayd to come vnto them, in whom he beginneth to worke new woorkes. And sitthen he dayly encreaseth and adorneth his which beane themselves vprightly and godly, and saythfully exercise the talents committed vnto them, it is very well sayd, that he dayly cometh vnto them by reason of new giftes. And this is that kind of visiting, wherof Christ speaketh in the Gospell of John. But, if we will knowe the first access of God, & comming of Christ vnto our hartes to dwell in them, Paul teacheth it vs to the Ephesians.

For thus he writeth: That Christ may thorough fayth dwell in your hartes. Wherfore this sentence of Christ teacheth not, that iustification commeth of loue. For iusti-fication goeth before it, although not in time, yet in order.

The mos-
tise concerning iustifi-cation, hath not a condition ioyned.

Pighius proceedeth and maketh such a distinction of testaments, that some he sayth are absolute and free: by which the heere may streight way enter vnto the inheritance: other some are conditionall, which make no heere, but vpon certayne conditions. And to this latter kind referreth he the testament of God. And therfore contendeth he, & except those conditions be perfozmed, none can be iustified. Here we deny his assumpt, namely, that the testament of God touching the remission of sinnes in Christ hath any condition ioyned with it. Which thing Paul testifieth in his 3. chapter to the Galathians, when he thus writeth. Brethern, I speake accorto the maner of men: Though it be but a mans testament, yet when it is confirmed no mā doth abrogate it, or adds any thing therunto: Now, to Abraham were made the promises, and to his seede: he sayd not, To the sedes: as speaking of many: but as of one: and in thy seede, which is Christ. And this I say, that the law whiche began 430. yeares after, can not disanul the testament before approued of God towards Christ, that it should make the promises of none effect. These wordes most manifestly declare, that the testament which God made with Abraham was pure and absolute, & without any condition of law. Which thing the wordes of Genesis declare. For God once promised vnto Abraham the blessing. Afterward was geuen the law, which vnto those promises should adde conditions of precepts: so that if men would be iustified and obteyne them, they should know that they must perfozme & accomplish all the commaunde-mentes of God. But this latter way of iustification, although it can by no meanes be accomplished, can not let, or make void the first way. But that first way was nothing ells but the Gospell thorough Christ. And that men should the moze willingly come vnto it, there was set forth also the latter way of iustification by woorkes:
that men, when they vnderstode, that they were not able to perfozme them, should fly vnto Christ: of whome, when as being iustified they endeuored themselves to liue vprightly, they might freely receaue the promises set forth in the law.

Now let vs see, what be those conditions which this man ascribeth vnto the Testament of God. In the 103. Psalm it is written: The mercy of the Lord is from generation vnto generation vpon them that feare him, and his righteousness vpon childrens children, vpon those which kepe his testament, and are mindfull of his commaundements, so doe them. Of these wordes Pighius gathereth, that the feare of God, the mindfulness of the Testament of God, & the endeuor to perfozme his commaundements, are the conditions of the promises of God. But here I do not a litle mer-vail, & Pighius would affirme, that a man is iustified by loue, whē as he confesseth that the holy scripture attributeth the same vnto feare. But we wil not stick with Pighius, & he be contrary vnto himselfe. But if we wil harken vnto the scriptures in 33. Psalm, Mercy is promised vnto the that hope. For thus it is written: And him that hopeth in God, mercy shall compass about. Also in an other place it is written, he which beleueth shall not be confounded: and he which calleth vpon the name of the Lord, shall be made safe. But who saeth not, that all these vertues are in a man already iustified: and that God hath mercy vpon him? But here lay all the controuersie, vnto which of these vertues chiefly iustification is to be ascribed. Andoubt-edly by the testimony of the scriptures, the same is to be attributed vnto faith.

Pighius

Pighius saith mozeouer, that in that condition which he alleaged is sayde, that they shoulde be mindfull of the commaundements of God to doe them, there is not added saith he, to doe all the commaundements, God receiveth a man which endeuoreth himselfe to doe them, and of his mercy forgiveth many things. But this that is written, To doe them, must of necessitie be vnderstand of all. For doubtlesse in the lawe, which this man calleth the Testament, are written all. And if God forgive or remit any thing, he doeth it to men already regenerate: And not vnto them that are straungers from him, & children of wrath: such as they must needs be, which are not as yet iustified, but stil prepare themselves, and are bent to performe the conditions. Vnto these I say, nothing is remitted, wherefore they are bound vnto all. And therefore Moses said, as Paul testifieth, Cursed be he which abideth not in all the things that are written in the booke of the law.

Vnto those which are not iustified nothing is remitted of the rigor of the law.

Farther he maketh a contention also about the production of sayth, and demaundeth, from whence it hath his beginning in vs. We in one word easely answer that it hath his beginning of the holy ghost. But he saith himselfe to wonder, how we graunt the holy ghost vnto a man befoze he doth beleue. For he thinketh that to be absurd. First I can not deuise how this man should so much wonder at this. But afterward I perceave that he manifestly maketh and teacheth with the Pelagians, that sayth is of our selues, and that it is gotten by humane strengthes. For otherwise if he beleued that it is of God and of the holy ghost, he would not separte the cause from his effect. But that he should not thinke, that we without good reason do attribute vnto the holy ghost the beginning of sayth, let hym harken vnto the moste manifest testimonies of the Scriptures. Paul sayth in the first epistle vnto the Corinthians: Not in the words which mans wisdom teacheth, but which the holy ghost teacheth: that your faith should not be of the wisdom of men, but of God. And in the same place, The carnall man understandeth not the things that are of God, neither can he: for vnto him they are foolishnes: for they are spiritually discerned. But how can they be spiritually discerned except the spirit of God be present? Children also know that of **Coniugata* are deriued firme arguments. And vnto the Galathians: God (saith he) hath sent his spirit into our hartes whereby we cry, Abba father. For by the spirit we beleue and in beleuing we call vpon God. Pea and the spirit himselfe (as it is written vnto the Romanes) beareth testimony vnto our spirit that we are the children of God. And vnto the Ephesians, Be ye strengthened by the spirit in the inward man, that Christ may by sayth dwell in your hartes. Here we see, that that sayth whereby we embrace Christ, commeth of the spirit of God, whereby our inward man is made stronge. The Apostles when they sayd, Lord increase our sayth, manifestly declared, that it sprang not of their owne strengthes, but of the the breathing of God. And Paul in the 1. to the Corinthians the 12. chapiter: Vnto one (saith he) is geuen the word of wisdom, vnto another the word of knowledge, vnto another sayth, vnto another the grace of healing. And then is added, that it is one and the selfe same spirit which workerth all these things, deuiding vnto euery man as pleaseth him. And if thou wilt say that this place and the foresayd petition of the Apostles pertayneth vnto the particular sayth by which are wrought miracles, doubtles I will not be much agaynst it. And yet if thou wilt nedes haue it so, I will reason a minori, that is, from the lesse. For if these free gifts are not had, but from the spirit of God, much les can that vniuersall and mighty sayth whereby we are iustified be had from els where. Farther Paul vnto the Rom. Vnto euery one, saith he, as God hath denided the measure of sayth. And in the latter to the Cor. Having (saith he) the selfe same spirit of sayth: eue as it is written: I haue beleued, for which cause also I speake: we also beleue and speake, that God which rayfed vp Iesus from the dead, shall through Iesus rayse vp our bodies also. Vnto the Gal. are reckned by the fruites of the spirit: Charity, ioy, peace, patience, lowlines, gentlenes, sayth, meekenes, and temperaunce. Sayth here is numbred among the fruites of the spirit, wherefore it procedeth of the spirit. But vnto the Ephesians he sayth moze manifestly, By grace, you are made safe through sayth: and that not of your selues, for it is the gift of God. And in the Actes of the Apostles it is thus written.

From whence faith is ingenerated in vs.

* Coniugata to be those wordes which being of one kind be deriued of another: as of iustice, a iust man or a iust thing.

How the holy ghost
is in man not regene-
rate

written. The Lord opened the hart of the woman that sold silkes, to geue hede vnto those thinges which Paul spake. And in the 13. chapter, They beleued as many as were predestinate vnto eternall life. Wherefore it is not to be doubted but that sayth is ingenerated in our harts by the holy ghost: who yet may indeede be had of them which beleue not, but that yet is onely perswading, and not as sanctifying them. And although in the elect he suddenly poureth in sayth, yet forasmuch as he is the cause of sayth, he is therefore before it, both in dignity and in order.

Now let vs see what absurdities Pighius gathereth out of this sentence. If the spirit (sayth he) be the autho<sup>r</sup> of our sayth, and bleth the instrument of the word of God, and may be also in them that beleue not, how cometh it to passe, that whē as there are many at one and the selfe same sermon, where as both spirit is present and the word preached, yet part do beleue, and part beleue not? we answer in one word: that that cometh because y<sup>e</sup> spirit is not of like efficacy in all men, neither doth after one & the selfe same maner teach all mē inwardly and in y<sup>e</sup> minde. But of his will we can not render in cause, although we nothing doubt but that it is most iust. If the matter be so (sayth he) the hearers will easely content them selues, neither will they put to their endeuor or studie: for they know, that that is in vaine, when as it wholly dependeth of the spirite of God. This is not only a very common, but also an enuious obiection. But we answer that all men are bound to beleue the word of God, and therefore they bounden duety is diligently and attentiuely to hearken vnto it, & with all their strengthes to assent vnto it. And if they so doe not, they shal then incur the punishment of the law: neither are they to be hearkened vnto if they shal say that they could not obey it: or if they would haue gone about to haue proued what their strength could haue done, their endeuor, for that they were not as yet iustified, should haue bene in vaine and sinne. As if a master should bid his seruauit which is lame to walke, and he should excuse himselfe, and say that he were lame, and could not goe without great deformitie, it is not to be thought that therefore he is excused. We are not of that minde that we thinke that all sinnes are alike. Yea rather we teach, that they which omit or neglect those outward workes which they might performe, and put not to endeuor and study to do wel, do much more greuously sinne then they which according to their strengthes obserue some certaine outward discipline: And as Augustine sayth, Cato and Scipio, shalbe much more tollerablier delitt with, then Catiline or Caligula. But I would haue y<sup>e</sup> Pighius whome our opiniō so much misliketh, to declare himselfe when he thinketh that the holy ghost is geuen vnto men. He will answer when as now these preparations haue gone before, when a man hath beleued, feared, hoped, repented, and sincerely loued. What more could Pelagius haue sayde? As though to beleue, to loue, and such other like shoulde spring of humane strengthes.

We alleadgeth this also, and thinketh it to make for his purpose, Come vnto me all ye which labour and are laden, and I wil refresh you. For he thinketh that labours, burthens, contrition, confession, and as they say, satisfaction, fastings, teares, & such other like make to the obteynment of iustification. But this place is to be vnderstand farre otherwise. For Christ calleth them laboring and laden, which were oppressed with the law, and felt they<sup>r</sup> owne infirmity, and the burthen of sinnes, and which had now long time laboured vnder humane tradicions. These men being now wearied, and in a maner without all hope, the Lord calleth vnto him. For they are more apt vnto the kingdome of heauen, the are other blessed & secure men, which by they<sup>r</sup> owne works & good dedes thought the selues very iuste.

God (sayth Pighius) requireth workes preparatory: and them he promisseth not to fayle them of his grace. This was vtterly the opinion of the Pelagians: against which y<sup>e</sup> holy scriptures are vtterly repugnant. For they teach, that it is God, which geueth both to will, and to performe, according to his good will: that it is God which be- ginnereth in vs the good worke, and accomplisheth it euen vnto this day: that it is God, fro whome only we haue sufficiency: when as otherwise we are not able to thinke any thing of ourselves, as of our selves. Wherefore it is manifest, that Pighins confoundeth the lawes of God, & disturbeth those things which are wel set forth in þe holy scriptures.

Farther, when as we say, that vnto iustification is not sufficient, an histori call sayth, he sayneth him selfe to meruayle what manner of histori call sayth we vnderstand. For if (sayth he) they call all those things which are written in the holy scriptures, an histori, wil they bring vnto vs an other faith wherby we may beleue those things which are not in the scriptures? But we reiect not an histori call sayth, as though we would saue some new obiects of sayth, besides those which are set forth in þe holy scriptures, or are out of the firmly concluded. But we require, not a vulgar or cold assent such as they haue, which are accustomed to allow those things which they read in þe holy scriptures, being thereto led by humane persuasio, & some probable credulity, as at this day þe Iewes & Turkes confesse & beleue many things which we do, but an assured, & firme & strong assent, & such which cometh fro the afflation of the holy ghost, which changeth & maketh new the hart and the mind, and draweth with it good motions and holy woorkes. In this manner we say, that that sayth which is of efficacy differeth very much from an histori call assent. And, that we are by that sayth, which we haue now described, iustified, we haue thre manner of testimonies. The first is of the holy ghost, which beareth witness vnto our spirite, that we are the children of God: The second is of the scriptures: The third is of woorkes. But contrariwise, they which hold and crie, that a man is iustified by woorkes, haue no sufficient testimony. For the holy ghost testifieth it not, the holy scriptures deny it: only woorkes are brought forth, and those without piety and sayth: such as were in times past the woorkes of the old Ethnikes, and at this day the woorkes of many which beleue not in Christ, and are strangers from God.

But it is woorthy to be laughed at, that he hath cited also a place out of the 66. chapter of Esay, by which, and if there were no more places then it only his cause is most of all ouerthrowen. Vnto whome (sayth God) shall I looke, but vnto the poore man, vnto the contrite of harte, and vnto him that trembleth at my woordes. By these woordes Pighins thinketh are signified those woorkes, wherby God is drawen to iustifie vs. But the matter is farre otherwise. For the scope of the Prophet was, to detest the suspicion of the Iewes. For they neglecting the inward piety of the mind trusted only to outward ceremonies. Wherefore this thing God by þe voyce of the Prophet condemned, and declared how odious it was vnto him: Heauen (sayth he) is my seate, and the earth is the footestool of my feete. As if he should haue sayd, I nothing passe vpon this your temple, which ye so much boast of. For heauen is my seate, such a seat as you can not frame nor make: and the earth adozned with all kind & variety of plants, liuing creatures, herbes, & flowers, is the footestool of my feete. Where shall be that house, which ye wil build for me? And where shall be my resting place? And straight way to declare þe it was not the temple built with handes, All these things (sayth he) hath mine hand made: and all these things are made sayth the Lord. By which woordes we learne that God delighteth not in these things, and in outward ornaments and sumptuous buildinges for theyr own sakes: but chiefly requireth sayth, and inward piety of the minds, that he may dwell in them. And who they be that beleue, and are in very deede godly, is declared by theyr certayne and proper notes. Whosoener is poore and seeth him selfe to want righteousness, and whosoener is contrite of hart, that is to say, afflicted in this world, whosoener is of a moderate and delected spirite, and not of an arrogant and proud spirite, whosoener with great reuerence and feare receaueth the woordes of God, he most iustly may be nombred amongst them. These are sure tokens, and as it were the proper coulours of faith and true piety. Afterward the Prophet declareth how much God esteemeth the woorkes of men that beleue not, and are not as yet regenerate, though these woorkes be neuer so goodly to the shew. He which killeth an ox (sayth he) it is all one as if he should kill a man: and he which sacrificeth a shepe, as if he cut of a dogges necke: he that offreth an oblatiō, as if he offred swine flesh: and he that maketh mention of incense, as if he blessed iniquity. All these kindes of oblations and

The difference betweene an histori call faith and a strange faith.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the sacrifices were commaunded and appointed in the law of God: which yet bein done of an vnclene hart and of a stranger from God, were counted for most greguous finnes. Wherefore Pighius hath nothing out of this place toherby to defend his error: but we by the selfe same place do most aptly and most truly confirme our owne sentence. But this is a notable and sharpe disputer, which bringeth for him selfe those things which make so playnly and manifestly agaynst himselfe.

Two manner of waies
of sekyng
after God.

But he owteth this also out of the epistle vnto the Hebrwes, That he that cometh vnto God ought to beleue that there is a God, and that he rewardeth them which seeke vnto him. By these wordes it seemeth that he would conclude that iustification is geuen vnto them which seeke God, namely, by good woorkes. But he ought to haue made a distinction of the y seeke God: which thing Paul also did. Namely, that some seeke him by woorkes, & other some by faith. This distinction Paul sheweth: neither leaueth he vnspoken what followeth of it. For thus he writeth vnto the Romanes: Israel which followed after righteousness, attained not vnto the lawe of righteousness because they sought it of woorkes, and not of fayth. Wherefore they which seeke God to be iustified of him by fayth, as the Apostle teacheth, do attayne vnto that which they desire. But they which will be iustified by woorkes, do fall away from iustification. And that God rewardeth woorks which are done of men regenerate, and by which they contend to the crowne of eternall saluation, we deny not. But that pertayneth not vnto this question. For at this present the contention is not about this kinde of woorkes: but only about those which are done before regeneration. Whose Pighius contendeth to haue their reward, and to be merites after a sort of Iustification.

Neither doth this any thing help this cause, that he affirmeth, y this kinde of merite redoundeth not vpon God, or maketh him debto: vnto vs, or is equall vnto that which is rewarded. For these thinges although vnto him they seme to serue only to extenuate the dignity of merites, yet do they utterly take away all the nature of merite. For whatsoever good thing men do also euen after iustification, the same is not properly theirs: For God woorketh it in them. Whereouer also all that whatsoever it be, was alredy before wholly deu vnto God: neither can we do any thing that is good, or geue any thing vnto him which is not his. Wherefore we must utterly take away al merite not only in the which are not as yet iustified: but also in them that are iustified.

Merite is
taken away
both from the that are not iustified
and from
them that
are iustified

But Pighius the easelier to perswade, putteth forth a similitude of a certayne maister which hath many seruauntes: vnto whome, to the end they should the diligentlier and speedelier accomplishe some certayne worke which he setteth them to do, he appointeth a reward. Who (sayth he) will deny, but that those seruants which speedely and diligently haue finished their worke, haue deserued the reward that was promised? We will briefly examine what may be concluded by this similitude. If by seruauntes he vnderstand men regenerate in Christ, we wil graunt that God setteth forth prizes and rewardes, whereby we are stirred vp to liue holply: neither will we deny but that such may be sayd to receaue a reward. But yet we will not graunt that they truly and properly merite the crowne of eternall felicity. And certayne of our writers to declare that this thing pertaineth vnto the iustified do vse a similitude, not of a maister and his seruauntes, but of a father and his children. For fathers are wont oftentimes with some certayne condition to promise a gowne, a cap, or money vnto they children which otherwise they would frely geue vnto them, yet they do it to quicken their eueno: thereunto: as for example sake, that they shall haue this or that, after they haue thoroughly learned this booke or that booke. Here no man that will speake as he should do and properly will say, that these children when they haue finished their woorks haue deserued the giftes which were promised vnto them. For the father geueth them frely and of liberalitie vnto them. But Pighius entreateth of seruauntes, that is, of men not as yet regenerate, but that vnto such are by God set forth any rewards of good thinges, I meruail out of what place he can at the length declare.

Wherby will he proue that the woorkes of such men, seing they are yet, as we haue taught, sinnes can please God? And seing the matter is so, vnto them is set forth not a reward, but a punishment. But to make the thing moze playne let vs compare childzen and seruantes together. Childzen though they do nothing, yet they enter vpon their fathers inheritance onely, so that they will receiue it: But seruantes though they labour neuer so much, yet they haue no inheritance with the childzen. This is so plaine that it needeth no further declaration.

A comparson between seruantes &
childzen.

But to wrest out of our handes this, that we say, that if woorkes be required vnto iustification, the honour of Christ shoulde be diminished, as though he by merite alone could not be sufficient to reconcile vs vnto God, I sayth he) doe take away nothing from Christ, but do leave vnto him his hono: whole and safe. But I beseech thee, how dost thou take away nothing, when as thou requirest woorkes vnto our iustification, and so requirest them, that thou sayst, that God moze regardeth them, then faith? But he thus expoundeth his suttile riddle. That Christ in that his order is a sufficient cause: as if he should haue sayd, if we speake of the reconciliato: and of the sacrifice, whereby we are reconciled vnto God, Christ onely is sufficient. But we cannot be prepared and be made apt vnto that benefite but by many woorkes. I cannot doubtles but meruaile where is become the wit of this so great sophister. As though so sooth they, against whome the Apostle disputeth, euer said, that woorkes are required vnto iustification as outward principles or grounds. Andoubtedly they also went about the same that Pighius doth, that woorkes are certaine purgings and preparations of the mynds. Farther who seeth not, that an vniuersall proposition being true, it is lawfull to apply vnto all the singular propositions thereof that which is either affirmed or denied in it? Wherefore seeing Paul denieth y a man is iustified by woorkes, he excludeth all kindes of woorkes, in what order so euer they be put.

But Pighius sayth farther, that God requireth these woorkes, that he maye freely impute vnto vs iustification. Whosoever is but euen slenderly ex- cised in the holys Scriptures, shall easely see, that thys man is euen directly repugnaunt vnto Paul. For he in the Epistle to the Romanes sayth, Vnto hym which worketh not, a reward is imputed accordyng to grace. But Pighius sayth, vnto hym which worketh God imputeth righteousnes freely. But to impute freely, and not to impute freely, euery childe may see that they are contradictories. But mark gentle Reader, this reason of two members. These woorkes which he speaketh of, either profite vnto iustification, or else profite not. If they profite not, why calleth he them preparations? For amongst causes are reckened also causes preparatory. But if he will say that they profite, & are in very deede causes preparatory, with what mouthe can he affirme, that he plucketh away nothing from the honour of Christ, but appoynteth him to be the whole, and absolute cause of our iustificatio: But peradventure this two membered argument, a man will turne vpon vs, touchyng those woorkes which follow iustification. For (he wil say) either they are profitable to obtaine saluation, or they are not profitable: If they be not profitable, why are they required, and why are their promises set forth vnto the? But if they be, why doe we not allowe merite to be in them? I answer that suche woorkes are profitable vnto men regenerate, for that they liuing by rightly and orderly, are re- newed and made moze perfect. But that is nothing else but a certaine inchoation, and as it were a participation of eternall life. Farther, it hath seemed good vnto God, by suche meanes, or rather by suche spaces to bring men vnto eternal felici- tie. But we can not cal these woorkes merites. For Paul expessedly teacheth, that the stipend of sinne is death: but eternall life is grace. But that which is giuen freely, utterly excludeth merite. And in the meane tyme we ought to remember, that there is a great difference (as we haue oftentimes taught) betwene their woorkes, which are as yet straungers from Christ and from God, and their woorkes which are now by grace grafted into Christ, and made his members.

Wherunto
good woorkes profite after iustification.

That which is giuen freely excludeth
merite.

Afterward also he goeth about to confute that which we say, that a man is iu-ified by that faith which hath a respecte vnto the promises of Christ, and of the remission of sinnes: as though we holde that faith is the proper correlative of such promises. For he saith that faith hath equally a respect vnto all the thinges which are set forth in the holy scriptures. Yea (saith he) he doth vnto God a thing no les acceptable, which beleueth, that he created the world, or beleueth the thre persons of the diuinitie, or the resurrection to come, then he, which beleueth that Christe was giuen to be our mediator, and that by him is to be obtained the remission of sinnes. For that faith is of no lesse worthinesse then the other. And, if we be iustified by faith, he contendeth that that faith no lesse pertaineth to the other articles then to the remission of sinnes by Christ. And this he thinketh, may be proued by that which Paul wyrteth in the .4. chapter vnto the Romaines: And not for him only, were these things written, but also for vs, vnto whome it shal be imputed, so that we beleue in him which hath raised vp Christ from the dead. Beholde saith he, that faith is imputed vnto vs vnto righteousness, whereby we beleue that God raised vp Christ from the dead: and not that faith, whereby we beleue that sinnes are forgiven vs by Christ. First here we confesse, that our faith asseteth vnto all the thinges which are contained in the holy scriptures. But forasmuche as amongst them, there is but onely one principall and excellent truthe, vnto which all the other truthe are directed, namely that Christ the sonne of God suffered for vs, that by him we might receiue forgiveness of sinnes, what meruail is it if our faith haue a respect vnto this one thing chiefly? For this our assumpt Paul proueth. For he saith, that Christ is the end of the law. Wherefore seeing he is the end of all the scriptures, he is also the summe and principall obiecte of our faith: although other wise by our faith we also embrace all other thinges which are contained in the holy scriptures. And whereas he addeth that the faith which is of the other articles, is no lesse acceptable vnto God, then this faith which concerneth Christ and the remission of sinnes, we may first say that that is not true, if a man rightly way the dignitie of the action of faith. For the dignitie of faith, as also the dignitie of other suche like kindes of powers, is measured by the obiects. For as those obiects differ one from an other in excellency and dignitie, so the assetings of faith ought according to the same to be counted inferior, or of more excellency. Seeing therefore God would in suche sort haue his sonne to die, and that men should be by him reconciled, that for this he hath instituted all the other thinges to be beleued, which are set forth in the holy scriptures, we can not put any doubt, but that this pleased him much more then the other. For that the other are directed vnto this, as vnto their end. And this is a common rule amongst the Logicians, Every thyng is such a thyng, by reason of an other, wherefore that other thyng shall much more be such. Wherefore this actio of faith, whereby we asset vnto this most noble truth, ought to excell al other actioes of faith, whatsoeuer they be. And so it is not by a thing like acceptable vnto God, whether a man beleue this or that. If we should vse this answer, I know Pighius were neuer able to confute it, but we say moreouer that he in vaine contendeth about the greater, or lesse dignitie of faith as touching this or that article. For we are not iustified by the dignitie of faith. For it is in euery mā weak and feeble. But we therefore say, that we are iustified by faith, bicause by it, as by an instrument vnto this ende giuen vnto vs, and by God appointed, we apply Christ vnto vs, and take holde of the forgiveness of sinnes. Wherefore the worthinesse or unworthinesse therof, is to no purpose considered.

Christ is the principal object of our faith.

The dignity of faith is measured by the object.

We are not justified by the dignity of faith.

But that which he bringeth out of the .4. Chapter of the Romaines, he bringeth cut of and maimed. For if a man read the full and perfect sentence, he shal exactly see, that plaine mention is there made of the death of Christ, and of the remission of sinnes, which by it we haue obtained. For Paul saith, that vnto vs it shal be imputed as it was vnto Abraham, if we beleue that god raised vp our Lord Iesus Christ from the dead, which was deliuered for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification. Is it not here most manifestly said, that we ought to beleue that that Iesus Christ whome God raised vp, was dead and rose againe, that we should be iustified, and

haue

haue all our sinnes forgiven vs; doubtlesse it is a thing most vncomeely for a man that professeth diuinitie so willingly not to see things, that are most manifest.

Afterward he maketh a cauillation about the perticular sayth wherby we say that euery one that beleueth truly in Christ ought to be most assured with him selfe, that his sinnes are forgiven him. He denieth that there is any such faith found in the holy scriptures. And that therfore this is only our deuise and inuention. Here vndoubtedly I can not hold my selfe, but that I must needs say, that Pighius loudly lieth. For I would haue him to tell me, what did Abraham beleue whe he was iustified, but that vnto him should one day be rendred those promises of God? For vnto whome is it most likely beleued he that they should be rendred, but vnto him selfe? The selfe same thing may be sayd of Moses of Dauid, and of many other: of whome it is most certayne that they beleued, that the promises which God made vnto them, should perticularly be rendred vnto them. And what, I beseech you met Christ, when he sayd vnto the man that was sicke of the palsey, Sonne, thy sins are forgiven thee. And when he sayd vnto the woman, Thy sayth hath made thee safe? And did not Paul vnto the Galathians thus speake of Christ. Who hath loued me, and deliuered vp him selfe for me? What can be more manifest then these wordes? Let Pighius go now & make his vaunts, that we were y first finders out of this proper and singular sayth; and let him cry, that euery Christian man ought to beleue that the promises are made only indefinitely, & that it is not mete, that euery one of vs should apply them seuerally vnto him selfe. For we ought to beleue of our selues, and not of other. For we may as touching others be deceaued, whether they beleue or no. But touching our selues we may be assured and certayne of it. Let euery man beleue the promises of God indefinitely as touching others, for we know not who is predestinate and who is reprobate, but none which is saythfull ought in any wise to doubt of him selfe, but to beleue that the promise is perticular as touching him selfe, by that that he seeth that he truly beleueth. Farther when promises are set forth in an vniuersal proposition, we may most assuredly of them gather they singular propositions. And Christ sayth in John, This is the will of my father, that euery one that seeth the sonne and beleueth in him should haue eternall life. Wherfore we thus inferre: But I beleue in the sonne of God, Ergo, I haue now and shall haue that which he hath promised.

Pighius still goeth one, and, to the end he would proue that the sayth of euery article, and not that sayth only which is referred vnto Christ for the remission of sins, iustificth, vseth the example of Noe. For he sayth that he beleued only those thinges which pertayned to the safegard of his house, and to the destruction of the world: and by that sayth he sayth he was iustified. Here sayth he, is no mention made of Christ or of the remission of sinnes. But it semeth vnto me that this man hath not very diligently red that which Peter writeth in his 1. Epistle and 3. chapter: For Peter sayth, *When once the long suffering of God abode in the dayes of Noe, while the Arke was preparing, wherein few, that is, eight soules were saued thorough the water: vnto the figure wherof Baptisme now agreeing, maketh vs also safe: whereby not the filth of the fleshe is put away but wherebye it commeth that a good conscience well answereth vnto God. That which Peter saw was signified by the Arke, and by those thinges which Noe did, can we thinke that the patriarch him selfe saw not? This vndoubtedly were to much derogation vnto him. And if he saw those thinges which Peter maketh mention of, he beleued not only those thinges which were then done, but also those which were looked for to be accomplished by Christ. And therfore it is very well written vnto the Hebrynes, y he was by such a faith made the heyre of righteousness.*

But Pighius nothing passeth vpon this, who, so that he may be agaynst vs, is nothing at all aserd to fight euen against the Apostles themselves. For he is not aserd to affirme that our first father Adam was iustified, but yet not with that sayth, which we speake of, which concerneth the remission of sins thorough Christ. For he had no promise as touching that, as farre as may be gathered out of y scriptures

Noe was iustified by sayth in Christ.

Adam was iustified by faith, whereby he bele-
ued the remission of sinnes
through
Christ.

Distinction
of the promise.

tares. But doubtles this man is both farre deceiued and also hath forgottē his Fathers, whome he would be sene to make so much of. Was not the selfe same thing sayd vnto Adam, which was by God promised vnto Eue his wife, that his seede should bruse the hed of the Serpent? Christ was that seede, & he hath so broken the hed and strengths of the deuill, that now neither sinne, nor death, nor hel can any thing hurt his members. This place all the fathers in a maner thus interpret.

But Pighius which yet is les to be bozne withall, is not afeard to say, that iustification is not geuen vnto vs by the promise. In which thing doubtles he is manifestly agaynst Paul. For he vnto the Galathians thus writeth, God gaue vnto Abraham by the promise: and there is no doubt but that vnto vs it is geuen after the selfe same maner that it was vnto Abraham. But this is to be knowen that this worde promise is taken two manner of wayes: eyther for the thing promised: and so it is not to be doubted, but that we are iustified by the promise, that is, by Christ, and by the forgeuenes of sinnes which is promised vnto them that beleue: or ells it is taken for the very words of God, in which he thorough Christ promis-eth vnto vs remission of sinnes. And in this maner also we may be sayd to be iusti-fied by the promise. For although the cause of our iustificatiō be the mere will and mercy of God, yet is not the same offred or signified vnto vs but by the wordes of the promises, and by the sacramentes. For these words haue we as sure testimonies of the will of God towards vs. And, so sayth want not wherby we appzehend the thinges that are offred, we are iustified by the promises.

Afterward Pighius, to the end he would proue that God attributeth more vnto workes then vnto faith, citeth a place out of the 22. chapter of Genesis: where is described that excellent worke of Abraham, that he refused not to lay his only sonne, and to offer him vnto God: And therefore God said vnto him from heauen.
Because thou hast done this thing, I haue sworne by my selfe, that in blessing I will blesse thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seede, that it shalbe as the starres of heauen, and as the sand of the sea: it shall possesse the gates of his enemies: and in thee shall all na- tions be blessed. Behold here (sayth he) are promises geuen for workes sake: and thereunto is added a most faithful oth: but there is no mencion at al made of faith.
Wherefore (saith he) God hath more regard vnto workes, then vnto sayth. This speaketh he with a stout stomake: but according to Ysaias, The mountaynes would be brought to bed, and out cometh a poore sely moufe. Wherefore if a mā would demaund what I thinke as touching this thing, I would answer that it is a notable and most excellēt history, out of which yet can not be gathered that which this man exclaimeth. First here is no mencion made of iustification. What serueth it then to that matter whereof we now entreate? So often as any thing is called in controuersy, we must runne to such certayne and assured places in which is entreated of the selfe same thing: and not vnto those places in which it may be answered that they entreat of an other matter. Of this nature is that place whiche Paul citeth as touching this thing. Abraham belened in God, and it was imputed vn- to him vnto righteousness. But as touching this history, I willingly graunt, that Abraham by that worke obteyned a certayne more ample benefite, then he before had by sayth: not indeede either in substance, or number, or quantity of the promises, but in a sound and firme certaynty. For although he doubted not, but that whatsoever thinges he beleued, God would faithfully render vnto him, yet afterward when he had done those excellent dedes, he was more fully perswaded of the verity of his sayth, and constancy of the promise, and strength of the righteousness imputed vnto him. I deny not but that by that excellent worke, Abraham obtayned these thinges. What is there here that Pighius should boast of? What new thing is here promised? What couenant not heard of before, or new oth is here set forth? Nothing is here reherfed, which was not before made mencion of. For the couenant which is here made, was before ordained, partly when Circumcision was appointed, and partly in that sacrifice, wherin was commaunded that y beasts shoulde be deuided partly on the right hand and partly on the left: as though they which should swere and make the couenaunt shoulde passe thorough the midst.

Epistle to the Romanes.

402

For, that manner was also used amongst the men of Athenes: as Demosthenes declared in his oration agaynst Aristocrates. Farther we can not deny but that Abraham was iustified before. For even before it was sayd, Abraham beleued God, and it was imputed vnto him vnto righteousness. And seeing the matter is so, although afterward were added some promise, yet will that make nothing agaynst vs. For we deny not but that those workes which follow iustification are both good, and also do please God, and are recompensed of him although freely, yet with great & ample giftes. Now resteth only to declare an other way how to vnderstand this clause, Because thou hast done these things &c. And this pertayneth vnto the certaynty whereof we before made mention: which as we haue sayd, is from the effectes, and, as they vse to speake, a posteriori, that is from the latter. And that thou shouldst not thinke that this is of myne owne inuention, go & read Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis. For he diligently peruseth these wordes. Now I know that thou fearest God, was God (saith he) ignorant of this before? Had he any neede of this triall, when as he is the searcher of the raynes, and of the heart? Nothing les saith he. For here this word, I know, is nothing else, but I haue made thee to know, or I haue made plaine and manifest. Wherefore here is not rendered a reason of the promises by the cause: but after the selfe same manner vndoubtedly, by which it was said of the sinfull woman, Many sinnes are forgiven hir, because she hath loved much. Of which place we haue so largely before entreated, that now there is no neede at all of any repetition.

A manner is mongst the
of Athens.

Pighius hath framed an other obiection out of the .18. chapter of Ezechiel. If the wicked man (saith the Prophete vnder the person of God) shall repent him of all his iniquities, and shall doe all my commaundments, I wil no more remember all his iniquities. Here saith Pighius, we see that iustification which is the forgiveness of sinnes is not promised vnto faith, but vnto perfect repentance, and vnto the obseruation of the law of God. And here his bristles so arise, as though we must needs now giue place. But this argument, if it be more narrowly considered, is bothe bayne and trifling. For we easely graunt, that if a man perfectly repent him of all his iniquities, and doe all the commaundments of God, he shall haue iustification by workes. None of vs euer denied this. But here is the payne, this is the trauayle, to finde such a one as being not yet iustified hath performed this. And where I pray thee Pighius is that thine interpretation wherein thou before saydest, that God requireth not that we should performe all the commaundments: but that he of his mercy remitteth many thinges. For here thou hast brought a most manifest testimony agaynst thy selfe. But to returne to the matter. Forasmuch as man neither performeth, nor also can performe those thinges which are set forth both of the Prophet & of the law, what resteth there then, but that he should come humbly vnto Christ, and hauing through faith freely receaued iustification of him, should by grace and the spirite now giuen vnto him do perfect repentance (so muche as this life will suffer) and beginne by an obedience to obey the law of God. Entreatyng of this argument, there came to my remembrance the olde Philosopher Aristhenes. For when a certaine glorious yong man, which was one of his scholars, boasted that he had a ship laden with excellent marchandise, and when it were arrived, he would giue vnto him an excellent gifte, and this song was euermore in his mouth, so that he was irksome to the bearer, Aristhenes brought him forth into the market place, and in a certaine shop bought a few elles of cloth, and hauing them in his hand, when Aristhenes not hauing paid the money, began to go his way, the Marchant called him backe againe. Ho, good fellow, saith he, before thou depart pay me my money. Then Aristhenes shewing him the yonge man, This man (saith he) shall pay thee so sone as his ship is arrived. So will I answer vnto Pighius, when thou shewest me one, which being not yet regenerate, by his owne strengths repenteth him of all his iniquities, & obserueth al the commaundments of God, we wil say that he is iustified by his workes. But when will this ship arriue? wherefore let him cease to boast of the wordes of the law. For those wordes

Cap.ii. A Commentarie vpon the

what so euer they be, whether they pertaine vnto promises or vnto preceptes, we will after this maner interpret.

But he saith moreover, that Christ also sayd, He that dothe the will of my father, shall enter into the kingdome of heauen. But the Lord saide not (saith he.) We which beleue. Yea but I say that in an other place he did, and maketh no mention of any worke. For this (saith he) is the will of my father, that he which seeth the sonne, and beleueth in him, haue eternall life. Let not Pighius then from henceforth deny, that the Lord euer spake this. But that no man should thinke that the scriptures speake things contrary, I answered that these two sentences are not repugnant, but agree very well together. Pighius by the will of the father, understandeth a great heape of good workes. But Christ saith, this is the work of God, that ye beleue. And after this action of beleuing, follow many other good workes. Wherefore the holy scriptures are not repugnant one to the other. And Pighius argument is left weake, and of no efficacie.

But because Pighius seeth himselfe dyged with the word of God, for that so oftentimes is red in the holy scriptures, that man is iustified by faith. He saith that that is to be vnderstande of a lively and strong faith, which hath be ioyned with it other vertues. As though he forsothe we euer spake of any other faith. If he speake this from the heart, he beleueth the self same thing that we beleue. Wherefore lay aside the contention, and the controuersie being ended, let vs all agree in one. But Pighius cannot abide that this agreement should take place. For after ward, when he expoundeth how we are iustified freely, he saith that that is nothing else, but that God will freely impute vnto vs vnto righteousness the workes of faith, hope, and charitie. What haue we here to do? Doubtlesse it seemeth vnto me, that this man doth not with a sound iudgment read the scriptures, but doth with a corrupt affection, wrest them at his pleasure. For where workes are, Paul denieth that there is any free imputation: for these two are repugnant one to the other. Wherefore in that Pighius goeth about to ioyne them together, doeth he not seeme most manifestly to be against the Apostle? Thus muche of Pighius: vnto whome our Smith the eight wise man of Greece, and the first wise man of Englande, adioyneth himselfe a companion as Theseus did vnto Hercules. But in very deede, he bringeth nothing else, but that which he hath dyatone out of the links of this man and other such like.

First he saith that faith is not touching remission of sinnes: and therefore we fondly saue that iustification is had by it. For the faith (saith he) wherby Christians are discerned from no Christians, is in Iesus Christ. Which thing also (as though it made much to the purpose) he goeth about to proue by holy scriptures, and by a testimony of Ierome. But I would haue this man to answer me, if euer he learned the Hebrew tongue, what is the signification of this name Iesus. Doubtlesse amongst all the Hebrewes this word Iaschag signifieth to saue: wherefore Iesus may in Latine rightly be turned Seruator that is, a sauior. But if (which thing I thinke) true he be ignorant of the Hebrew tongue, yet he ought at least to haue beleued the Angel, which so interpreted that name. Thou shalt call his name (saith he) Iesus: for he shall saue his people from their sinnes. How then can faith be in Christ Iesus, vnlesse it be also touching the remission of sinnes through Christ?

Afterward he is not aserd to cite that also out of the Epistle of Peter: Charitie couereth a multitude of sinnes. Behold (saith he) forgiveness of sinnes is here ascribed not vnto fayth, but vnto charitie. He that will haue a mete are to cutt those knots a sower, let him attentiuely consider the holy scriptures, and diligently see, from whence those places, which are cited in the new testament, are taken out of the old. This sentence of Peter is had in a maner out of the 10. chap. of the Proverbs For there it is thus written, Hatred stirreth vp rebukes. For whome a man hateth, he vnicouereth and publisheth abroad his faultes as much as in him lieth. But contrariwise Charitie hideth and couereth the sinnes of his brother. For they which truly loue one another, are wont to defend one another, and to couer one another thers faults, so much as they se by conscience they may. And this is a most true sentence of Salomon. Wherefore Peter going about to exhort Christians vnto Charity wisely and aptly borrowed this sentence out of Salomon. But Smith not understanding, nor considering this, thinketh that Peter thought, that remission of sinnes is gotten by Charity. But he is most folly deceived, as oftentimes he is wont to be. But leaving these men aside let vs this remember, that if any time the Fathers seme to attribute righteousness vnto woorkes, the same is not to be vnderstand of that righteousness, which God freely imputeth vnto vs thorough Christ, but of y inward righteousness cleauing vnto vs, which we continually get and confirme by vpright life. Or if those thinges which they speake do manifestly pertayne vnto the righteousness imputed, that is, vnto the remission of sinnes, we must alwayes as we haue before taught run vnto the foundation of good woorkes, namely, vnto a liuely sayth in Christ. Which rules and such like if our aduersary would consider, they would neuer so impudently & obstinately defend so manifest lyes. Although if I should speake any thing touching Pighius, forasmuch as I see that he is nether of dul wit nor vnlearned, I can not say, that he in earnest and from the hart wrote touching this matter: but when he had once taken the matter in hand, he counted these thinges for pastime and pleasure.

But now to prosecute that order which I haue appoynted, let vs come vnto the Fathers, and see how muche they make on our side. And vndoubtedly for this matter shall we not nede any great number of testimonies. For euen as to vnderstand of what tast the water of the sea is, it is not nedeful y a man drinke by the whole sea, so, to vnderstand, what the Fathers thinke touching this, we shall not nede to go thorough all they sayings.

Irenaeus a most auncient author in his 4. booke and 30. chapter, agaynst Valentine writeth somewhat touching this matter although briefly. And I suppose that he for this cause wrote so briefly of it, for that this truth was in those first times so confessed and certayne, that it was not of any man called into doubt. But yet by that litle which he hath may sufficiently be vnderstand, what his iudgement was: as the saying is that Protogenes knew Apelles: by the draught of one line only. Irenaeus sayth, that the old Fathers eue those also which were before the law, were iustified by sayth. For first when he had spoken of Abraham, he ascendeth from him vnto Loth, then vnto Noe, and vnto Enoch, and afterward he addeth a reason why in these mens time the law was not written. Bycause sayth he, they were already iust, vnto whom the law was not geuen. For the iust haue the law written in theyr hartes. But peradventure thou wilt scarcely admitte this testimony, bycause Irenaeus in that place, when he speaketh there of Enoch, sayth, that he was sent a legate vnto the Angells: which may seme to be Apocriphall. But I thinke that the same is cited, not so much out of any booke which is counted apocriphall, as out of some old tradition. For many thinges were as it were by hand deliuered vnto the elders, which indeede are not to be reiect, so that they be not repugnant with the holy scriptures. Otherwise if for that cause we reiect this testimony, why do we not also reiect the epistle of Judas? For he also citeth a sentence of Enoch, that God shall come with thousands vnto iudgement. But whereas Irenaeus sayth that Enoch was a Legate vnto the Angells, I suppose that it may thus bee vnderstande to say that those Angells were men which were princes and great kinges, or such as were bozne of the famely of Seth. For so in Genesis the sonnes of God are sayd to haue sene the daughters of men, that they were sayre. Paradventure Enoch was sent vnto them by God to reprove them. And thus much out of Irenaeus.

Tertullian in his booke of Baptisme sayth, that a perfet sayth hath security of salvation. Wherefore it is not we alone that haue brought in a perticular sayth touching the remission of sinnes. Neyther ought it any thing to moue vs, that in that booke he defendeth most manifest errors touching Baptisme, and exhorteth men to differ Baptisme till they come to ripe age, and not to make hast vnto it before they marry. For although we allow not these thinges, yet in y meane time whilest he entreateth hereof, he hath many thinges which ought not to be contened, which were at that time receaued and confessed in the Church. So Ciprian when he treateth of rebaptising of heretikes, when they returned vnto the Church, hath in the meane time many true and weighty testimonies, which we can not reiect, although in the very state of the question we utterly disagree from him. And what father I pray you is there amongst them all, which in some one place defendeth not some sentence which is not to be allowed, and yet ought not all theyr workes therfore to be contemned. For there is no Pomegranet so sayre, which hath not in it some rotten carrells.

Cap.ii. A Commentarie vpon the

Nowe let vs come vnto Origen. He in his first booke vpon Iob (if yet that be Origen's worke) thus writeth: All things which men do, whether it be in virginity, or in abstinency, or in chastity of the bodye, or in burning of hys fleshe, or in distribution of his goodes, all these things I say they doo Gratis, that is in vaine, if they doo them not of sayth. In this place, whereas he sayth Gratis, all men vnderstande in vaine. Whiche thing doubtles Pighius and his companions will not admitte. For they will haue these things to be certayne preparations vnto iustification. But, that Origen is by expresse wordes against them, those wordes which follow do moze plainly declare. For thus he writeth, That all holines and righteousnes which a man doth without faith he doth it in vaine, and to his owne destruction. And he citeth this sentence of Paul, whatsoever is not done of faith is sinne. I am sure that neither Pighius can deny, but that Origen in this place maketh on our side: & that he in that sence vnderstande these wordes of Paul, whatsoever is not of faith is sinne: whiche wordes yet he crieth out that we are accustomed to abuse. Although he not onely Origen, but also Augustine, Basilus, and other fathers as we haue before taught, expound those wordes after the selfe same manner. Wherefore he doth vnjustly and impudently accuse vs: but if he will say that we must not so much regard, what interpretation the fathers bring, but must see whether the place in the texte may so be taken, therein we commend him. For we gladly admit appealing from the Fathers vnto y word of God. But he ought to haue remembred, that it is not the point of a good man to reprove that in others, which he doth himselfe. Wherefore he should suffer vs also on the other side, when the matter so requireth to appeale from the Fathers vnto the scriptures. But as touching the very matter, we haue els where declared, that that sentence of Paul as it is written in his Epistle, is so to be expounded, that of it may be inferred that the workes of men not regenerate are sinnes. Origen afterward addeth: Of whome shall he receaue a rewarde? Of him thinke you whome he sought not for? whome he hath not acknowledged? in whom he hath not beleued? He shall not sayth he receaue of him a rewarde but iudgement, wrath, and condemnation. If these things be rendred vnto such workes, who will denye but that they are sinnes? Afterward he bringeth a similitude. Euen as (saith he) he which buildeth without a foundation loseth his labour, and hath onely trauaile and sorrow: euen so it is with him which will build up good workes without faith. And euen as vnto him whiche beleueth all things are possible to finde refreshing at his handes in whome he hath beleued, so vnto him that beleueth not nothing is possible. Euen as the earth without the Sun bringeth not forth frutes so except the truth of God do through faith shine forth in the hartes, the frutes of good workes springeth not forth. For so (saith he) all that whole yeare, wherein Noe was saued from the flood, for that the Sunne shined not forth, the earth could bring forth no fruite. Thus much hath Origen in that place which we haue now cited, by whiche we conclude that faith formeth and maketh perfect al good workes which follow, and not that it as these men (I can not tell who) haue sained, taketh and bozoweth his forme of them. The same Origen vpon the. 4. chap. vnto the Romanes thus reasoneth: If he which beleueth that Iesus is Christ be born of God: & he which is born of God sinneth not: the is it certain that he which beleueth in Christ Iesus sinneth not. This kinde of argument is called Sorites, & is allowed of y Logicians. For y Stoikes were wont oftentimes to vse it. The assumptes of this argument cannot be denied. For they are take out of the holy scriptures. But he addeth after ward, And if in case he sinne, then is it certayne that he beleueth not. This of necessitie followeth of the former conclusion. For if euerie one which beleueth sinneth not, then doubtles whosoener sinneth, beleueth not

not. Let Pigghius now go laugh, for that we say, that by greuous sinnes true faith is lost, or is in such a dead slepe, that it hath not his act. And let him aggrauate the matter as much as he can, that he which sinneth greuously neither beleueth that there is a God, nor also the rest of the articles of the faith. Origen both thinketh & writeth the selfe same thing that we do. And he saith moreover, that there is a token of true faith, where sinne is not committed: as contrariwise where sinne is committed, it is a token of infidelitie. Again he addeth in the same chap. If peradventure that which is said of the Apostle, to be iustified by faith, seme to be repugnant with that, which is said that we are iustified freely (For if faith be offered first of the man, he can not seme to be iustified freely) we must remember that euen faith it selfe is geuen of God: and this he proueth by many testimonies. But this thing our Pigghius can not abide. For he derideth vs as often as we say, that faith is had by the breathing of the holy gost. For he saith y it is wonderfull y the holy gost wil haue his abiding & worke in the which do not as yet beleue. The same Origen vpon Leuiticus in his 3. booke & 3. chap. The holy sicle, sayth he, representeth our faith. For if thou shalt offer faith vnto Christ, as a price vnto the immaculate ramme offered up for a sacrifice, thou shalt receiue remission of sinnes. Here also we haue expessedly, that remission of sinnes is obtayned by y faith (I say) which is directed vnto Christ, deliuered vnto death and sacrificed for vs. There can nothing be more manifest the these testimonies which Origen hath brought for vs. But these me are so obstinate, that they wil not be led from y opinion which they haue once take in hand to defend, although thou bring neuer so gret light with the, least they should seme to any of theirs to haue defended an il cause.

Cyprian beside those thinges, which we haue spoken of the coniunction of faith with a good life writeth also in his 3. booke to Quirinus, that faith onely profiteth, and that we are able so much to performe as we do beleue. The first part of this sentence pertayneth vnto the third article of this question: but the latter serueth very much for that which we are now in hand with. It is a wonderfull saying doubtles, that so great is the force of faith, that by it we are able to do whatsoeuer we will. And yet did not Cyprian thinke it sufficient absolutely to pronounce this, but hath also confirmed it by many and sundry testimonies of the scriptures.

As touching Basilus and Gregorius Nazianzenus that shal suffice which I haue before cited. Chrysostome in his sermon, which he hath entituled, de fide, lege natura, & spiritu, sayth, that euen faith is of it selfe able to saue a man. And for an example he bringeth forth the thief, who he sayth onely confessed and beleued. But workes, sayth he, alone can not saue the workers without faith. After that he compareth workes done without faith with the reliques of dead men. For dead carcases, sayth he, although they be clothed with precious and excellent garments, yet draw they no heat out of them. So (sayth he) they which want faith although they be decked with excellent workes, yet are they by them nothing holpen. And the same saith vpon the epistle vnto the Romanes, vpon those wordes of Paul, But the righteousness which is of faith, Thou seest (sayth he) that this is chiefly peculiar vnto faith, that we all treading vnder foote the complaints of reason, should enquire after that which is aboue nature, and that the infirmity of our cogitations being by the vertue and power of God caste away we shoulde embrace all the promises of GOD. Here we see that by faith wee obtaine the promises of God: and although by it we assent vnto all that whiche is contained in the holpe Scriptures, yet it peculiarly hath a regard vnto the promises of God. This is also to be considered that he saith, that the infirmity of our cogitations in beleuing is by the vertue and power of God cast away. For this maketh agaynst them which contend that this is done by humane strengthes: as though we should haue faith of our selues and that as though it goeth before iustification. The same Chrysostome vpon the 29. chapiter of Genesis in his 54. homely. This (sayth he) is the true faith not to geue hede vnto those thinges which are seene, although they seme to be agaynst the promise, but onely to consider the power of him that promiset. Let the well consider this, which will haue vs to haue a regard not onely to the power and promises of God, but also chiefly to our own preparations. And expounding these wordes in Genesis. Abraham beleued God &

Workes
dead without faith.

So lone as a man bele-ueth he is iustified.

We must appeale vnto
the scrip-
tures.

it was imputed vnto him vnto righteousness, let vs also, saith he, learne, I beseech you, of the patriarch of God to beleue his sayings, and to trust vnto his promises, & not to serch them out by our owne cogitations but to shew a great gratitude. For this can both make vs iust, and also cause vs to obtayne the promises. Here also are two thinges to be noted. The one is that we are made iust by sayth, the other that by the same we obtayne the promises: which two thinges our aduersaries stoutly deny. The same father vpon these wordes of Paul vnto Timothe, Of whome is Hymeneus, and Alexander, which haue made shipwracke as concerning sayth, So, (sayth he) he which once falleth away from the sayth, hath no place to stay himselfe, or whether to go. For the head being corrupted and lost, what use can there be of the rest of the body? For if sayth without workes be dead, much more are workes dead without sayth. Here is to be noted that this is an argument a minori, that is, of the lesse. For he sayth, that workes are more dead without sayth, then is sayth without workes. The same author in his sermon de verbis Apostoli, vpon these wordes of the Apostle, Having one and the selfe same spirite of sayth, For it is impossible (sayth he) it is doubtles vnpossible, if thou liue vnpurely, not to wauer in faith. By this we see how great Chrysostome thought the coniunctiō to be between faith & good workes. The same father expounding these wordes of the Apostle, do we the destroy the law by faith? God forbid, yea rather we confirme the law. So soone as (sayth he) a man beleueth, straight way he is iustified. Wherefore sayth hath confirmed the will of the law, whilst it hath brought to an ende that for which the law did all things. How the doth Pighius say that sayth is only the foundaciō, & therefore is very farre from the perfection of iustification? As to what purpose is that, that after sayth he putteth so many degrees and meanes by which we come vnto iustification. For Chrysostome speaketh farre otherwise, y a man is iustified straight way so lone as euer he beleueth. Farther he attributeth vnto sayth even this also, that it maketh men iust, when as the law was not able to performe that, although it by many wayes endeavored it selfe therunto. Moreover when he expoundeth these wordes, They being ignorant of the righteousness of God, and going about to establish theyr owne righteousness, are not subiect vnto the righteousness of God. This righteousness of God (sayth he) he calleth the righteousness of sayth, which is wholly geuen by grace from above, and not for our labours. And vpon these wordes: Behold I put in Sion a stone of offence. Thou seest the (sayth he) that sayth hath with it confidence and security. Here he manifestly appointeth a perticular sayth and a certainty touching the remission of sinnes: which thing our aduersaries so much resist. Farther when he expoundeth that saying in the 11. chapter, And if they abide not in theyr incredulity they also shall agayn be grafted in. If sayth, sayth he, could graft thee, when thou wast a wild olive tree, into a good olive tree, it can also restore them into theyr owne good olive tree. Here also the power to be grafted into Christ by iustification, and the power to restore them which are cut of, is attributed vnto sayth. I could now passe over to Ierome, if there were not somewhat which calleth me backe agayn vnto Chrysostome. For the selfe same man writeth, that sayth only is not sufficient vnto saluation. And such sentences are oftentimes read in the Fathers: which our aduersaries continually wrest agaynst vs. Although to speake the trouth such an obiection is no such a manner of weapō, that it nedeth so greatly to be feared. For it may easely be answered in one word. For he sayth not, that faith is not sufficient vnto iustification, but only vnto saluation. For sayth is of it self sufficient vnto iustification. But after we are once iustified, it is not inough to the obteynement of saluation to say, I beleue. We must put to also an holy life & good workes: for by them, as it were by certayne degrees God bringeth vs to felicitie. And after this manner we may interpret all the sentences of the Fathers which seme to tend this way. And if in case theyr wordes (as sometimes it happeneth) will not beare such an exposition, then as it is most right we will appeale from them writing negligently vnto the selfe same fathers writing in an other place more soundly and more catholically: as did woman in times past, which appealed from Phillip being downe vnto the selfe same Phillip being sober.

Ierome vpon the epistle vnto the Galatians vpon these wordes, And we knowing that man is not iustified by the workes of the law, but by the fayth of Iesus Christ, sayth, That all the old fathers were iustified by the selfe same fayth in Christ, by which we are now at this day iustified. And this sentence he confirmeth by induction of many examples: first he reckoneth by Abraham, for of him he sayth Christ thus spake. He saw my day, he saw it and reioysed: after him he maketh mencion of Moses: for of him he sayth, it is thus written in the epistle vnto the Hebrzewes, that he counted the reproches of Christ greater riches then the treasures of Egypt: and that he refusing to be in the court of Pharao did chuse rather to embrace the crosse of Christ. And he addeth that Iohn Euangelist in his 12. chapiter most manifestly teacheth, that all those thinges whiche Esay hath put in writing touching the glory of God, when he saw the Lord sitting vpon an high throne lifted vp, are to be vnderstand of the sonne of God. He addeth moreover out of the epistle of Iudas, that the Lord Iesus Christ deliuered the people of Israell out of Egypt, and after that smote the vnbeleneers. In which place I very much meruaile that Ierome, a man otherwise excellēt in the Greke tounge, turned it thus the Lord Iesus Christ, when as in our text is had only this word Lord: vnles we will suppose that his exemplar was differing from that which we now vse. Which I speake not as though I doubted, whether those thinges whiche at that time happened, were done by Christ the sonne of God or no. For Iohn sayth, No man hath sene God at any time: but the sonne which is in the bosome of the Father, he hath declared him. Wherefore whatsoeuer is vttered vnto men touching thinges diuine, is vttered by the sonne of God, who hath most truly geue him selfe vnto mankind a faithfull interpreter of God his father. And Paul in his first epistle vnto the Cor. the 10. chap. sayth, They dranke of the spirituall rocke following the: And that rocke was Christe. Also, Let vs not tempt (sayth he) Christ as certayne of them tempted him. The same Ierome vpon y epistle vnto the Galathians, where he reckoneth by the fruites of the spirite, when he cometh vnto faith, thus writeth, If charity be absent, sayth also departeth away together with it. These wordes manifestly declare, that his iudgement was, that true sayth cannot be deuied from charitie: which thing we also teach and defend. But Pighius with his, hisseth at it, and crieth out against it: but let him gruntle as much as he will, it sufficeth vs that this doctrine agreeth both with the scriptures and with the fathers.

All the fathers were saue by fayth in Christ.

Whatsoe-uer hath ben vttered vnto
men touching thin-
ges diuine,
hath bene vttered by the sonne of
God.
Faith is not seperated
fro charity.

Ambrose expounding these wordes out of the Epistle vnto the Romanes. For it is one God which iustifieth circumcision by fayth: Because (sayth he) there is but one God, he hath iustified all men after one and the selfe same maner, forasmuch as nothing causeth merite and dignitie, but fayth. And after ward vpon these wordes, Therefore by fayth according to grace, that the promise might be firme vnto all the seede. The promise (saith he) cannot be firme vnto all the seede, that is, vnto all manner of men of what nation so euer they be, except it be by faith. For the beginning of the promise is of fayth, and not of the law, for they which are vnder the law are guiltie: but the promise cannot be geuen vnto them that are guiltie: and therefore they ought first to be purified by faith that they may be made worthy to be called the sonnes of God, and that the promise may be firme. And towarde the beginning of the 5. chapter, vpon these wordes, Being iustified by fayth we haue peace towarde God, Fayth (saith he) and not the law causeth vs to haue peace with God. For it reconcileth vs vnto God, when our sinnes are taken away which had before made vs enemies vnto God. And afterwarde vpon these wordes, The law of the spirite of life. It is fayth, (sayth he) which iustifieth them that flye vnto it to remit vnto them, that which the law helde them guiltie of, that liuing vnder faith, they might be free from sinne. And in his 2. booke vpon the Gospell of Luke he saith, that Peter wepte not, but when the Lord had looked backe vpon him. And he addeth that the Lord brought forth in him both repentance, and the power to weape.

But Augustine when he entreateth of this matter seemeth to be in his owne field, so that to hunt in him for testimonies touching this controuersie, is, as the common saying is, to seeke water in the sea. Notwithstanding it shal not be strange from our purpose to picke somewhat out of him also. In the sermon of the Lord vpon the mountaine, touching the wordes of the Gospell in Mathew in his 7. Sermon towarde the end: If thou presume of thine owne worke, a reward (sayth he) is rendred vnto thee, and not geue vnto thee by grace. I demaund now, Beluest thou, o sinner? I be-

Cap. II

A Commentarie vpon the

leue. What beleuest thou? that thy sinnes may by him freely be forgiven thee? Then hast thou that which thou beleuest. In his p̄face vpon the 31. Psalme. Thou hast done no good: and yet remission of sinnes is geuen thee. Thy workes are considered, and they are all found nought. If God should render vnto these woorkes that which is dew, doubtles he should condemne thee. And in his booke de Spiritu & Litera the 12 chapter. We gather that a man is not iustified by the rules of good life, but by the fayth of Iesus Christ. And in his booke agaynst the 2. epistles of the Pelagians in his 3. booke and 5. chapter. Our fayth (sayth he) that is, the catholike fayth discerneth the iust from the vniust, not by the law of workes, but euen by the law of fayth. And Augustine and Alp̄ius in his 106 epistle, of righteousnes is of fayth whereby we beleue that we are iustified, that is, that we are made iust by the grace of God thorough Iesus Christ our Lord. The same father agaynst Pelagius and Cælestius in his 1. booke and 10. chap. It is not inough (sayth he) to confesse what grace thou wilt, but that grace whereby we are perswaded, whereby we are drawen, and whereby euen that which is good is geuen. This maketh plainly agaynst the, which put I know not what generall grace, and will haue it to lye in euery mans power either to admitt or to refuse the same. But this grace whereby we are so perswaded, is nothing ells but fayth. Which fayth indeede is necessary to iustifie, but those woorkes which are done befoze we be iustified, do nothing auaille. For the same Augustine agaynst the 2. epistles of the Pelagians the 3. booke and 5. chapter. Euen as woorkes (sayth he) which seme good, are vnto the vngodly turned into sinnes. &c. And in his booke de Spiritu & Litera the 28. chapter. Euen as (saith he) there are certayne veniall sinnes, without which euen the iust men can not liue: and yet they hinder vs not from saluation. so are there certayne good woorkes, without which euen the most wicked men can very hardly liue: which woorkes yet nothing profite them vnto saluation. And that we should not thinke that this fayth whereby we are iustified is a thing common, and straying at pleasure, he addeth after ward in the 34. chap. Why is this man so instructed, that he is utterly perswaded, & an other not so? There are onely two thinges, which I thinke good to answer: O the deapth of the riches. &c. Also what is their iniquity with God? He that is displeased with this answer, let him seeke (saith he) men better learned, but let him beware of presumptuous persons. If we should geue credit vnto our aduersaries this had ben a very rude & blind doubt. For they would haue straight way answered at one word: that the one was perswaded, because he would: & the other was not perswaded because he would not. But Augustine considering & matter moze depely, namely, that it is god, which worketh in vs, both to wil & to performe according to his good wil, & perceiuing y Paul himselfe (being ouercome with y admiatio of this thing) made such exclamatio, thought it most mete rather to referre y whole matter vnto God: who distributeth vnto euery man y which semeth vnto hym good, & that without doubt iustly: although we see not y reasons of his iustice. Yea neither is it mete for vs to search them out: vnles we will haue that to happen vnto vs, which commonly happeneth vnto flies: which, being allured by the light of the candell and flying moze nigh vnto it, are oftentimes burnt with the flame thereof. The same Augustine de Predestinatione sanctorum in his 5. chapter repproueth Pelagius, for that he had sayned that common grace vnto all the saints: which he would haue to be nothing els but nature: which selfe thing our aduersaries also at this day do, when as they cry out that that grace is set forth as it were openly vnto all men, and that it lieth in euery mans power to receaue it so that he will. The same authoꝝ ad Vitalem in his 107. epistle, Vnto those, sayth he, whose cause is a like, with those vnto whome grace is geuen, vnto whome yet it is not geuen: that they vnto whome it is geuen might vnderstand how freely it was geuen vnto them. And in the selfe same place he playnly declareth, that it is God, which of vntwilling maketh vs willing, and taketh away our stony hart, and geueth vs a fleshy hart. This manifestly declareth, that it is fayth whereby we are iustified: and that God distributeth it according to his good will. The same father de dogmatibus ecclesiasticis in the 4. chap. (for that booke, whosoener was the authoꝝ thereof, beareth the name of Augustine) To be purged from sinnes, (saith he) God tarieth

Note this:
getly what grace we ought to confesse.

Woorkes
which seme
good are turned into sinnes.

What may be answered
to the cause why
one man is perswaded
and an other is not.

The grace
which the Pelagians
taught was set forth to be common
vnto all men
was nature.

Grace is geuen vnto
some, and is not geuen
vnto other
some.

not for our will, and in the 44. chapter, The holy ghost maketh vs to chuse, thinke, and consent vnto euery good thyng pertaynyng vnto saluation. And in his 13. booke and 17. chapiter de Trinitate, The word of the sonne of God, sayth he, toke vpon hym the nature of mā without any maner of merite. And after the selfe same maner also is the grace of God geuen vnto vs. This comparison is taken of the greater. For if that man which was made the sonne of God, obtayned the same without any merite: much moze are we without any merite either of cōgurity or of worthines receaued in to adoption. And vnto Simplicianus in the first booke and 2. question, who (sayth he) can lyue vprightly, and worke iustly, except he be iustified by fayth? Who can beleue, except he be touched by some calling, that is, by some testification of thyngs? Who hath in hys power to haue hys mynde touched wyth such a sight, whereby the wyll may be moued vnto fayth? And in his 61. sermon vpon Iohn: All synnes (sayth he) are comprehended vnder the name of infidelity. And he addeth, That fayth can not be wythout hope and charity. Which thing also he most playnly teacheth vpon the 31. Psalme. The same father in his 1. booke and 19. chapiter against the 2. epistles of the Pelagians, at large entreateth after what maner we are drawen of God, and amongst other thinges sayth, that the Pelagians would to much triumph ouer the Christians, if they had not the worde of drawing in the holy scriptures. But forasmuch as that word is expresse euē in the Gospell, they haue now vtterly no place whereunto to flye. There are infinite other places in Augustine which confirme thys sentence: whiche now for briesenes sake I thinke good to ouerpasse.

Cyrillus agaynst Iulianus in his 1. booke and 14. page sayth, The fayth of Abraham and ours is vtterly one and the same. And the same autho: vpon Iohn in the 3. booke and 31. chapiter expounding this sentence, This is the worke of God, that ye beleue in hym, whom he hath sent, For fayth (sayth he) bryngeth saluation, and grace iustificeth: but the commaundements of the lawe rather condemneth. Wherefore fayth in Christ is the worke of god. In these words we ought to note, that faith is it whereby is brought saluation: and that we are iustified by grace. And he declareth these things moze plainly vpon Iohn in his 9. booke and 32. chapiter vpon these words, And whether I go, ye know, and ye know the way. For we are iustified by fayth, and are made pertakers of the diuine nature by the participation of the holy ghost.

Leo in his 13. Sermon of the Passion of the Lord, The fathers (sayth he) beleued together wyth vs, that the blood of the sonne of God should be shed. Wherefore there is nothyng (dearely beloved) straunge in Christian religion from the old significations, nor at any tyme from the iust men that haue gone before vs, but that saluation is in the Lord Iesus Christ which was hoped for. This and many other like testimonies confute those chiefe which dare say, that Abraham was indeede iustified, but not by in Christ, but by fayth touching earthly promises. But the same autho: may seme to make agaynst vs in that that we say, that true fayth is not found without charity. For in his Sermon de Collect: & cleem: he thus writeth of Sathā: He knowing that God is denied not onely in wordes, but also in deedes, hath taken away charity from many, from whome he could not take away fayth: and possessing the field of theyr hart with the rootes of couetousnes, he hath spoiled of the fruit of good works those whom he hath not deprived of the confession of their lippes. These wordes if they be deeply considered make nothing at all agaynst vs. For we speake of a true, sound, and liuely fayth. But Leo vnderstandeth onely a certaine outward profession of faith. For when he would render a reason whereby it might appeare that fayth was not taken from them, he setteth forth onely an outward confession of the lippes: which we also graunt may consist without charity, & is oftentimes boasted of of many men which yet are most wicked. And after this maner I suppose are to be expounded such like testimonies if any happen in the fathers.

Gregory Bysshop of Rome in his 19. homely vpon Ezechuell. We come not, (sayth he) to fayth by workes: but by fayth we attayne vnto vertues. For Cornelius the Centurian came not vnto fayth by workes: but by fayth came vnto workes. For it is sayd, Thy prayers and almes, But how prayed he if he beleued not. But that he now knew not that the mediator was incarnate, by workes he came vnto a more fuller know-

It is not in our power to be touched with that sight whereby the will may be moued vnto faith.

The fathers were iustified by the fayth of those promises which we beleue, ledge. Whereby I would haue our aduersaries to know, y<sup>e</sup> sayth necessarily goeth before al good woorkes. For they contend y<sup>e</sup> moꝛall woꝛks, which are done of Ethniks and of men not yet beleuing in Chꝛist, are good. Which thing is in this place of Gregory confuted. The same authoꝛ in his 2. booke and 25. chapter de morali bus, speaking of the same thing thus wꝛiteth: Unles sayth be first gotten in our harts, all other thynges whatsoeuer they be can not in deede be good although they seeme good.

Bede vpon the 2. chapter of Iames: He onely beleueth truely, which by working excerciseth that which he beleueth. For sayth and charity can not be seperated a sonder. And this shall suffice as touching the Fathers.

But what these counsels Aphricanum, Mileuitanum, and Arausicanum teach concerning iustification, sayth, grace, and woꝛkes, we haue before at large declared in the first article. This onely wil I now adde, that our aduersaries, when they say, that God offreth his grace vnto all men and geueth his giftes vnto men that desire them and take hold of them, and forgeueth sinnes to them that do that which they ought to do, forasmuch as in the meane tyme they omit the breathing of the holy ghost, and the power of God which draweth vs, and the inward perswasion of the mynde, and all those things which are most chiefly required in this matter, are most manifestly against those counsels which we haue now cited. Howbeit I can not leaue vnspoken, y<sup>e</sup> in the counsell of Mence, which was celebrated vnder Carolus Magnus, in the 1. chapter is cited Gregory who thus wꝛiteth: He beleueth truely, which by working excerciseth that which he beleueth. Forasmuch therefore as we haue now hetherto spoken as touching this article, namely, that men are iustified by sayth in Chꝛist, and haue confirmed the same by scriptures, & haue ouerthrowen the obiections of our aduersaries, and alleadged testimonies of the Fathers to confirme our sentence, let vs now come vnto the third article.

The third article.
We are ius-tified by sayth onely.

Wherefore we say that iustification consisteth of sayth only. Which sentence all those places of scriptures pꝛoue, which teach that we are iustified freely: and those which affirme that iustification commeth without woꝛkes: and those also which put an antithesis oꝛ contrariety betwene grace and woꝛkes: All these places (I say) most truely conclude, that we are iustified by sayth onely: Although this word, Onely, be not red in the holy scriptures. But that is not so much to be weighed, for the signification of that word is of necessity gathered out of the. Further this also is to be noted, euen as we haue already before taught, that we affirme not that that sayth whereby we are iustified is in our myndes without good woꝛkes: although we say that it is it onely which taketh hold of iustification and remission of sinnes. So the eye can not be without a head, braynes, hart, liuer, & other partes of the body: and yet the eye onely apprehendeth colour and the light. Wherefore they which after this maner reason agaynst vs: Sayth, as ye say, iustifieth: But sayth is not alone, Ergo, Sayth alone iustifieth not, do fall into a fowle paralogisme. As if a man should thus conclude, onely the will willet. But the will is not alone in the mynde: Ergo, not the will alone wylleth. Here euen litle childꝛen may see the fallace oꝛ deceate, which they call, of composition & of diuision. And is it not a fowle thing that so great diuines should not see it? But here Smith, the light fosloth of diuinity, setteth himselfe agaynst vs. He of late cryed out euen till he was hoarse, that we falsely affirme that those places of the scripture, which testify that we are iustified gratis, that is freely, should signifie all one with this to be iustified by sayth onely. For this worde gratis is not all one wyth Solum, that is onely. Dull gramarians that we are, which without thys good maister could not vnderstand this aduerbe so much in vse. Howbeit thys Grammaticall Aristarchus, lest he shoulde seeme wythout some reason, to playe the fowle. It is wꝛitten (sayth he) in Genesis, that Laban sayde vnto Iacob, Forasmuch as thou art my kinsman, shalt thou serue me gratis? Here sayth he, put this word, Only, and thou shalt see, what an absurd kind of speach it will be. And in the booke of Pombers, The people sayd, that in Egipt they dyd eate fishes gratis. And in the Psalme, They haue hated me gratis. Here sayth he can not be put this aduerbe Only. Wherefore we rashly and very weakely conclude, that for that in the scriptures

Fallacia
compositionis & diuisionis.

Of the ad-
uerbe gratis
that is freely.

tures a man is sayd to be iustified gratis, he is therefore strayght way iustified by sayth only. But this sharpe witted man & one so wel exercised in y<sup>e</sup> concordance of the Bible should haue remembred, that this word, Gratis, signifieth without a cause, or without a reward and price. And therefore we rightly say, that iustification consisteth of sayth only, bycause it is sayd to be geuen gratis. For if workes were required, there should be a cause, or a reward or a price to the obteynement of righteousness. But soasmuch as Gratis, excludeth all these things, of y<sup>e</sup> word is rightly and truly inferred, only sayth. And those places which this man hath alledged are not hard to confute. For Laban sayth, Shalt thou serue me gratis, that is, without this condition that I should geue the any thing which is, only to take, and nothing to repay. And the Israelites when they sayd that they did eate fishes gratis, ment, that they did eate them with out any price payd. And this, They haue hated me gratis, is nothing ells then wout a cause, or without any my desert. Wherfoze if this word, Gratis, take away price & merite, soasmuch as Paul sayth, that we are iustified gratis, we must nedes vnderstand that it is done without any our price or merite. Which doubtles should not be true, if workes should be required as causes and merites. And bicause we once brought a place out of the epistle to the Galathians, But when as we knew that man is not iustified by the workes of the Law, except it be by the sayth of Iesus Christ, and of this particle, Except, concluded, that iustification consisteth of sayth only, this man according to his wisdom rageth and sayth, that this word, Except, is not all one with Only. For, sayth he, Ioseph in Genesis sayd vnto his bzyethern, Ye shall not se my face except ye bring your youngest brother: & Christ (sayth he) sayth, Except ye eate the flesh of the sonne of man, ye shall not haue life in you. Who (sayth he) wil say, that life is had only by the eating of the Sacrament: wherfoze (sayth he) these thinges can not be expounded by this word Only. Yes doubtles but they may. For in the booke of Genesis, what other thing ment Ioseph then to admonish his bzyethern, that they should vpon this condition only come a gayne into his sight, namely, if they brought they<sup>r</sup> youngest brother with them. And Christ in the 6. of Iohn entreated not of the eating of the Sacrament: for he had not as yet instituted it: wherfoze by this word to eate he signifieth to beleue. And he sayth that they which are of full age hereyn only haue life; if they eate hys flesh and drinke his bloud: that is, if they beleue that the sonne of God was deliue<sup>r</sup> for them for the remission of they<sup>r</sup> sinnes: And that this is the only way whereby they may be saued. But Smith addeth, that from Iustification is not to be excluded hope and charitie and other good workes. I graunt indeede, that those are not to be excluded from a man that is iustified. Notobeyt I do not attribute vnto them the power of iustifieng. For that which Paul saith y<sup>e</sup> a man is not iustified by workes, should not be true, if we should be iustified by any kind of workes. For if a man should say, that an artificer worketh not with his fingers, and after ward should confesse, that he vnto that worke which he doth wth fingers, he were wo<sup>r</sup>thy to be laughed at: although being conuict he would say, that he excepted only the litle finger and the third finger, and not the thombe, foze finger or middle finger. For he which b<sup>l</sup>eth th<sup>re</sup> fingers, vndoubtedly b<sup>l</sup>eth fingers. But why doth this man say, that hope and charitie are not excluded? Bycause (sayth he) euen ye your selues will haue vs to be iustified by a linely sayth: which doubtles is not without these. We graunt that these vertues are always ioyned with true sayth. But yet we do not in them put any part of our iustification befoze God. In this argument is a fallace or disceate of the Accident. For vnto those thinges which are adioyned is attributed that which is proper vnto that vnto whome they are adioyned. As if a mā should say, The Sunne is round and high, ergo, the roundnes and highe of the Sū do make vs warme. What workes then doth Smith exclude from iustification; when as he includeth hope and charitie? I suppose surely, he excludeth outward workes, fastinges, almes, and such like. But with what face can he so say or teach, when as he appointeth and defendeth workes preparato<sup>r</sup>y? But this sharpe witted man thinketh, that he hath trimely escaped, for that he sayth that these thinges are

Of this aduerbe Nisi
that is, except.

Fallacia
accidentis.

The Pelagians fled
vnto the common
grace of creation.

A strong reason coproue that faith onely
iustifieth.

are not of necessity required vnto iustification but only if they be present they are profitable vnto iustification. But this is worthy to be laughed at. For we haue before most playnly taught, that all workes which are done before iustification are sinnes. So far is it of that they can serue any thing vnto iustification. And if they should by any meanes profite vnto iustification, our gloryeng should then not be excluded. For we might glory, that we had done those thinges by whose helpe and ayd we were iustified. But of this (sayth he) we can not boast, for that they were done by a certayne grace of God preuenting. But this is chiefly to be marked, that these men attribute a great part of such workes vnto free will. And therefore in y be halfe at y least we may glory. Neither also shall y be true which the Apostle sayth what hast thou, that thou hast receaued? And agayne, why dost thou boast, as though thou hadst not receaued? Here some of the answer y we can not glory of this liberty of will, for that we haue it not of our owne. For it is God which hath endued vs with this faculty, and gaue vs free will when he created vs. But this is not sufficient to take away boasting. First, for that this were to fly vnto the comon grace of creation, which thing the Pelagians did: and by that meanes should at the lest may be left vnto vs a good vse of free will, of which we might glory. For although we haue the same of God by creation, yet the right vse thereof is ours: namely, to assent vnto God when he calleth vs, and to apply our selues vnto good workes which of God are set forth vnto vs. And therefore vtterly to take away all glorying, it is nedeful y we continually haue this in our mynde which Augustine hath admonished vs of in his booke de spiritu & Litera the 24. chapiter, That not onely the wyll and election of well doying is of God, because by creatiō he hath geuen choyce & free wyll, but also because by the perswasion of thynges sene he hath made vs both to wyll and to beleue: and that not onely by the outward preaching of the Gospell, but also by inward perswasion. For he doth not onely stirre by the hart, but also perswadeth draweth and boweth it to beleue: I graunt in dede, that it is the office of the will, to will and to embrace that which God offreth: for we do not will by vnderstanding or by memory, but by will. And yet for all that I doubt not, but that it is God which maketh vs to wil and to follow good things. Farther our aduersaries think that although workes concurre vnto iustification, yet is that notwithstanding true which the holy scriptures teach, namely, that we iustified freely. Because say they those workes are geuen of God, and are done of grace. If this refuge mought helpe, then had not Paul done well, when he toke away from ceremoniall workes the power of iustifying. For a Jew might say, Our fathers which in the old tyme were circumcised, and performed other obseruations of the law, did not the same by their owne naturall strengthes, but by the grace of God both helping them and stirring them by thereunto. Wherefore if other workes which were commaunded in the lawe coulde profite vnto iustification to merite it, as ye speake, of congruity, why coulde not ceremoniall workes do the same? Neither will this any thing helpe, to say, that Paul taketh not away from them the power iustifying, but onely after the comming of Christ. For he manifestly speaketh of Abraham, which was iustified by fayth, and not by circumcision, and bleseth a testimony of Dauid, of whome it is most certayne that he liued vnder the lawe. But whereas this man sayth that charity and hope can not be excluded, I would gladly know of hym, whether the workes of these vertues be iust or no. I know he will graunt that they are iust. What will he then answer vnto Paul, who vnto Titus sayth, Not by the workes of righteousness which we haue done. But I know these men fond deuises. They answer, that such workes also are excluded, if they be done by the law, and by free will without grace. But what nedeth to exclude that which can not be? For who will either loue God or hope in him without grace? Farther in what maner so euer they be done they can not serue to iustification: for we are iustified by grace, as it playnly appeareth by the holy scriptures. But betwene grace and workes is so great contrariety, that Paul sayth: If of grace, then is it not now of workes: and if of workes then is it not of grace. Neither ought these men to be so much displeased, for y<sup>e</sup> we vse this word, Only. For we necessarily conclude it of that which Paul sayth: First, that we are iustified by faith: and afterward addeth, without workes. How aptly we thus conclude, I will declare by a similitude in the 6. chapter of Deutronomy, if we followe the truth of the Hebrew, it is thus writtē, Thou shalt feare the Lord God and hym thou shalt serue. Here as thou seest wanteth this particule Only, yet because there followeth, Thou shalt not go after strange Gods, The seuenty interpreters haue thus turned that place, Thou shalt feare the Lord thy God, and hym onely shalt thou worship. These men, of the first proposition, being affirmatiue that God is to be worshipped, and of the other being negatiue, that strange Gods are not to be worshipped, concluded that God onely is to be serued. Whose authoritie should not be of so great waight with me, but that Christ himselfe hath cited that place in that sort. For thus he rebuked the deuil, Depart from me Sathan, for it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and hym onely shalt thou serue. Here we see that to disproue the worshipping which is geuen vnto a creature this particule only, is necessary: which although it be not had in the Hebrew yet is it necessarily gathered out of it. Now when as we also after this maner reason, why should these men so much be offended? Let them consider that the best and the most auncest Fathers abhorred not from this word. It is a thing ridiculous to see with how colde toyes and poze shifts Smith goeth about to resist them. First he sayth that they ment nothing els but to repress men, that they should not waie insolēt. But let Smith in one word according to his god will come aunswere me, whether the Fathers spake this truely or falsely? If they spake it truely, then make they on our side: and why doth this man so much impugn it? But if falsely, this god end nothing helpeth the to repress the insolency of men. For euen as euill is not to be committed, that god may ensew, so false doctrine is not to be affirmed, to ouerthrow other false doctrine. But this man undoubtedly is so farre besides him selfe that he sayth that this was lawfull for the Fathers to do: For in his booke de votis, which not many yeares ago he set abrode, he sayth that Augustine in his booke de Bono viduitatis, whereas he writeth that their matrimonies which had bowed a bow of virginity or of sole life are true mariages & not adulteries wrote the same for no other end but to perswade Iuliana the widow vnto whome he wrote the booke, that mariages in generall are not euill. And so in Gods name he confesseth, that Augustine setteth forth one false doctrine, to ouerthrow an other false doctrine. And with the like wisdom in the same booke he sayneth, that Clemens Alexandrinus wrote that Paul had a wife (which he thinketh to be most false) only to proue that marriage is god and honozable. And if it be lawfull so to mingle true thinges with false, and to confound all thinges, when then shall we beleue the Fathers? What thing can at any time be certaine vnto vs, but that we may be deceaued by them? Farther he sayneth that Paul excluded from iustification only workes of the law. But this we haue before abundantly confuted and haue taught that the reasons of Paul are generall. Yea the Fathers saw euen this also: For Augustine in many places affirmeth, that Paul entreateth not only of ceremoniall workes, but also of morall workes. But bycause the authoritie of Augustine is I can not tell by what meanes suspected vnto our aduersaries, let vs see what Jerome sayth. He vnto Celsiphon agaynst the Pelagians vpon these wordes, By the workes, of the law no flesh shall be iustified, thus writeth, By cause thou thinkest this to be spoke of the law of Moses only and not of all the commandments which are conteyned vnder this one name law, the selfe same Apostle sayth, I consent vnto the law of God. There are others also of the Fathers which teach the same: but I now ouerpasse them. Let it suffice to shew that this other sayned iustification of Smith is vaine and trifling.

Thirdly (he sayth) that they ment to exclude workes, as he calleth them, penal namely, those workes I suppose which men repentant do but to shew how ridiculous this is also, shall neede no long declaration. For first such workes were required of men, not that by them they should be iustified before God, but only to ap-proue

The fathers vsed
this word,
Only.

Jerome also was of the opinion that not only ceremo-
niall workes
are to be excluded from iustification

Cap. II.

A Commentarie vpon the

God requireth more of men then
faith.

The right-
eousnes
which clea-neth vnto
vs constiteth not of faith only.

proue themselves vnto the Church: namely, lest they should by a fained and disbled repentance seke to be reconciled. Farther it is not very likely that Paul spake of any such workes. For they were not at y<sup>e</sup> time in vse. In dede Ambrose when he excludeth workes fro iustification, hath hereunto once or twice a respect. But we ought not so much to consider what one or two of y<sup>e</sup> Fathers say, but what agreeth with the holy scriptures. Smith addeth moreouer, that it is certayne that God requireth much more of vs then faith. For in Marke it is thus written, Repent ye and beleue. Here (sayth he) vnto sayth is adioyned repentance. And in an other place He that beleueth and is Baptised shalbe saved. He addeth also that in the epistle to the Ephesians: the Church is sayd to be sanctified with the lauacre of water in the word. And y<sup>e</sup> Peter in his 3. chap. of his first epistle sayth, That Baptisme hath made vs safe: Ierome also thus writeth vpon the first chapter of Esay, The lauacre of regeneration only remitteth sinnes. Behold (sayth he) iustification and remission of sinnes is ascribed not only vnto sayth, but also vnto the sacraments. As touching the first we graunt that Christ requireth more of vs then faith. For who doubteth, but that he will haue men that are iustified to liue vprightly, and to exercise them selues in all kindes of vertues, otherwise they shall not come vnto eternall saluation. But these are fruites of sayth, and effectes of iustification, and not causes. But as touching y<sup>e</sup> sacraments, we haue many times taught how iustification is to be attributed vnto them. For they are in the same respect vnto it, as is the preaching of the Gospel and the promise concerning Christ which is offered vnto vs, vnto saluation.
And very oftentimes in the Scriptures that which belongeth vnto the thing is ascribed vnto the Sacrament or signe. And bicause Baptisme promisseth remission of sinnes by Christ, and signifieth it, and sealeth it in them which are washed, therfore Ierome of all other sacraments attributeth this vnto it only. Wherefore the wordes of the Fathers ought nothing to moue vs when as they thus write. That sayth alone is not sufficient vnto saluation. For they vnderstand that of eternall saluation, vnto which we come not, except some fruite follow our sayth. But of they<sup>r</sup> sayings we ought not to gather, y<sup>e</sup> a man is not iustified by faith only. And though at any time those selfe same fathers seme to referre they<sup>r</sup> wordes vnto iustification, yet are they to be vnderstand, that they<sup>r</sup> meaning was to expresse the nature of the true and iustifying sayth. For it in very dede is neuer alone, but hath euer hope and charitie and other good workes as companions. Sometimes also by iustification they vnderstand the righteousness which cleaueth vnto vs: of which it is mosse certayne that it consisteth not of sayth only. They thinke also, that this maketh a gainst vs, for that Paul writeth vnto the Romanes. By hope ye are made safe: Reyse they, that hope is there taken for the last regeneration, which we hope we shall one day obteyne in our countrey. For the Apostle a litle before spake of it. And vndoubtedly we possesse that saluation onely in hope not as yet in very dede. If there be any paradiure, who this most iust and most true solution wil not satisfy, let him follow the interpretation of Origen. For he vpon that place sayth, that hope is there put for faith: which is no rare thing in the holy scriptures.

But they haue found out yet an other fond deuise, whereby as much as lieth in them they go about to lenise this worde, Only, which is so often bled of the Fathers, namely, that sayth only hath the beginning, and as it were the first degree of iustification, which afterward is made perfect and full when other good workes come vnto it. But how bayne this is Paul himselfe sufficiently teacheth.
For he doth not onely say that we are iustified by faith onely, but also he addeth, without workes. Farther this also maketh against these men which is written in the 15. chapter of wisdom, To know is full righteousness. In which place it is a sport to see, how our Smith writeth himselfe. First he dareth not deny the sentence for he counteth that booke for canonicall: but as he is of a sharpe witte, at the last this he sayneth: That God is not knowen by sayth onely, but also by loue. But who euer would so say, but this man onely? Undoubtedly by loue we know not, but by loue we loue. But that which is spoken in the booke of wisdom (whiche
yet

yet with me is not of so great authority) Christ himselfe hath most manifestly testified in the Gospel, saying, This is eternall life, that they know thee the onely true God. Although of this saying also of our sauioz, Winchester hath fained a new deuise I know not what: namely, that to know God is not properly eternall life, although it some what helpe forwarde thereunto. But forasmuch as neither the Fathers, nor Paul, nor Christ himselfe can satisfy these men, there is no hope that we shall any thing preuaile with our reasons.

They adde moreouer. That the fathers say, that onely faith iustificeth, that is, is the principallest thing whereby we are iustified. I confesse indeede, that only, sometime signifieth, principall. But this sense can not agree with Pauls purpose. For if charity be compared with faith, charity is excellenter and better as Paul sayth. Wherefore if both of them iustify (as these men will haue it) then shoulde charity haue the chiefeest part and not faith. And this also is a great let vnto these men, which I haue oftentimes spoken of, that Paul so ascribeth iustification vnto faith, that he sayth, without workes.

This word Only, some times signifieth principall.

But Augustine say they, vnto Simplicianus writeth, That by faith we beginne to be iustified. Vnto this we may answere two maner of wayes: first that that beginning is such, that in very dae it hath the very full and whole iustification. So that Augustines meaning is, that we are iustified, so soone as we haue faith. Or if this please them not, we will say as the truth is indeede, that Augustine ment of the righteousness which cleaueth in vs.

They cite also Ambrose bpō the 5. chapiter vnto y Galathians, In Christ. &c. For (saith he) we haue nede of faith onely in charity to iustification. Behold say they vnto iustification we haue no lesse nede of charity then of faith. But they are far deceaued: For by those words Ambrose ment nothing els, but to make a distinction betwene true faith and a vaine opinion. Wherefore he sayth, that we haue nede of faith only, namely, which is ioyned with charity.

But Ierome vpon the 5. chapiter vnto the Galathians sayth, That it is charity onely which maketh cleane the hart. What other thing els shall we here aunswere, but y this his saying if it be vrged roughly & simply, is false: For it is faith also which purifieth the hartes, as it is written in the Actes of the Apostles. And Paul to Timothe sayth, Charity out of a pure hart, good conscience &c. By which words it is playne that the hart must of necessity first be pure, before charity can come. Wherefore we will interprete that sentence by the effect, and as touching our knowledge: For then is it most certayne, that we are regenerate and haue a cleane hart, when we be endued with charity. After this maner also haue we before expounded this, Many sinnes are forgiven her, because she hath loued much. And by the selfe same meanes also may that saying of Augustine in his booke de natura & Gratia the 38. chapiter be answered vnto: It is the charity of God (saith he) by which onely he is iust, whosoever is iust. But this seemeth vnto me best, to vnderstand such sayings of the fathers of that righteousness which cleueth vnto vs. For that consisteth not onely of faith, but also of all vertues and good workes. But because amongst all vertues charity is the principallest, therefore the fathers sometimes attribute righteousness vnto it onely. And that which our aduersaries haue most vniustly vsurped, to expound this word Only, for principall or chiefe, may in this place most iustly serue vs. For here we entreat not of that iustification which is had by imputation, but of that which we attayne vnto after regeneration. Wherefore in this our proposition we exclude not from a man that is iustified hope, charity, and other good workes: but this only we say, that they haue not the power, or cause, or merite of iustificing. And when we say that a man is iustified by faith only, we say nothing ells vndoubtedly, but that a man is iustified only by the mercy of God and by the merite of Christ only: which we can not apprehend by any other instrument then by faith only. Neither must we geue place vnto our aduersaries, not to vse this worde, Only: though they cry out neuer so much that of it springeth great offence, and mens mindes are by this perswasion somewhat weakened

Why our righteousness is attributed sometimes vnto charity.

We must not leane of from vsing this worde Only.

Cap. II. A Commentarie vpon the

ned in the exercise of vertues. For by sound doctrine we may easily remedy these discommodities. For we alwayes inculcate, that it is not true iustification, or true sayth, which wanteth the fruites of good life. But we see the subtle and craftie deuise of these men: For if we should say, that a man is simply iustified by sayth, leauing out this word Only. Straight way they would adde of theyr own, that a man indeede is iustified by faith, but yet is he no les iustified by hope, and charity, and other good woorkes. For this selfe same cause the Catholikes in times past would not permit vnto the Arrians this word, ὁμοούσιον: that is, of like substance: because they would straight way haue sayd, That the sonne indeede by appellation or name is God like vnto the father, & in a maner equall vnto him, but yet not of one and the selfe same nature and substance. Wherefore they did with tooth and naile defend and keepe still this word ὁμοούσιον, that is, of one and the selfe same substance, as a word most apt to expresse the truth of that controuersie: which they might also by good right doe, and chiefly for that they saw that that word was of necessity concluded out of the holy scriptures: out of which also is most evidently concluded thys our word, Only: and is thought of vs a word most mete to confute the errors of those which would haue iustification to come of woorkes.

Like example.

Howeouer Gardiner bishop of Winchester counted this our proposition to be absurd: and agaynst it amongst other arguments vled this, and it is to me moze then wonderfull, how much it is esteemed of certayne Papists his parasites: The righteousness (sayth he) that is geuen vs of God whereby we are iustified pertayneth to all the faculties of the mind, or rather to the whole man. Ergo, we are not iustified by sayth only: For, that pertayneth only vnto the higher part of the soule. Here gentle reader, lest thou shouldest be deceaued, lieth hidden a double fallace or discreate. For first graunt that that righteousness which is geuen vnto vs pertayneth vnto the whole man, and vnto all the faculties of the mind. Shall it therefore follow, that that righteousness which is offered of God, is not apprehended by sayth only: Andoubtedly the meate which we eate is distributed into all the members, and into the whole body. And yet is it receaued with the mouth only, and not with the whole body. Farther the disputation is not about any righteousness which cleaueth vnto vs, which in very dede is dispersed into the whole man, but about iustification, which is the forgiveness of sinnes. But this righteousness hath no place or seate in our mindes, but in God only by whose will only our sinnes are forgiven vs.

The righteousness whereby we are iustified is in God and not in vs.

But now forasmuch as this article hath ben sufficiently defended agaynst the cavillations of importunate men, we will omit this, and briefly declare, that the auncient fathers abhorred not from thys worde Only, which our aduersaries so much detest.

Origen vpon the epistle vnto the Romanes, vpon these wordes: Thy glorying is excluded, By what law? by the law of dedes? No. But by the law of sayth. For we suppose that a man is iustified by sayth without the woorkes of the law: The iustification (sayth he) of sayth only is sufficient, that a man only beleuing should be iustified, although he haue done no good woorkes at all: and so example he bringeth forth that thiese which was crucified together with Christ: and that woman vnto whome Christe answered, Thy sayth hath made thee safe. Afterward he objecteth vnto him selfe, that a man hearing these thinges mought be made secure and contemne good woorkes. But he answereth, that he which after iustification liueth not vprightly casteth away the grace of iustification. For no man (sayth he) receaueth forgiveness of sinnes to vse licence to sinne. For pardon is geuen not of fautes to come, but of sinnes past. When which sentence can nothing be sayd moze conforable vnto our doctrine.

Ciprian to Quirinus in his 42. chapter, Sayth (sayth he) only profiteth and looke how much we beleue, so much are we able to doe.

Basilus in his sermō de Humilitate writeth, that a man is iustified by faith only.

Hilarius also vpon Matthew the 8. chapter. Sayth (sayth he) only iustificeth.

Ambrose vpon the 3. chapter vnto the Romanes vpon these wordes: Being iustified freely: Because (sayth he) they woorking nothing, nor rendering turne for turne,

are

are by faith onely iustified by the gift of God. The same author vpon these wordes: According to the purpose of the grace of God, So Paul (sayth he) sayth it was decreed of God, that the law ceasing, onely faith should be required vnto saluation. And straight way after, God hath ordeyned, that men should by faith onely without labour and any obseruation be iustified before God. The same father vpon the .1. chapter of the .2. epistle vnto the Corinthians. It is appoynted (sayth he) by God that he which beleueth in Christ should be saued without workes by faith onely. And he hath the like sentences in his booke de vocatione Gentium.

Out of Chrysostome I could bring a greate many places to confirme this sentence: but of them I will picke out onely a few. Vpon the 3. chapter vnto the Romanes vpon these wordes, Thy glory is excluded, In this (sayth he) is set forth the might and power of God, in that he hath saued, iustified, and wroughte glorification by faith onely without workes. And at the beginning of the 4. chapter, That a man being destitute of workes should be iustified by faith, peradventure it may appeare to be well. But that a man being adorned with vertues & good workes, is not for all iustified by the, but by faith only, this assuredly is wonderfull. Hereby our aduersaries may understand, that although faith haue as companions hope, and charitie, and other good workes (which thing cannot be doubted of Abraham) yet they serue nothing to the apprehending of righteousness. And vpon the .10. chapter vpon these wordes, They being ignorant of the righteousness of God and going aboute to establish theyr owne righteousness, were not subiect vnto the righteousness of God, He calleth (sayth he) the righteousness of God that righteousness which is of faith. Bycause we are without labour by faith only iustified thorough the gift of God.

Of Augustine I will speake nothing. For he is full of this agaynst the Pelagians, and any man may easely by his writings proue this sentence.

Hesichius vpon Leuiticus in his first booke and second chapter, Grace (sayth he) is comprehended by faith only: not of workes: Which selfe thing in a maner he hath in his 4. booke and 14. chapter.

Theophilactus vpon the 3. chapter vnto the Galathians, expoundeth these wordes Bycause by the law no man is iustified before God: Now (sayth he) Paul playnly declareth, that faith euen alone hath in it the power to iustifie.

Phocius vpon the first chapter vnto the Romanes, Iustification (sayth he) consisteth of faith only.

Acacius in Oecumenius vpon the first chapter vnto the Romanes. He hath (sayth he) by faith onely raysed vp and quickened vs being mortified by sinnes.

Bernardus in his 22. Sermon vpon the Canticles By faith only (sayth he) he that is iustified shall haue peace. And in the selfe same sermon, That wanteth (sayth he) of grace, what soeuer thou ascribest vnto merites. Grace maketh me iustified freely.

Whome these things suffice not let him reade Genuadius vpon the 5. chap. to the Romanes: Cirillus in his 9. booke 3. chapter vpon Iohn: Theodoretus vpon the 5. chapter to the Romanes. Didimus vpon the 2. chapter of Iames Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall history the 3. booke and 27. chap. Ciprian (or whatsoener he were, in his exposition of the sumbole: Liranius vpon the third to the Galathians: The ordinary glosse vpon the epistle vnto Iames: Haimo vpon the Gospell of Circumcision: Sedulius vpon the 1. and 2. chapters vnto the Romanes. Thomas vpon the 3. to the Galathians Bruno vpon the 4. vnto the Romanes. Arnobius vpon the 106. Psalme. Now I thinke I haue spoken inough as touching this question. Wherefore I will now returne to the exposition of the wordes of the Apostle.

The twelfth Chapter.

Besech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye offer by your bodies a liuing sacrifice, holy, and acceptable vnto God, whiche is your reasonable worshipping.

I beseech you therefore brethren.] Whisitions are accustomed to cleanse a sore or wound of all matter and corruption, and then to anoint it with soft and gentle medicins. So Paul hath first by a sharp disputacion confuted the arrogancy of the, which had confidence to be iustified by the lawe or by philosophy, and that through their owne strengthes, now therefore he turneth himselfe to perswade to an holy life and to good woorkes, whereby we are renewed, and are made perfect by a righteousnes cleauing vnto vs. Wherefore first he establisheth the doctrine of ius-tification: and then that being finished he exhorteth to the fruits and endeuors of good woorkes. Let the aduersaries learne at the lest way by this methode of the A-postle, that good woorkes go not before iustification. For first we must be regenerated, & after ward bring forth the fruites of regeneration. And this part is not to be neglected, for it is added vnto the former as a fruit thereof. For why doth God iustify vs, and regenerate vs by faith in Christ? Doth he it to the end, we shoulde abide still in sinnes? Ans. Fulvius when he had called backe his sonne from the retine of Catiline, and was now ready to kill him, sayd, I begat thee not to Catiline, but to thy countrey. So God hath not regenerated vs vnto sinne, but to innocency and holynes. Wherefore Paul in this chapiter desireth vs, and that for Gods sake, to lead a life woorthy his benefits. But what those benefits are, we before at large haue declared. For when we lay in sinnes, and could by no meanes rayse vp and heale our selues, he of his mere mercy iustified vs, for Chrestes sake. And to bring this to passe, he suffered his only & dearly beloued son for our sakes to be deliuered vnto y death, & that vnto a most shameful death, namely y death of the crosse. And so great was his goodnes towards vs, y before the foundations of the world were layd he elected vs and predestinated vs to eternall felicity. By these most excellent benefites of God towarde vs we are stirred vp to behaue our selues in such wo-thy and conuenient sort as those benefites require. The forme of this prayer is an obsecration. For he entermeth the mercyes of God, and desireth them for these mercyes sakes. And this forme of prayer is very necessary for the ministers of the Church. For Salomon sayth in his 8. chapiter of Proverbes, The poore man spea- kerh with obsecrations. But the rich man answereth thinges hard or rough. And the poore man therefore speaketh gently, and lowly, and by way of obsecration, for that he seeth that he wanteth fauour and authority, and by that meanes may easely be reiecte. And therefore he entermeth thinges holy and diuine, by which he thinketh he with whome he hath to do may most be moued. But the ministers of the Church although their dignity be great, yet for that to the world, as touchig the outward appearance they seeme abied, therefore they oftentymes fall to obse-crations. This worke of the ministers Paul declareth in the 2. to the Corinthisans the 5. chapiter. We are (sayth he) ambassadors for Christ, as though God did be- sech you through vs, we desire you in Chrestes steede that ye be reconciled vnto God.
 And in the same epistle in the 10. chapiter he sayth: Now I Paul my selfe beseech you by the goodnes and meekenes of Christ which when I am present amongst you, am base and humble. And in the fourth chapiter of the first to the Corinthisians, We are blas- phemed, and we beseech. And yet is not this sayd, as though the ministers haue not power earnestly to reprove, and sometymes sharply to chastice. For Paul sayth in the epistle to Philemon, Wherefore though I be very bold in Christ to commaund thee touching thy duty, yet for lones sake I rather beseech thee, though I be as I am, euen Paul aged, and euen now a prisoner of Iesus Christ. Sometimes also Paul vsed that seneri-ty. For in the Actes in the 10. chapiter he sayd, O thou sonne of the deuill full of de- ceat, and of all guile: how long peruerstest thou the strait wayes of the Lord? Behold the hand of the Lord is vpon thee, and thou shalt be blinde, and shall not see for a tyme.
 And in the fourth chapiter of the first to the Corinthisians, Will ye that I shall come vnto you with the rod, or with the spirit of lenity? And vnto the Galathians, O ye foo- lish Galathians. He also deliuered some to Sathan to the destruction of the fleshe.
 But thou wilt paradiuenture aske: when it is most mete to vse obsecrations, and when seuerer obiurgations? The prudent minister may deale in this matter as occasion

The forme of this prayer is in ob-
 secration.

It is meete for the ministers of the church to vse obse-crations vnto
 the people.

Ministers
 may also re-
 prove and sharply chasten and commaund.

When obse-crations are to be vsed,
 and when obiurgations

occasion serueth: with men obstinate, arrogant, and liuing without the feare of God, he must deale moze sharply. But vnto godly men and such as are weake and faynt harted, he must vse obsecrations. Nowbeit this is to be noted, that neither the lawe nor the Prophets vse obsecrations. For the lawe threatneth, and commaundeth, and speaketh with authority, and menaceth punishments if any transgresse. And the Prophets were interpreters of the lawe: and in maner had to do with them which were contaminated with impiety and all kindes of sinnes. And therefore I thinke are not found in the any such obsecrations. Neither did Christ, as farre as we can gather by the Gospels, vse them. For in him was a singular authority and dignity. Therefore he is sayd to haue taught with great authority and grauity, and not as the scribes and Phariseyes and he had oftentimes to do with hypocrites, and with most peruerse oppressors of the sinagoge. But Paul beseecheth vs, and that, as we haue shewed, not besides his office. Now it is our part neither to contemne him, nor God which speaketh in hym. For if we despise these that in such sort beseech vs, what punishment is it that we are not woorthy of? If we will haue our prayers to be hard of God, let vs not suffer these obsecrations to be in bayne. Moreouer by this kind of prayer we are taught, that monitions, obiurgations, and obsecrations, are not in bayne, (as many thinke) although the whole estate of our saluation be ascribed vnto the grace of God. For Paul as we heard, hath playnly taught, that it is not of him that willett nor of him that runneth, but onely of God that hath mercy: who yet now exhorteth and beseecheth vs. Doubtles whatsoever pertayneth to our conuersion is wrought by the grace of God, but therto it vseth sondry instruments, namely, the preaching of the gospel, admonitions, reprehensions and punishmentes. For by these meanes men are called agayne into the right way. Wherefore none of vs ought vnder this pretence to cease of from doing his office. Prea rather let vs admonish them that are fallen let vs pricke forward the slowe, and finally let vs exhort al men to holines: which thing we see Paul now presently doth. For although we our selues can not make our words of efficacy, yet ought we to referre the matter vnto God to vse them according to his most iust pleasure, cyther to the saluation or to the condemnation of them with whome we haue to do. Paul in this obsecration entermedleth a thing of most excellency, namely, the mercy of God: and that the greatnes and power thereof might the moze manifest appeare, he vseth the plurall number. I beseech you (saith he) by the mercyes of God. And what these mercyes were and of what sort he hath before declared in his discourse: and therefore there is no neede in this place of any new explication touching this matter. But let them which are studious in the holy scriptures note, that there are many effects of the mercy of God. And therefore Paul beseecheth by the mercyes of God, as mothers are wont, when their children are stubborne and will not be ruled, to beseech them by their breaſtes that gaue them sucke, and by their wombe which bare them for they set forth vnto them their chiefeſt benefites towardes them: that they bare them in their wombe: and after when they were borne nourished them with their breaſts, which offices although they were very paynfull yet by reason of the singular loue they seemed to the mother thinges swete. So here the Apostle besides infinite other benefites of God towardes men maketh mention of the mercyes of God: by which first we are regenerated in spirite: and after that by them we are both fed and sustayned in this way wherein we stand. In this heate of prayer the talke of Paul is inflamed & set on fire. For it manifestly appeareth that these words came not from the lippes onely, or were but spoken with the tonge, but they came wholly euen from the bottom of the hart. And which ought moze vehemently to moue vs, he requireth nothing against our owne commodities and profite, for he requireth nothyng els, but that we should leade a life woorthy our calling. Demas when he saw king Phillip very merry, and daunsing amongst the captiues, and obpraising vnto them their calamitye, sayde vnto hym, Seing that fortune hath put on thee, the person of Agamemnon, art thou not ashamed to behaue thy selfe like Thersites? Wherefore Paul requireth this, that soasmuch as not Fortune, but God himself hath put on vs not a perso, but the most true dignitie to be the mem-

The lawe and the prophets vse not obsecrations.

Christ also vseth not obsecrations.

Obsecrations are not in bayne, although our saluation dependeth vpon grace.

Many effects of the mercy of God.

Demas against Phillip.

bers of Christ, and his children, we should not shew our selues to be lost children and strangers from God.

What a sacrifice is.

Division of sacrifices.

It is lawful for vs to offer a sacrifice of thankes geuing, but not a sacrifice of expiation.

Why oblations were slayne.

In this sacrifice are sinnes to be killed.

The outward sacrifices were simboles of the inward sacrifice.

Why man is oftentimes in the scriptures called body & flesh.

Body is not here the name of nature, but of corruption.

The body of sinne.

Now will we declare what he particularly desireth. He desireth vs to offer our selues vnto God. And this oblation he saith shal haue the nature of a sacrifice. And that we may the readier vnderstand what Paul meaneth, it shall not be from the purpose to consider, what a sacrifice is. A sacrifice is a voluntary action, wherein we worship God, and offer vnto him somewhat, wherby we testifie his chiefe dignity and dominion, and our seruitude and submission towarde him. In this definition are expessed all the causes. The matter is the oblation: the forme is the action, not a naturall action, but y<sup>e</sup> which is done with election, and inspired, by the holy ghost: neither is it a politicall or economical action but a religious action: for that pertayneth to the worshipping of God. The end is to testifie our seruitude and submission towarde the so great highnes and dominion of God. Wherefore we by god right belong to his proper possession, which hath at the beginning created vs, and after ward when we were lost redeemed vs. And sacrifice is deuided according to his proprieties: so that one kind of sacrifice is called ευχαριστιον, that is, a sacrifice of thankes geuing: and an other is called ιλαστικον, that is a sacrifice of expiation or purging. That sacrifice which we ought to offer is not a sacrifice of expiation. For, that preheminance was geuen to Christ only, by the one only sacrifice of himselfe which he offered vpon the crosse to consummate & accomplish all things. But the geuing of thankes which we offer vnto God in this sacrifice is very excellent. And this sacrifice of thankes geuing is deuided by the matters about which it is occupied. For vnto God were offered either prayers, or first frutes, or some kind of life (as of the Israhelites) or finally some certayne oblations and offerings. And to this last part pertayneth, that which Paul in this place exhorteth vs vnto: for he willeth vs to make our selues oblations vnto God. Ambrose in this place demaun- deth, why oblations were in y<sup>e</sup> old sacrifices killed. And he putteth two causes: first, that they which sacrificed should vnderstand what they had deserued: secondly, that by that slaughter should be shadowed the death of Christ. Which two causes may serue vs also as touching this our kind of sacrifice. For it is necessary, that the death which sinnes haue brought vnto vs, we agayne rebound vnto sinnes, and that in our selues we kil wicked affects. And to do this, the death of Christ doth not a litle pricke vs forward. For if he would for our sakes in this sort die, how much more ought we for his sake with a ready mind to offer this sacrifice? And doubtles there is no other sacrifice more noble. For here we offer not outward thinges, but our selues. And Augustine in his booke de Ciuitate Dei sayth, that that outward sacrifice in the old time was a signe, whereby was signified this inward sacrifice, wherein we offer vnto God both our selues and all that we haue. Being therefore we now see that that whereunto Paul exhorteth vs is a sacrifice, and that a sacrifice of thankes geuing, wherein we offer vnto God all that we haue and also our selues, now let vs see how Paul describeth thys sacrifice.

Your bodies. ¶ When he nameth a Body, by the figure Synecdoche he vnderstandeth the whole man, which also is sometimes vnderstanded by this worde soule. For so is it written, that Iacob entred into Egypt with 70. soules. And the scriptures therefore oftentimes call man by the name of flesh, and of the body to put vs in mind of our infirmity, and chiefly of sinne, which we drave first of propagation by the body. Wherefore this word body in this place is not the name of nature, but of corruption. For corrupt affects ought to be mortified, and good affects substituted in theyr place, that our offering may be acceptable vnto God. This selfe thing ment the Apostle when he wrote to the Colossians, Mortifie your members which are vpon the earth: in which place by members he vnderstandeth that tyrannicall law of sinne, which chiefly beareth dominion in the members, and in the whole man. And Paul before in the first chapter, knowing, saith he, that our old man is crucified with Christ, that the body of sinne should be abolished. In which place is used the Hebrew phrase. For it is sayd The body of sinne in steede of the body obnoxious to sinne. But he moze manifestly by the name of body vnderstandeth the whole man, when he thus writeth, Let not sinne raigne in your mortall body. For he ment y sinne ought to be prohibited not only from the body, but also from the mind and from the whole man. And the same thing he ment when he wrote in the senenth chapter. Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? For he desired not so greatly to be deliuered from the nature of the body. For in an other place he sayth, We desire not to be spoyled of that we haue, but to be adorned a new. Wherefoze he desired that he might at the length be deliuered from corrupt affects and motions both of the soule and of the body. Hereto also tendeth that which is written in the first to the Cozinthians, I chastice my body and doo bring it into bondage. For there is chiefly entreated of the mortification of affects, and not only of the outward tormenting of the body. If we so vnderstand the matter, the sacrifice shalbe ful and perfect. For by this meanes as we haue receaued all whole of God, so in the other side we shall render all whole vnto God. Which thing as it seemeth they of Platoes sect rightly vnderstode not. For they, as farre as may be gathered out of Timeus, were of this opinion, that the minde onely and reason are immediatly geuen of God. For they held that the substance of the body is drawen of the elements; but the temperature, which they call the complexion they sayd is drawen of the celestiaall spheares; and the affectes and grosser partes of the soule is drawen of Devils. And therfoze they taught that the mind and reason ought to be rendred vnto God. But we know that the whole mā is formed of God, and therfoze ought he all whole to be rendred vnto him. And if we be now grafted into Christ, & haue geuen our selues all whole into the possession of God, we ought perpetually to offer vp our selues all whole vnto him. This selfe thing Paul befoze touched in the first chapter, when he thus wrote, Geue not your members as weapons of iniquitie vnto sinne, but geue your selues vnto God, as they that are on line from the dead; and geue your members as weapons of righteousness vnto God. Which thing vnles we do, we incurre into the most greuous crime of sacriledge. For when we withdraue our selues frō God, we take away from him a thing most excellent, that thing I say, which of all sacrifices is vnto him most acceptable.

to

As we receiue all whole of god to haue our being, so agayne let vs render al whole vnto him. An error of Plato.

I man to withdraue himselfe frō God, is sacriledge.

A liuing sacrifice, holy, & acceptable vnto God. ¶ If Christ would for our sakes be made an oblatiō, it ought not to seme greuous to any of vs, if we on the other side be made oblations, & be sacrificed vnto God. For hereto are we predestinated, to be made like vnto the image of the Sonne of God. And euen as he is not a good citezin which cannot be content with the common condition of other citizens, so or rather much les is he to be counted for a good Christian which refuseth to take vpon him the condition of his head or first borne brother. As touching the name of a sacrifice or oblatiō in latten called hostia or victima, we ought to know that either of these twoordes is deriued of the victory gotten of enemies. For those verses of Ouid are commonly knowne of all men.

He is not a good christian which refuseth to take vpon him the condition of his head.

Wherof these wordes hostia and victima are deriued.

Victima, quæ dextra cecidit victrice vocatur

Hostibus a domitis hostia nomen habet. That is.

Victima, of hym that ouercommeth, taketh his name:

And Hostia, of enemies ouercome, doth take the same.

Wherefoze sayng that by Christ is now gotten the victory, whereby he hath set vs being now redeemed by his blood at libertie, we ought by good right to offer vp our selues as sacrifices vnto him: to y end to geue thanks vnto him for so great a benefite. And that we should not erre in this sacrifices, Paul here diligently describeth the proprieties of a Christian sacrifice. For so it was in the olde lawe expressedly commaunded, what faultes shoulde be taken heede of in chusinge of sacrifices. And doubtles godlye men had at that tyme a greate care not to offend that way. And in Malachy the Prophet, God greuously complayneth of the couetous and vngodly: which whē as they had in their heards and flockes whole, ¶ Ce. iij.

sat,

fat and strong cattaille, would notwithstanding sacrifice weake, leane, and diseased cattayle, wherfore the Apostle willethe vs that it be a lively sacrifice. For dead sacrifices please not God. And in the old lawe, if a man had touched a dead car-hayse, he was made vncleane: wherfore we ought to take hede that our bodies be not subiect vnto sinnes. For they which are so as sayth Ambrose, are utterly ad-dicted vnto death. Those are called liuing things, which are moued of the selues, namely, of a beginning within them: and are not driuen of any outwarde force, which they called violent force: by which motion wood, stones, and yron, are mo-ued hither and hither. Wherfore we ought to be the sacrifices of God, not by force, but from the hart and willingly. A consideration also is to be had to that, wherby we are stirred vp to worke. And we must in any wise beware, that that ground be not euill: suche as is theys whiche are moued only by the lustes of the fleshe, or by humane reason, or by the impulsio[n] of the deuill to doo those thinges which they do. Those bodys which are in very deede liuing before God, are mo-ued by the spirite of God, and therefore they can not lye weltring in idleness. Then vndoubtedly do Christians liue, when they alwayes diligentl[y] do those thinges which may both please God, and aduance epyther our saluation or the sal-uation of others. For they which liue idly, are not worthy to be sacrificed vnto God. For idleness seemeth to be a certayne participation of death. Wherfore Seneca when he passed thorough a village longing to one called Vatia, a man full of idleness and geuen to pleasures, Here (sayde he) lyeth Vacia, signifying therby that such may seme not only to be dead, but also to be buried. Wherfore let the sacri-fice be liuing and chearefully moue it self to those thinges which please God. And where hence this life hath his beginning Paul teacheth to the Galathians, In that (sayth he) I liue in the fleshe, I liue in the fayth of the sonne of God. And Abacuch the Prophet sayth, The iust man liueth by his fayth. Paul mought aptly commaund these thinges, when as he had before abundantly reasoned of Iustification, and of the life of the soule which is to be obteyned by fayth. Wherfore by this place we are taught, that men not yet iustified can not be such sacrifices. For they want, that life which the holy ghost aboue all other thinges requireth.

Idleness is an image of death.

Men not yet iustified
cannot be sacrifices
vnto God.
What holy
is.

*Sagmen is a kind of grasse plucked vp with earth.

Things
holy haue this property to be be-loued of god

Holy.] ἀγία. The Etymologye of which word Plato thus describeth in Cra-tylo: as though it were composed of α, a particle priuative, and γία, that is, earth: wherfore Αγία are thinges impolluted and chused from all earthly filthines and dregges. And with the Latines this word sanctum that is holy, signifieth y<sup>e</sup> which is consecrated with bloud, as Seruius sayth, writing vpon these wordes in the 12. booke of Eneidos, Qui foedera numine sancit. And his opinion is, that sancire amongst the elders was to consecrate with bloud. Martian the Lawyer in the Title De rerum diuisione, sayth Sanctum, is a thing vniuolated, and which is defended and guarded from the iniury of men. And he thinketh that the name is deriued of the Herbes, called *sagmina, which the Legates of Romanes caried with them, to the end their enemies should do them no violence. But Vlpian, De significa-tione verborum sayth, that Sanctum signifieth all one with firme, fixed & stable. And that sancire is all one with to appoint, & constantly to decre. All these signifi-cations agree very wel with that thing whereof we now entreate. For our sacri-fice ought to be consecrated with the bloud of Christe. Further it ought to be cer-tayne and stable, which ought neuer to be reuoked or to be chaunged: and finally, it ought to be purged from the filthines of sinnes.

Acceptable vnto God which is your reasonable worshipping.] Plato in En-riphrone, when he had appointed to entreate of holines, consuted this definition, wherein that was sayd to be holy, which is beloued of God. For he thinketh that this is rather a property of holines then the definition thereof. For thinges holy seme to haue this propriety, to be beloued of God. Wherfore the Apostle aptly vn-to holines of life addeth εὐαγερον τὸ θέον, that is, acceptable vnto God. And it is all one as if he should haue sayd, If your sacrifice be holy, it shall also be acceptable vnto God. And in the meane tyme he seemeth to haue alluded to that which is written

written in the law, namely, that God accepted as a most sweete smelling saour those sacrifices, whiche are done as they shoulde be done. The Hebrewes say: Richan Ichouah.

Your reasonable worshipping. ] This oblation is called reasonable by an Antithesis to the sacrifices of the Jewes and of the Gentiles. For they consisted of brute beastes: or els as Origen interpreteth it, so that our sacrifice is such that we therof can render a reason to them that require it. Such doubtles were not the sacrifices of the elders. For the Jewes could geue no reason why God chose out for his sacrifices, rather these beastes then other, or why he would be worshipped rather after this maner then after that. That which we in Latine reade Cultum, that is, worshipping, is in Greke, λατρεῖν: whiche word, as the Latine Fathers write, and especially Augustine in his 10. booke, De ciuitate Dei, the 1. chapter, properly signifieth the worshipping of God. For althoughe (sayth he) manye other things are worshipped, yet this worship called λατρεία belongeth not vnto them. As touching the substance of the thing we deny not, but that vnto God is due a certayne worshippinge whiche is not to be communicated vnto thinges created: Notobeyt that λατρεύειν doth with the Grecians alwayes so signifie: I am not able to affirme, for as Suidas sayth, λατρεύειν is δουλεύειν ἐπὶ μισθῷ, that is, to serue for a reward or hire. And in the holy Scriptures where we reade, that the festiuall dayes ought so to be kept, that in them should be done no seruite worke, y Greke edition hath it thus, ἔργον λατρευτῶν. This word δουλεύειν also, that is, to serue, doth not so properly belong vnto creatures, that it is not also attributed vnto God. For the Apostle many tymes calleth him self δούλον ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, that is, the seruaunt of Iesus Christ: as also with the Hebrewes this word Abad, which signifieth to serue, signifieth y obeyfance, which we geue both vnto God, and also vnto y creatures. By these wordes we may gather that all Christians are now sacrificers: as which ought not only to sacrifice themselves, but also others: which thing they chiefly accomplish which preach, teach, exhort and admonishe their neighbours to returne vnto Christ, y when they sal they should repent and returne againe into the right waye. This thing Paul pronounceth of himselfe in the 15. chapter of this epistle. By the grace (sayth he) which is geuen vnto me, that I should be the Minister of God amongst the Gentiles. In that place sayth, that he is λειτουργον, and ἐργουνοῦντα τὸ Εὐαγγέλιον: as if he should say, that he sacrificed the Gospel, that the oblation of the Gentiles might be made εὐπρόσδεκτος, that is, acceptable & sanctified in spirite, &c. But in my iudgement it seemeth most likely, that Paul ment in these wordes to comfort those which were newly conuerted vnto Christ, as well Jewes as Gentiles. For our religion mought seme vnto them at the first sight very slender and bare: as which wanted that godly shew and outward decking of sacrifices. But the matter sayth Paul, is farre otherwise then ye thinke it is. For we also haue our sacrifices: but they be liuing, holy, reasonable, and acceptable vnto God. What moze sharper spurs can be put to our sydes to cause vs to leade a godly and holy life, then to be taught that we ought all to be such sacrifices, & the offerers vp also of those oblations: He that is not moued with theie reasons to liue holily and innocently, I see not doubtles, by what other meanes he can be moued.

And apply not your selues to the figure of this world: but be ye transformed in newnes of your minde, that ye may allow what is the will of God: good, acceptable, and perfect.

And applye not your selues to the figure of this world, but be ye transformed in newnes of your mind. ] They which teache Pussicke do not onely teache how men should singe, but also do therewithall inculcate how men should not sing that the scholars may perceauie, both what they ought to follow, and what to auoyde. So Paul here teacheth what is to be done in this sacrifice, & what is to be eschewed. Imitate not (sayth he) this world. He vseth the figure Metonomia, by the wordes

Why our worshipping is called reasonable.

All christians are sacrificers. The ministers of the worde of God aboue all other do sacrifice.

Our religion wanteth not conuenient sacrifices.

The order of teaching vsed of the Apostles.

Woꝛld
what it here
signifieth.

What difference be-twene a foꝛme and a figure.

If the renewing of the mynde be commoun-
ded, then was it corrupt.

Whether
the mynde be incorrupt in
them that are not regenerate.

to vnderstand men not yet regenerate. For they are rightly sayd to be of this woꝛld, for that their affectes and maners are vile and filthy. For men nowe regenerate, although they liue in the woꝛld, yet as Chꝛist sayd vnto the Apostles, they are not of the woꝛld: for they are continually conuersant in heauen, as Paul sayth to the Philippians. And that which the Apostle in this place requireth at our handes, the self same requireth he in the 4. chapter to the Ephesians. This (sayth he) I say and testifie in the Lord, that henceforth ye walke not as other Gentiles walke, in vanity of their mind, hauing their reason darkened, and being straungers from the life of God, through the ignorance, that is in them, and the blindness of their hart, which being past all feeling haue geuen themselves to wantones, to worke all vncleannes eue with greedines. These are y<sup>e</sup> chiefeſt faults & finnes of the childꝛe of this woꝛld, fro which Paul calleth vs backe. Chꝛisostome expounding thys place waigheth these two woꝛdes, συνμορφωσθε, which is, if I may so terme it, be ye configured, & μεταμορφοῦσθε, y<sup>e</sup> is, be ye transformed. And he putteth a great difference betwene this woꝛd foꝛme & this woꝛd figure. For the good things of this woꝛld as they are weake & transitory haue rather as he thinketh the nature of a figure then of a foꝛme. For so sayth Paul wꝛiting to the Corinthyans, the figure of thys world is gone. For riches, honours, and pleasures, are thynges (sayth he) most vncertayne. For they haue not a sound foꝛme, but are beholden and scene onely as a person playing in a stage play: so y<sup>e</sup> they are rather a spectacle oꝛ shew vnto vs, then that we can in very deede haue the fruition of them. And foꝛasmuch as such thynges are crooked and oblique, they ought not to be vnto vs a rule of life: and especially seing that we are made to the Image of God, whereunto only we ought perpetually to applye our selues, vnles we will fall away from our natieue dignity. These things which Chꝛisostome thus mencioneth, are both true, and goodly, although I can scarce thinke that Paul had any consideration of any such thing. For with hym there is not so great a difference betwene a foꝛme and a figure. Yea rather eche woꝛde is oftentimes bled foꝛ one and the selfe same ithing. For vnto the Philippians he sayth, that the sonne of God tooke vpon him the forme of a seruaunte, and was founde in figure as a man. Although whether so euer exposition be receaued I thinke it skilleth not much.

In renewing of your mynde.] Unless our mynde had ben corrupted, and now infected with some oldnes, Paul would neuer haue added this particule. For we renew not but onely those thynges, which now through oldnes are woꝛne, and corrupted. And seing that the Apostle as befoꝛe by the body, so here by the mynde vnderstandeth the whole man, it may seeme straunge why he befoꝛe bled the name of the body, and afterward the name of the mynde. But the aunswere is not hard. He befoꝛe entreated of y<sup>e</sup> sacrifice, wherein are to be slayne corrupt affectes & finnes, which affectes and finnes foꝛasmuch as they haue crept in through the body & the fleshe, which we haue by propagation drawen from Adam, therefore the Apostle in that place bled this woꝛd body, rather then the name of mynde. But here, where is entreated of renewing, which beginneth at the mynde, and is afterward spꝛed abroad into the affectes and grosser partes of the soule, that it cometh also vnto the body and vnto the members thereof, he would first make mencion of the mynde which ought first to be renewed. Many contend that this part of our soule is yet whole and vncorrupt. For, as Aristotle sayth in his Ethikes, it seemeth alwayes to encline to good thynges. Which thing I confesse: and know that amongst the philosophers were Socrates, and certaine others endewd with a wonderfull innocency of life, and bꝛight maners: foꝛ that reason alwayes stirred the by to notable and excellent factes. But these thynges they did not neither after an bꝛight manner, noꝛ to a de wende, noꝛ with a sound intent. For they had not a regard vnto the honoꝛ of God, noꝛ to his will, noꝛ the true and pure woꝛshipping of him. This thing onely they followed, which they had set befoꝛe them to rest themselves in, & thereby to make themselves perfect, foꝛ that they had chosen vnto themselves such oꝛders of life. This was that spot and corruption wherewith their mynde was exceedingly contaminated. Yea we also although we be regenerate, yet haue not as yet our mynde, in all thynges clesed. Wherefoꝛe this ad-

moni

monition was needfull eue for the Romanes which were conuerted vnto Chriſt. And that our mynde ought ſo to be renewed Paul admoniſheth alſo vnto the Ephesiens. Be ye renewed, ſayth he, in the ſpirit of your mynde. And in what eſtate our mynde was, when we liued without Chriſt, we are taught in the ſelfe ſame epistle: Amongſt whome (ſayth he) we alſo were conuerſant, doing the will of the fleſhe and of reaſon. And in the firſt chapter to y Colloſſians he ſayth, that we were alienated from God in euill works and were enemyes in mynde. The Apoſtle exhorteth to this renewing by a reaſon taken of the end: namely, that we ſhould allow what is the will of God. Neither doth he here require a common allowing: but ſuch an allowing whereby we in very dede follow and embrace the commaundementes of God. For otherwiſe as touching the common allowing we know that ſaying of the Poet concerning Medea: Video meliora, proboq; : Deteriora ſequor, that is, I ſee good things, and I allow them, but I follow the worſe. And in this epistle in the 2. chapter. Behold thou art a Jew, and reſteſt in the law, and glorieſt in God and knoweſt his will, and alloweſt things that are profitable. Howbeit ſtraight way he wriſteth of the ſelfe ſame Jew, Thou whiche teacheſt an other, teacheſt not thy ſelfe: thou that preacheſt a man ſhould not ſeale, ſealeſt. If this be the nature of a mynde renewed to acknowledge the wil of God, that is, with a ſound iudgement & vprightly to thinke of it, and cherefully to follow it, firſt it is manifeſt that the philoſophers had not a mynde renewed. For they onely allowed their owne doctrines, and reſted themſelues in them onely. The wicked alſo haue not a mynde renewed. For if a man aſke them what they thinke touching the commaundementes of God, if they ſpeake as they thinke, they will aunſwere that they ſeeme vnto them hard, and ykeſome, and impoſſible. Yea and the matter at y length proceeded to ſuch impiety, that there were ſome, which held, that the law of Moſes was not geuen of the true God, but of an euill God: ſuch a God as they had ſayned vnto themſelues. In this erroꝝ, oꝝ rather wicked impiety were the Kelenſinians, Martionites, Maniches, and other peſtiferous heretiques. Laſt of all neither they alſo haue their mynde renewed, which in ſence only and wordes prayſe and allow the law of God, but in dedes do much abhorre from it. Chriſtoſtome thus readeth it, That ye may allow the better things, and then by oppoſition he addeth, The will of God: as though he ſhould adde an interpretation which ſhoulde make playne what theſe better things are: namely, thoſe things which God willeth. But that particle is not had in this place: but is red in the Epistle to the Philippians: for there after this word, δοξάζειν, that is, to allow, is added διὰ τὰ βέλτεια, that is, better things. Paul in theſe wordes ſetteth forth an excellent rule whereby a mynde renewed ought to be directed: namely, that the whole order of a mans life is to be taken out of the word of God, and out of his lawes. For this is the part of true a Chriſtian, that being aſked a reaſon of his doings, whatſoeuer he do, ſpeake, oꝝ meditate, he aunſwere that therefore he doth it, for that he knoweth that it pleaſeth God. That the mynde of man not yet renewed can not allowe the things which are of God, but rather ernestly reſiſt them, we may vnderſtand by that which Paul befoꝝe ſayd. The wiſedome of the fleſhe is enmity agaynſt God, for it is not ſubiekt vnto hys lawe: yea neither can it. Wherefoꝝe euen as in a ſicke man the taſt ought firſt to be clenſed from coꝝrupt humoꝝs, befoꝝe that he can iudge a right of his meat and drinke: ſo in vs humane reaſon muſt needes be purged, befoꝝe that it can vnderſtand any thing pertayning to God and conducing to ſaluation. Farther Paul when he exhorteth to renew the mynde ſaith to haue a reſpecte to that whiche he had befoꝝe touched concerning thoſe which when by humane wiſedome, and by the admonition of creatures knewe God, yet worſhipped him not as it was meete: and therefore they were caſt of God into a reprobate mynde: Wherefoꝝe he now exhorteth vs, that by a new profeſſion of fayth we vtterly put of the olde mynde.

Good, acceptable, and perfect. ] Theſe things may be taken two maner of wayes, firſt, they may be referred vnto the will of God, as though they were a

The minde of the regenerate is not in all pointes clenſed.

What approbation of his wil god requirith.

The philoſophers had not a mynde renewed.

The law of God ought to be allowed not only in ſence and wordes, but alſo in dedes.

The inſtitution of Iſe, ought to be directed by the wordes of God.

certaine expreſſiō of his diſpoſitiō or nature. And if we follow this interpretation, the ought we to take y wil of God for thoſe things which God willet: & not for power or faculty wherby he willet. For ſo we be to ſay, this is my will, or this or y mans will: when as onely thereby is ſignified what it is y I will, or what is that this or that man willet. So the meaning of Paul ſhould be, that thoſe things which God willet are good & acceptable vnto him & perfect. Yea we cannot find thoſe proprieties, but only in thoſe things which God willet. The other expoſitiō on is, that that which is here ſayd, be referred wholly to y which went before: as if Paul ſhould ſay, that to be transformed in newnes of mind, and to allow the will of God, is both good, and acceptable vnto God, and perfect. But the firſt ſence is both more ſimple, & ſomewhat alſo more agreeable. Origen vpon this place thinketh that there is one wil of God, which is take abſolutely & ſimply, & there is an other wil which Paul calleth good, acceptable and perfect. For the old law ſayth he, and the olde ceremonies were the wil of God: But they could not be called the good & acceptable and perfect wil of God. After this maner we may ſay that the finnes wherby God auengeth other finnes are a certain wil of God, but not a good, acceptable, and perſite wil, for ſuch finnes we ought neyther to allow nor to deſire. For we wought to follow that wil of God, which we haue ſet forth vnto vs in the holy ſcriptures. But I thinke y this ſubtelty ſerueth nothing to the purpoſe of Paul

For I ſay thorough the grace that is geuen vnto me, to euery one that is amongeſt you, that no man preſume or thinke of himſelfe more then he ought. For we ought to be wiſe vnto ſobriety as God hath dealt to euery man the meaſure of ſayth.

For I ſay thorough the grace, that is geuen vnto me. ] That which was before ſpoken ſummarily and generally. Paul now declareth perticularly and by partes, and more plainly ſetteth forth the, and profitably ampliſieth. By this grace geuen vnto him he vnderſtandeth the office of the Apoſtleſhippe, and ſayth that he was heard of God, although not for his owne ſake, yet for his office ſake which he executed. He uſeth the figure Metonomia, whereby the cauſe is put for the effect. For of the grace and mercy of God it was that Paul was an Apoſtle. He ſheweth alſo y neceſſity, wherby the Romanes vnto whom he wrote were bound to obey his ſayings. And when he nameth grace, he eſcheweth all ſuſpicion of ambition. For it ſignifieth that that office was freely geuen vnto him of God. For he did not thruſt himſelf into the miniſtery: but when he thought nothing leſ, or rather when he persecuted the Goſpell, God appointed to him this office. Whereby alſo men ought to learne, how much they are bound vnto God for the paſtors and miniſters of Churches. For God in this thing no leſ gratifieth the people, then he doth them that be they rulers and they teachers. For thoſe giſtes of God, which are commonly free gracious giſtes, are beſtowed not ſo much to they vſe vnto whome they are geuen, as to the ediſieng of the common body of the Church. Criſoſtome moreover noteth the ſingular modeſty of Paul: who as before he did ſet forth the mercies of God, whereby to allure the Romanes to harken to the word of God, ſo here he maketh mencion of his grace, to the end thoſe thinges which he ſpeaketh ſhould not be reſected.

I ſay. ] Many haue taken this word as an expoſition of thoſe thinges which were before ſpoken. As if Paul ſhould ſay, that this is the good, acceptable and perfect wil of God, which he now ſetteth forth and persecuteth. But I thinke rather that here he beginneth to ſpeake of a new matter. For if this word, I ſay, ſhould here haue that ſignification, it woulde not very well agree with it which is added: namely, thorough that grace, which is geue vnto me. Wherefore it ſignifieth nothing ells, but I bid or I commaund: which ſignification diſagreeth not from the Greke nor Latine phraſe. For the Grecians ſay, λέγω σοι χάριν, or διμμεύζην, or χλαίνην, And we in our epiſtles vſe at the beginning to ſay Salutem dico: which is all

To ſay, ſometimes ſignifieth to commaund.

all one as if we should say, Iubeo te saluere, that is, I commaund thee to haue health. Wherfore Paul by this phrase of speech signifieth, that those thinges which follow are commaundementes of the Apostle. And that which consequently is witten in this chapiter, may be comprehended in this proposition or summe. Whosoeuer is in this body of the Church, let him abide in his place: let him not vsurpe an other mans office: but let euery man execute his owne with as much diligence and loue as he ca: For Pauls mind was utterly to banish from the congregation of the godly all busie and curious doinges whereby commeth to passe, that men eyther medle with higher matters then is mete for them, or neglecting theyr own they busie themselves about other mens matters. Paul geueth this charge to al men vniuersally, he excepteth not one. For in this poynt he relenteth neither to princes, nor to rich men, nor to learned men, more then to others. And this pertayneth to that vertue, which they commonly call humilitie. And therfore Chrysostome sayth, that the Apostle here setteth forth vnto vs humility the mother of all vertues. And therein he semeth to imitate Christ: when he should entreate of maners and of an vpright life, began first w this sentence, Blessed are the poore in spirite: for theyrs is the kingdome of heauen. Doubtles there were great causes ymoued Paul so largely in this place to entreate of this thing. For first the church of Rome was enscaded with no small discorde. For the Iewes sought to be preferred before the Gentiles, and the Gentiles on the other side despised them. This so greate euill could not more conueniently be remedied, then that Paul should admonish them all to containe themselves within that measure, which God had deuised vnto euery man. And euen as in the Church of the Corinthians emulation once kindled, grew at the length in a maner to contention, bycause that the gifts of the holy ghost were not with an equall proportion distributed vnto all men, so is it also most likely that the like thinges happened amongst the Romanes. Whereouer we may say that the Apostle after a sozte maketh a stepp vnto those thinges which he will afterward speake of, when he shall reproue those, which thorough a certayne arrogancy trusting to theyr great knowledge bled all kindes of meates, and that to the great offence of the weake. Yea and those weake ones also forgetting theyr limits and weake knowledge, were not ascrd to condemne others which were excellenter then themselves, as though they greuously sinned, when they did eate those meates, which they durst not touch. Wherfore seing that either of them exceeded the meane, it was very mete and requisite that they should be put in mind of modesty and temperancy.

Let no man (sayth he) presume, or thinke more of himselfe, then he ought, For we ought to be wise vnto sobriety. That is we ought to thinke moderately and temperately of our selues. Ierome against Iovinian, most sharply defending virginity and chastity, to the end to abuse this place for a testimony, condemned the receaued translation of the Latine booke: For he thought that we should here rede not that we ought to be wise vnto sobriety, but, to be wise vnto chastity. I graunt indede that σωφροσύνη sometimes signifieth chastity. *Not*beit in this place that signification agreeth not. For Paul generally entreateth of arrogancy, and selfe loue whereby euery man sought to be preferred one before an other. Origen much better by σωφροσύνη vnderstandeth temperaunce: not that temperaunce, whereby we moderate pleasures in meate and drinke and carnalitie: but whereby we brydle our affects, and lustes, and all our actions. So that Paul semeth here to teach nothing ells, but that no man should take vpon him more then his degree and condition wil suffer. Yether is this to be passed ouer, that Chrysostome hath noted that the Greke etimology of this word σωφροσύνη, is, that it kepeth a meane or rather prudence. Which etimology Plato also followeth in Cratilo, as though it were σωτηρία τῆς φρονήσεως, that is, the preseruer of reason: And doubtles they which let lose the brydle to arrogancie, and thinke higher of themselves then is mete, are destitute of their accustomed prudence, and become mad: such as were certayne, Emperours and Monarches, which would be worshipped for Goddes: and such as he was, which was not aserd to say, And what God is it, that can deliuer you out of mine hand? These things also are aptly applied vnto them which trusting in their owne doctrine, will serch out the secrets of God: which thing we know many of the Philosophers did, but they were so vtterly besides themselves, that they had great neede of a violent purgation. This thing Agrippa objected vnto Paul as a reproch, Much learning (sayth he) hath brought thee to madnes. And Chrysostome sayth: that if a mā by reason of wisdom or any gift of the holy ghost be puffed up into so great arrogancy, that he become madde and out of his wit, that mā (saith he) is in no wise worthy of compassion. For he (sayth he) which is borne a foole, hath an excuse and all men easely pity his case. But he which becometh mad, for that he semeth vnto himselfe, excellently well learned, or for that he is endewed with some gift of God, by that which (sayth he) is good, he hurteth himselfe: and he vntemperately abuseth thinges healthfull. And  $\sigma\omega\phi\iota\sigma\tau\acute{\upsilon}\nu\eta$  is rightly take for temperaunce in so large a signification, Plato teacheth by these wordes in Timo.  $\tau\omicron\delta\ \tau\epsilon\alpha\tau\epsilon\iota\nu\ \&\ \gamma\acute{\nu}\omega\sigma\kappa\epsilon\iota\ \tau\alpha\iota\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \&\ \iota\alpha\upsilon\lambda\omicron\nu\ \sigma\acute{\epsilon}\phi\epsilon\rho\iota\ \mu\omicron\upsilon\ \tau\epsilon\pi\omicron\sigma\chi\epsilon\iota$ . That is, A man to do, and to know both himselfe, and that which pertaineth vnto him, belongeth only to a temperate man. And that Paul now earnestly exhorteth to temperance, we may vnderstand by that y he before comaunded the renning of y mynde. Wherefore seing that this vertue pserueth prudence and arrogancy, y which is contrary thereto, exceedingly weakeneth it (which thing also the Greke word  $\alpha\ \tau\omega\upsilon\omicron\iota\alpha$ , whereby is signified arrogancy, playnly declareth, we are admonished both to eschew the one, and to the vttermost of our power to embrace the other. For we offende in that sinne not onely in our actions and in the executing of duties, but also in the study of knowledge & of vnderstanding. For there are many which neglecting the care of knowing things necessary, vnprofitably wander in things vnfruitfull and vaine. Did not the Emperour Adrian make himselfe a laughing stocke, when amongst the waighty affayres of the common wealth, he curiously enquired of Grammarians who was the nurse of Euandre, who was the great grandfather of Priamus, and other such like trifles, and fond toys? And was not y philosopher worthely derided of his handmayden, when as he attentively and carefully considering the starres, fel into a ditch which was before his feet. This oftentimes happeneth in ouermuch busying our selues in curious thinges that whilest we go about to search out these thinges which nothing pertayne vnto vs, we to our shame are ignozant of other thinges which are profitable & necessary. The vnderstanding of me is weake, neither is it able to consider many & sundry thinges at one and the selfe same tyme. And therof it cometh to passe, that where with great earnestnes we seake to pease any thing, our attentiuenes is very much slackened touching the searching out of other thinges. Wherefore Seneca iustly complained, y a good part of our life is lost whilest we do nothing: but a greater part whilest we do euil thinges: & the greatest part of all, whilest we do thinges strange that is, vnprofitable and nothing pertayning vnto vs. They also breake this commaundment of the Apostle which in thinges profitable & necessary to saluation will be wiser then they ought to be. For there are some which search out thinges pertayning vnto Christian sayth with greater study then is nedefull. For they wyll not be content with those thinges which are set forth in the holy scriptures: but according to the rashenes of humane reason will either adde somewhat to the wordes of God, or plucke some thing therefro. Who will not say, but that these men are besides themselves. Wherefore we ought to obey this doctrine of the Apostle. For there can nothing be deuised which is generally moze profitable then it. And that we may the easelier perfoyme this, Paul addeth a meane which we ought to keepe in esteeming our selues.

Here in is commaunded modesty. Christ gaue grete charge touchyng this modesty. Discorde in the church of Rome.

When intemperate and proud hurt themselves. What belongeth chiefly to a temperate man. Arrogancy called  $\alpha\ \tau\omega\upsilon\omicron\iota\alpha$ .

I most grane say: ing of Seneca.

As God hath deuised to euery man the measure of sayth. ] In these wordes is used the figure Eclipsis which signifieth want. And the want may thus be supplied: Let him in such sort thinke of himselfe, and let him not arrogantly take vpon him moze. When mencion is made of sayth, it is by the figure Metonymia. For in the cause we vnderstand the effect, namely, the gifts and spirituall powers geuen geuen of God. For no man ought moze to pzeſume of himſelfe, then þe meſure of þe giftes of God ſuffreth him, which giftes ſoꝛasmuch as they are receaued by ſayth, therefoze Paul aptly ſayd, that we muſt be wiſe according to the meſure of ſayth. But what this ſayth is all the interpreters are not of one minde. For ſome thinke that in this place is vnderſtanded that ſound ſayth whereby we are iuſtified. For, to vſe the giftes of God by right, is geuen vnto vs by regeneration, which we haue obtayned by ſayth. But becauſe the Apoſtle after ward teacheth thoſe thinges which ſerue chiefly to the right vſe of the giftes of God, it is not likely that he woulde now befoze due place entreat of that doctrine. Mozeouer we ſee that the quantity oꝛ meſure of ſpirituall giftes, which they call free giftes are not according to the meſure of ſayth which iuſtifieth. For we ſee oftentimes thoſe which haue a very ſlender ſayth, oꝛ rather not that ſayth at all which iuſtifieth; are yet notwithstanding endued with a wonderfull gift both of teaching; and of perſwading, and of doing thinges orderly. And in that laſt day many ſhall ſay, Lord haue we not prophesied in thy name? &c. But anſwere ſhall be made vnto them, I know you not. And on the other ſide we ſometymes ſee moſt holy me endued with a true ſayth and ſeruent charity, which yet haue theſe free giftes either very ſlenderly, oꝛ ſometymes not at all. Wherefoze it ſeemeth that ſayth in this place may be taken for þe ſayth wherby are wrought miracles. Chriſtoſtome alſo in this place diſcourſeth, how ſayth ought in theſe wordes to be take, but ſo obſcurely, that it can ſcarſely at the length be knowen, what his mynde is. Origen mencioneth, that certayne of the learnede ſort gathered out of theſe wordes of Paul (Let no man be wiſe more then is meete.) that a certayne meſure and mediocrity is to be retayned in all vertues. For if a man keepe not meſure in that iuſtice whereby ſinnes are puniſhed, he ſtraight way incurreth into the vice. For if in that kinde he want of the meane, then ſhall he be remiſſe and diſſolute. But if he excede the meane then ſhall he be cruell and tyranous: For ſo ſhall he ſeeme to be to greedy of vengeance. In chriſtian liberty alſo, he which paſſeth the meane is raſhe and headlong, he which daret not vſe it, is fearefull and cowardly. So in prudence, he which wanteth of the meane is a ſoule: and he which paſſeth the meane, is crafty, wily, and malicious. So the ſerpent in paradise is ſaid to haue ben moze prudent then all liuing creatures. Touching chaſtity alſo he ſayth, that they are wiſer then they ought to be, which geue themſelues to the doctrines of deuils, and prohibite matrimony, and forbid meates created of God. This place the ſuperſtitious bond ſclaues of the Pope ought well to peale. For thoſe peſtilent furies contend, and cry out, that it is well done, that no man be admitted into the fellowſhip of the miniſters, but he onely, from whome is wreſted the bow of ſole life. Mozeouer in this vertue they alſo depart from the meane, which through luſtes and adulteries impudently let loſe the bride vnto the fleſhe. Yea, ſaith he, there are found ſome, which touching Chriſt himſelfe are wiſer then they ought: as are thoſe, which thinke that he is not the ſonne of that God which made þe world, as though ſoꝛth they could find out a moze excellent father ſoꝛ him. Neither do they commit any leſſe ſinne which thinke, that he tooke not an humane body of the bleſſed virgen, but ſayne that he brought a celeftiall body with hym from heauen. Theſe thinges bringeth Origen ſoꝛ the laudable mediocrity which is to be kept in all thinges: and that according to their iudgement, whome he calleth wiſe and learned. Mozeouer this is not to be paſſed ouer, that they are not ſo wiſe as they ought to be, which vnder the pzeſence of modeſty eſchew a higher degre and place in the Church, ſoꝛ that they ſay, that they haue not the giftes and facultyes, which are meete & conuenient ſoꝛ ſuch an adminiſtration: when as yet in þe meane tyme either they fly the daungers and troubles, which they ſhould incurre ſoꝛ þe Church ſake, oꝛ els they pꝛouide ſoꝛ their owne commodities, delightes, & eaſe. So did in tymes paſt many monkes, which as their common ſaying was, forſaking the world, reſuſed thoſe functions, wherby they mought haue holpen the Church. And this is nothing elſe, but ὑπερφοβία, that is, to be too careful oꝛ mindefull of the ſucceſſe. But we can not (ſay they,) we haue not that ſtrength and power: and the Mediocrity betwene extremes, ought to be kept.

Against ſuperſtitious idolatry.

The eccleſiaſtical vocation is not to be eſchewed.

times are troublesome. I graunt that this is the property of a good & honest mind thus to testifie of himself. Notwithstanding they which thus excuse themselves, when the necessitie of the Church requireth, and the calling suffreth not any counterfayt excuse, it can not be chosen but that they are to be counted to be wiser than they ought to be. And when Paul addeth, As God hath deuised to euery man the measure of faith, he both comforteth those, (if there were any suche) which were grieved, for that lesse was geuen vnto them then to others, and he putteth downe theyr arrogancie, which by reason of moze ample gifts, were ouer muche insolently puffed vp. For the first sort, for as much as they knew y<sup>e</sup> God is the distributer & orderer, ought willingly to be content with his order & appoyntment: vntlesse they will be ouer wise, and prescribe vnto God himselfe. And the proude and arrogant ought to remember, that those giftes which caused them so much to glory of themselves, came not vnto them of themselves, but of God. Which thing Paul also in another place to the Corinthians teacheth, What hast thou (saith he) that thou hast not receaued? And if thou hast receaued it, why boastest thou as though thou haddest not receaued it?

For as we haue many members in one body, and all members haue not one office, so we being many are one body in Christe, and euery one, one an others members, seing that we haue giftes that are diuers according to the grace that is geuen to vs, whether prophesy according to the proportion of faith: or whether ministry in the ministry. He that teacheth, in doctrine: he that exhorteth, in exhortation: he that distributeth, let him do it with simplicitie: he that ruleth, with diligence, he that sheweth mercye, with chearefulness.

For as we haue many members in one body. &c.] The next commaundement he proueth by a similitude: namely, that forasmuch as there are sondry gifts in the Church, euery man ought to be content with this owne, and not to inuade an others mans. For so sayth he commeth it to passe in the body: in which are sundry partes and many members endued with diuers faculties and powers. And forasmuch as they execute their offices appointed vnto them, so also in the Church, which is the body of Christ, it is mete that euery member do in like sort behaue himselfe. This similitude the Apostle very much bleth. For he bleth it not onely in this place, but also to the Corinthians, and to the Ephesians: and that moze than once. Neither doubtles is it to be wondred at. For how great the efficacy of this similitude is, we may perceauce by that history which Titus Linius wrote of Mecenus Agrippa. For when the people had fallen away from the Fathers, he called them home agayn by this parable. And in this comparison these things are chiefly to be considered. First, that in the Church are not graunted vnto all men the selfe same giftes: as in the body are not geuen vnto all the members the selfe same strengths. Secondly, that we ought not to thrust our selues into an other mans office. For no member of the body taketh vpon him the office of an other member. Last of all, what soeuer the members of the body doo, they do it to the common vtilitie of all the parts of the body. If all these thinges were obserued in y<sup>e</sup> church, it should without all doubt be in safety and men should in vayne complayne, that the dissolution of the church hereof commeth, for that the authoritie or rather the tyranny of the Pope is banished away, as though by it only men can be kept in doing of theyr dewty. But whereas Paul calleth the Church a body, that disagreeth not from the common speech of men. For we vse to call the congregations and assemblies of many, by the name of Bodies. Whereof cometh that title in the digests de Corporibus & collegiis mutilibus, that is, of bodies and vnprofitable colledges. And Paul vnto the Corinthians calleth the congregation of the godly, one loafe, and and one body. We haue gifts (sayth he) that are diuers according to grace. According to the grace (sayth he) geuen namely of God: who befoze he sayd distributeth vnto euery man the measure of sayth. By this phrase of speech we may most aptly conclude, that the holy ghost is God. For Paul to the Corinthyans expessedly & plainly wyrteth, that the holy Ghost deuidenth those giftes vnto euery man as pleaseth him. Wherfoze seeing that now this distribution is ascribed vnto God, it thereof most evidently followeth, that the holy ghost is God. These giftes in this sort differing, are degrees and limites, within which it is necessary that euery man containe himself, that he be not moze wise then he ought to be. But this doubtles is a very hard matter. For it is a hard thing to put of the olde man, being now in all partes so corrupted. For the olde man is it which causeth euery man ambitiously to desire to excell others both in degree, honoz, and dignitie. These giftes wherof here is entreated, pertaine not to miracles, as the giftes of tongues, and those that are mencioned in other places but vnto ministeries and functions, which ought at this day also to be kept in the Church.

Congregations and assemblies of men are called bodies.

The holy ghost is
God.

The giftes
which are here spoken of are not the giftes of
miracles.

Whether prophesie, according to the proportion of faith. Prophesie is here taken of many for that faculty or gift, whereby many in the Church, did by the spirite of God foretell things to come. Neither doubtles can it be denyed, but that in those first times such giftes flourished in the Church. For Agabus foretold what euill should happen vnto Paul if he should goe to Jerusalem. And the daughters of Phillip are said to haue bene Prophetesses. Vnto Peter also was foreshewed the coming of the messengers, which Cornelius the Centurion sent vnto him. And the spirite of God commaunded that Paul and Barnabas should be put aparte for him. And in the booke of the Apoc. those things which should come to passe, were shewed vnto Iohn. Wherfoze at that time suche giftes appeared openly in many. Notobeyt in this place I wil not follow that signification. For Paul here meaneth not that power, whereby were wrought miracles: but only describeth those offices which are at all times necessary in the Church. Wherfoze, that Prophesie y was spoken of in the first Epistle to the Corinthyans the. 14. chapter, when Paul sayd, he which prophesieth, speaketh edification, exhortation, and consolation. And againe, ye may all one by one prophesie that all may learne, and all receiue consolation, the same prophesie I say, I thinke is met in this place. And this is to be noted, y the Apostle did at the beginning set forth two offices generally: which are after ward deuided into their partes, as we shall see. And there are two, for that man consisteth of body and soule. And God for that his will is that the whole man should be saued, hath instituted ministeries in the church, both which pertaine to the soule and which pertaine to the body. Prophecy comprehendeth the giftes which pertaine to doctrine and to exhortation. And Διакονια, that is, ministry, containeth those thinges which conduce to relieue the body either from pouerty or from diseases, and which restrayne it from wicked and vncomeley actions. Touching the first he sayth, Whether prophesie, according to the proportion of sayth. In this place many thinke that by faith are to be vnderstanded the chief groundes and principall sentences of religion, as those which are comprehended in the symboles. And so the sense is, that they which teach, or exhort, or comfort the people of God, ought chiefly to beware of this, that they speake nothing that is repugnaunt to the whole summe and principall groundes of the Catholike faith: which things they which haue the charge of suche functions, ought alwayes to haue befoze their eyes, least peraduenture they decline from them. Others by faith vnderstand the rote of such giftes. And Origen thinketh that this particle is to be repeated in all those things which are afterwarde mentioned: namely, that the ministry and doctrine ought to be exercised according to the measure and portion of that faith: as though all those parts of this generall thing, which seeme to haue in them the figure εκ μέρους, should by this particle be made complete. But I thinke that this place is moze simply to be vnderstanded, so that faith here signifieth that knowledge, wherof God

Of what kind of prophesy mention is here
made.

maketh them partakers whome he placeth in suche functions, that he which teacheth, which exhorteth, or which comforteth, set forth nothing vnto the people, but that which God hath put into his head, namely, by his inspiration and reuelation: that they presume not to speake those things which either they vnderstande not, or which are of their owne inuention. If our elders had obserued this rule, we should not now haue had in y<sup>e</sup> Church so many new inuentions of men, nor so many abuses, nor so many superstitions. For when euery man toke vpon to speake and to teach the people what so euer came in his head, then began these mischiefs to encrease without measure. Farther this we ought to knowe, that Origen and Chrysostome, of this, that the Apostle saith, according to the proportion of faith, toke occasion to thinke, that it lieth in euery mannes power to obtaine these giftes at his owne pleasure. For God (say they) poureth in those things according to the vessel of faith offered of vs. As though it were not before sayde, that God deuidenth vnto euery man the measure of faith. But (say they) God deuidenth it according as we our selues will. Not so vndoubtedly. For Paul to the Corinthians of these free giftes thus writeth: All these thinges worketh one and the selfe same spirit, deuidenth to all men as he will. But thou wilt say, He worketh indeede as he will: but he would frame his will to our disposition: and therefore he geueth not but so much as we wil. He which thus speaketh, considereth not the history of the primitive Church. For it is manifest that there were many amongst the Corinthians, which would indeede haue spoken with tounges, as they saw others speake: but yet they could not attayne vnto it. At this day also there are many, which would faine haue the gift of teaching aptly and of exhorting with fruit: yet are they not therfore endewd with y<sup>e</sup> gift. And there are iust causes, why God wil not sometimes geue those giftes. For peradventure they should turne to y<sup>e</sup> destruction of the receauers: either for that they would become insolent, or els for that otherwise they would abuse the gift of God. The scripture manifestly admonisheth vs that we are ignorant what we should pray as we ought. And therefore God reiecteth not the prayers of his, although oftentimes he geue not those things which they aske particularly of hym. Farther Paul vnto the Ephesians playnly admonisheth, that God hath put in the Church some to be Apostles, some Prophets, and some Euangelistes. And if it be God, which ordereth the disposing of these giftes, they depend they not of our preparation, but of his will. But some man will say, if they lie not in our choise, what neded Paul to say to the Corinthians, Labour to attaine to the better giftes, but chiefly to prophesie. I answer, that the Apostle there repro- ueth the preposterous iudgement of the Corinthians. For they most esteemed the gift of tounges, when as rather prophesie was much better. And if any mā had ech faculty, namely, of speaking with tounges, and of prophesying (which thing happened to many, for Paul himselfe, both spake with tonges, and prophesied) yet he admonisheth, to labour rather to execute the gift of prophesie then of tonges. And if a mā wil desire of God any of this kind of giftes, Paul sheweth what gift most conduceth to the edifying of the Church. And yet doth he not therfore affirme that it lieth in the hand of euery man to haue what he will. For he sheweth only what is rather to be desired. Origen findeth fault with the Lattin translation, which thus readeth, iuxta rationem fidei, that is, according to the real or consideration of faith. For ἀναλογίαν, that is, proportion, he thinketh signifieth a competent measure. But whether those be the wordes of Origen, or rather added to by the interpreter, I somewhat doubt. For in my iudgement it seemeth not verie likely, that Origen in his interpretations would seke for any helpe of the Lattin bookes. And besides that I see not howe iustly our translation in this thinge shoulde be reproved. For ἀναλογία may verie aptly be turned ratio. Now resteth to declare why I sayd, that prophesie is here set forth as a general office, which after ward is deuidenth into doctrine, & into exhortation: This I proue by the wordes of the Apostle, which I before cited out of the 14. chapter to the Corinthians. He which prophesieth speaketh edification, exhortation, and consolation to all men. In these wordes Paul most mani- festly

Free giftes are not ditributed of God according to the will of the receauers.

Those giftes depend not of our preparation but of the will
of God.

festly teacheth to what peculiar offices the gyft of Propheſſe pertayneth in the Church.

Or a ministry, in ministry. ] The want of this speech may thus be supplied whether he haue a ministry, let him abide and be occupied in the ministry, and wholly apply himselfe thereunto: vnles paraduenture any had rather with Origen to repete that former particle namely, according to the proportiō or measure of sayth let him exercise himselfe in the ministry. As touching the sence Paul in these wordes sheweth, that God will not that any man should be Idle in his vocation. For as Alexander sayd to Mammae, There is nothing moze pernicious to a common welth, then to haue thinges done by deputies. Euery mā ought to labour himselfe in his vocation. But what a lamentable case is it, to see in these dayes infinite ministers in the Church, which boast, that they are not bound to preach, to fede the flocke, and to gouerne the shepe of Chriſt: when yet in the meane time they receiue no small gaynes at the handes of theyr shepe.

No man
ought to be idle in his vocation.

He which teacheth in teaching. ] Of this commaundemēt the Apostles haue geuen vs an excellent example, when they sayd, It is not mete for vs to leaue the word of God and to minister at tables. For soasmuch as they were appoynted of the Lord to teach the whole world, they would be occupied in teaching.

He which exhorteth, in exhortacion. ] These two to teach and to exhort are of very nigh affinity the one to the other. And sometimes ech is geuen to one and the same man. But sometimes and for the most part they are deuided. For a man shall see some teach aptly, and most playnly set forth thinges most subtle, and perspicuously expound thinges that are obscure: which selfe men yet in exhortacions are very vnapt. There are others, which haue a wonderfull dexteritie and efficacy in exhortacions, which yet of all men are most vnapt to teach. By the wordes of the Apostle to the Cor. a litle befoze alledged we see how the giftes of the prophesie are distinguished. First he sayth, He speaketh edification, which pertayneth to doctrine: secondly, exhortacion: namely whereby men are stirred vp to do good and to eschew euill: thirdly is put consolation. For oftentimes it cometh to passe that some are broken in aduersities, which by that meanes may seme redy either to dispayre or to fall away frome the truth. Wherefoze it is necessary that they be holpen by consolation.

To teach,
& to exhort,
are diuers.

These parts of prophesie

This part Paul here prosecuteth not (I thinke therfoze) for that he comprehendeth it vnder exhortacion. And how much publike teachings and exhortacions were vsed in the old time in the Church, we may gather out of that 14. chapiter to the Corinthians. Yea neither were these thinges cuer entermitted in the sinagoges of the Jewes, so often as there was had an holy assembly. Which may here by be proued, for that vnto Chriſt, when he was set downe in the sinagoge, was deliuered a booke, to expound somewhat thereof vnto the people. And when Paul and Barnabas came to Antioch as Pisidia, as it is writte in the 13. chapiter of the Actes, and were come to the sinagog with the rest of the Jewes, the ruler of the sinagog sayd vnto them, If ye haue any word of consolation for the people, say on.

In the sinagoge of the Jewes, these offices of prophesie were vsed.

He that distributeth, let him do it with simplicity. ] Here is touched the office of deacons, as they were at that time, and ought also to be in our time. Theyr office was to distribute to the poore the almes and oblations of the faythfull. Let the do theyr office sayth he with simplicity. Let them conueighe nothing away by craft, or by euill practises. For noughty and deceatefull men, when they haue the charge of common receauinges of money, do nothing simply, but vse wonderfull guiles and subtiltie. The faultes Paul willeth to be remoued away from this kind of ministry. Others thinke that the geuing ought to be done simply, that is, without any regard to get the prayse of men, which some seke for in the distribution of other mens almes. But the first interpretation in my iudgement semeth moze apt.

The office of Deacons

He that ruleth, with diligence. ] Although I doubt not that there were many kindes of gouernēt in the Church, yet to confesse the truthe, this as I thinke may

The office
of the elders

most aptly be vnderstanded of those which were called presbiteri, that is, elders, not of these which had the charge of the word and of doctrine, but of those which were appointed as helpers to the pastors. They as men of the wiser sort & endow- ed with a greater zeale and piety, were chosen out of the Laytie. Their office was chiefly to se vnto discipline, and to looke what euery man did, and in euery house & famely to se what euery man neded, either as touching the soule, or as touching the body. For the Church had his elders, or if I may so speake, his senate, which as time required prouided for all thinges mete and profitable. Paul describeth this kind of ministry not only in this place but also in the first to Timothee: For thus he writeth. The elders, are worthy of double honour, especially they which labour in the word & in doctrine. In which wordes he semeth to signify, there are some presbiteri which teach and set forth the word of God: and there are others, which although they do not this, yet are they gouerners in the Church as elders. This thing Am- brose left not vntouched, when he expounded that place, yea he complayneth, that euen the either thorough the pride, or thorough the slouthfulness of the priests they were in a maner wome away. For whilest they which haue the gouernment of the Church seeke to draw all thinges to themselves, they diligently as much as they can, labour that in that roome should be ioyned no fellow officers with the. Wherefore Paul willeth, that they which haue this charge, do put to theyr diligence, and expell slouthfulness and sluggishnes.

Why these giftes are called free giftes.

He that sheweth mercy with cherefulness. This semeth to haue bene the of- fice of widdowes & of old men: which were to that end maintayned of the Church, to se vnto strangers and to sicke persons. Vnto these he not without iust cause com- maundeth cherefulness. For men weake and afflicted are much relieued, if they see their necessities holpen with cherefulness. For they which do these thinges with an heauy and frowning loke, do seme to adde sorrow to them that are in sor- row. For thereby they suspect that they are greuousome and burdenous to theyr brethren. By meanes whereof they are oftentimes brought to that poynt, that they count death much better the than life. Thus much hath Paul spokē of the publique ministers of the Church, which he not without iust cause calleth χαρισματα, y is, free giftes. For all these thinges, although it seme they may be gotten by humane art and industry, yet by our endeour we shall neuer bring any thing to passe y way, vnles we be holpen by the grace of God, whereby those thinges which we do are made profitable, and of efficacy. For they which are occupied in these offices with- out the helpe of God, may indeede winne praysē of men, and commendation of the people, but they are not able to aduance the saluation of the soules, and the com- modities of the Church. And as touching this matter oftentimes they haue God fauorable & prosperous vnto the, which yet obey him not with a sincere will. But this is exceedingly to be lamented that this gouernance of the Church is so mise- rably decayed, that at this day not so much as the names of these functions are a- ny where extant. They haue put in steed of them, Laper carriers, Accoluthes and Subdeacons, which haue light and trifling effects appoynted to them pertayning to theyr superstitious alters.

Let loue be without dissimulation: hating that which is euill, and cleauing to that which is good. Being affectioned with a bro- therly loue to loue one an other. In geuing honor, go one before an other. Not slouthfull to do seruice, seruent in spirite, seruing the time. Reioysing in hope, patient in tribulation, continuing in pray- er, communicating to the necessities of the Sayntes, geuing your selues to hospitality.

Let loue be without dissimulation. Men are of theyr owne nature very prone to hipocrisie. Wherefore Paul expressly prohibith it. For God, as Iohn sayth, will not that we should loue in wordes & in tounge: but in dede and in truth.

And

And Paul to Timothe writeth, Love ought to come from a pure hart, and a good conscience, and a sayth unfayned. Origen sayth, He which loueth God, and those things which God willet, that man hath love without dissimulation. But he which loueth not either God, and those things which God willet, he I say loueth not, but only dissembleth and pretendeth love. As if a man see his neighboꝝ fallen into some greuous crime & doe not admonishe him, oꝝ reprove him, his love is counterfeit. For he willet not those things towarde his neighboꝝ which God willet. The fauor of his neighboꝝ is moze deare to him, then the will of God.

Hating that which is euill, and cleuing to that which is good. ] Good and euill in this place may signifie profite and disprofite. And so the sence here is he loueth his neighbour without hipocrisie, which hateth all things whatsoeuer he seeth shalbe discommodious and hurtfull vnto him: but those things, which may by any manner of meanes be profitable oꝝ commodious vnto him, he both vehemently desireth, and as much as he can helpeth forward. It may be also that Good and Euill signifie honest and dishonest. And so they which loue truly, abhorre from wicked and filthy woꝝkes: and as much as they can apply themselves to holy and honest woꝝkes. Which is therefore sayd, for that some are so foolish, that they thinke they loue theyꝝ neighbours, when they consent to them in theyꝝ wicked lusts and great extorsions. But this is not that love, which the Apostle describeth, when he sayth, that we ought to abhorre from wickednes, and to embrace as much as lieth in vs that which is honest & iust. Chrysostome noteth that ἀποσυγγνις, that is, hating is spoken with a vehemency. For this preposition, ἀπο, which Paul signifieth vehemency of speech as in the 8. to the Romanes, ἀποκαρδοχία, signifieth not any common, but a great and vehement carefulnes and anguish. And ἀποδιχλαί, signifieth moze then to waite for: For it signifieth diligently to wait for. And ἀπολύρωσις, is redemption, not euery kinde of redemption, but an absolute redemption. Mozeouer we see that the affect of hatred is not in vayne planted in our myndes: but to the end we should exercise it vpon vices. Wherefore the Stoikes vniuersally reiected affects: For affects are the matter of vertues. And as in an harpe when to the wood, pegges of bone and stringes are applied number, proportion and measure, is brought forth a most swete harmonye: so when to these affects is added the spirite and grace of God, of them spring forth notable and excellent vertues. But we are in the fault which abuse those giftes of God, and hate those things which both are honest and please God: and contrariwise the things which are filthy and displease him, we embrace. And so peruerse oftentimes is our iudgement, that we call good euill, & euill good. Although the nature of the things themselves be not chaunged by our iudgement. For things that are filthy, are alwayes filthy, although we iudge otherwise of them. Wherefore he wisely answered, Αἷσχρόν τὸ γὰρ αἷσχρον, καὶ δοκῇ, καὶ μὴ δοκῇ: that is, That which is filthy, is filthy, whether thou so iudgest it, or no. And this is to be noted that as the Apostle commaundeth vs to be ἀποσυγγνις, which woꝝd as we haue declared signifieth an hatred with vehemency, so willet he vs not simply and absolutely to cleave vnto God, but addeth the particle καλλωμένοι, which signifieth to be ioyned together not sclenderly, but as it were with a strong and indissoluble bond.

Being affectioned to loue one another with a brotherly love. ] In Greke it is τὴ φιλαδελφία εἰς ἀλλήλους φιλόσοργοι: in which woꝝds is declared, what manner of affect love is, namely, a brotherly affect. And it is called σοργή: which woꝝd signifieth an affect not comming of election, such as are frendshippes which men enter into one with another: but grafted in by nature, and therefore so ioyned to our minds that it can neuer in a manner vtterly be shaken of. And soasmuch as of these naturall affections there are sondꝝy sortes oꝝ kindes (for either they are betwene the parents and the children, oꝝ betwene the husband and the wife, oꝝ betwene brethren) the Apostle mencioneth that kind which most agreed with his exhortacion which he had begonne: namely, to geue vs to vnderstand þ our love towarde others ought to be a brotherly love: which is therefore moze vehement then are common frendshippes

Good signifieth two things.

The affect of hatred is not in vayne planted in vs.

The Stoikes vniuersally reiected affects.

Things are not chaunged by our iudgement.

What Storge signifieth.

ships, for y<sup>e</sup> these friendships are dissolued euen among honest men, when they perceiue y<sup>e</sup> they<sup>r</sup> frendes haue fallen away fro<sup>m</sup> iustice, & are become wicked, & corrupt. But as touching our parents, brethren & children, it is vndoubtedly a griefe vnto vs if we se the behaue them selues otherwise the we would they should: yet is not therfore y<sup>e</sup> affection of our mind towarde the extinguished. Moreover in these affections of loue we seke not, y<sup>e</sup> in our louing one should recompense an other wth mutual benefites. For of our owne accord we loue both our children and brethren, although they haue not bound vs vnto the by any they<sup>r</sup> benefit to vs ward. And so much as these things ought to be obserued in christia<sup>n</sup> loue, therfore Paul calleth it agape, although it come not of nature, but of the spirite of God and of grace. And how much the consideration of brotherhode is of force to stirre vp loue betwene Christian men, we are taught by the example of Moses. For he the next day after that he had slayne the Egyptian, when he went to visite the Hebrewes, and saw a certayne Hebrew doing iniury to an other Hebrew, as S. Stephan recitereth the history, sayd vnto them, Ye are bretherne, why doo ye in this sorte iniury one an other? The force of this affect Ioseph also declareth: For he when he ment vpon the so dayne to reconcile himselfe to his brethren, who had solde to be a bondman, sayde vnto them: I am your brother Ioseph. And so soone as he had spoken that, he could not restrayne him selfe from teares. So great is the force of this affect with the godly. Neither is the mutuall loue betwene Christians without iust cause called a brotherly loue. For Christ called his disciples brethren: and y<sup>e</sup> at that time chiefly when after his resurrection he was now endued wth immortality. Aristotle in his 9. booke of Ethics, wher he cntreteth of friendship. Amongst brethren (saith he) one and the selfe same thing is distributed amongst many, and therefore for as much as they communicate among themselves in one, and the selfe same thing, they by good right loue the one the other. By that one and the selfe same thing wherin brethren communicate, he vnderstandeth the substaunce of the father and of the mother, wherof eche haue their part. The like consideration also is there betwene the faithful. For as Peter sayth, they are made partakers of the nature of God, wherfore they ought to loue one an other as brethren: which thing if they neglect to doe, they are wo<sup>r</sup>thely called asephoi, that is, without naturall affections. Which vice, as a sinne most greuous Paul in the first chapiter of this Epistle attributed to those which fell away from the true worshipping of God, and were therfore deliuered of him into a reprobate minde.

The loue of brethren is of great
efficacy.

The effects of honour &
of contempt

What honour light-
neth.

The neglecting of our brethren stirreth vp contentions.

In geuing honor go one before an other. This is the proper effect of brotherly loue, that whome we loue, those we labour by all meanes to honour: and in so doing, we allure those whome we honour to loue vs again: as contrariwise when we contemn our brethren, we breake in sonder the fetters of loue, and prouoke our brethren to hatred and enmities towarde vs. For what thing els is anger, but a desire of vengeance, springing by reason of contempt? Honor is here taken not only for a certaine outward reuerence, wherby we reuerence the dignitie of our neighbour, but also for an outwarde helpe, succor, and aide, wherby we help those which stand in neede. So Paul admonisheth Timothe to honour widowes. And Christ reprobued the Phariseis, for that they contemned the precept of God (which commaunded that parents should be honored,) when they gaue counsell to y<sup>e</sup> children, to offer vp those things in the temple, which ought rather to haue ben bestowed towarde the relief of their parents. And of how great force the neglecting of this kinde of helpe towarde our brethren, is to stirre vp hatred and enmities, we may gather out of the Actes of the Apostles. For straight way in the primitive Church, there arose a grudge, for that the widowes of the Grekes were contemned in the daily ministry. Whereunto Christ exhorted his, when he willed that they should not please for the first romes in the sinagoges, and that being bidden to feasts, they should sit downe in the lowest rowme. This wo<sup>r</sup>de προνομιαν, which is in this text, may haue a double sense by reason of the diuers significatiō of the verbe προνομιαν. For sometimes it is taken for existimo, or reputo, that is to esteeme esteem or make account of. And so the sence shall be, let every man thinke that others are moze worthy of honour then him selfe. As to the Philippians in the 2. Chapter it is witten, τὴ ταπεινότητι ἑαυτοῦ ἕκαστος ἑαυτὸν ὑπερέχοντα ἵστανται, that is, in humbleness of minde, every man esteeming others better then him selfe. And sometimes ὑπομῆναι, signifyeth nothing els, but to be a captaine, and to goe before. And so the sence is, let every one of you pzeuent the other with honour, and suffer not himself to be pzevented.

Not slouthfull to doe seruice. For as much as these things which he hath now reckened by, ought not slenderly to be put in vze, therfore Paul sayth, therein we must doe our diligence. And the slouthfulness, which he commaundeth to be put away, is that slownes in executyng of offices, whereby men declare that they doe those things which they do, grudgingly. From which fault they are cleare, which doe it with such cherefulness and willingnes, that sometimes they contemne euen their own commodities. In sume Paul requireth, that we loue not only in words, but also in very dede, and with an effectual endeuor: and that we be not professors of this Philosophy, ἀνὴρ τοῦ ὑπατάειν, μὴ τοῦ ἀγαθῶν, that is, all in words, but nothing in dedes: which thing was reproued in diuers wise men amongst the Ethnikes.

Feruent in spirite. Those things, which he hath now made mention of, for that they bring with them troubles, lothsomnes, laboures, and costes, therfore commonly seme irksome vnto the fleshe. Therfore Paul requireth that we suffer not our selues to be seduced by the flesh, but rather, that we be feruent in spirite. Men neither hot nor colde, highly displease God: I would to God (sayth he,) thou wert either hot or colde, but for that thou art luke warme, and neither hot nor colde, I will begin to spew thee out of my mouth. This word spirit may here signifie two things, either the power and instinct of God, or els our soule. And it is doubtfull whether sence we ought here to follow. And that spirite sometimes signifyeth our soule, it may be gathered by many places of the scriptures. For it is witten, blessed are the pure in spirite. Againe, he bowed downe his head, and yelded up the spirite. Againe, that the spirite may be saued in the day of the Lord. Againe, that it may be holy both in body and in spirite. Againe, the body without the spirite is dead. Againe, Christ went to the spirites whiche were in prison. Howbeit I graunt that this word spirite hath either signification. And I here thinke that it hath either signification: namely bothe our soule, and also the power of the spirite of God, wherewith the faithfull are illustrated. Therfore Paul requireth a force and efficacie, wherby our minds should be inflamed. And although as we haue before taught, it lieth in no mannes hand, to be endued of God with this or that power of the free gifts, for God distributeth them to every manne as he will) yet the regenerate, for that they are not simply men, but are the men of God, and haue their strengthes after a sort renewed by the grace and spirite of God, they may by their endeuor, prayers and industry stir vp in themselves the spirite, whereby to be feruent, or they may frame themselves vnto it, when it stirreth them vp. For so Paul sayth to Timothee. Stirre vp the grace which is in thee, by the imposition of the hands of the eldership. And to the Thessalonians, Take heed ye extinguish not the spirite. For euen as vnto fire, being once kindled, we may put wood and coles, to make it to burne the moze, so the spirite being now geuen may by the exercise of doctrine, exhortacion, or ministry, be stirred vp, to make vs the moze feruent: and this to do, Paul now here exhorteth vs. In the Actes of the Apostles the 18. chapter it is witten of Apollo, that he spake with a feruent spirite, as which taught diligently those thinges which pertayned to the Lord. But it is added that he was learned, and eloquent. In that place I see two thinges ioyned together, which are very necessarye for a pzeacher. First that he diligently take heed what he speake: that he poure out nothing rashly or agaynst the truth: the second is, that those thinges which he speaketh, be not spoken coldly and slenderly, but be set forth effectually and feruently. But in some, though otherwise they are behement inough, yet there wanteth doctrine: & in other some, in whom sometimes seemeth to be diligence inough, yet they want feruentnes of spirite.

Spirit sometimes signifies our soule.

The regenerate may after a sort stirre vp in themselves the spirite.

Two principal offices of a pzeacher.

And

Cap. 12. A Commentarie vpon the

And that which I now speake of preachers, ought also to be applied to other offices, wherof is now entreated.

Seruing the time. ] Here some rede καιρος, that is, time, and some καιρως, that is, Lord. Chrysostome and Origene read, Lord: and rather allow that reading, then to read time: peradventure therfore for that they thought it is the poynt of an inconstant and light man to be changed according to the time: and for that to serue the time, may seme to be rather a wary behaviour of mā, then y<sup>e</sup> worshipping of God. But contrariwise Ambrose, what needed (saith he) to say that we must serue the Lord, when as all the things which hitherto haue bene spoken, sheweth that we should serue the Lord. But that notwithstanding there is no cause, but that we may read, Lord. For they mought say, that Paul in his sentence admonisheth the godly to thinke that in all those things they serue not men, but God, who seeth all things, and to whose hono<sup>r</sup> all things ought to be directed. How be it Origene somewhat relēteth and saith, that we may serue the time, whilest we consider how short it is, and contracted: that although we haue wiues: yet we are as if we had none: and although we possesse, yet as though we possessed not, redeeming the dayes for that they are euill: which interpretation I dislike not. Although time in this place may more aptly signifie occasion, which is earnestly and diligently to be obserued, if we wil doe any good to our brethren. For occasion otherwise passeth away, neither can it be called backe againe when we will. We know, with how great subtlety and wickednes, Satan and the flesh resist the workes of God. And therefore it cometh that there is no man almost which patiently taketh admonitions & reprehensions. And muche les in a manner, if we admonish out of time, and out of season. Paule gaue place somewhat to the time, when he Circumcised Timothe. But he could by no means be perswaded to circumsise Titus also, though he were vehemently therunto vrged. Christ himselfe according to the consideration of the time fled, when the Jewes sought to put him to death, howbeit afterward, when he saw opportunitie he returned of his owne accord. Therefore his disciples sayd, Euen now the Jewes sought to stone the: and wilt thou now agayne go into Jewry? Christ answered them. Are there not 12. houres in a day? In which words he signified that we ought to serue time. And for no other cause. Salomon sayth, that there is a time to build, and a time to plant. &c. Such occasions are as certayne bekes of God to bring thinges well to passe: which bekes we ought no les to obserue, then soldiers do the signe or watchword of they<sup>r</sup> captayne. And good seruants attempt nothing before that they se they<sup>r</sup> Lord or maister to beken thereunto. Erasmus thinketh, that to serue the tyme, is to take in good parte aduersities, when they at any time happen. And this sentence he thinketh is confirmed by that which foloweth. For Paul addeth, Reioysing in hope: patient in tribulation. But if there be any which like better the other reding, seruing the Lord, we wil not be agaynst it. But here is to be noted this Greke word δουλευοντες, that is, seruing. For thereby we vnderstand (which thing we before also admonished) that a δουληα, belongeth not only vnto creatures excellling in dignity, but also vnto God him selfe. On the other side he which thinketh, that Paul commaundeth vs to serue the time, ought to be ware, that whilest he obserueth occasion he decline neither to the right hand nor to the left, that is, that he chaunge not his sentence. For we ought to be constant in that which we rightly vnderstand: although euery time will not suffer vs to burst forth straight way into act.

Occasion to be obserued.

Occasions are counted as bekes of God.

What is to be taken heed of, in obseruing of occasions.

How patience worketh hope, and hope patience.

Reioysing in hope. ] This can not they do which settle them selues in worldly thinges for in them only put they all they<sup>r</sup> hope and confidence: and wayte for nothing els. Paul in this place vnderstandeth the hope of eternall felicitie: whereby men are so confirmed in aduersities, that Paul to the Thessoloniās calleth it a helmet. Here is hope reckened as the ground of patience in tribulation. At which thing some man peradventure may meruaile. For before in the 5. chapter Paul wrote, Tribulation worketh patience, patience experience, and experience hope. Where we se that hope is produced of patience. But contrariwise in this place patience is sayd to spring of hope. But herein is no contrarietie. For this commonly cometh to passe in thinges which are nigh by nature, that by an inuerse order they mutually inferre the one the other. For so of rayne are engendred cloudes, and a gayne of cloudes is brought forth rayne. And as the philosophers say, of good actions spring vertues, and contrariwise of vertues spring good actions. Chrysostome, as we befoze admonished, testifieth, that the honor which we geue vnto brethern hath not only loue to the roote thereof, but also engendred the selfe same loue in those whom we honor. Now hope, to expresse the nature thereof, is a certayne faculty or power breathed into vs of God, whereby with a constant and patient mind, not thorough our owne strengthes, but thorough Iesus Christ, we wayt for the saluation now begun in vs (which by sayth we haue receaued) vntill at the length it be accomplished. They which hope are mery and reioyce, for that they are assured, that they shall one day obteyne the thinges which they hope for. Howbeit in the meane time they are somewhat sorry, and it greueth them, for that they haue not as yet obteyned those thinges. Moreouer they which hope for thinges hard and difficile, which yet are not impossible. For vnles we thought, that we may by the grace and spirite of Christ obteyne eternall life, we would neuer hope for it. Paul befoze in the 8. chapter obserued euē this selfe same order. For he taught that of hope springeth patience. For the hope (sayth he) which is fene, is no hope. For who hopeth for that which he seeth? And a litle afterward, If we hope for that which we se not, we wayte for it thorough patience. Doubtles the mind is not a litle stirred vp to suffer all thinges, where great rewarde is set forth. And therefore in the selfe same chapter Paul sayth, The sufferings of this time are not worthy the glory to come, which shalbe reueled in vs. But here it may be doubted, why Paul vnto hope attributeth ioye: especially seing that ioye is an affect comming of a present good thing: but hope is of a thing to come. I answer that those good thinges which are hoped for are in dede absent but such is the force of hope, that that which is absent, it after a sort maketh present. Therefore Paul in the 8. chapter very aptly wrote, that by hope we are made safe: and vnto the Ephesians, That God thorough Christ hath brought to passe, that we now sitte together with him in heauen at the right hand of God. And according to this forme of doctrine we vse to say, that they which beleue truly & hope, do make the body and bloud of Christ euen present, although otherwise in very dede they be in heauen: and they wholly in mind and in spirite haue the fruition of them, so often as they rightly and godly come together to the supper of the Lord. But how great a good thing it is, to haue in tribulations a patient mind, hereby may be gathered, for that it is a common saying: That it is a great euill, not to be able to suffer euill: as if a man should say, that aduersities, and tribulations, which commonly are called euill, are not in very dede euill, but only for that they can not be borne or suffered.

Continuing in prayers.] Chrysostome gathereth together in good order those thinges which may mitigate the painefulnes of those offices, which haue now ben mencioned. Which chayne or order he thinketh Paul hath diligently prosecuted. The first remedy is loue, and that such a loue which cometh of a brotherly affect. For there is nothing hard to him that loueth: Secondly is required the feruentnes of the spirite of God: thirdly the hope of that which is most excellent: fourthly ayde & helpe obtayned at Gods hand by affectuall prayers. Wherefore Paul here admonisheth vs of prayers, that we should continue in them. But whereas he here saith προσκαρτεροῦντες, that is, continuing, to the Thessalonians he sayth, ἀδιαλείτως, that is, vnceasingly. For we ought to pray vnto God without ceasing and intermission, so much as humane imbecillitie will suffer. And euery man, so often as any thing happeneth which eyther troubleth the mind, or stirreth vp a feare, or desire, ought to turne his mind to God, which can either deliuer him or accomplish the thinges which he desireth. And this is done in a moment, and in the twinkling of an eye. Pea those prayers are chiefly commended, which are as burning firebrands cast vp into heauen by a sodayne conuersion to God, and do not thorough multitude

Things
nigh by nature together. too by an inuerse
order in-ferre theene
the other What hope is.

Hope ma-keth glad & maketh sorry

Hope is of things hard but not of things impossible.

Hope ma-keth things absent, present.
Faith also maketh
things absent, present
Of the Eucharist.

It is a great euill, not to be able to suffer euill.
A most profitable
chaine.

Cap. 12. A Commentarie vpon the

of wordes wate cold. And Christ in Luke the 19. chapter admonisheth vs to pray alwayes, and not to be weary. In Greke it is, μὴ ἴνακῆν. For κακοὶ are sometimes those which are stoutfull and sluggish. And that we should not become such, nor be discouraged in prayeng, Christ hath set forth vnto vs the parable of the widow and of y<sup>e</sup> vniust iudge: to declare vnto vs, that God will without doubt heare those thinges, which we incessantly aske of him. And at the end of the parable he addeth The Lord will take vengeance of the quickly. But how doth he it quickly, when oftentimes he differeth it so long? He is sayd to doe a thing quickly, which doth that that is to be done so soone as occasion offereth it selfe. Wherefore the tarieng is not in God, but in our thinking. But if we should be admitted into the inward parts and secrets of the counsell of God, we should so that we are very rashe and heblong in making our petitions. Wherefore that is to be cast away from vs, that we be not letted from enduring and perseuering in prayers.

God quickly auengerh
his.
There is no
tarieng in God but in our thinking.

The sayntes
haue most rede about
all other.
Why the flesh abhorreth the
pooze.

Of the
pooze and of straungers.

Communicating to the necessities of the Sayntes: geuing your selues to hospitalitality. ] He chiefly maketh mencion of the sayntes, for that they aboue all others haue most nede, as those whome the world hateth. And he rightly addeth, Stran- gers: for at that time y<sup>e</sup> sayntes being turned out of all they<sup>r</sup> goods, liued oftentimes as wanderers abroad and exiles. Wherefore Paul exhorteth the Romanes to entertaine such men with a louing mind, and with liberall hospitalitie. The flesh is not redy to doe good to this kind of men. For when it seeth them in misery, it iudgeth, that they can by no means be recompensed agayne at they<sup>r</sup> hands, and therfore, whatsoeuer is bestowed vpon them, it thinketh to be lost. And they which follow this affect, count nothing moze blessed, then to receaue. Wherefore they willingly geue nothing, but where they thinke there shall returne vnto them a gayne either as much, or rather moze. God oftentimes in the law commendeth strangers. In Exodus the 22. chap. he commaundeth the Israelites, that they should not bere strangers but should handle them curteously, for that they them selues also were once strangers in Egipt. Whereas he putteth them in minde of things past, that may also be profitable vnto vs, if we consider what may happē hereafter.
For who is now so certayne of his home and habitation, that he can be assured that he shall neuer be a straunger? And in the 19. chapter of Leuiticus, commaun-dement is geuen to the haruest folkes, and to the grape gatherers, that they gather not all, but leaue somewhat for the poore and for straungers, and God commaundeth his people to loue them euen as themselves. And in the 10. chapter of Deut. God affirmeth, that he is the protector and auenger of Orphens, widowes and straungers. For these kindes of people are left to his care. Vnto all such kind of men we owe our beneuolence, and chiefly if they be of the household of fayth: of whom Paul now presently entreateth. Of this thing the Apostles Peter, James, and Iohn, had so great care that when they sent away Paul to the Gentles, and they themselves were appointed to be ministers vnto the circumcision, they commended vnto his care the poore which dwelt at Jerusalem. And this office he testified to the Galathians that he with an earnest diligence accomplisshed. What which is in the lattine booke, Necessitatibus, that is, necessities, is not well turned. For the Sophisters abuse this word, and teach, that a Christian man is not bound by the commaundementes of God, to helpe the miserable, vnles they be in verie great, or as they speake, in extreame necessity. But Paul willetth vs to communicate rather to their bles then to their necessities. For to do good vnto thy neighbour, thou must not tary vntill he be vrged with extreame necessity. For no man would gladly so be dealt with. Neither is this to be passed ouer in silence, that some booke in stead of χρειαις, that is, bles or necessities, haue μυριας, that is, memoies. And of this reading Origen or rather his interpreter maketh mencion.
And Ambrose both so readeth it, and also interpreteth it. And so the sence is, that we ought to do good not onely to the poore which are present, but also to them that are absent. For Thales milesius was wont to say, that we ought to remember our frendes, not onely which are present, but also that are absent. And the Apostle had

Whetherin
helping of the poore
we ought to tary vntill
they be in extreme necessity.

had a greate care to prouide that the Gentles shoulde minister almes vnto the Saintes which dwelt at Jerusalem. Notwithstanding we will follow the accustomed reading ῥηταις and say, that we ought to communicate to the blessing of the Saintes, to their blessing (I say) and not to their pleasures or delights. For by that meanes men are oftentimes made worse. And besides that also, such superfluitie would serue to relieue other poore folkes also. Neither (saith he,) geuing, or bestowing, but κοινωνουτες, that is, communicating. For in almes geuing there is a certaine communicating. For if we speake of the poore which were at Jerusalem, the Gentiles had receiued at their hands spirituall things. For the worde of the Lord came out of Sion, and the law of God out of Jerusalem, and saluation from the Hebrewes. For out of that nation were appoynted preachers of the Gospell to preache vnto the whole world. Therefore Paul in the second to the Corinthians the 8. chapter, saith That your aboundance may relieue their want, and that on the other side theyr aboundance may relieue your want. But if we speake of other poore folkes, euen when we helpe them with our almes, there redoundeth vnto vs no small commoditie or profite. For Christ saith, as we read in Luke, Make you friends of the wicked Mammon, that when you faile, they may receiue you into your euerlasting Tabernacles. But what if the poore be euil, and they also excluded from the kingdom of heauē? These things are to be vnderstanded not of the men, but of the workes. But so also should follow an other absurditie, that by the vertue of our workes, we should obtain the kingdom of God. I answer, as we deny that workes are the causes of eternall life, so also deny we not, but that God rewardeth the good workes of the faithfull, which are now regenerate by Christ. For we know that he shal iudge euery man according to his workes. For he will say, I was hungry, and ye fed me. I was thirsty, and ye gaue me drinke: I was a straunger, and ye harbored me. The kingdom of God is geuen for election and the promises sake, which the saints receiue by faith. But because those things are hidden from mannes eyes, therefore are brought forth good workes: which are the proper and manifest effectes bothe of our faith, and of the election of God. Διακονουτες, that is, geuing our selues saith he to hospitalitie. This is not spoken without a great emphasis. For it is a greater matter to apply and geue our selues to hospitalitie, then only to kepe hospitalitie. For Abraham waited not, vntill straungers came home to him, to desire to be receiued in, and to require harborow: but going of his owne accord out of his tabernacle he looked round about, to see if he could espy any straunger, whom he might receiue into his house. And if he saw any, he ranne vnto him, and prayed him, not to passe his house. If I haue founde fauoure (saith he) in your eyes, I beseeche you turne in vnto your seruaunt. And the same diligence and minde was in Lothe, and in a maner in all y<sup>e</sup> fathers. Paule in these wordes chargeth vs not with any vile and vncomely workes, but with workes noble, and of great excellency. For there was neuer any noble man, or notable Prince, but that he was desirous to doe good vnto others, and was careful ouer straungers. Titus Vespasian, at night, when he called to memory, that he had that day done no benefite vnto any man (wold with heauines say) Friends we haue lost this day. And Christ, The kinges (saith he) of the nations beare dominion ouer them, and they which haue power ouer them are called gracious: in Greeke it is δυσπιδου. The Ethnikes also saw that God hath a care ouer straungers, and therefore they worshipped Διαξενιον, that is, Iupiter hospitalis. This propriety of God, Homere, describeth in y<sup>e</sup> second booke of his Odisseas. And Virgil aptly saith: Iuppiter hospitibus nam te dare iura loquuntur: that is. For men say that thou o Iupiter geuest right vnto straungers. And the naturall affecte towarde citezens, commonly stirreth vp euery man, that if he meete a straunger, and one that is in neede, he wil to his power help him, and prouide harborow for him. So we also if peraduenture the Saints, which as touching the eternall countrey, are our Citizens, doe come vnto vs, ought to helpe them, and gently to entertaine them. But what if they be euil, and enemies vnto vs, and such as curse vs, and hate the Gospell? What is in this case to be done? Paul addeth.

We must haue compassion not onely of the that are present: but also of them that are absent.

We must communicate vnto the blessing, and not to the pleasures of the poore.

In almes is a communicating. A recompensing of almes.

Hospitalitie is a worke of noble men.

Iupiter hospitalis.

Blesse them which persecute you, blesse and curse not. Reioyse with them that reioyse, and wepe with them that wepe. Be of like affection one towards another. Be not highe minded, but making your selues equall to them of the lower sorte. Be not wise in your selues. Recompence not euill for euill, procure things honest in the sight of all men. If it be possible, as much as in you is, haue peace with all men. Dearly beloued auēge not your selues, but geue place vnto wrath, for it is written: Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord. Therfore if thine enemy hunger, fede him, and if he thirst geue him drinke. And in so doing, thou shalt heape coles of fire on his head. Be not ouercome of euil, but overcome euill w goodnes.

An excellent laying of Epictetus.

How we may speake
well of our enemies.

Blesse those which persecute you: Blesse and curse not ] I thinke that εὐλογεῖν, that is, blesse, in the first place, signifieth to speake wel, but it may seme maruelous how we can allow or commend him that reuileth vs, & worketh mischief against vs. And if we so do, we shal be found liars. But Epictetus in his Enchiridion wisely admonisheth, that euery thing hath two handles to be holden by, & therfore euery wise man ought to haue a consideration, by which of those handles it may best be taken and holden. For if thou take a thing by that part whereby it can not be holden, thou lovest thine laboz. Now there can none be founde of so wicked and vngratious a nature, but that he which indgeth indifferently may beholde in him some gifts of God. For he is either actiue, or strong, or learned, or noble, or eloquent, or witty. These things though we be neuer so muche prouoked by iniuries, we ought not to deface, or to kepe in silence, if any opportunity be offered vs to speake wel of our enemies. Eschines an Ethnike hidde not from the men of Rhodes the eloquence of his most deadly enemy Demostenes, but rather as much as he coude amplified it, and recited vnto them his most spitefull Oracion which he had written against him: and added, that it was nothing in comparision of the gesture and pronounciation which the orator vsed in vttering it. David bothe in wordes and in dede reuerenced Saul being his enemy, for that he was anoynted of the Lord. And the Apostle now therfore commaundeth this, for that the world indgeth that men should deale farre otherwise. For either it delighteth in cursed speakers, and enemies of the truthe, or it thinketh that it is honest to requite iniuries done against vs. Therfore Vespasian, when there sprang a contention betwene a certain Senator, and a knight of Rome, with this sentence appeased the contention. A Senator ought not doubtles to reuile: but when he is reuiled, it is both a thing lawfull and civile to reuile againe: for that he which first reuiled, spoyled himselfe of the prerogative of his honour. But Paule commaundeth vs far otherwise. For we must not consider what our aduersary deserueth, but what is comely for vs. Neither requireth the Apostle, that we should only speake well of our enemies, but also that we should wish well vnto them. For so thinke I that εὐλογεῖν in the second place is to be taken, as an Antithesis to that which followeth, and curse not. Some thinke that it is nothing but a repetition for a more vehemency sake. But I thinke that this is the better sense, that we are first commaunded to speake well of our enemies: and then to wishe them good: and in no wise to curse them, as men commonly vse to doe. And if this seme a hard matter to doe, let vs remember that we are his children which maketh his Sunne to shine vpon the good, and vpon the euill, and his Disciples, which answered his Apostles when they required fire from heauen, to burne the Samaritanes, ye know not of whose spirit ye are: namely, of his spirit, which came not to destroy, but to saue: of him which healed those that persecuted him: of him which restored vnto Malchus his eare, who came with the other soldiers of the chief rulers to take Christ. Of him which saluted his betrayer Judas as a friend, and receiued him with a kisse: of him finally which forgave the wicked hed these, and promised vnto him eternall felicity, whiche prayed for them that crucified him: and which of his owne accorde died for his enemies. It shall nothing profite thee, to recompense iniuries with iniuries, and taunts with taunts: thou oughtest rather to commit the matter to God, who will be a most iust arbitroz, neither can he by any perturbation be led away from iustice. Further hereby may we gather that it is not lawfull to speake euill of any man, nor to curse any man. For if we be prohibited to doe these things against our enemies, which thing mought other wise seeme tollerable in mannes iudgement, much les it is lawfull for vs to doe it vnto others. Chrysostome, to persuaue vs to follow these wordes of Paul, recheneth by the comodities, which the cursings and persecutions of the aduersaries commonly bring to the goodly. First (sayth he) it excellently well helpeth vs to the obtainment of the kingdome of heauen. For Christ saith, blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness sake, for theirs is the kingdome of heauen. And he addeth, Blessed are ye when they reuile you, and persecute you, speaking all manner of euill, and lying against you for my sake. Be glad and reioyse, for your reward is great in heauen. Ec. Moreover they are an occasion or mater of most excellent vertues. For as Paul teacheth, tribulation worketh patience: patience experience: and experience hope. But where is the patience of the sayntes? Where is their experience? Where is their hope? If thou take away the wicked enterprises of our enemies against vs? Moreover, the glory of God can by no other meanes be more highly aduanced, then if we valiantly and courageously behaue our selues in those things which are to be suffered for his name sake. For it is not so hard a matter to cleaue vnto God, so long as all things goe prosperously and quietly with vs, and as we would desire. But when all manner of aduersities happen, and yet constantly to abide in his obeyfance, this doubtles cometh of a manly and strong faith. And therefore I thinke Iames sayd, that patience hath a perfect worke, vnles peraduenture a man will thus vnderstande it, that perfection is not in any worke vnles we perseuer in the same. For when we leaue of, we bring not the worke to his ende, and so without patience it is left vnperfect. And besides all this, our enemies are by this meanes chiefly feared away from continuing to persecute vs. For when they see we are not moued by their iniuries, they thinke that they lose their labour. And therefore they take not so great pleasure of the reproches, wherewith they reproched vs. But if they perceiue that we are out of quiet, and take it in ill parte, they will thinke that they: iniuries haue taken good successe, and will after ward be moze bolde in they: wicked endeuors. By this we may see why the Lord sayd, blessed are ye when they reuile you, and persecute you, and speake all manner of euill, and make lies against you for my sake. Reioyse and be glad, for your reward is great in heauen. This commaundement of Christ, the Apostles executed. For they returned from the presence of the Counsell, reioysing that they were counted worthy to be reuiled for his name sake. And Paul in the first to the Corinthians sayth, we are euill spoken of, and we blesse. In Greke it is λοισδορούμενοι καὶ βλοσυροί. How be it this counsell Paul alwayes obserued not. For to the Galathians he sayth, I would to God they were cut of, which trouble you. And Danid sayth, let theyr table be made a snare before them, let theyr eyes be made dimme that they may not see, and bow downe theyr backe all wayes. And other bookes of the Prophets, are euery where ful of curses and imprecations, wherewith they curse the enemies of the people of God. Here doubtles as I iudge, is it to be sayd, that we ought so to deale, as Paul now admonisheth, so long as we haue a respecte to our owne iniuries, and that we walke the ordinary way and common course, whereby we are of loue bound to wishe well to our neighbours. But if God open vnto vs his hidden will, and declare what shall without doubt come to passe of our enemies, and of those which persecute vs, then if we sincerely and truly loue him, we ought vn-doubtedly to stay our selues in his will and counsell. Whatbeit this caution is added, first to be fully assured, whether those things which God hath opened vnto vs, pertaine only to a threat, or wholly to declare his determinate and assured wil. For where we suspect that God threatneth only to bring vs to repentaunce, we

If we ought not to speake euill of our enemies much les of others.

Paul also sayes we should not curse our enemy.

Whether it be lawfull at any tyme to curse our enemies.

ought not to cease of from prayers euen for the wicked. So did Moses, when he made supplication to God for his people. So did Abraham for the Sodomites: so did Samuel for Saul: and so did Jeremy for the people. But when they are assured that it is the fixed, and certaine will of God, they doe not only pray against & wicked in prophesying (as Augustine thinketh against Faustus in his. 16. booke and. 22. chapiter, where he thus writeth. But curses when they are spoken by the way of prophesie, come not of the euill desire of him that curseth, but of the foreknowing spirit of him that denounceth them) But also it is done with a minde now consenting vnto God, and wishing the self same things that he wisheth. Dauid when as otherwise he was so gentle and sanowable towards Semei, Abolon, Saul, and other enemies, yet sometime so curseth and banneth the wicked, that it driueth an hozro into the readers. Christ also first bewailed the infelicitie of the City of Jerusalem, for that it knew not the time of his visitation: and sayth, how often would I haue gathered together thy children, as a henne doth her chickens vnder her wings, and thou wouldest not? Howbeit euen the same Christ, when he knew the assured and vnmoueable will of God, did burst forth into these words, I geue thanks vnto thee O father of heauen and of earth, for that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent men, and hast reueled them to infants. Euen so, Lord for that it hath so pleased in thy sight. Whereouer men of God when they come to this poynt, haue not a respecte to theyr owne cause, neither doe regarde theyr owne iniuries: but consider that by the wicked workes of the vngodly, the Church of God is hurt, the spirituall proceedings therof are letted, the course of the Gospell is hindred. And they moste ardently desire that the name of God might be sanctified, & his kingdome most amply spred abroad. And hereof it cometh, that whē the godly pray against wicked men, they persecute not theyr owne enemies, but the enemies of God, whom they desire might be most purely worshipped. Dauid saue that he was called of God to the kingdome, and vnderstode that the enterprises of the wicked, wer not so much repugnant to his honoꝝ, as to the will of God. Wherefore worthely in his prayers he wisheth rather that they should pearish, and that most vile, then that any iotte of the most iust will of God should be hindred. Wherefore bothe in this place, and in suche other like, we are prohibited not only to curse, but also to speake euill, when we are overcome with the contumelies & iniuries of the wicked, by which it is not mete that we shold suffer our mindes to be broken, & to be led away from the rule of charity. Wherein doubtles consisteth the noblenes of stomake of Christians, & their incredible valiantnes of courage, not only not to curse them that persecute them, but also to speake well of them, and to pray vnto God for them. How be it I can not inough wonder, that Aquinas should say, that by these words of Paul, Christians are not compelled by the force of the commaundement, to shew singularly an affect of loue to theyr enemies, or, as they vse to speake, to shew signes of beneuolence vnto them except it be in case of necessity. For it is inough if they exclude them not from the generall bond of loue, wherewith we ought to loue our neighbours. Neither sayth he is it necessary that we peculiarly pray for them. But this is sufficient if we exclude them not from the common prayers which we make for all men. And if any man (sayth he) besides the case of necessity do shew vnto his enemy tokens of a singular loue, or do singularly make intercession for him, that man followeth the counsell of Christ, but obeyeth not the commaundement. But Christ and Paul when they spake of these thinges, taught not this distinction. This doctrine doubtles cutteth in, sonder & strings of Christian religion: it abateth the vehemency of the spirit of God: and taketh away the force and sharpnes of the law of God. Let these men go now and cry out, that we are they which dissolve the endeoꝝ of god workes, and open a window to lose lyfe: when as they can not deny, but that they are the men which at theyr owne pleasure change the assured and seuerer commaundementes of God into counsells. Doubtles Christ and Paul commend these thinges and do not only geue them as counsells: But this is exceedingly to be lamented that those commaundementes,

Wherin
consisteth
the nobles
nes of the macker of the Christians.
An error of Aquinas.

in this iron age of ours are made like to lawes of y Athenians. For they although they were wisely inuented and published abroad, yet notwithstanding lay neglected and were euery where & of all men violated. And this I suppose to haue come of no other cause, but for that the whole iuyse and bloud of Chzistian religion is in a maner dyed by.

The lawes of the Athenians.

Reioyse with them that reioyce, and wepe with them that wepe. In Greke it is the infinitiue mode. And no meruaile for they oftentimes vse the infinitiue mode for the imperatiue mode, as the Latines somtimes vse y selfe same mode for the preterimperfect tense. As touching the entent of the Apostle hereto chiefly he tenderth, that forasmuch as we are all members of one and the selfe same body, we should be altogether of one consent, & there ought to be betwene y members a certayne sympathia or like affection, that, as it is wrytten to the Coz. If one member suffer, the other members suffer also together with it: and that if one member bee glorified, the other members be also glorified together with it. Hereto Paul exhorteth the Thessalonians in these wordes. Brethern, if a man be contaminated with any sinne, ye that are spirituall reprove that man in lenity of spirite, considering thy selfe, that thou also be not tempted. This is nothing ells, but that we should transferre the affects of other me to our selues. When doubtles is a city in good estate, as a certaine wise man sayd, when euery one of the citizens thinketh that iniury done vnto himselfe, which he seeth is done to an other man and counteth that his honour, which he seeth is geuen to an other. He which reioyseth with them that reioyse, and wepeth with them that wepe, declareth himselfe to be both full of humanitie and also to be farre from enuy. Neither doubtles can there any thing be commaunded which is moze conuenient for the Church. For forasmuch as it is one body, and hath Chzist only to his hed, and is gouerned by the the spirite of God only, it is mete, that it be endewed with one and the selfe same sece and affect. Chrysostome when he weigheth the partes of this sentence, sayth y it is an harder matter to reioyse wth y reioyce, then to wepe wth y to wepe: for y man is by nature prone to mercy if he se a man soze afflicted & in great misery: & for y the same man is prone to enuy, if he se an other man encrease and augment in good fortune and prosperous successe. Howbeit to conciliate mindes nothing is of so great force as these two commaundements. For to him that soroweth his sorow is somewhat diminished, if he se that an other soroweth his case together with him. And to him also that reioyseth, the ioy is encreased, if he se others reioyse with him of his felicitie. Hereby also cometh an other commoditie, For if thou sorow together with the afflicted, thou shalt by litle and litle accustom thy selfe to the godly affect of mercy: and if thou take pleasure in the prosperity of thy brother, thou shalt by litle and litle shake of the vice of enuy naturally grafted in the. Origen not vnprofitably admonisheth, that we ought not to thinke, that these commaundementes are to be taken vniuersally. For we ought not with a glad mind to reioyse with a couetous man which reioyseth in his euill gotten goodes, but ought rather with a brotherly admonition to withstand his wicked ioy, and to call him backe frō his foolish and pernicious ioy to repentance. Neither ought we on the other part to mourne together with them which vnrmeasureably bewaile they dead: or which therefore lament, for that they can not haue the fruition of those things which they wickedly desire. For we ought rather to withstand them by reprobuing of them, and to amend they corrupt affectes. Wherefore Paul admonisheth vs to frame our affectes to iust sorow, and to the sound pleasure of our brethren.

When a citye is in good estate.

It is a harder matter
to reioyce
with them
that reioyce,
then to wepe with them that wepe.

We ought not to frame
our selues
to the wyc-ked sorow
and wicked
pleasures of our brethren.

Be of like affection one towarde an other. He exhorteth vs to transferre the affections of other men to our selues, that peace and conoord may grow the stronger, and be the moze constantly retayned. When thou art rich and of might (sayth Chrysostom) if one in misery & pouerty come into thy house, thou oughtest not to indge of him by his beggery, misery, and pouerty, but rather to ascribe vnto thy selfe those things which thou thinkest to be in him: and gladly to participate vnto him those thinges which are thyne. As for example, if thou se him base and abject, such a one oughtest thou also so

Cap. 12. A Commentarie vpon the count thy selfe: if thou thy selfe be mighty and noble, doubt not; but that before God he also is mighty and noble.

Arrogancie
is a pestilence to bio-sherpis loue.

Be not highe minded. ] He utterly remoueth away all arrogancy from the saythfull of Christ. But into this fault falleth he whosoener, attributeth vnto him selfe more then is mete, and which as the common proverbe is, walketh in wondrous. And there is nothing which maketh more to breake the peace and concord of brethren. But we shall very well aduance both our selues and the Church of God if thinking lowly and moderatly of our selues we abase our selues to the lower and meaner sort. For thereto tendeth that which is added.

But making your selues equal to them of the lower sort. ] This sentence some referre to persons of the lower sort, and some to thinges abiect. But we thinke that it is to be vnderstanded of each kind. For they which ascribe not to much vnto themselves, nor disdayne not to abase themselves to the commodities of theyr inferiours, those men (I say) will not contemne baser assayes and offices.

Wherof
commeth
the conceit
of our brethren Every man
hath made one of another.

Be not wise in your selues. ] This thing Paul befoze commaunded in the beginning of this chapter when he sayd, that no man ought to be more wise then is mete, but to be wise vnto temperance. More playnly also and with the selfe same wordes in a maner in the 11. chapter, I would not Brethren (sayth he) that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, Be not wise in your selues. This admonition the holy scriptures euery where vize. For Esay sayth in the 5. chapter. Wo be vnto them that are wise in theyr owne eyes, and to those which are prudent in theyr owne sight. Chrysostome affirmeth, that the rote of this vice is to thinke that a man hath of himselfe all sufficientie. For they which dare hope so much of themselves, do easely contemne others. But the case is farre otherwise. For we haue all nede of the helpe of others, neither is there any man in all poyntes so perfect, but that he nedeth to be holpen by others much inferior vnto him. Who at any time was more prudent then Moses? Yet obeyed he Iethro, when he gaue him good counsell. Saule folloved the counsell of his lad, to go to the seer. And that whiche was not reuealed vnto Isaac touching the infants that came in theyr mothers wombe, was by an oracle shewed vnto Rebecca. Chrysostome thinketh, that the Romans were much infected with this vice: and therefore they were so often admonished touching this, for that the pride which was amongst them much disturbed the assayes of the church, when as the dignity of the city, the amplexes of theyr empire, and theyr excellent endowments of naturall good thinges, abundantly ministered vnto the matter of pride.

Rendring vnto no man euill for euill. ] Vnto the cause is aptly added the effect. For they which arrogantly take vpon the many thinges, and alwayes aspire vnto highe thinges, do easely contemne others, and are offended euen in trifels, and easely demie that they are despised of other men. Whereof springeth displeasure taking, and seeking of vengeance. Some thinke that that which is now sayd differeth from that which is after ward added, Dearely beloved aueng not your selues. For they suppose, that to render euill for euill extendeth farther, then to auenge. But I, to speake the trath, see not, how he which seeketh to recompence euill for euill, seeketh not also to be auenged. Therefore (as I thinke) the Apostle first setteth forth the thing generally: after that he addeth what ought rather to be done: last of all by way of repetition, he returneth to expound that which he put forth, we ought not to render euill for euill. For if we see that that is euill, which our enemy hath done vnto vs, we ought by no meanes to imitate him, as Chrysostome aptly admonisheth vs. Origen addeth that they more greuously sinne, which render euill for euill, then they which first committed the euill. For it is possible that he which first did the hurt, did it vnwares, or was ignorant that that was euill which he did to an other, or thought it would not haue bene so greuous as it was. But he which hath had experience in himself, and knoweth how irksome it is, and will yet notwithstanding repay the selfe same euill, may much more iustly be accused then the other. This sentence Paul putteth forth generally, and excludeth no man. Wherefore it is by no meanes lawfull to recompence euill for euill, neither to Jewes nor more greuously whi-

We thinke
che render euill for euill,
then he
which first promoketh
a man to anger.

to Gentiles, nor doubtles to any man living. And by this meanes is confounded the righteousnes of the Scribes, and of the Phariseis. For they taught, y<sup>e</sup> we ought to loue our friends, and to hate our enemies. How be it Princes, Judges, nor Magistrates doe commit nothing against this law, when they punishe wicked doers: for punishments proceeding of iustice, ought not to be counted amongst euils.

Procuring good things in the sight of all men.] The commo<sup>n</sup> reading hath not only before God, but also before all men. But that particle is more then needeth. Here also is to be noted that he speaketh generally. For he sayth not in the sight of the Grekes, or of the Jewes, or of this man, or of that man, but vniuersally of all men. Paul in the 10. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, sayth: be ye such that ye geue no offence neither to the Jewes, nor to the Grekes, nor to the church of God: euen as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine owne profit, but the profit of many, that they might be saved. This is in a maner all one with that which is in this place commaunded. Wherefore we must not only be ware, that we commit not any thing against those things which are forbidden in the law, but also that we behaue our selues warely in those things which should otherwise be lawfull, least the weaker sort should be offended. Good things, that is, iust, holy, and honest, are procured in the sight of all men, when those things are done, whereby is illustrated the glory of God, and the edifying of our neighbour is aduanced. Notbeit this ought not to be our entent, to get the praise of men. For Christ admonisheth, take heede that ye doe not your righteousnes before men to be sene of them. But let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your father which is in heauen. Wherefore Paule sayth not, Seke to please men, but haue a care that your examples be suche in the sight of all men, that by them they may be put in minde of theyr saluation. And when he sayth procuring, he plainly declareth that this ought not to be done negligently, but most diligently.

If it be possible, as much as in you is, haue peace with all men.] Therefore he addeth conditions, for that peace can not be had, but with certain. And oftentimes it hapneth that through y<sup>e</sup> outrageousnes and maliciousnes of some, peace either can not be made, or els can not be kept: when as they labour through theyr impietie to lead vs away from God, or els we should holde our peace, and consent to oppress our neighbours. But when we come once to this poynt, that either God is openly to be offended, or our neighbour, (whome we ought to ayd, succor & helpe,) is to be forsaken, this peace with wicked men, is vtterly to be refused. For euery faithfull man ought to his power to withstande the enterprises and endeuors of the wicked. Pea Chrysostome sayth that Paule was so seuer, that in the 7. chapter to the Corinthians, he thus wyrteth euen of them which are ioynd in matrimony: And if the vnbeleuer depart, let him depart. For in suche a case the brother or sister is not subiect to bondage: God hath called vs in peace. And we doe as muche as lieth in vs, when we hate y<sup>e</sup> sinne, and loue the persons, and resist them as much as we can, that they commit nothing either against God, or against our neighbour. And this thing so oftentimes happeneth, that Christ sayd, that he came not to send peace vpon the earth, but the sword. Wherefore Paul not without iust cause sayth, If it be possible, and as much as in you is: which conditions we fulfill when we haue our mindes prepared to an vpriight and honest peace. Dauid sayth, with them that hated peace, I was peaceable.

Dearly beloued auenge not your selues: but geue place vnto wrath.] After he had written, what we ought rather to do, then to recompence euil for euil, he returneth more largely to expound that which he put forth. This thing (saith he) I commaund you, that ye auenge not one an other. And therewithall sheweth, what we ought to do, after that we haue receaued iniury. Geue place (sayth he) to anger. But to whose anger? Some vnderstand his anger that hath done to vs the iniury. For so it is possible y<sup>e</sup> in geuing place we may break y<sup>e</sup> violence therof: but if we resist y<sup>e</sup> fury therof, it wil ware more hot. So lightnings ouercome, breake, & with a great noyse and fall cleaue in sonder thinges hard and which resist the. But when they meete with thinges soft and geuing place they easely penetrat and hurt them not at

When peace with men
is to be refused.

at all. So those instruments of warre called Connes, with a great violence overthrow walles and castles built of hard stones, but if they light vpon rampers of earth, which geue place to their stroke, they vtterly lose their strengthes, and nothing hurt. Wherefore good captaynes when they make ware vpon the sea, vse to couer their shippes euery where with wolle, for by reason that the wolle geueth place to the strokes, the whole force of y<sup>e</sup> Connes is easely frustrated. It may thus also be vnderstanded, that we must geue place to the wrath of God: for he which auengeth, preuenteth or rather hindreth himselfe. So the sense is: Commit the matter to God and geue place to his anger. For it hangeth ouer your enemies heads. For when they hurt you, they heap vnto themselves wrath in the day of wrath. Moreover he which auengeth himselfe, doth rashely, and vsurpeth vnto himselfe the office of God: and where as being of a priuate estate he hath not authority ouer those of whom he is hurt, yet he vniustly claymeth it. Beloued, sayth he: for those things which he commaunded seemed to be somewhat hard. And therefore with gentle speach he purchaseth their assent and therewithall declareth, that he writeth not these thinges, for that he litle regardeth their iniuries and hurtes. It is not so, saith he, for I loue you from the hart. Neither commaund I these things but for your owne profit sake. Thou wilt peraduenture demaund, whether Christians are prohibited by these wordes of Paul that when they are hurt they should not goe vnto the Magistrate, and pleade against him which hath done the hurt. They are not hereby vndoubtedly prohibited. How be it this is to be taken hede of, that they doe it not of a corrupt affect, and wicked mind, to seke vengeance, and to repay euill for euill. But this they ought to haue a care of, to defende by the helpe of the Magistrate, those whome they haue in theyr tuition: and moreover that that brother which hath offended, whome they see will not be amended with sound counsels, and godly admonitions, be reformed by some other meanes, lastly that euill examples be taken out of the Church, and out of the publike wealthe. Upon these and such other like considerations, it is lawfull to goe vnto the Magistrate. For he is apoynted of God: as it is lawfull for y<sup>e</sup> faithful to vse other benefites of God, the heauen, I say, the sunne, corn, and frutes, so also is it lawfull for the to vse the magistrate. And so is place geuen to y<sup>e</sup> wrath of God. For y<sup>e</sup> wrath is declared vpon y<sup>e</sup> wicked, either by y<sup>e</sup> Magistrate which iudgeth by the authority of god, or in his place, or if y<sup>e</sup> magistrat neglect his office, by god himselfe, as they vse to speak, immediatly. Wherefore in going vnto y<sup>e</sup> Magistrat, so y<sup>e</sup> it be done rightly & orderly, is no offence committed. But this is chiefly to be take hede of, y<sup>e</sup> we seke not to abuse either God, or y<sup>e</sup> magistrate, only to satisfie our anger, & to fulfil our hatred, as though we would vse them for our tormentours. The common edition hath.

We may go
vnto the magistrate
in iust causes.

We which goe to the magistrate
geue place
to anger.

Whether it
be lawfull to repell violence
by violence.

Not defending your selues.] In Greke it is ἐκδικοῦντες, which worde although sometimes it signifie to defend, yet it signifieth that defence, which is ioyned with vengeance. And a christian is not forbidden, but that he may repell violence by violence: when he is either suddenly inuaded in a solitary place, or that he cannot otherwise haue the ayde of the magistrate. For so much as the lawes made by a iust magistrate permit vnto him this thing, he dothe it not as a priuate man, but as a publique minister armed by iust and publique lawes. Christ sayd, If a man gene vnto thee a blow on thy right cheke, turne vnto him the other. But this is to be done, when thou seest that thou maist by this meanes profite thy brother, or that it conduceth to illustrate the glory of God. But besides these cases, we are not bounde of necessitie so to doe: as both Christ and Paul by theyr example haue taught vs. But whilest we repell violence, by violence we must obserue a moderation of a iust defence of our selues, as the lawyers speake, that we seke not eyther to hurt or to kill him which doth vs violence. And this is diligently to be taken hede of, that we repell his violence that hurteth vs with as litle his hurt as we can. Doubtles vnles it had bene lawfull to repell violence by violence, the Apostles when they followed Christ, would not haue caried swordes with them: but they had swordes. For they sayd vnto Christ, in that last supper. Behold, here are, two swordes. And Peter when Christ should be taken, Shall we smite (sayth he) with the sword. Whereby it is very very manifest, that the Apostles to this use wore smozdes. If this had bene repugnant vnto the law of God, Christ would neuer haue permitted it: for he was a most sharpe defender of the commandments of his father.

Vengeance is mine, and I will repay sayth the Lord. ] That whiche is hard vnto the flesh, and disagreeing from humane reason, he confirmeth by the authority of the word of God. These wordes are witten in Deut. the 32. chapter. And it is to be red in the nominatiue case, and not in the accusatiue case. For in Hebreu it is Linekamuelchalony and in Greke, ἐκδίκησις. That is, vengeance. And y<sup>e</sup> which is added, And I will repay, is not in y<sup>e</sup> Hebreu, but only Vel halom, which is. And a retribution. Wherefore in the Hebreu it is thus: Vnto me vengeance, and retributiō. But the 70. interpreters haue not that particle, but in stede thereof read ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐκδίκησης ἀνταποδοῦναι ἑκάστην. That is, In the day of vengeance I will repay when time serueth. Neither is it to be doubted but y<sup>e</sup> God wil auenge our cause. For in our iniuries he is first offended. For no mā can so much as once think to hurt vs, but y<sup>e</sup> he first violateth the law of God. And he wil take vengeance of our enemies, for y<sup>e</sup> we are vnto him most deare. Therefore he sayth, he which toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. And God is neyther forgetfull, nor also neglecteth his office. Wherefore seing vnto him belongeth vengeance and we are vnto hym deare, & when we are iniured he is first offended, and he neglecteth not that which pertayneth to him, we ought without doubt to leue the vengeance vnto him.

Sayth the Lord. ] This is not had in the Hebreu. Howbeit it is aded of Paul to the end these admonitions should sticke the deaplier in our mindes.

If thye enemy hunger, fede him. ] A notable kind of vengeance, may humayne reason say. But much rather will it so say, if it thinke that in the name of meate and drinke are comprehended all maner of dewties which are necessary for the maintenance of the life. Wherefore the lawyers, when in a testament or will is bequethed vnto a man meate and drinke, thereby vnderstand that vnto him are bequethed clothing, lodging, bedding, phisike, and such other like thinges. And the lord when he sayth, that God maketh his sunne to arise vpon the good and vpon the euill, and rayneth vpon the iust and vpon the vniust, by these two words Sunne and rayne, comprehendeth all the gifts of God, whatsoener we se in thys life common to the good and to the euill.

And in so doing thou shalt heape coles of fire on his hed. ] This some thus vnderstand: thou shalt adde spurres vnto him, whereby he shalbe stirred vp to loue thee agayne. Some thus, Thy benefites shall be vnto him as coles of fire, whereby he shalbe made ashamed, his conscience shalbe troubled, and he shalbe kindled, with confusion: as though this shalbe the vengeance of the godly, and by this ignominy of they<sup>e</sup> enemies they<sup>e</sup> shal satiate they<sup>e</sup> anger. This latter interpretatiō is not so seemely for a Christian man. For none y<sup>e</sup> is godly at any time reioyseth in the hurt of his enemies. I grant indeede, that the benefites which we bestow vpon our enemies may worke these thinges in them. Howbeit we ought in no wise to set forth these thinges as endes of our dewty: but in such sort as we declared in the first exposition, so farforth as they serue to his amendement to whome we do good. The selfe same thing is to be iudged of that which Origen sayth, that these coles signifie hell fire. This indeede may come thorough they<sup>e</sup> default that our benefites should encrease they<sup>e</sup> dampnation and punishmentes. But that ought not to bee the cause of our purpose or entent. For we ought to seke nothinge els but their saluation.

Be not overcome of euill, but overcome euill with good. ] Forasmuch as betwene contraries there is a continuall battaile, therefore Paul aptly maketh mention of good & euill, which are contraries. It is doubtles an excellent kind of victorie, by well doing to overcome the force of hatreds: as contrariwise, it is a pernicious fall to be thowen downe with the outrageousnes of anger. In this battaile it is necessary, that either the wickednes of our enemies be overcome by our goodness, or that our goodness geue place to the fury of our enemies. And that by such polle-

A notable
kind of victory.
& daungerous fall.

ties is overcome the maliciousnes of ill men may be proued even by theyr otone testimony, as Chrysostome writeth. For if they should be asked the question, they will confesse, that they are then overcome of vs, when with a valiant mind we contemne theyr iniuries and hurtes. For there they chafe, they fret, they fume, as though by our patience were broken and utterly delected all theyr strengths. But they wonderfully reioyse when they se vs so moued, that we wil nedes auenge the iniuries which we haue receaued. In humane conflicts, those are said to overcome, which ouerthrow others: and those are counted overcome which being vanquished and euill handled haue the worse. Which is not to be meruayled at, when as those things are the inuentions of the deuill. But the holy ghost here setteth forth vnto vs a farre other kind of battayle: wherein they are overcome, whilest they seke to auerge themselves, playnly declare that they are overcome: and they go alway conquerers, which so lenesse and temperate theyr anger, that they shew benefites vnto them which haue done vnto them iniury. Upon this stage ought Christians to exercise themselves: wherein they haue as lookers on and supporters the Angells. And the author or maister of the game is the most iust God. These wordes, to overcome, and to be overcome, God and euill are of great efficacy: with which vnles our mindes be moued, it is a great argument, that there is but a very slender spirite and bastardy sayth in vs. But what shall we iudge of men excluded from the Church, whome they call excommunicate persons? And what also of them which preach and teach doctrine contrary to the truth. With the one we are commaunded not to eate meate, and to the other not to say so much as God speede. Touching these men, if necessity byge, we ought to geue vnto them meate, and other thinges necessary not for acquaintance, familiarity, or our delectacion sake, but even only that we cease not from the office of charity. But if there be no such necessity, we ought neither to talke with them, nor to eate with them. But if the necessity of the soule or of the body so require, all these thinges which Paul here writeth we ought to obserue towards them.

The diuers
manner of fighting of carrell and of spirituall
men.

The stage of christians.

How we ought to be haue our selues to-wardes the excommuni-
cate, and to-wardes he-reticks.

The thirteenth Chapter.

Et euery soule be subiect to the higher powers: for there is no power but of God: and the powers that be, are ordained of God. Whosoever therfore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist, shall receiue vnto them selues iudgement. For Princes are not to be feared for good workes, but for euil: wilt thou then be without feare of the power? Doe well, so shalt thou haue prayse of the same. For he is the minister of God for thy wealth: but if thou doe euil, feare: for he beareth not the sword for naught. For he is the minister of God, an auenger vnto wrath.

Let euery soule be subiect to the higher powers. If, as we haue before proued, they are to be repayed which repay euill for euill, and if also the office of Christians be to render vnto men that haue offended them the dueties of charitie, then doubtles are they exceedingly to be accused, which in stead of benefites repay euil, & which geue not due honoꝝ, nor shew due obedience to such men as deserue wel at theyr hands, such as are magistrates. And for as muche as the Apostle entendeth diligently, and at large to entreat of this matter, that we may the better vnderstand what his scope is, we will first define what a magistrate is. A magistrate is a person elected, and that of God, to defend the lawes and peace, and with punishments, and the sword to repressse vices and euils, and by all manner of meanes to aduance vertues. The efficient cause is God, the ende is the preservation of the lawes

Definition
of a magistrate.

lawes and of peace, the banishing away of vices and discommodities, and the increase of vertues. The forme is the order, which the prouidence of God hath appointed in things humane. The matter is the man, or person. For who so ever is appointed to be a magistrate, is taken of men. The methode which is here kept, is in a manner generall. First he sayth, that all men ought to be subiect vnto magistrates, which thing is first proued by the efficient cause: for that all suche powers are of God: then is it proued by the contrary, for that they which contrary to the magistrature, are against God, and that to theyr owne great hurt. Finally it is proued by the ende, for that the magistrates bring vnto vs great profit. This is both very often, and also very exactly entreated of in the new Testament, and that for three cause chiefly, for that the childzen of God sometimes thinke, that it is a thing in a manner vayne, that they being gouerned by the spirit and word of God, should be subiect vnto outward powers. Neither can it be expressed in how ill part the Jewes toke it, when they were as captiues oppressed of the Babilonians, Assirians, Medes and Persians: and when at home in theyr Countrey they were greuously afflicted first of the Macedonians, and afterwarde of the Romaines. They would gladly haue shaken of that yoke, which the Anabaptistes & Libertines at this day with great fury, go about to shake off: and which the Pope and his darlings, hath now long time shaken of. For he hath so exempted bothe himselfe and his cleargy from all publique power: that now Princes are subiect vnto him, and he suffereth the great monarchies of Christendome to kisse his fete, and most filthily to whip him. He createth Emperors: and putteth them downe as it pleaseth him. He taketh away kingdomes, and yelletteth and polletteth them as he lust. But Christ behaued himselfe farre otherwise, for he payed tribute, and taught, that vnto Cesar, ought to be rendred that which is Cessars. With these wordes of Paul agreeth that which Peter wyrteth in the second chapter of his first Epistle, saying: Be ye subiect to euery humane creature, that is, vnto the ordinaunce which God would shoulde be amongst men. Be subiect sayth he, for the Lords sake, whether it be vnto the king, as vnto the superior, or vnto gouerners, as vnto them that are sent of him, namely, either of the king, or of God, for the punishment of euill doers, and for the praise of them that do wel. If we examine all the partes of this commaundement, we shall in a manner finde in it all those thynges whiche are here taught of Paule. The selfe same thyng Paul wrote to Titus in the third Chapter, Admonishe them (sayth he) that they be subiect vnto Princes and powers, and that they be obedient to the magistrates. And in his Epistle to the Ephesians to Timothe, and to Titus he diligently commaundeth seruants to be obedient to theyr masters. And vnto Timothe, he commaundeth Christians to make prayers for theyr magistrates. Whereby that is most manifest, which we haue oftentimes sayd, and which Chrysostome in this place wyrteth, that the doctrine of the Gospel was not geuen to ouerthrow the politique gouernments of the world, but rather to confirme them, and to make them better. This place of the Apostle pertaineth to that commaundement of the law, Honour thy father and thy mother. For in the olde time, as Aristotle also wyrteth in his Politiques, fathers gaue lawes to theyr famely, and to them were as kings. And amongst the Romanes the Senators: were called Patres conscripti, that is, appointed Fathers. For a magistrate is nothing els but the father of the countrey. Here we neede not curiously to entreat, by what right, or by what wrong, Princes haue obtained theyr power. This thing only is to be seene vnto, that we reuerence magistrates, when they are in that roome. For this Epistle was written when the Romaines had now obtained the Empire of the whole world, which Empire we know they possessed by violence, and afterwarde the Emperors by as wicked practises dyed vnto them the whole dominion ouer al, yet Paul without al exception, commaundeth vs to be obedient vnto the powers. And so generall is this proposition of Paul, that Chrysostome testifieth that vnder this commaundement, are contained Priests, Monks, Prophets, Apostles and Euangelistes. But I thinke that Origen is not here to be allowed. For he wyrteth that Paul sayth, let euery soule, Why so often in the new testaments gent is instructed, that ought to geue honour to the magistrate. He hope here proued guilty and condemned.

Christ was subiect to the powers of the world

The Gospel ouerthroweth not the gouernments of the world. A magistrate called by the name of a father.

In this precept are contained all degrees of men.

Wh. j.

and

Cap. 13. A Commentarie vpon the

and not euery spirite, for they which are vtterly spiritual, & do not by any meanes follow the affectes of the flesh, neither possesse things humane, doe not liue vnder Princes and powers. But who euer had more aboundance of the spirite, then our Lord and sauioꝝ Chꝛist had: Who at any time was more holy then his Apostles were: and yet the submitted themselues to the higher power euen to the death. Wherefoꝛe it is muche better to say with Chrysostome, that none is to be excepted from this vniuersall sentence. But those ecclesiasticall Papists will say, that the kings themselues and publique powers, haue geuen vnto them theyꝛ right, and haue appoynted that the clergye should be exempted. But we ought not to regard what Princes haue done herein, but what they ought to haue done. For it lyeth not in theyꝛ hands to disanull the lawes of God. Wherefoꝛe if this diuine commaundement of Paul willeth, that euen euery soule be subiect vnto the publique power, then doubtles ought we to obey it. For the decrees of God ought not to be reuoked by any authoritie of man. Although these wordes are so to be contracted, that we vnderstande, that we are not subiecte to the magistrate, but only as touching his function and office. Which if he at any time goe beyond, and commaund any thing, that is repugnāt vnto pietie, and vnto the law of God, we ought to obey God rather then men.

Princes ought not to haue geuen
their right ty to popes & bishops.

For there is no power but of God. He proueth his purpose by the efficient cause. For that no humane strength or force, but God himselfe is the author of all powers. And it is to be noted that there are sondꝛy kindes of powers. For there is a power of the father towarde his children: there is also a power of the husbands towarde the wife: and a power of the master towarde his seruants: and there is also ouer common wealthes these powers, Regia that is the power of a King, and then Aristocratica, which is, where the best men gouerne, and Politica, that is, a political gouernement, and Tyrannica, Oligarchia, & Democratica. And although the se thꝛee kindes are exceedingly corrupted and vitiated, yet is God the author of them. For there is in them a force, might, and power to gouerne men, and to kepe them vnder, which vndoubtedly could by no meanes be, but of God. But if thou demand at what time such powers first began, or when they were first ordained of God, I answer that that light which God hath grafted in our mindes, sheweth vnto men euen from the beginning, the maner of bearing rule: and it was afterward by sondꝛy oracles of God confirmed. In the booke of Genesis God sayde to Noe, and to his children, that mannes blood should be required at his hand which should shed it: that is, that he which killed a man, should also be killed. And y this ought not to be done rashly, and of euery man, euen reason it self teacheth. Wherefoꝛe out of this place is most manifestly gathered, that there ought of necessity to be chosen out men, to decide causes, and to punish the guiltie. But for that we see that in kingdomes many things are done ouerthwartly and vniustly, lawes are peruerterd, and the commaundements of God are violated, many thinke that it can not be, that such powers should be of God. But as Chrysostome very well admonisheth, the thing it self, that is, the principall function, must be distinguished from the person. For it is not to be doubted but that the person, for as much as he is a man, may abuse a good thing, but the thing it self considered apart, for as much as it is good, cannot come from any els where but from God. For euen as in the nature of things he hath appoynted al things orderly. For he hath set heauen ouer the elements: and therehense through the ayre he infuseth sondꝛy powers and faculties into the earth, and thereof bringeth forth the diuers and manifolde frutes, wherewith we are nourished and liue. And in mannes body he hath set the head in the top, as in a tower, and vnder it hath placed the eyes, the eares, the nose and other members euen to y sole of y fete: so in order he preserueth humane society, so that there are in it certayne degrées, by which it is directed in those woꝝkes wherein men communicate the one with the other. For it is not possible that where all are equall should long be kept peace. For therof rather spring contentions and discordes. Wherefoꝛe some must needes be aboue others, to take away contentions,

Sondꝛy
kindes of powers.

In what place God
by his word
confirmed
the magistrate.

In iudging
we must dis-
tinguise
the thyng
from the person.

contentions, and to bring matters of controuersy to a quietnes. This thing God hath not denied to beas, cranes, and fishes. For these liuing creatures haue their kinges and princes, by whose conduict and leading they either go forth to worke, or retorne from worke. Wherefore seeing that man is the most excellent of all liuing creatures, and communicateth in many actions, it was most requisite that he should be sensed of God with this ayde of principality. But besides this reason which yet is most true and very necessary, the holy scriptures also constantly asserme the selfe same thing. For they teach that God is not only the authoꝝ of all publique power, but also that he distributeth kingdomes & principalties, whē & to whō he wil at his pleasure. For somtymes he called y<sup>e</sup> Assyrians, somtymes y<sup>e</sup> Chaldeas, & somtymes other nations, which by violence ouercoming & oppressing y<sup>e</sup> Israelites rayned ouer them. The kingdom which Dauid and Salomon had receaued all whole, was by the will of God rent in sonder, and ten partes thereof were geuen to Ieroboam the sonne of Mabath. And y<sup>e</sup> this thing should come to passe the Prophet in the name of God did shew vnto Ieroboam befoze y<sup>e</sup> it came to passe God afterward remoued the famely of Achab, that it should no longer raigne, & commaunded Elizus to anoynt and consecrat John the sonne of Nansi. And in the 4. chapter of Danell it is thus wꝛitten, God obtayneth the kingdome amongst men and deliuereith it to whome so euer he wyll. Howbeit God obserueth this order, to vse wicked and vngodly Princes to punish the wicked doinges of the people. And indeede we oftentimes see that sumptuousnes, pompe, pride, and raging lustes are kept vnder by the violence of tyrans, which otherwise if al things were quiet, could not be restrayned. Lenity oftentimes can not remedy these euils: therefore that they should not to farre range abroad, stronger remedies are necessary. And after that men being in this soꝝ chastised doe retorne vnto God, he comforteth them, and prouideth for them gentler princes, and moze iust gouerners. For he will not suffer, that though the cruelty of tyrannes, thinges humane should vtterly be ouerthrowen and come to nought. And this is the cause, why God, as it is manifest by histories, alwayes with these monsters, that is, with these cruell and bloudy tyrannes minglet some godly and iust princes. For he wil not haue vices so be repressed, that the nature of men should vtterly perish. Wherefore not only good and iust princes doe raigne by the wil of the lord, but also vngodly and wicked tyrans. But if thou wilt say, it be so, why sayth Osea vnder y<sup>e</sup> perso of God, They haue rayned but not by me. I answer, for that euill princes, and such which after that by wicked meanes haue obteyned the kingdome, doe by worse meanes gouerne it, these I say in that they thus beastly behaue themselves, haue not a respect to the will of God, which is reuealed vnto vs either by the law of nature, or in the holy scriptures. For by that will of God they doinges and endeuors are most manifestly repproued. And in this maner they are sayd not to raigne by God, for that they apply not themselves to the wꝛitten and reueled will of God. Howbeit it can not be denied but that God by his hidde and effectuall will would haue them to raigne to that end which we haue now declared. For, that is not inough which some answer, that God doth not these thinges, but only permitteth them. For the holy scriptures manifestly testifie, that he called the Babylonians, the Assyrians, and other nations, to bere and afflict the Israelites: and that agaynst Salomon and other kinges, he raysed by enemies and aduersaries, to kepe them vnder and to chastice them. And soasmuch as these men being thus raysed by haue no regard at all to the will of God, but only apply themselves to ambition, and to theyꝝ owne luste they greuously sinne agaynst God. Howbeit God by them though they be neuer so vniust and wicked executeth his most iust iudgement: and therein committeth no offence.

The powers that be, ar ordeyned of God. If they be apoynted of God, then also are they constant and stable: and although by sūdy successions thinges humane are disturbed, yet this power is perpetually pꝛeserued: as in the world, although there oftentimes happen most great and innumerable changes, yet the heauen,

Quietnes cannot be had where equality is.

God geneth and trāstereth
kingdoms.

God by will princes punisheth
sinners.

God wꝛth tyranny enterming-leth some iust pꝛin-
ces.

the ayre, the earth, and the sea, alwayes kepe still theyr place, neither at any time leue theyr limits. I would to God they which beare dominion, would alwayes haue this in theyr mind, that that office which they execute is the ordinance of God, doubtles they would not the in such sort abuse it. Now y<sup>e</sup> matter requireth

Bonifacius
the eight abused this place.

that we should not kepe in silence, how Bonifacius in his Extravaganti, which beginneth, Vnam sanctam, abused these wordes of the apostle to confirme his pride. For he goeth about hereby to proue, that those thinges which are of God, haue betwene themselves a certayne order, so that theyr dignity is by certayne degrees distinctly knowne y<sup>e</sup> one fro the other. And thereof it foloweth that the powers which are of God are not a like. And that power is the higher which is occupied aboute the worthier matter. And soasmuch as y<sup>e</sup> ecclesiasticall power consisteth in thinges spirituall, and the ciuill power in thinges corporall, therefore the ecclesiasticall power is the highest, and ought not to be subiect vnto the ciuill magistrate. And the Pope (he sayth) hath iurisdiction ouer all princes, for that Christ sayd, Whatsoeuer thou bindest vpon earth shall also be bound in heauen: & whatsoeuer thou lovest shall be loosed. And to declare this also moze manifestly, he bringeth y<sup>e</sup> which we read was sayd to Jeremy, Behold I haue appointed thee ouer kingdoms and nations, that thou shouldst overthrow and destroy, and also build up, and plante. But these argumentes,

The ecclesiasticall
power consisteth in spirituall thinges.

as they are full of pride and arrogancy, so also are they most bayne. For first Paul here speaketh not of the degrees of powers distinct betwene themselves. This thing only he sayth, that all powers whatsoeuer they be, are ordeyned of God. And that the ecclesiasticall power consisteth in thinges spirituall I deny not: for it is occupied in the ministry of the word of God. And that power we therefore confesse to be the greatest, for that the word of God ought to beare dominion ouer all men. But this power serueth to bring vnder all vnderstanding, and to overthrow the highnes of humane reason. Let these proud glorious lords do this: let them preach the word of God, and leue the fond inuentions of men, and then if there be any which will not harken vnto them we will not sticke to condemne them: whither they be princes or kings, or monarches or emperors. Howbeit hereof it followeth not, that they as touching corporall life, and possessions, lands, houses and maners are not subiect to the politicall or ciuill power. Yea also euen as touching the function, they ought to be subiect to a godly & religious magistrate: not that we thinke that the word or the sacraments ought to be subiect to humane lawes: but for that the office of the magistrate is either to punish or to remoue ministers, if they be haue themselves ill in theyr function, if they deprave the truth, or minister the sacraments corruptly. Let them bind and lose, that is, let them by the word, and by preaching shew, who are loosed and who are bound. And yet let them not therefore exempt themselves from the ciuill magistrate. For euen as a king, though he be of neuer so great authority and dignity, ought yet notwithstanding to obey the word of God pronounced by the ministers of the Church: so an ecclesiasticall man although he be placed in an excellent and high function, yet is he not exempted from the obedience, and subiection of the magistrate. But that which they bring out of Jeremy is very friuolous and bayne. For, that prophet neither overthrow,

Whether
the ecclesiasticall
function be subiect
to the politicall power.

How the prophets overthrow and erected kingdomes.

nor erected kingdomes howbeit hereunto he was called of God, to pronounce in the name of God, what kingdomes, should be overthrown, and what erected. Others labour very foolishly to auoyd this place. For they say that the Apostle commaundeth nothing els, but that euery man ought to be subiect to the power appointed ouer him. For otherwise should folow a great confusion, y<sup>e</sup> the Spaniards should of necessity be compelled to serue the king of England, and the Englishmen the Frenchmen. Wherefore the Apostles intent is this only, that euery one be obedient to his owne power. But the clergy say, they haue theyr Bishoppes and Popes, whome they obey, and haue nothing to do with the ciuill magistrate. These men see not, or rather dissemble, and will not see how absurde it is to deuide and to cut in sonder any nation into two bodies: as though the clergy of the Spaniards, are not Spaniards: or the clergy of the Frenchmen, are not Frenchmen

One & the self same nation ought not to be diuided into two bodies.

men

men. Doubtles if all the Spanyards be subiect to theyr king, the clergy also, for as much as they are Spanyards, ought of necessity to be subiect vnto him. Further by this goodly sense they abuse the wordes of Paul. For he putteth subiecte enery soule vnto such powers, which haue the right of the sword, and to whome tributes ought to be payd. But Popes and Bishops haue not the sword wherfore in this argument there is nothing but mere fraud and deceit. But they say y<sup>e</sup> the ministers of the church, as y<sup>e</sup> Pope & certayne other bishops, may haue and vse the right of the sword. And if thou obiecte, that Christ gaue not vnto them the sword, yea rather sayd, that his kingdome is not of this world, and that he had not where to lay his head: they will answere, that ministers in dede haue not the sword, in as muche as they are ministers, but haue receiued it from els where, and that by a iust title, and by iust possession. But Christ executed his vocation: for he came in humilitie, by his passion and death to redeeme mankind; but his example is not to be followed in all things. Other wise no Christian ought to beare the office of a Magistrate. For Christ bare it not. Wherfore they affirme that he left an example only to men tending to perfection: such as are monkes and begging friers, which (as they say) haue renounced the world. Neither can they abide that Peter should prescribe vnto his successor, when he sayd, that he had neither golde nor siluer, but that he left only a paterne of perfection vnto them, which so order their life as he did, who forsaking all that he had, folowed Christ, that he might the redylier serue him. But these men should remember, that not only examples, but also commaunders make on our side. For Christ sayth, The kings of the nations beare dominion ouer them: but so shall not ye. And these wordes are to be vnderstanded singularly and peticularly of the Apostles and of ministers, and not of all men vniuersally. For cities and kingdomes can not be gouerned without a Magistrate. Peter also commaundeth the gouernors of the Church, not to exercise dominion ouer the flocke. But let vs see by what reasons these men pretende the vsurpation of the sword. Cities and prouinces, say they, are by this meanes the better gouerned. Where I neede not much to trouble my selfe to make answere. Let vs loke vpon the Cities which are vnder Bishops, how much holper and purer they are then others. Verily for as much as they can not by themselves gouerne and order things, they substitute deputies and iudges, and those whome they call Officials. But they geue themselves to deceites, and to wicked practises, and to most filthy gaines, no les then other most vile iudges which are placed in y<sup>e</sup> ciuill Magistratship. An other reason is, for that (say they) in this yron and most corrupt age, men are not led by the zeale of piety, nor by the spirite, as they were in times past in the primitive Church, it is expedient that they be kept vnder by force, and by the sword. Auit it were so. But Princes can by their sword kepe vnder the wicked: and especially at this time, when as Princes are Christians, and professe one, and the selfe same sayth with vs, but whome I beseeche you, haue they by theyr sword made the better. Undoubtedly the state of Christianity was neuer in worse case, then it hath bene, since the time that Bishops leauing the charge of the shepe, and flocke of Christ, began to vsurpe the sword. Further who saith not, that these two functions doe so hinder the one the other, that he which exerciseth the one, can not execute the other: For it is an hard matter to finde one so prompt and ready, that can rightly and orderly administer but euen one of those functions. But touching this matter we haue spoken sufficiently. Now resteth moze diligently to consider vpon the wordes.

There is no power but of God. According to the rules of Logike, it is all one as if Paul should haue sayd, enery power is of God. Wherfore seeing that Paul in such sort reasoneth, some in vaine canill, that they should doe no reuerence to inferior maiestates, as to such as haue the charge of cities, or are appoynted gouernors of prouinces. For they think it sufficient, if they be subiect to the higher powers, as to Emperors and to Kings. But Paul comprehendeth all maner of power. For a proposition exclusiue, as they vse to speake, is of the same force that an vni-

Christ hath not geuen vnto the Pope nor to Bishops the sword.

Commmandement is geuen to the ministers of the church not to haue the sword nor dominion.

By what light arguments the Popes and Bishops defend their sword.

How are by the sword of the Pope made better but worse. These two functions do let the one the other.

Cap. 13. A Commentarie vpon the

It is law-
full to ap-
peale from the inferior magistrate to the supe-
riour.

They whi-
che resist
the power
fight with
God.
The ciuill power is resisted two maner of wayes.

Greuous punishments
appoynted
to seditious and rebell-
ous persons.

He which
obeyeth the powers, so-
beyeth god.

We reue-rence God in the earthly powers.

In earthly iudgements
we contemplate the iudgement
of Christ to come.

uersall proposition is transposed or conuerted. As for example, Only man runneth: Ergo, every thing that runneth is a man. So here, Only if God is power, Ergo, all power is of God. And if all power be of God, then without doubt ought we to honoꝛ and reuerence it. But if we see that we are too cruelly oppressed of the inferiour magistrate, we are not by this doctrine letted, but that we may vse the benefite of appealation. For as that is by good equitie permitted by the law of man, so is it by no parte of the holy scripture abrogated. Paul himself vsed it when he saw opportunitie. Wherefoꝛe it is lawfull by way of appeale to flye from the inferiour magistrate to the fidelitie and mercy of the superiour.

But they which resist them, resist the ordinance of God. What is moꝛe vniust, or moꝛe vniwoꝛthy, then to go about to fight with God? How peruerse a thing that is, euen the Ethnike poets also saw. For they saie that Jupiter toke most greuous vengeance, vpon the rashnesse of those Giants, which went about to assault hea- uen. And the ciuill power is resisted two maner of wayes: either by open violence, which thing we see seditious and rebellious men vse to doe: or els by craft and sub- tlety, as when a Prince is through wicked pollicies and deceites circumvented, that he can not execute his office. For by these meanes oftentimes, the Prince be- ing ignorant, the course of iustice is hindꝛed. Wherefoꝛe this saying of Dioclesian is much vsed, A good, wary, and wise prince is oftentimes sold. For whilst he is alone in his chamber, his seruantes come, and declare all things vnto him deceitfully. So he vniwares doth things as vpright and iust, which in very deede are most vni- iust. He remoueth away good men from the gouernement of the publike wealth, and aduanceth those which ought to be most far of banished. Wherefoꝛe a certaine wytyer called the Senate of Rome, not Patres conscripti, but circumscripti. Howbeit I speake not this, that I thinke that it is not lawfull for godly men, by all maner of vpright meanes, to auoide the daunger of falling into the handes of ty- rants. Which yet they ought not to doe, after that they be once cast into prison. For this were to violate publike lawes, and to geue an example to murderers and thieues to doe the like.

And they that resist, shall receiue vnto them selues iudgement. Men are not in this case hurt, but the estimation and dignitie of God is contemned. For God answered to Samuel, They haue not cast thee away but me, that I should not raigne ouer them. By iudgement we chiefly vnderstand that iudgement which concerneth ster- nal destruction. For after ward it foloweth that we ought to be subiect, not only for anger sake, but also for conscience sake. We may also by iudgement vnderstande iudgement in this life. For Salomon sayth, the anger of a king is like the roaring of a Lion: he which prouoketh it, sinneth against his owne soule. Greuous punishments are appoynted for seditious persons, and for rebels. In the olde law it was death if a man had resisted the higher power. Chore with all his, was consumed with fire. Dathan and Abiram were swallowed by of the earth, for that they seditiously re- sisted Moses and Aaron. We know what end Absolon came vnto, when he had ex- pelled his father out of his kingdome. What seemed moꝛe godly to the whole world, then that notable acte of Brutus and Cassius, which destroyed the tyrant Ce- sar, and yet that their doings were not allowed of God, the ende declared. Where- foꝛe we ought not to resist Princes, though they be wicked, as Peter admonisheth vs. Of these wordes we may thus gather, he which resisteth the powers, resisteth God: therfoꝛe they which obey the powers, as it is meete, obey God. This argumēt taken of contraries, is very manifest and true. And this sentence not a little com- forteth the children of God. For they see that when they obey Princes, they obey God, and reuerence him in the powers. Moꝛeouer also by the forme of the iudge- ments of the earthly magistrate, they set before theyꝛ eyes a certayne similitude of the iudgement of God, which at the ende of the world we doubt not but Christ shall put in execution.

For princes are not to be feared for good workes, but for euill. How Paul, when he had abundantly spoken of the efficient cause of humane powers, where- by

by he taught that we ought to obey them, tendeth to proue the same by the end: that we might with the attentive mynde harken to those precepts. If magistrates be appointed to take away wicked workes and haynous factes, then it semeth that there should be no place left for them, if men would of their owne accord endeuer themselves to piety and to iustice, and would not offend against the lawe. Yea but even then also their function is some way necessary. For oftentimes we see that good and innocent men, although their mynde and will be good, and albeit they desire to leade an vpright life, yet of themselves they can not keepe any order as touching ciuill discipline. Wherefore they haue nede of god and godly lawes to direct them to that which they desire. Wherefore the ciuill power may be vnto them as a scholemaster. But amitte that amongst men were no ignorance of the offices of life, and of ciuill duties: yet must we needs confesse, that they shall euen then also be had in honoz and admiration, which are more aboundantly endewd of God with most excellent giftes: vnto whome yet should remaine no part of principality, to be exercised ouer others. And soasmuch as this shall happen vnto vs after that blessed resurrection, therefore Paul to the Corinthians very well writeth, that Christ at the end shall deliuer the kingdome to God, and vnto the father, and all principality and power shall be abolished. But whilest we liue here still in the world, and haue our conuersation here amongst euil men, both the magistrate is necessary, and we ought vterly to obey him in those thinges which are not repugnant vnto piety. And soasmuch as the magistrate is to this end appoynted to punish wicked workes, and to aduance god, thereby we may vnderstand, that they which resist him may two maner of wayes be accused: either for that their owne conscience accuseth them of euill actes by them committed which they would not haue punished: or for that they are negligent followers of iustice, whereunto they can not abide to be pycked forward. But they complaine that they which are magistrates are men corrupt, cruell, and violent: and that they whole trauaile is, that euery man should haue either nothing at all, or else very little. But these me ought to consider, that Paul here entreateth of the thing it self, and not of the abuse: and speaketh of that which happeneth for the most part, & not of that which happeneth seldome. As touching the first, that may not to be imputed as a fault to the thing, which commeth of the abuse thereof. As if a wicked man should peruerfly abuse either the minde, or the eyes, or the eares or the rest of the powers of the soule, yet should it not therof follow, that the ends of all these thinges are not most excellent: vnles peraduenture we will say that God is the authoz of euill thinges. And as touching power it may be abused as well by them which exercise it, as by them which ought to obey it. We ought also to remember that euen tyrannes also, all be it they be greuous and irksome, doe not withstanding retaine still many offices of iustice and of equity: and therfore they haue much more vtility and commoditie, then Anarchia hath, wherein euery man may at his pleasure without any consideration doe what he will. For vnles tyrans though they be neuer so cruel had some regard to right and equitie, they could not kepe still that they power. When Nero in his gouernement oppressed the whole world, yet were matters in controuersie decided, nether was the strength of lawes vterly taken away from men. For vnder him Paul was by the Centurion deliuered from the danger to be tozne in sonder of the common people, and of the multitude of the Jewes. And whē he had cried that he was a citezen of Rome, he was losed from his bandes, & escaped stripes. And the same Paul, to the ende he should not be oppressed of the embusmentes of the Jewes, was by night led away of the souldiours to Antioche: and there oftentimes had libertie to defend himselfe. And to be short, he pleaded his cause, and at the last appealed vnto Nero. Wherefore seeing that euen in wicked Princes there is some good, it is very manifest, & they power also is of God: neither is it lawfull for any private man to kill a tyranne: Dauid when he mought, yet not withstanding would not kill Saul, although he vsed himself like a tyranne: yea rather he commaunded that Amalechite to be slaine, which boasted that he had killed

Not onely the euil but also good and goodly are holpen by magistrates.

For what causes some resist the magistrates?

Both the subiects and the princes sometymes abuse the power.

Tyrannes also want not many good thinges.

Examples of the gouernment of Nero.

It is not lawfull for private men to kill a tyranne. Examples of Dauid.

Saule: and he put them to death also, which had slaine Ishobab Saules sonne. And doubtles if it should be lawfull for euery man at his pleasure to destroy a tyranne, there would not want wicked men, which vnder the pretence of the condemning of tyranny, would doe violence vnto godly Princes: and so should nothing be left holy and vniuolated. Notwithstanding I speake not this, that I thinke that superiour powers can not be put downe by inferiour magistrates, or that they can not be constrained to doe theyr duety of those which are appoynted either keepers, or authours, or electors of Princes, if they transgresse the endes and limites of the power which they haue receiued. As in times past at Rome the Senate & people of Rome were wont to do, & at this day in Germanie, the Electors of the Empire doe sometimes to doe. But to returne to Paul, those two offices of powers which he mentioneth, are the principallest, and most necessary, and such that they comprehend in maner all other offices of power. Solon was wont to say that the common wealth consisteth in two things, in rewarde and in punishment. And Antisthenes the Philosopher was accustomed to say, that those Cities tended to destruction and present ruine, where was no difference betwene good and euill. His meaning was, that good Citizens ought to be adozned with rewarde, and wicked men scourged with punishment.

What inferiour powers may do towards superiour powers.

There are two principall offices of power. The common wealth is contained in two things.

To be afraid of the powers is irksome.

It is no small poynt to be absolved in iudgement.

God leaue not the magistrate deserveth of his provision.

Tokens of the government of god as touching powers.

Vilt thou be about feare of the power. We vse a kinde of reasoning, where in is a preuention ioyned with the confutation of that thing, which might easely come into a mannes minde. These powers although they bring many things profitable, yet oftentimes they are terrible, and they bring into men a terror & feare, which is a thing very irksome. Wherefore Paul sayth, behaue thy selfe wel, & thou shalt be without feare. For know thou for a certaintie, that either thou shalt receiue praise of the power, or if the same power be ouermuche violent and cruell, God will geue vnto thee so much strength and constancie, that thou shalt be able with a valiaunt and stout courage to suffer all manner of extremities. For if he gaue this thing vnto Socrates, Anaxarchus, and Seneca which were Ethnikes, and to infinite martyrs of Christ, then doubt not, but that he will geue vnto thee the selfe same thing: wherefore be not afraid of the power, if thou behaue thy selfe vprightly and blamelesly.

Thou shalt haue praise of it. It is no small praise to be acquitted in iudgement. It was counted a praise vnto Cato, that whereas he was so oftentimes accused, he was alwayes absolved and acquitted. It is also a great praise, if a man liue so holily and innocently, that in iudgement nothing can be layde against him. As when Fimbria had accused Scenole, and was demaunded what fault he could lay against him, which was counted a man so vertuous and innocent, he answered, for that when he strake him, his weapon ran not through out his whole body.

For he is the minister of God. He is as it were his vicare on the earth. And as Monarches or Emperors doe not in waighy matters leaue destitute theyr lieutenants and deputies, so God forsaketh not his ministers, and those whome he hath appoynted to be rulers: but when the state of things, are by these earthly powers brought into extreme daunger, he sometimes by his owne power and myght endeth all things, and worketh wonders. For we haue oftentimes seene in very great authoritie, certaine wicked gouernours, or rather pestilences of common wealthes, which haue bene punished by a wonderfull meanes and way, when as otherwise they were in great estimation with their Princes. We haue also oftentimes great offenders, which whē as otherwise they might most easly haue fled away, haue bene so daseled and overwhelmed with darknesse, that they could not flye. I would to God princes would take the rules of their administration out of these offices here described of Paul. They should not then so be led by theyr lustes, neither should they commit those things, which God by Samuel describeth in the law of a king, and which he forgetolde tyrannes should doe. The Prince is appoynted to be in steede of God; betwene God and men, and shall vndoubtedly one day render an accompte to God of his doinges.

It is his dewty to be carefull for those that are his subiects and vnder him, and to procure for them whatsoeuer is profitable and comodious. Werye well wrote Chrysostome when he sayth, that god princes make vertues easy, when that they both vye them by example, and impel men vnto them by feare and punishmēt. A man shal see many that doe as it were abhorre vertuous life: which yet whē they are by the force of the lawes and by feare compelled to acquaint themselves with it, are by litle and litle so taken with the worthines therof that afterward they diligently practise it. And this was the reason why Augustine whereas befoze he was of this iudgement, that the magistrate ought not to punish heretickes, afterward changed his mind. For the other Bishops alledged for examples many Churches, which for feare of the Emperors and of the lawes fell away from the sect of the donatistes, & had now by long continuance, so acquainted themselves with the catholike truth, that they would be no meanes depart from it. For when those reasons had bene very often inculcated into them, which befoze they could not heare, at the last they appeared vnto them (as they were indeed) most true. Chrysostome also admonisheth that publique powers doe helpe the ministers of the Church. For we (sayth he) teach the people piety, chastitye, and modesty: we dehorte them from murders, false witnesses, adulteries and thefts. But the magistrate draweth them to accompt for these thinges by theyr iudgements: Wherefore it semeth (sayth he) that he conspireth with vs, and woorketh together with our function. Origen also is of the same mind entreating of a place in the 15. chapter of the Actes. The Apostles decreed, that the Gentiles should obtayne from flesh offred to idolls, from fornication, from bloud, and from that which was strangled. And they sayd they would lay no other burthen vpon them. And at the last they thus conclude, If ye absteyne from these thinges, ye shall doe well. Fare ye well. If (sayth Origen) they would not charge them with mo precepts, doe they therefore leue vnto them murders, theftes, perjuries, lustes, and adulteries free? Not so (sayth he) But there was no nede to decree any thing touching these thinges. For these are iudged by the magistrate, and are prohibited by ciuill lawes.

For he beareth not the sword for nought. ] Therefore he sayth that the magistrate is to be feared of the wicked, for that befoze him are bozne swordes and scourges & ares. Which are tokens and instruments of punishmentes, wherewith are punished those which offend agaynst the lawes. The sword declareth y they (as the lawiers vse to speake) haue a mere imperry. Vlpian sayth, y that is a mere imperry, which hath the power of the sword to punish wicked offenders.

For he is the minister of God, an auenger to wrath. ] As he is the minister of God to thy good and commodity, if thou doe well: so is he the minister of God to wrath, that is, to vengeance, if thou behauest thy selfe ill. Neither ought he to whō the sword is committed to be ignorant, that he is a keper not only of the latter table, but also of the first. Wherefore he ought to doe his diligence, that religion also be rightly administred, and that according to the word of God: Neither let him thinke, which thing many princes at this day perswade themselves, that such a care pertayneth nothing vnto them. They wil distribute benefices and Bishopricks to whome they thinke good: but that they whome they haue exalted to such dignities should execute theyr office, they nothing at all regard.

Wherefore you must be subiect not bycause of wrath only, but also for conscience sake. For for this cause ye pay also tribute: for they are Gods ministers applyeng themselves for the same thing. Render to all men therfore theyr dewty, to whō ye ow tribute, tribute: to whom custome, custom: to whō feare, feare: to whō honoz, honour. Ow nothing to any man, but to loue one an other for he y loueth an other hath fulfilled the Lawe. For this: Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steale, Thou shalt not beare false witness Thou shalt not couet, and if there be a-

Good princes make vertues easy.

An example of Augustine.

The magistrate helpe the ministers of the church.

The sword which is bozne befoze the Prince, what it signifieth.

The magistrate is a keper both of the first table and of the latter.

ny other commaundement, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, euen in thys, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Loue doth not euill to his neighbour, therefore is loue the fullfillinge of the Law.

VWherefore you must be subiect, not only by cause of wrath, but also for conscience sake. ] In this as it were in a brieft conclusion he concludeth the chiefe reasons which he had before alledged. And referreth them either to vengeance or to conscience. And into how greate a danger such as are stubborne and rebellious agaynst the magistrate bying themselves, we may easely vnderstand by the most greuous punishments, which are set forth in the lawes. De crimine lesa maiestatis, that is, of the case of treason, and in other such like lawes. Moreover we must haue a regard to our conscience, which otherwise condemneth vs, and deliuereth vs to the iudgement of God: that although we escape the wrath of earthly princes, yet let vs know that the vengeance of God doth stil hang ouer our heads. But admitte there were no such vengeance hanging ouer our heddes, doost thou yet notwithstanding count it so smal a matter, to haue thy sicke mind continually scourged with the prickles of thy conscience. There is no man I suppose which is ignorant, how greuous a torment those cogitations accusing and defending one another, are. These are those auenging furies, which as the Poets sayned, do alwayes torment guilty men. If thou vse thy selfe sediciously or stubbornly against princes a double care straightway afflicteth thy conscience. One is for that thou hast cast away the gouernment instituted of God: The other is, for that thou hast wyth most great ingratitude, impietie, iniustice, and contumelies sought to hurte the power which deserueth well both at thy handes, and also of all mankind.

A double care afflicteth
the conscience
of seditious
persons.

For two causes tribute is payd.

For this cause ye pay also tribute. For they are the ministers of God, applying themselves for the same thing. ] Paul declareth by an outward signe, that the conscience of rebellious and stubborne men may iustly be repproued, for that they pay tributes vnto their princes. And that this is done iustly and rightly, and orderly, he taketh as a thyng graunted and knowen of all men, and of all nations. For tribute is geuen, either that men should testifie that they are subiect to theyr princes: for for this cause God also commaunded that men should offer some what vnto him: not that he hath any nede of our thynges, for whatsoeuer we haue, we haue it of him otherwise if he should haue nede of our good thynges, he should not be God, as David sayth: We els tributes are geuen in steede of a rewarde, that we might some way recompence those greuous paynes which the maiestates take for the common wealth, and that they may be able to beare the burthe of publike costs and charges. Wherefore tribute admonisheth the conscience of men, that that power is excellent to whome that tribute is geuen, and that the same power is instituted of God, and set and placed amongst men in the steede of God, which also we ought to reuerence and highly to esteeme. For, that is the thing which every man in payng tribute promisseth to do. This also we are thereby put in mind of, that the Common wealth is by theyr care and industry very much holpen, and therefore they ought to be sustented with our riches which are priuate men, as with a rewarde most iustly deu to theyr labours. For to the end we should liue quietly and at ease, they are continually troubled with the affaire, of the common welth. They are compelled oftentimes to be abrode, and to neglect theyr owne business for publike affayres sake, that thou mayst abide at home, and loke to thine owne affayres. They defend the borders, they fight agaynst the enemy, they suffer all manner of labours, they put themselves into most great dangers, that we may peaceably and securely haue the fruition of our goods and possessions. They decide matters in controuersy, they make lawes, they set forth decrees, they sit in counsell, that no man shoulde by violence be put from his owne, that no man shoulde haue any vilany or hurt done vnto him. They persecute the euill doers: murderers and theues they destroy: that we may safely iorney, and that no danger should be

be brought agaynst vs either at home or abroad. For these so many benefits, none ought to thinke it a thing greuous, if tribute be payd vnto them as a iust reward. But besides tributes Paul admonisheth vs to helpe them also with our prayers, vnder them we may lead a quiet & peaceable life with all piety and temperance. I would to God princes one the other side when they receaue tributes & customes; would thinke with themselves, to what end they are geuen. I would to God they would thus say within them selues. These things are for this cause geuen vnto me, that I should aduance vertues, that I should repressse vices, and defende the peace and tranquillitie of the common wealth. I will not for nought, receiue so great a reward: I will not neglect those things which my people by this kinde of hono<sup>r</sup> requireth: or rather v<sup>o</sup>geth at my hands. If all Princes would do thus, then should be taken away that ignominie, which p<sup>o</sup>uerbe is in euery mans mouth. That all good Princes may be written in one ring.

For they are the ministers of God. Λειτουργοί. Here we see that Λειτουργία and Λειτουργία pertaine not (as some thinke) to holy seruices only. Yea rather those words properly signifie publique offices and functions.

Render therefore. When he saith, Render, he declareth that this thing pertai- neth to iustice. Wherefore he which either not payeth, or slackly payeth that which he oweth, violateth iustice, which rend<sup>o</sup>reth to euery man that which is his. Ney- ther is it to be meruailed at, that Paul by so many wayes and meanes commen- deth vnto vs obedience toward the magistrate. For it is otherwise an harde mat- ter to b<sup>o</sup>idle & kepe vnder the p<sup>o</sup>ud stomakes of men in this duty. For we would all be Lordes, and be obedient to no man. From hence Paul passeth to entreate of the common duty of loue, which we ought to execute towards all our neighbors.

To whom ye owe tribute, tribute: to whome custome, custome: to whom feare, feare: to whome honour, honour. Some thinke that by feare in this place is vn- derstanded reuerence, which they hereby p<sup>o</sup>ue, for that Paul before seemed to take away feare from godly men. When he sayd, do good, and thou shalt not be af<sup>o</sup>rd: yea rather thou shalt obtaine praise at the magistrates hande. But this is not of necessitie. For albeit he whic<sup>h</sup> hath not committed a wicked facte, doe not feare, yet is it profitable vnto him, that he feare, least he hereafter commit any suche thing. Although all those things which are here reher<sup>o</sup>sed do pertaine to the mag- strate, yet because he doth not all things by himself, therfore the Apostle vsed a di- stribution. Vnto the persone of the Prince render hono<sup>r</sup>: vnto sergeants, men of warre, souldiers, to<sup>o</sup>menters, render feare: to Collecto<sup>o</sup>rs of subsidies, tribute: to Customers, custome. Neither doe we owe hono<sup>r</sup> vnto Princes only, but also to our parents. Seruaunts also owe feare to they<sup>o</sup> Lordes and masters. In Palachie God thus complaineth: If I be your father, where is mine hono<sup>r</sup>: If I be your Lorde, where is my feare. And Princes ought to be acknowledged both as fathers, and as Lordes. We pay tributes of lands and possessions: and customes of Marchandises either carped forth, or brought in. And tributes and customes as Vlpian sayth, are the sinewes of the common wealth, without which it cā not be sustained and ad- ministred. The Clergy and Ecclesiasticall men contend that they by the benefite of Princes, are exempted from tributes and customes. Doubtles Christ vsed not this p<sup>o</sup>uilege. For he caused tribute to be paid both for himselfe, and also for Pe- ter. Whereouer if we loke vpon the ciuil lawes, they are not exempted from all bur- then of tributes. Iustinian in dede willed that they should be free from personal of- fices, as it is had in Code, De Ecclesiis & Episcopis. And those are called personal offices, which we execute only by industry and labour. For if the ministers of the Church should be bound to them, it could not be chosen, but that they should be bind<sup>o</sup>ed from they<sup>o</sup> function. And the same Iustinian seemeth also to haue exempted them from extraordinary exactions, and not from ordinary. Yea they are bounde to the mending of common high wayes, and to the repairing of bridges. Neyther doubtles doth the law of charity suffer, that when as they possesse lands and many other things, they should withd<sup>o</sup>aw themselves from euill burthens, and lay the whole

We ought to helpe the magistrates with pray- ers.

Liturgia pertayneth not onely to holy ser- uices.

It is as gainst iu- stice not to pay or to di- minish tri- butes.

Why he so many wayes setteth forth obedience to- wards ma- gistrates.

Tributes & customes are the sinewes of the com- mo<sup>n</sup> wealth. Whether ec- clesiasticall men be ex- empted frō all tributes & customes.

A most vn-
just decree of Bonifacius the eighth.

A philosopher witte-ly reposed
of Diocle-
sian.

The priestes of Egypt in what sort they were exempted.

The priestes of Israell were justly exempted, for they possessed nothing

whole waight vpon others: that where as all others are afflicted with penury, they alone hold liue in wealth. Bonifacius the .8. a man, as the Papists themselves confesse, ouer proud and arrogant in making of decrees, made a decree, as it is had de immunitate ecclesiarum, wherein he decreed that Ecclesiasticall men should vtterly be free from all maner payment of tributes. Pea he straightly forbiddeth that any man should without the commaundement of the bishop of Rome presume to pay any thing to prophane Princes. Doubtlesse a most greuous constitution of a most peruerse man, whereout haue sprong in a maner infinite brawlings, & endles contentions. How be it some haue patched it vp with a goodly interpretation. That somewhat may not withstanding be exacted of them, if Churche matters or religion, or the common wealth, be in any extreme daunger. As though forsothe these men ought not to succor the common wealth, but when it is in extreme daunger. I remember a very witty saying of Dioclesian to a certain philosopher which desired immunitie, Thy profession (sayd he) much differeth from thy petition. For thy philosophy teacheth, that affects ought to be overcome. But thou plainly declarest thy selfe to be overcome with lust and conetousnes. So the clergy, whē as aboue all others they professe religion and charity, doe yet not withstanding desire, not to be compelled to obey magistrates, or to succor the common welth. Thomas Aquinas thinketh that this exemption of the clergy, came by the priueledge of Princes. How be it he sayth that it is agreable with the lawe of nature. And he citeth a place out of the booke of Genesis, where it is wyrtten, that the landes of the priestes were free from the pension of the fifth parte. But if a manne diligently consider the whole matter, he shall easely finde, why they landes were free from that fifth parte: Namely bicause they were not solde to the king, when the penury was euery where wonderfull greate. For the Priestes hadde coine of the kinge, so that they were not compelled to buy coine. Wherefore the possession of their lands abode vnto them whole, which mought yet not withstanding at the pleasure of the king, be charged with other customes and tributes: although they were not comprehended in that generall pension of the fifth part. Others object that it is wyrtten in Esdas, that king Artaxerxes commaunded that no tributes should be layd vpon the priestes. But this was no meruaile, when as they possessed no landes amongst the children of Israell, but only liued of oblations and sacrifices. Cesar also wyrteth, that the Drudes amongst the Frenche men payde neither tributes nor customes, as others did, but were vtterly free, and discharged from all such things. But Plini in his .16. booke and .44. chapter wyrteth that those Druides had nothing: wherefore it is no meruaile if they paid no tributes. How be it I speake not this, that I thinke that princes may not remit somewhat of they tributes to Ecclesiasticall men, whiche diligently execute they office, and kepe hospitality, and succour the necessitie of others, so that a regarde bee had, that that turne not to the hurte of others, and that by suche immunitie they doe nothing els but maintaine they pompe and riotousnesse. I graunt in dede that Princes may doe this: howbeit I affirme that Ecclesiasticall men can not by any law of God claime vnto themselves any such immunitie: and that none can by good conscience denye tribute vnto Princes, if it be required. Neither ought Pope Bonifacius in any wise to haue taken vpon him to make that vnreasonable and outrageous decree. It is already concluded of Paul that all owe subiection and obedience to publike powers. Neither ought the godly (sayth Chrysostome) to take it in ill part to be subiect to magistrates, although they themselves are the children of God, and appoynted to the kingdome of heauen. For they glozy is not in the state of this life. They wayt vntill Christ appeare, in whome as yet is hidden they life. But in y meane time they ought not to count it a thing greuous, if they rise vpp, if they vncouer the head, if they geue the vpper hande, if they obey Magistrates. Were is nothing vnnete or vncomely. Pea rather what so euer is done of them accordynge to the prescript of the worde of God, is full of all comelinesse and worthinesse.

Owe nothing to any man, but this to loue one an other.] Paul will haue vs so perfectly and fully to render to every man, that which we owe vnto him, that we should cease to be any more in debt. Howbeit there is one certain thing, which can neuer be fully payd, namely, the debt of loue and charity. For although thou both hast and dost loue thy neighbour, yet notwithstanding art thou still bound to loue him. For there alwayes remaineth a cause why thou oughtest to loue him, namely, God, whose image he is. He made him, he gaue him to thee to be thy neighbour, he hath commaunded, that thou shouldest loue him as thy selfe.

Charity is alwayes true for that the cause of that bet alwayes remaineth.

For he that loueth an other, hath fulfilled the law. Some referre this to that part of the law only which is here spoken of. True it is that the discourse of this treatise is of that part of the law which pertayneth to our neighbour. So that the sence should be, he which loueth an other hath fulfilled the whole law as touching the second table. But I see no let, but that we may simply vnderstand the whole law: For we can not loue our neighbour well, vnles we loue God in him. For these are so knit together, as the cause and the effect, and therefore they can not be separated the one from the other. For the loue of our neighbour is a testimony of that loue wherewith we loue God. If we loue not God being in a neighbour after a sort visible and present, how do we boast that we loue him in himselfe, which is not sence of vs, but is of some thought to be very farre of from vs? I would not that our aduersaries should here triumph, as though Paul should say, that we performe and fulfill the law. Paul indeede affirmeth, that the law is fulfilled of him which loueth his neighbour: but yet of such a one which in such sort loueth as the law commaundeth. But this is no man able to performe.

Our neighbour is not rightly loved, vnles God be loved in him. We haue God in our neighbour after a sort visible.

We must not hereby affirm that we can performe the law.

For this, thou shalt not committe adultery, thou shalt not kill, The profe is hereof taken for that all those preceptes are summarily comprehended in that which is sayd, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. And this commaundement, as Chrysostome here noteth, is sayd of Christ to be like that great commaundement, Thou shalt loue thy Lord thy God with all thy hart, with all thy soule, and with all thy strengths. For seeing that we ought to loue our neighbours as our selues, there wasteth little, but that we ought to loue him, as we loue God. For we omitte nothing which may serue to our owne commodity or saluation. He made no mention of the loue towards our parents, eyther bycause that precept, as the Hebrews thinke pertayneth to the first table, or els for that he would not reckon vp all all the commaundements. For therfore he added.

Why the commaundement of honoring the parents is ouer hypped.

And if there be any other commaundement. Or els for that he had already before sufficiently spoken of the obedience due to magistrates: in which order are parentes also to be placed.

Loue woorketh not euill to his neighbour. This is easely gathered of that which hane bene spoken. For in these commaundements are prohibited all things, whatsoeuer may offended our brother. Therfore Paul aptly added, that such is the force of loue, that it suffreth not any man to hurt his neighbour.

And that considering the season, that it is now time, that we should arise from slepe: for now is our saluation nerer, then when we beleued. The night is past, and the day is at hand, let vs therefore cast away the woorkes of darkenes, and let vs put on the armour of light. So that we may walke honestly as in the day, not in glottonie and dronckenes, neyther in chambring and watonnes nor in strife and enuieng. But put ye on the Lorde Jesus Christe, and take no thought for the flesh, to fulfill the lustes of it.

And that considering the season, that it is now time that we should arise from slepe. After that Paul had now geuen many rules touching the duties of loue and of an holy life, lest peradventure they should slippe out of our minds, he thought it good to vrgue them by an argument taken of time. The sunne is at this present king is.

What was
What
slepe is.

all these thinges are diligently and with an earnest endeuor to be sene vnto, for that oportunitie serueth exceedingly thereunto. For so signifieth the Greke word καιρος which Paul bleth. All this whole talke is metaphoricall, for he maketh mencion of slepe, of night, of day, of arising from slepe, and of darkenes. Making, Aristotle calleth a liberty of the senses to execute theyr functions: contrariwise slepe is a bond of the senses. Which cometh by the euaporation of the nourishments to the hed. The meaning is this. That befoze the sayth of Christ was reaceaned, that is befoze regeneration, men were conuersant in great darkenes of ignorance: and therefore as it had bene men on slepe they were hindered from all good workes which mought be gratefull and acceptable to God. But now after sayth, and the grace of regeneration, the bright knowledge of God hath shined forth as it were the day: and therefore the strengths both of the soule and of the body are now after a sort loosed, and made free to performe the workes of righteousness. Wherefoze it is not mete that men should at this time be idle and senceles. And therefore euery one ought to be awaked vp to execute the will of God, seing that he saith, that he walketh in the light and in the day. Paul bleth this selfe same forme of speech in his first epistle to the Thes. in the last chap. All ye (sayth he) are the children of the light and of the day: for we are not the children of the night nor of darkenes wherefore let vs not slepe as others doo, but let vs be sober, and let vs watche. For they which sleepe, slepe in the night: and they which are drunken are drunken in the night. And in the last chapter to the Ephesians, Ye were (sayth he) in times past darkenes: but now ye are light in the Lord. Wherefore walke as children of light, and haue not to do with the unfruitfull workes of darkenes, but rather reprove them. For the thinges which they do secretly, it is filthy euen once to name. Howbeit these thinges are not to be counted as faultes to be ascribed to night or to darkenes. For God created night and darknes to our vse and commoditie, namely, that by them we should haue some rest and intermission from labours.

Things
fro whence are taken these ar
not alwaies
by reason of the trope
or figure,
either to be allowed or to be condemned.
Difference
betwene a natural motion and a violent.
Some are seruent at the beginning, and afterward
are wearp.
A distinction
of these times.
Our state
may be called both light and
darkenes.
It is now
twilight.

For now our saluation is nerer then when we beleued. The further we go on, the nigher we come to the end. Wherefoze euery man ought diligently to apply himselfe to liue vp rightly. For they which runne for a wager, the nigher they drawe to the marke, the more earnestly they runne therunto. And naturall motion herein differeth from violent, for that thinges impelled naturally are more swifter towards the end: but those thinges, which are driven by violence, the further they go on, the softer and weaker they are. Wherefoze that we may not secme to obey God agaynst our willes, the further we go on in liuing here, so much the feruentlier and holier let vs liue. And Paul therefore peradventure admonished vs hereof, as Chrysostome noteth, for that many are wont at the beginning of theyr conuersion, most feruently to follow after righteousness. But afterward they slacke theyr zeale and become lery.

The night is past, and the day is at hand. Here are to be noted three differences of times. Of which the first pertayneth to the most chiefe felicity, which we wayte for in the blessed resurrection, where the day shall shine most brightly: The other pertayneth to that darke night and ignorance which is befoze our regeneration and conuersion vnto Christ. The thirde is this shoyte time, wherein we being iustified do liue thorough sayth. Wherefoze if this present time be compared with the night which went befoze, it may seme to be day. But if the same be compared with that time which we wayt for in the end, it hath stil some shew of night and of darkenes: so that it may not vnaptly be called twilight. For we haue some light out of the propheticall word, that is, out of the holy scriptures, which as Peter sayth shine vnto vs in the darke. And in the meane time whilest thorough faith we are instructed in thinges diuine, we se them not manifestly nor face to face. But only thorough a glasse, and in a riddle as Paul sayth to the Corinthians. And hereby, I suppose, it is very manifest, what that meaneth, that that saluation, that is, the full and bright day of felicity, is now nier vnto vs then when we first beleued. For then we began first to be moued towards the end: but now we haue gon a great way in our iorney: and every day draweth nier & nier the day of our death, wherein we shalbe caried from hence into heauen: and every day is nier and nier that comming of Christ, wherein he shall both iudge the world, and also shall perfectly renew vs according to our hope. Wherefore y<sup>e</sup> which Paul sayth, Then when we beleeued, is to be referred to the time of our conuersion.

V Wherefore let vs cast away the weapons of darkenes, and let vs put on the armor of light. ] Wozks of darknes he calleth vices: partly because they come of the ignorance of the heauenly truth, and partly also because the doers of them seke after darknes. For he which doth euill hateth the light. Adulterers, whoz mongers, theues, murderers, and such other like for the most part worke all their feates in the night. And we haue befoze declared, that Paul to the Thessalonians and to the Ephesians, mencioneth the like things touching darknes. Wherefore Christ most aptly sayd to them which were sent to take him, This is your howre, and the power of darknes. Good workes he calleth the weapons of light: for that they spring of the true knowledge of God, and do shine befoze men to the glozy of his name. And they are not without cause called weapons. For with them we must fight agaynst the deuill, and the flesh, and with them must we defend our liberty.

Why vices are called the wozks
of darknes

Good
workes as rightly called weapons.

So that we walke honestly as in the day. ] In Greke it is εὐσχημόνως. He perswadeth vs to that which he entreateth of by an argument taken of that which is comely and honest: which kind of argument is of great force with noble and sincere mynds: for men degenerate, and sauage are commonly moued rather with things profitable and filthy.

Not in glotony and dronkenne. ] Paul here putteth three vices and those very common, wherewith carnall men and men estranged from Christ are euery where contaminated: and vnder those three he comprehendeth all other vices, wherewith mankind is customably infected. By glotony he meaneth feastes and banquetes: but not all kinde of feastes, but as Ambrose sayth, prodigall feasts, which are made either at the common chardge of euery one of guests, or which are made by courses betwene good fellows & companions: wherein men passe the borders of all shame. For euery one of the guests thinketh that to be his feast: and therefore he dareth both speake and do whatsoever he thinketh good. But he which is bidden to an other mans table, is commonly bydded with some modesty and shamefastnes, not to presume to speake any thing that is vncomely. And peraduenture Iob feared least the feasts of his chilozen were such manner of feastes: and therefore he daily sacrificed vnto God for them. And what is wont to happen at such riotous feastes, the head of Ihon Baptist declareth which was geuen to that wanton and dissolute mayden. And how great the outrageousnes of men was, and especially of the elders amongst the Ethnikes, it may hereby be knowne, for that when they had well dronke, they were wont hauing garlandes on their heads, and minstrels with them to goe in banketting from place to place and as wanton and yong folke, to speake and to doe what they listed. So that oftentimes they fell to vncleane actes, and to contentions, as Paule here declareth. Which thing the Poetes haue conningly paynted vnto vs in the feastes of the Centaures, and of the Lapethites.

What glo-
tony is.

But put ye on the Lord Iesus Christ. ] When he had taught that the olde man together with his wozks of darknes is to be put of, he thought it good afterwarde to set forth vnto vs a new garment, namely Christ him selfe. This form of speaking he vsed to the Galathians. As many of you sayth he as are baptised, haue put on Christ. This is that wedding garment which euery christian ought to put on. And if we will follow allegories, this garment God commended to our first parents, when he clothed them with the skinnies, which were plucked of from deade beastes. Christ geueth not to vs that garment, but in as much as he hath made himselfe a sacrifice for mankind.

What is our wedding garment.
Christ was geuen as a garment to our first parents.

And take not thought for the flesh to fulfill the lustes of it. ] By the fleshe he here vnderstandeth not naturall health. For, that is not to be neglected, that we may be able the more constantly to serue God. Paul wryteth to Timothe, Use a litle wine because of the stomake, and often infirmities. Here he prohibiteth only the pleasures and delites of the flesh. For when we let loose the bridle to them, the flesh is made unruly. Wherefore seeing that we ought continually to wastle agaynst the prone affects therof, let vs take hede that with ouer much delicatenes we nourish them not.

The fourteenth Chapter.

In that is weake in the fayth receiue, not for controuersies of disputations. One beleueth that he may eate of all things: an other which is weake, eateth herbes.
Let not him that eateth, despise him that eateth not, & let not him which eateth not, iudge him that eateth: for god hath receiued him.

Here is declared the state of the churche in the first
times.

Whereof
sprang the discoorde be-twene the Gentiles &
the Jewes
in the church.

That we may the easelyer vnderstande those things, which shall afterwarde be spoken, let vs briefly declare the state of the Church at the beginning. The Church in those first times consisted of Jewes & Gentiles conuerted vnto Christ.
And the Gentiles liued more freely, as they which were not bounde to the lawes of Moses, and as for theyr owne ceremonies of the Grekish religion, they plainly saw to be vaine and dampnable. But the Jewes which knew that their lawe was geuen of God himself, could not straight way be perswaded, that it was to be abrogated. Therefore they stayed, neither would they easely be plucked away from it: And therfore they abstained from meates prohibited in the law, and obserued the festiuall dayes of the Jewes. All which things declared that they were yet weake in faith. And this their infirmite of faith, the stronger and learneded sorte bothe sharply reprovued and also derided. On the contrary side the Jewes reprovued the Gentiles, as they which liued to freely: and condemned them as violaters of the lawes of God, & for that they did without putting any difference, eate of al kindes of meates, as it were with a certaine vnsatiable greedynesse of the belly. And this discoorde did not a little bere the Churches at that time. Therefore Paul earnestly as much as lyeth in him, laboureth to put it away: and admonisbeth the stronger sort, not to reiecte the weaker, either as heretikes or as infidels: but rather to instruct them, and with all charitie to cherish them, vntill they were confirmed in sound doctrine. And on the other side he commaundeth the weake ones, not rashly to condemne them that were better learned, and stronger then themselves.

Weaknes
of faythe is not a let to iustificatio.

There is not always required an expresse
faith touching all
things.

Him that is weake in the faith receiue. What is, adioyne him vnto you, and through your humanitie and doctrine, ease him of the burthen and payne of igno-raunce. If thou demaunde whether that weaknes of faith were a let that they could not be iustified in Christ, I thinke we may answer, that it was no let. For we are not iustified by the strength and excellencie of our fayth, but by the obiecte thereof, as we haue oftentimes taught: for although some fayth be weake, yet is it faith. But these men thou wilt say beleued not all the things which are to be be-leued: for they beleued not that the ceremonies of the law of Moses were abrogated. But that faith which beleueth not all the articles of the fayth, is not a true faith, I graunt this in dede if that it happen through the default of him that beleueth, as if a man do contemne the truthe which he hath heard out of the holy scriptures, and will not admit them, but will be his owne iudge and arbitrer, howe muche ought to be beleued of the holy scriptures, and ascribeth more vnto himselfe, then to the testimony of the word of God: this is not a true fayth. For the holy Ghoste bleth not to breath into any man suche a minde. But if a man beleue not any thing which is not yet sufficiently knowen and tried out, when yet not withstanding in minde he is ready to receiue the truthe, if it be once made plaine, I see no cause why

Why suche a sayth shold not both be, and be called a true faith, & iustifie the beleuer especially if he assent to Christ, and to the principall poynts of religion.

Not for controuersies of disputations. He prohibiteth odious contentions which rather alienate then edifie the mindes of the weake. The mindes of men ought not in vaine to be wearied: but rather to be taught. Paul in the last chapter of the first Epistle to Timothee sayth, that certaine were sicke about vnprofitable questions, and contentions of wordes. And in the latter Epistle, he admonyssheth Timothee, to eschue questions which he calleth foolish and without learning. Which thing if the schoule diuines had obserued, and taken heede of, we shoulde not then haue had in theyr booke, so many intricate and darke (I will not say vngodly and sacrilegious) questions. How be it all questions vniuersally are not to be condemned as vnprofitable. Wherefore I can not commend certain men, which are wise, indeede and wary in other matters, but in this one thing doubtes are not very circumspect, which thinke that y question touching the Eucharist, which is at this day euery where debated in the churche, is not conuenient, and is vnprofitable. For they consider not, how much it auaieth to our saluation, constantly to holde that Christ both had, and at this day hath the true and perfect nature of man: and to expell that detestable idolatry brought in by thys, that men beleue that in the bread and wyne, or, as they speake, vnder the accidentes of bread and wyne is really and corporally the body of Christ. When we labour for this, that the horrible abuses touching Christian religion might be taken away, we dispute not about the shadow of an alle, or about a thing of small waight: For euery Christian ought to be fully perswaded touching this that he worship not bread and wyne in steade of God, that he thinke not that the body of Christ is diffused throught infinite places, and that he plucke it not downe from heauen. Although Paul in this place by controuersies of disputa. ion, do rather vnderstand brawlings and contencions of wordes, which are on either side poured out for victory sake: and by which y mindes are kindled to wrath, and are alienated, and plucked away one from an other. Which thing happened in this foresaid question. For either part iudged that hys reasons or arguments serued to his purpose. In sume here is entreated onely of brawling and contencious disputacions, and not of gentle and quiet disputacions whereby men may be instructed to piety. Moreover this is to be noted, that they which put a difference betwene meates, are called of Paul weake, when as yet at this day, such men will be counted most strong. But they object, that Paul here speaketh onely of meates of the law, and not of fastinges, and of the choyse of meates, which is now called into doubt. But these men consider not, that the Jewes had a great deale more iust excuse, which could not perswade themselves that those ceremonies shoulde be abolished, which God himself had deliuered vnto them by Moses, then they at this day can haue. For those men superstitiously (to omitte to speake more sharply) with so great a zeale follow the traditions of men only. Howbeit I meane not here to defend those glottons which vnder the prettice of the liberty of the Gospell geue themselves only to eating and drinking.

One beleueth that he may eate of all thinges: but an other which is weake, eateth herbes. That man (Paul sayth) beleueth, which thinketh, that all thinges are free vnto him: and those he calleth weake, which, to the end they would not light vpon flesh prohibited, or dressed other wise then the law commaunded, did eate nothing but herbes: for that in them could be no danger of violating of the law, wher vnto also those young men in Daniell seemed to haue had a respect, wher they would not defile themselves with the meates that came from the kinges table. For they desired to haue rootes and herbes geuen them to fede vpon. And without doubt it is necessary, that euery one haue an assured sayth of that thing which he doth, that it be not repugnant to the lawes of God.

He which eateth, let him not despise him that eateth not: and he which eateth not, let him not iudge him that eateth. Paul goeth betwene either parties as a mediator, and taketh away their brawlinges, and hedgeth in either part by cer-

The question touching the Eucharist, is not vnprofita-
ble.

They whiche put a difference
betwene meates, are to be counted weake.

Why the children of the Jewes
abstained
from the meates of the kinges
table.

taine bondes and limites according to his authoritie. He permitte every man at his pleasure to eate what meates so ever he will, so that he beane himself in such sort that he despise not his weake brother. He bideleth also the weake and permitte them for a tyme, not to eate against their conscience: but yet in such sort that they should not condemne others which are better the themselves. As knowledge without charity puffeth vp, and so puffeth vp, that we condemne others in comparison of our selves, so unskilfulness on the other side maketh vs prone and ready to iudge and condemne others.

There is danger both in knowledge and in unskilfulness.

By what names the superstitious are reproved.

Christ noteth, that those superstitious weake ones are in these wordes covertly in dede, but yet sharply, reproved. For first (saith he) they are called weak and that in faith, which doubtles is a most greuous fault. Secondly Paul commaundeth them to be receaved: as though of themselves they are not able to arise vp, or to stand, but have neede of instructions, and of doctrine and consolations. Lastly, he saith, that they are by more strong disputations which they are not able to conceive, easily offended, and for that cause are prone rashly to iudge. For they condemned others which were more free, as though they violated the law of God, and were geuen to glotony and to the belly more then was meete. These faultes the papistes at this day vpbraide to many of our men, but by what right and how truly, let God iudge.

Ab adiuvant.

For God hath receaved him. 1 Paul bringeth notable reasons, wherby he seareth away the weake from dangerous iudgements. The first is taken of things annexed together, for that he whome thou iudgest is not any common or vulgars man. For God hath receaved him, neither hath he suffered him to lie in sinnes, to worship idols, and to be ignorant of true religion and pietie. For rather he hath brought him to this estate, that he is now a member of Christ, and a partaker of the nature of God. Wherefore seeing that God hath adorned him with so great honour, how darrest thou presume to iudge him?

Who art thou which iudgest an other mans servaunt? He standeth or falleth to his owne lord: yea he shalbe established: For God is able to make him to stand. This man esteemeth one day above an other, and an other counteth every day alike. Let every man be fully satisfied in his mind. He that obserueth the day, obserueth it to the Lord. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, and geueth God thanks. And he that eateth not, eateth not to the Lord, and geueth God thanks. For none of vs liueth to himselfe: neyther doth any dye to himselfe. For whether we liue, we liue to the Lord, or whether we dye, we dye to the Lord. Whether therefore we liue, or dye, we are the Lordes. For Christ therfore dyed, and rose agayne, and reuiued that he might be Lord both of the quicke and of the dead.

Who art thou which iudgest an other mans servaunt? Here he reprehendeth they, that by a similitude taken of things civil & humane. Men vse not to clayme vnto them selves any right ouer an other mans servaunt. And knowest not thou, that those whome thou in such sort despisest are the servants of the lord? Undoubtedly he which is taken into the famely of any great prince is not commonly iudged of any but of his lord. I would to God these things were alwayes had in remembrance and obserued of backbiters, to consider, that those whose good names they seke to deface, are not only men, but also are now receaved of God into baptism and are by Christ made his children. Paul in the epistle to Timothe, calleth the beleuer the man of God: in which wordes he signifieth y he is not now a bare man. But are all iudgements by these wordes prohibited? Not undoubtedly to those which haue either in the publike wealth or in the Church any publike

The faithfull both are called and also are the men of God.

power

power. For in very dede these men iudge not, but rather God iudgeth by them. But what shall we say of priuate men? Doth not the spirituall man iudge all thinges doth not Paul say to the Corinthians, Te yourselves be iudges? From priuate men, especially from men adorne with the spirite of God, is not take away that power of iudging, wherby is discerned good from ill, truth from falshode, profite from disprofite. But here is not entreated of those thinges. For here is spoken of that iudgement wherby we reprove and condemne others. But vniuersally it is not lawfull for vs to condemne any man by our iudgement: If thou consider the persone, it is not lawfull so to condemne any man, as one which can not be amended or corrected. For alwayes so long as we liue here, we must conceaue a good hope of our neighbour, vnles there come in the meane tyme some peegular reuelacion of God, as we haue besoze taught. And as touching actes wher they are neuter & indifferent, charity requireth, & we interpretate the to procede of a good mind: for we ought not to accuse those thinges as sinnes, which may otherwise be well done. But as touching good factes, there is nothing to let but that we may in our iudgement commend them. Yea rather both iustice and the law of charity commaundeth vs so to do. But those thinges which are vtterly wicked, and plainly repugnant to the commaundements of God, are not condemned of vs, but of the wordes of God. But here the question is touching things indifferent. As concerning them, Paul profitably commaundeth the weake, for that they are still ouerspread with darknes, to refraine from iudgements. For, that is nothing els, but to goe about to vsurpe the office of God. For he is only the searcher of hearts, and he alone knoweth with what minde euery thing is done. Augustine de verbis Domini in monte sayth. That in these two things iudgement is rash, when it is vncertaine with what minde any thing is done, or what maner thing that shall in time to come be, which now seemeth either to be good or euill.

How farre forth it is lawfull to iudge as thers.

Rash iudge
ment cometh of vncertaine
of way.

He standeth or falleth to his owne Lorde. Sometimes they which iudge, pretend this, that they are moued with the grieffe which they take by reason of his destruction whome they iudge. But let no such affect trouble thee sayth Paul, for he whome thou iudgeth either standeth to his owne Lorde or falleth: and to him reboundeth the profite and the hurt. Doe not thou thinke thy selfe moze inster then him. That he which auengeth not, doe not thou by the vntimely iudgement seeke to destroy.

Yea he shall be established: For God is able to make him to stand. Forasmuch as it lieth not in thine handes to make thy brother either to stand or to fall, thou oughtest to thinke well of him, and not lightly to suspecte that he will fall. For he hath a good and mighty Lorde which is able to stay him vp and to establish him. And yet dothe not Paul here, as some fable, reason from the power of God to the effect. For, that were to doe nothing, and to imitate the Papists: which vpon this, that God can take away the nature of the bread, and reserue the accidentes without substances straight way conclude, that he so doth in the Eucharist. They ought first to be certaine of the will of God, and after ward to come to the effect. For Paul here maketh mention of the power of God, for that he had besoze sufficiently spoken of his will: that God had receiued him and taken him into his famely, and geuen vnto him a firme faith and strength, wherfore seeing that thou art assured of the will of God, and canst not doubt of his power, thou oughtest not lightly to distrust of his saluation whome thou iudgeth. After this manner also is to be vnderstanded that which he besoze sayd in the ii. chapter. And if he abide not in incredulitye, he shall be againe grafted in. For God is able to graft him in againe. Were also are we assured of the will of God, and that by the scriptures. For there are infinite promises made to the nation of the Jewes, which can not vtterly be boyde. For, as Paul straight way after ward affirmeth the giftes and calling of God are without repentance: and he affirmeth that they were beloued for they fathers sake. Wherfore seeing that there was no controuersie of his will, he aptly addeth an argument of his power. Yet ought we not too much to assure our selues of an other mannes

Paul here
reasoneth of
the power
of God to the effect.
First is requisite that we be cer-
taine of the will of God
besoze that we reaso of his power

Cap. 13. A Commentarie vpon the

Although we can not be assured of the saluation of an other man, yet ought we to hope well of him.

Of the Sabbath and Lords day.

Of holy dayes.

Differences of dayes, as touching fasting and abstinence were free. Some abstained from flesh on the fourth day of the weeke and some on the Saturday.

In matters of religion, euery man must not follow his owne sense.

saluation, although we ought not to be in doubt of our saluation. For although we can not be assured of others, yet charity moueth vs to hope well of them, wherunto all those reasons which Paul here bringeth doe vige vs.

This man esteemeth one day aboue an other, and an other counteth euery day a like. There was also an other infirmity of Iewes newly conuerted to Christ, in that they thought that the dayes ought to be obserued according to the old law, namely Easter, Whitsontide, the feast of trumpets, the day of expiations, the feast of tabernacles, the new Moones, and the Sabbaths. But they which were endued with a stronger faith, counted all dayes a like. Now be it we except the Lords day: for it pertaineth to the ten commaundementes, that out of the whole weeke, should one day be consecrated to the worshipping of God. That day God wold in the olde law should be the Sabboth day, that the benefite of the creation of the world, and of the deliuey out of Egypt, might the more firmly stick in memory: But afterwarde, that the memory of the resurrection of Christ, and the renewing of our saluation obtained by him, and the hope of our resurrection which we wait for, should most deeply linke into our mindes, the Lords day was appoynted, and that euen of the Apostles. Of which thing is very manifest mention made in the holy scriptures. Afterwarde by Ecclesiasticall men, were brought in a great many festiuall holy dayes, which, as Erasmus testifieth, and as they olone counsels affirme, as our times now are, were better to be fewer, or rather utterly none at all. But it is wonderfull howe Origen, Ambrose, and others, drew these wordes of Paul to the abstinences from meats and from flesh, which some Christians at that time obserued: as though there were some which in the Apostles time did certain dayes abstaine from flesh, or from some other kinde of meats. But others thought that all dayes were free vnto them. And yet though we should follow this exposition, can not the Papists, which at this day labour to obtrude vnto vs the choise of meats, by this place any thing be holpen. For Paul sayth it cometh of weakenes to esteeme one day aboue an other: and commendeth them as men of more strength which count euery day all one, and a like. Touching which matter it shall not be amisse to cite the wordes of Theodoretus, which wyrteth thus vpon this place. This custome, (sayth he) abideth euen to this day in the Churche: and this man embraceth abstinence: but that man dothe without all manner scruple eate all kindes of meates: and neither doth this man iudge that man: nor that man this man: but the lawe of concord maketh them renowned and notable. These wordes of Theodoretus, and those which are vpon this place gathered out of Origen, Ambrose and Chrysostome plainly declare, that these differences of dayes as touching fastings and abstinences, were in suche sorte vsed amongst Christians, that yet notwithstanding they were free. Neither doubt I, but that at the beginning Lent was of the same nature: although afterwarde the yoke thereof was vrged at mennes handes. Out of Ambrose vpon this place this I note, that in his time some abstained from fleshe the fourth day of the weeke, and some on the Saturday. I thought it good, (gentle Reader) to mencion these things, that thou mightest know whereto some of the fathers wrested these wordes of Paul. Now be it the first interpretation touching the dayes of the Iewes is both more simple, & more agreable with Pauls purpose. Let every man be fully satisfied in his minde. The olde reading hath, let euery man abound in his own sense: which some hereto wrest, as though we ought in those things which pertaine to religion to permit euery man to his owne sense. This thing Chrysostome proueth not to be true. For when we come to matters of faith, Paul pronounceth that he is accursed, which teacheth any other Gospel, yea although he were an Angell from heauen. But this is true in things indifferent. Why then doth not the Pope at this day, suffer men to be free as touching meats. But the wordes of Paul haue not this sense. In Greece it is thus witten ἕκαστος ἑστὶν ἰδίῳ νοὶ ἀνυποπόσιος, That is, let euery man be in his minde fully persuaded and assured of that which he doth, and defendeth to be true. This thing ought euery man chiefly to see vnto, that when he either doth or defendeth any thing, he be first of all assured assured and firme as touching it. For a man shal see some which dispute & contend only for victorie sake, when as oftentimes in theyr mind they either stand in doubt, or thinke otherwise. Those doth Paul in this place reprove, which either affirme or do any thing, when in the meane time they stand in doubt thereof themselves. It may here aptly be demaunded, whether this sentence of Paul, wherein he admonisheth to bear with the weak, be vniuersally true. Chrysostom sayth y this sentence is so long to be followed, as long as the fruit is not yet ripe. For so long must we beare with the weak, least by rashnes they take hurt. But we wil make a distinction of y ceremonies of y law, & this distinction al me in a maner refer to thre times. One time was, when y law was in force, & then were all those ceremonies of necessity to be obserued of all y Jewes. An other time was, when y gospel was now spread abroad & shined throughout y worlde, and y comon welth of the Jewes and their temple was vtterly destroyed. There was also a midle time whē the comon wealth of Israel after a sorte remayned still, namely when Christ had now ascended into heauen, and the Gospell was yet after a sorte in swadling clothes, and the light had not fully burst forth out of these darkenes. Then it was lawfull for a time to kepe still the ceremonies of Moses: but yet so, that no man should put in them the hope of his saluation. And this mozeoner was to be sene vnto, that others should not guilefully abuse this indulgency, which was for a tyme permitted towards the weak, to defend their supersticion by the example or lenitie of the godly. Paul when he saw that there was some consideration to be had of the weak, circumcised Timothie. But after ward he would in no case circumsise Titus. For he saw that if he shold haue so done, christian liberty shold by his example haue bene oppressed. Paul towards the Romanes shewed himselfe very gentle & remisse: for that he thought it mete to beare with their infirmitie & simplicitie. For soasmuch as they were but newly come vnto Christ, they could not straight way learne all thinges. But contrariwise let vs see how the same Apostle blessed himselfe towards those which now bitte vpon the bydle, and of a certayne obstinacie resisted his doctrine. Vnto the Col. the 2. chap. he saith: Take hede that ye be not wonne away by philosophie, and vayne deceite, according to the tradition of men, according to the elementes of the world, and not according to Christ. And straight way, Let no man therefore iudge you in meat or drinke, or in parte of a feast day, or of the newe Moone, or of the Sabbathes. And to the Galathians, ye which are circumcised haue fallen away from grace: Christ is nothing profitable vnto you. And agayne, ye obserue dayes, and times, and monthes, & yeares, I feare me lest I haue labored in vayne amongst you. This consideration also ought we at this day to obserue, that whome we see not yet sufficiently instructed, we gently cherish, and quench not the smoking flax: namely, so long as there is hope of repentance and of a better mind. But if they declare themselves to be hardened, and to be of purpose sworn enemies of the truth, there we must deale severely and constantly.

He that obserueth the day, obserueth it to the Lord. ] There were two things in the weaker sort, of which the one could by no meanes be allowed: namely, that they were ignorant of those thinges which they ought chiefly to haue known, and were in a maner destitute of faith and of the knowledge of Christian liberty. This thing Paul now omitteth, as which made not much to y present purpose. The other was, that they so feared God, and obserued his law, that they durst commit nothing which they thought was prohibited by the authozity of God. And for that this is a great aduancement vnto piety, therfore Paul setteth it forth, to the end to commend those weak ones to the better sort. Howbeit, lest in this matter he shold attribute moze vnto them thē to the freer sort, as though he shold think that the stronger in vsing liberty had not a consideration of the law of God, he pronounceth the sentence, which he setteth forth, comon to ech part. They, sayth he, which obserue dayes, obserue thē to the Lord, & they which obserue thē not, obserue thē not vnto the Lord. And they which eat, eat to the Lord, & they which eat not, eat not to the Lord. And those diuine cases which Paul here bleth, so obserue to the lord

We must not dispute of matters of fape, for victorie sake

How farre for the weak must beare with the weak. A distinction of the ceremonies of the law, as touching thre times.

Let the godly beware that no man abuse theyr lenitie towards the weak.

When in this case we must deale either gently or severely.

What might be commended in those which observe.

to eate to the lord, to liue to the lord, to dye to the lord, signifie nothing ells, but that we ought in all our actions, in all our life, and euen in death to depend of the lord.

Of what great force geuing of thanks is.

And geueth thanks to God. ] Hereby we may iudge y<sup>e</sup> eyther of those, what soeuer they did had a regard vnto God, for that either part gaue thanks vnto him. Wherefore geuing of thanks is of no small force. For it is as it were a certaine healthfull salwe, and maketh that, which otherwise of it selfe should haue bene hurtfull, commodious and healthfull vnto vs. Therefore Paul to Timothe writeth, Every creature is good, and nothing is to be cast away which is receaued with thanks geuing.

The scope of our life
and of all
our actions

For none of vs liueth to him selfe: neither doth any die to himselfe. For whether we liue we liue to the Lord, or whither we die, we die to the Lord. ] This may thus be applied, to be a reason, whereby the stronger sort are feared away from contemning the weaker: namely, for y<sup>e</sup> they both liue & dye vnto the lord. It may also be a general cause why they are sayd both to obserue & not to obserue daies vnto y<sup>e</sup> lord, & either to eate or not to eate to the lord: for that vniuersally they liue vnto the Lord, and dye vnto the Lord. By these wordes we are aptly and manifestly instructed touching the scope of our life, and of all our actions. I would to God this might neuer slippe out of our mind, but might with most depe rootes be fixed in our hartes. Life and death I thinke in this place are to be vnderstanded as touching the body. For I se not very wel, what consideration they haue, which referre these thinges to the life of sayth, and to the death of sinne. For there is none which sinneth to the Lord. For, that can not pertayne to the hono<sup>r</sup> of God. Vnles peradventure they meane, that this is all one with that which was befoze spoken, He standeth to his Lord or falleth. But y<sup>e</sup> first exposition semeth in my iudgement moze playne, and agreeth with those thinges, which Paul writeth to the Phillippians; And Christ shalbe magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death.

VVhither therefore we liue, or die, vve are the Lordes. ] This in sum ought to be of greate force with them, for that not only our life and death depende of the lord, but also for that we all both as touching life and as touching death are his proper possession. And if this be so, who can contemn his neighbour & escape unpunished? This is in a maner all one with that which Paul befoze sayd: Why iudgest thou an other mans seruant? What fault was reproued in the weake ones: and this is now layd to the charge of the stronger sort, that they reiect, and contemne not euery kind of men, but these which are the Lordes. Paul sayth to the Cozinthians, Ye are not your owne men: For ye are bought with a price. Glorifie God now in your body and in your spirite which belong to God. Agayne, ye are bought with a price be not ye made the seruants of men.

Whether Christ if he had not dyed
for vs,
should haue
had vs to his proper possession.

For Christ therefore died, rose agayne, and reuiued that he might be Lord both of the quicke and of the dead. ] Here he ascribeth a cause, why we ar by good right y<sup>e</sup> Lordes. For he hath redeemed vs by his death, & by his resurrection hath deserued life for vs. Wherefore he is Lord both of our life and of our death. But here peradventure thou wilt demaund, whither if Christ had not died we should haue bene his proper possession or no? As touching his diuine nature, euē without his death and resurrection he is our lord. For we are created of him, & whatsoever we haue, we haue it thorough him. But bycause he is in very dede mā, he hath by his death and resurrection iustly and worthely gotten vnto him selfe this dominion: which yet the father could haue geue vnto him freely: but to set forth his glozy he would rather geue it to his merites. Wherefore Paul to the Phil. sayth: for which cause God hath geuen vnto him a name which is aboue euery name: namely, for that he had humbled himselfe to death, euen to the death of the crose. Origē very largely entreteth of this doubt. Howbeit I thinke that this solution which I haue here brought is moze playne & moze true. But there ariseth also an other doubt. For Paul semeth to speake agaynst that sentence of the Lord in 22. chapter of Mathew. He is not the God of the dead, but of the liuing. For if he be not the God of y<sup>e</sup> dead, how is he here sayd to be Lord of the dead. But if the matter be moze narrowly examined, there is not herein contrariety. For there the Lord would hereby proue the resurrection of the dead, for that God could not be truly the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob vnles he would haue them to be saued, and that wholly both as touching soule and body. For it is the propriety of God to saue those whose God he is. And the Scripture in Exodus pronounceth, that God is the God of those patris arches. Wherefore they liue, and shall moze fully liue in the blessed resurrection. Whereby it is manifest that Christ spake of those, which were thought to be utterly dead both in soule and in body. But God can not be their God. For he can not suffer such a death to prouaile against his. But here Paul sayth, that Christ is Lord of the dead, which are dead in body only, but liue in spirite, and when tyme cometh shall rise agayne. Wherefore we see that betwene these places there is vn doubtedly no contrariety. But because we are by the way lighted vpon those wordes of the Lord, there are as I thinke in them two thinges to be obserued. First, that although of them is properly concluded the resurrection of the godly, whose God, God confesseth himselfe to be, yet followeth it, that of the selfe same wordes may be concluded the resurrection of the wicked. For if God of his goodnes do so fauor the godly, that he will not only haue their soules to be blessed, but also will geue blessednes to their bodies: he will also restore vnto the wicked their bodies, that according to the law of iustice they may be tormented not only in their soules, but also in their bodies. The other is, that in the Prophets there are touching the resurrection of the dead certayne other moze notable places, which yet Christ allea ged not, for that the Saduces with whom he then reasoned, admitted the law on ly, and touching the other holy bookes either they receaued them not, or els they esteemed them not much. For they read them as we read the Fathers. But I leaue this matter, and I beseech God, not to suffer this singular benefite of the death of Christ to weare away for age in our myndes, that the common prouerbe be not applied vnto vs. Nothing waxeth old sooner then grace.

Why
Christ
brought not testimonies of the resurrection out of the Prophets.

But why dost thou iudge thy brother? Or also why dost thou despise thy brother? For we shal all be set before the iudgement seat of Christ. As it is written, I liue saith the Lord and euery knee shall bow to me, and euery tong shall confesse vnto God. So then euery one of vs shall render accompt of himselfe to God. Let vs not therefore iudge one an other any moze. But iudge this rather, that no man put an offence to his brother, or be an occasion of falling.

But why dost thou iudge thy brother? Or also vwhy dost thou despise thy brother? By the name of brethren he reproveth eche part. For the right of brethren is equall and a like: and in them is expessed a ciuill administration, which is called Politia which is a certaine equalitie of Citizens betwene themselves. Wherefore no mā ought either to despise or to iudge him, whom he knoweth to be his equall.
For he which so doth, counteth him not for his equal, but for his inferior.

The right
of brethren
is equall.

Vvherefore vve shall all be set before the iudgement seat of Christ. By the iudgement seat vndoubtedly is vnderstanded the iudgement of Christ, and that by the figure Metonomia. And this benefite beside others we haue by the ciuill magistrates, that by theyr ares and swordes, and iudgementes seates we are put in minde of the iudgement of God. The like phrase of speache Paul vsed in the v. cha-piter of the latter Epistle to the Corinthians, vve must all appeare before the iudgment seat of Christ. Origen expounding these wordes, maketh a discourse I knowe not wherof, for that in this place is red. Before the iudgement seate of Christ, and to the Corinthians is red, Before the iudgement seat of God and with a long cir-cute he disputeth of this matter. But doubtles all our bookes haue in ech place. Before the iudgement seate of Christ. so that there appeareth no cause of ambiguity.
And yet if we should so rede as he imagineth, nothing could be gathered out of those wordes, but that Christ is God. In the 7. chapter of Daniell are set forth many

ny excellent thinges of this throne of God, wherein is described the magnificency of the iudgement to come.

This place
proueth the diuine nature of Christ.

As it is vwritten: I haue sayth the Lord.] This place which is brought to proue Christes diuine power of iudging the world, is witten in the 45. chapter of Esay. As touching the very bare wordes, Paul foloweth not the Hebrew verity: but yet most diligently kepeth the sense of the Prophet. For that which is here said, Saith the Lord, agreeth with that which is in the Hebrew, The Lord hath sworne. And the bowing of the knee signifieth here nothing els, but a submission, which is most aptly signified by that outward Simbole.

Euery tounge shal confesse vnto God.] In Hebrew it is, Euery tounge shall swear vnto me, but there is no man which knoweth not, but that in an othe is an excellent confession of God. For he is called as a witnes, or rather as a iudge: and he is so called, that he will punish the foreswoorne persons according to theyr desertes. But as yet we see not that all thinges are subiect vnto Christ. But that shall be when he shall deliuer by the kingdome to God and to the father. For then shall all thinges vtterly be made subiect vnto him, & amongst other the last enemy, namely death, as Paul sayth to the Corinthians. How be it now is begon a certaine obedience, and his kingdome is acknowledged of the congregation of the godly. Wherefore though many vniust and wicked thinges be now committed, yet let vs iudge nothing before the time come, leass we be prejudiciall to the sentence of that moste highe iudge. Then all thinges according to our hope, which now we seme to want equitie, shall be full of equitie. Of these wordes of the Apostle, is most manifestly gathered the diuinitie of Christ. For when he speaketh of the iudgement seat of Christ, he addeth, and euery tounge shall confesse vnto God. Which self thing is much more manifest if we looke vpon the Hebrew veritie. For before that these thinges are pronounced vnder the person of God, this is witten: Am not I Lord, and there is no other God besides me? Wherefore seing these thinges pertaine to Christ, as Paul testifieth, it most manifestly appeareth that he is God.

So then euery one of vs shall render an accompt to God of himself.] Wherefore it is not meete that we either rashly iudge, or proudly contemne others. For at that iudgement seat causes shall be decided according to their desertes.

Let vs not therefore iudge one an other any more.] This is concluded by the reasons alleaged of Paul: and is euery where in the holy scriptures inculcated of the holy Ghost.

To iudge hath two significations.

The impeller to sinne, sin-
neth more
griuously, then he
which com-mitteth the
sinne.

But iudge this rather, that no man put an offence to his brother, or be an occasion of falling.] This word κρίνειν, that is, to iudge, hath not here all one significati- on with that which it had before. For before it was to condemne an other by his sentence, or to affirme any thing rashly of another. But here, to iudge, signifieth to appoynt a thing with our selues. Appoynt therfore with your selues (sayth he) and thinke that this chiefly pertaineth to your duety, that no man be offended by any your example, or any your doings. Chrysostome by a straunge reason proueth that this thing is to be taken heede of. For (sayth he,) he which impelieth an other to sinne, deserueth to be muche more grievously punished, then euen he which hath sinned. For euen at the beginning a greater punishment, and behementier curse was inflicted vpon the serpent, then vpon the woman. For she transgressed: but the other perswaded. The woman also was more grievously punished, then the man: for that he had not sinned but by her counsell and persuation. And Iezabel was much more grievously punished then Achab: Christ pronounceth of a man thus offend- ing his brother, It had bene better for him that a milstone had bene hanged about his necke, and he throwne headlong into the sea. Agayne, Wo be vnto him, by whom offence commeth. How be it if any man be offended with honesty and iustice, we ought not to regarde that: Let vs say rather with Christ, let them alone, they be blind leaders of the blinde. Euery plant which my heavenly father hath not planted, shall be pluc- ked vp by the roote.

I know

I know and am persuaded, that through the Lord Jesus, there is nothing common of it self: but vnto him which iudgeth any thing to be common, to him it is common. But if thy brother be grieved for thy meate, now walkest not thou according to charity. Destroy not him with thy meate: for whome Christe died. Cause not your commoditie to be obnoxious to euill speakings. For the kingdome of God is not meat nor drink, but righteousness and peace, and ioy in the holy Ghost. For whosoever in these things serueth Christ, is acceptable vnto God, and is approued of men.

For I know and am persuaded. The stronger sort might haue sayd, and that not without iust occasion, why dost thou call vs backe fro the vse of Christian liberty? Is it not lawfull for vs to eate of all meates indifferently? Dost thou by thine Apostolicall authority decree, that certayne meates are vncleane? Thou say which with so great liberty reprobouedst Peter at Antioch, attempting by his example the like thing. Vnto this obiection Paul by preuention answereth, and affirmeth, and constantly pronounceth, that all meates are vnto a Christian man free.

That thorough the Lord Iesus Christ there is nothing common of it selfe, but to him that iudgeth any thing to be common, to him it is common. Hereby we vnderstand, that no meate is of his owne nature vncleane. For it hath not his nature of himselfe, but of God. But he hath created nothing that is euill, for his creatures are in the holy scriptures called good. In Greke it is, δια ταυτου, that is, by it selfe, that is, of his owne proper force and nature. And though certayne kindes of meates were prohibited vnto the first man, and to Noe and to his children, and to the Hebrewes, that was not done because there was any fault in the thinges themselves, but that men should by a certayne discipline be instructed of Christ & of a vertuous life vntill the light of the Gospell came. But if any error happen, as if any man should foolishly thinke (which thing the Pharisees, and other like pestiferous men did) that it is a detestable thing to eate either flesh, or any other certayne kind of meat, then such a meate is not of his owne nature made vncleane, but thorough that mans corrupt opinion. Wherefore let vs beware that we conceaue not in our mindes any errors or mad opinions touching meates. And let thys be before our eyes, which Paul sayth, that meates are made vnto the common, which iudge them to be common. But the gouerners of the Church haue so appoynted fastings, and certayne dayes, and choise of meates, that by that meanes, there no where want such superstitious opinions, but are euery where in a maner rise, and sinnes are without measure increased. For if we thinke that God is offended in any thing, and do not for all that absteyne from it, it is a great token that we more esteeme our owne will, then the law of God. Yea rather that man whatsoever he be in so doing sinneth double: first for that he is ignorant of that which he ought to know, secondly, for that he followeth not euen his owne sense which he hath conceaued of religion, but committeth that which he thinketh is forbidden by the law of God. And Ambrose in this place doth not vnaduisedly weigh the phrase of the law. For the law when it speaketh of vncleane meates, thus decreeth: These thinges shall be vncleane vnto you. It sayth not absolutely. They shall be vncleane, but addeth, Vnto you. For that the Iewes only were bound to those lawes. Hitherto we haue spoke of the nature of meates: now wil we speake of theyr vse. That vse, ought, eue as al other our actions, to be subiect to the law of charity. And therefore we must take hede, that it serue to edification, and that by it our weake brethren be not offended. For, to speake at a word, we haue nothing in the whole world which is free from the loue of our neighbours. Paul sayth, common, after the Hebrew manner. For, that nation had certayne peculiar meates, not only as touching nature thereof, but also as touching the dressing of them. But other kindes of meates, for that they were confusedly vsed of other nations were called common,

Mark. i.

as

Why no
meat is of his owne
vncleane.
Why God
sometime prohibited
some meates.

Of the suspicion
of opinions
spring gre-
uous sins.

Why the law saith:
They shall be vncleane
to you.
Of the vse
of meates.
We haue nothing in the world
which is free from the loue of our neighbours.

What Paul here
signifieth
by this word common.

Cap. 14. A Commentarie vpon the

What
things are called pro-
phane.

Through Christ creatures hurt
be not,

The nature
of charity.

as though they had no holynes ioyned with them. So of the Lattines such things are called prophana that is prophane, which are πορρο, that is, farr of, a fanis, that is, from temples, and may be vsed of all kindes of men. Therof it came, that in the 10. of the Actes Peter sayth, that he had neuer eaten any thing common or vncleane. In which place he aptly ioyned together κοινον & ακαθαρτον, that is, common or vncleane. And Chrysostome noteth, that here is sayd, common, of that, which commeth out of the hart: so, that is it which maketh a man common, that is to say, polluted. Such as are adulteries, murders &c. Neither is it in wayne that Paul addeth, through Iesus Christ. For if thou referre it to that which he before sayd, I know and am persuaded (which way Chrysostome seemeth to like wel) it declareth, that this persuasion of Paul is not humane, but utterly diuine. But if it be referred to that which followeth, That there is nothing common, then teacheth it vs, that we ought to count to haue receaued this benefit at Christes hand, as by whom the obligation or bond of the law is abrogated. And in these wordes are they couertly reprobued, which will not vse so great a benefit of Christ. By Christ also we haue this benefite, that the creatures which otherwise by reason of sinne are subiect to the curse and to vanity, can now doe vs no hurt. For as Paul sayth to Timothee They are sanctified by the woord of God and by prayer. But vnto infidels and to those which are without Christ they kepe still that curse whereunto they are subiect. Wherefore Paul sayth to Titus, All things are cleane to the cleane: but to the vncleane and to the vncleane nothing is cleane, for that theyr mind and conscience is defiled. Here we se y those things which otherwise were vncleane, are by fayth & the woord made cleane. And contrariwise y which of his owne nature is cleane, is by a corrupt opinion, and by departing fro the woode of God made vncleane. What meruaile is it then, if we say, that when the woode and faith is added, the bread in the Eucharist and the water in Baptisme, are no more common and vulgare elementes.

But if thy brother be greued for the meate, now waiketh not thou according to charity. ] Here he declareth that that which of his owne nature is not common or vncleane, is yet notwithstanding sometymes for some other cause prohibited, namely as we haue sayd for charity sake. For the nature thereof is to stirre vs by diligently to prouide for all those things which we knowe shall profite our brother. They greuously sinne against this commaundemēt, which wil not forbear from those things by which they know the consciences of their weake brethren are offended and afflicted. In mans body if any member peraduenture be ill at ease, it is handled gently, and diligently sene vnto of the other members. So ought we to helpe our weake brethren as much as lieth in vs, and to ease them of their paine and griefe. Let no man thinke that the consent of religion is a thing light or of small valew. For in such cases we se that the weake are greued, whē they se others to doe otherwise then they iudge ought to be done. But contrariwise the godly reioyce, when they se others consent with them both in sayth and in maners.

Destroy not him vvirh thy meate for vvhome Christ died ] For what other thing ells is this, but openly to resist the counsell of Christ? He hath redeemed him: wilt thou destroy him? He hath shed his life, soule, & bloud for thy brother. Canst not thou for his sake absteyne from a pōre pece of meate? He being the chiefe creator & authoz of all thinges did this. And dost thou being but a worme, yea and lesse thē a worme thinke I kōne to doe this? He died for thee when thou wast hatefull and his enemy: and canst not thou suffer so trifeling a thing for the brother sake? Ambrose very godly sayth that by this place we may know, of how greate valew the saluation of our brother is. This I thinke he therefore spake, for that the nature of iustice requireth, that the price of a thing be after a sort made equall with the thing it selfe.

The price of a thing is after a sort
made equall
with the
thing it self.

VVherefore cause not your commodity to be obnoxious to euil speakings. ] We must in no case suffer, sayth he, the excellent giftes of God to be euill spoken of thorough your default. But Christian liberty, and the doctrine of the Gospell and sayth are no vulgare or common giftes of God. Why then doe we cause them, to be euill.

euill spoken of for our sakes, when as rather they ought by all manner of meanes to be commended, and with most high praises to be set forth: By euill speakings I vnderstand not the euill speakings of euery kind of man, but of the weake brethren: which forasmuch as they detest thy liberty, thorough thy default are made confus- melious agaynst God, which gaue it vnto thee. But that man goeth rightly & orderly to worke, which saith vnto, that his workes be approued, and especially by the iudgement of the godly brethren: that the glory of God may be celebrated, & that others may haue an example of holynes to follow. We may here also vnder- stand the euill speakings of those which are without. For they when they see christi- ans to contend amongst them selues about frivolous matters, beginne to haue our religion in contempt. Whereof came it, that Paul sayd, for your sakes the name of God is euill spoken of amongst the Gentles.

For the kingdome of God is not meate and drinke. These stronger sort thought that in desending their liberty, they did very much increase the kyngdom of God: & thought also yf if they dyd other wyse they should betray it. Paul thus answereth vnto the, yf this is not the force, this is not the right, this is not yf fruit of the kingdome of heauen, that we should either eate or drinke whatsoeuer we list. For the effectes thereof are of much more excellency: Which effectes Paul straight way mencio- neth, namely, righteousness, peace, and ioy in the holy ghost. Chrysostome thus expoun- deth these wordes. The kingdom of God is not meate and drinke, these things bring thee not to the kingdom of heauen: but righteousness, peace, and ioy in the holy ghost make thee partaker thereof. With which exposition Ambrose also agreeth. If by righte- ousnes, peace and ioy they vnderstand Christ, which is made vnto vs all those thinges, I wil not be agaynst the. But if they put the as causes of our felicity, their interpretation is vtterly wide from the marke. They had not spoken amisse if they had sayd, that meate and drinke are not those thinges whereby is confirmed and spred abroad the kingdom of God: and therefore we must not contend about them as certayne chiefe and principall points. Therefore Paul saith in the 8. chapter of the first to the Corinthians. Meate commendeth vs not vnto God. For neither if we eate not, shall we want, neither if we eate shall we abound. One Origen, as Augustine writeth in his 86. epistle very vnlearnedly abused these wordes, to proue, that we ought to fast on the Saturday. Because the kingdom of God (sayth he) is not meate and drinke. Augustine answereth, If the matter be so, then vpon the Sondays and at other times, when we fast not, we pertayne not to the kingdom of God. Chrysostome sayth, that by this sentence of the Apostle eyther part is admo- nished. For it is profitable for ech part to vnderstand wherein consisteth the king- dome of God. Which thing though I graunt to be somewhat likely, yet doe I not iudge it to be of necessity. For he still continueth in dealing with the stronger sort and sayth, destroy not the worke of God for meate sake.

Righteousnes, peace, and ioy in the holy ghost. The kingdom of God consi- steth not in outward thinges. For forasmuch as it is a thing spirituall, it must nedes also consist of thinges spirituall: which though they be many in number, yet here are reckened by only the excellenter spirituall thinges. By righteousness he vnderstandeth both yf righteousness wherby we are iustified, out of which springeth true peace: And therefore Paul before sayd, We being iustified by fayth haue peace: And also that righteousness which after regeneration springeth forth of fayth as a fruit therof: which righteousness also is the mother of peace. For it disturbeth not, neither worketh any thing, wherby our neighbors may iustly be angry or be mo- ued. By the first righteousness the mind of a sinner is pacified, wher as he beleueth that thorough Christ his sinnes are forgiven, and so also is it by the second, for that our hart accuseth vs not of any crime, of any such crime (I say) which may plucke vs away from God, and may wast the conscience. After this in order followeth ioy, whereby we alwayes reioyce in the Lord, and assuredly hope for perfect good thinges, and doe now presently fele the same good thinges to be begone. There is a certayne other peace of the flesh, which Christ came not to send vpon the earth.

likk.g.

And

Meat and drinke are not the principall
thinges for
which we should contend.

Righteousnes of two sortes.

And touching the ioy of the flesh Christ sayth in Luke: Wo be vnto you which laugh now: and pronounceth them to be blessed which mourne. This particle, in the holy ghost, is added, for that by him all these things are geuen vnto vs. Wherefore it is witten in the 5. chapter to the Galathians, The fruites of the spirite are ioy, peace, and patience. But thou wilt peradventure say, Although the kingdome of God as it is sayd be spirituall, yet notwithstanding outward things also seme to make somewhat eyther with it, or agaynst it. For they are commonly commended in the Church, which liue temperately, and they which geue themselves to drunkennes and glottony do greauously sinne. That hereof commeth, for that whatsoeuer eyther vprightnes or wickednes is in these things, the same as Christ sayth cometh out of y hart. And when Paul saith y the kingdō of God is not meat or drinke he most sharply reproveth those whose bealy is they? God. These are the things whercof the kingdome of Christ consisteth, by which also it is confirmed and aduanced. In these things let vs exercise our selues: and let vs decline from those things which are contrary to them, namely, iniustice, brawlinges, and sozow of the spirite. These stronger sozte are in my iudgemēt greauously reproved in these wordes, for that they vniustly reiected they? weake bzyethern, and for that by those they? vntimely disputations they troubled the common peace, and also for that they in liuing licentiously & ouer freely did by they? exāple fill others with sozow.

For vvhosoeuer in these things serueth Christ, is acceptable to God, and is aproued of men. The latine interpreter as it should seme red, not ἐν τοῖς that is, in these things, but ἐν τούτῳ that is, in this. For he hath thus turned it: Qui enim in hoc that is, for he which in this: which reading Origen followeth and also Ambrose: and eyther of them semeth to referre this sentence to the holy ghost, as if he should haue sayd, he which thorough the holy ghost serueth Christ. If we follow this sentence then much more greauously are these cōtencions and brawlinges of the Romanes reproved, bycause that they seemed hereof to spring, for that in spirite they serued not Christ, but attributed to much vnto carnall things. But we will follow the Greke reading. For by it we are with great fruite taught in what things the true and proper worshipping of God consisteth. But in the Papacy all things are full of dūme and superstitious ceremonies. He which after this maner worshipping God is acceptable vnto him. For he worketh those things which without doubt come not of our selues but of God. And men will they or nil they shall be compelled to geue testimony vnto the truth. The things which are here promised are most high and most excellent, namely, that we shall be grateful and acceptable both to God and to men wherfore of the contrary we may wel conclude that they which are occupied wholly in outward worshippings, in meat and drinke, and affliction of the body, shall neyther be grateful nor acceptable to men that be of an vpright and true iudgement, nor also to God. And this is that which Paul writeth to Timothe, The exercise of the body hath litle commoditie: but piety, that is, the spirituall worshipping of God stirred up by sayth & loue, wherof spring righteousness peace and ioye, auayleth to all things, as that which hath promises both of this life, and of the life to come. And Paul so writeth not of the superstitious exercise of the body, for otherwise that is vniuersally condemned in the holy scriptures: as it is manifest by the second chapter to the epistle to the Colossians: but he speaketh of that which was of many most highly and singularly esteemed and reuerenced, as though the whole stay and foundation of all religion consisted in it only.

Let vs therefore follow those things which concerne peace, and mutuall edification. Destroy not the worke of God for meate sake. All things indede are pure: but it is euill for the man which eateth with offence, It is good neyther to eat flesh, nor to drinke wine, nor any thing, wherby thy brother may stumble, or be offended or be made weake. Hast thou sayth: haue it with thy selfe before
God

In what things consisteth the true worshipping of God.

In argument taken of contraries.

God. Blessed is he which iudgeth not himselfe in that thing which he alloweth. For he that doubteth is condemned if he eate: for that he eateth not of fayth. For whatsoever is not of fayth is sinne.

Let vs therefore follow those thinges which concerne peace and mutuall edification. ] He auocateth them from thinges vnprofitable, to the end they should geue themselues to the principall and chiefe thinges, and very sinnetwes of the Church, namely, to peace and to edification. Which he declareth are to be followed not lightly or negligently, when he sayth: ἡ ἀκοιμία. For peace as Origene saith, seemeth to be diuyn away thorough the default of men, and to be taken away fro theyr doinges. But the more it lieth away, the more earnestly is it to bee followed after, yea though it be to the hinderance of our commodities. After peace he putteth edification, for that no man can abide to be instructed of him, whome he thinketh to be his enemy. Neyther can men be closed together as liuely stones to the building of the church, vnlesse they be ioyned together with the glewe of peace and of charitie.

Neither destroy the worke of God for meate sake ] Chrysostome calleth the saluation of men the worke of God. This doubtles besemeth vs not, that whereas we are the workemen of God, to this ende appoynted to be an helpe to him in aduancing the Gospel, we should through our default, ouerthrowe that which God will haue to be established. For so shall we be rather the workmen of the deuill, and of the fleshe, then of God. But in my iudgement they nothing stray from the meaning of Paul, which by the worke of God vnderstande saith, although it be weake, or a sparke of Christian pietie kindled in the hearts of our brethren, which it is our partes by al maner of meanes to cherish, and not to oppresse and to extinguishe as the Romaines did: and especially seeing that Esay in his 42. chapter thus writeth of Christ, He shall not quench the smoking flaxe. For Christ sayd, This is the worke of God, that ye should beleue. And the speach is made so muche the more vehement, in that it is sayd. That the worke of God ought not to be destroyed for meate sake. For the Antithesis betwene the worke of God, and betwene meate, is of great distance. And yet is not this spoken as though meate were the worke of the deuill, for it also is the creature of God. But as Ambrose waresly noteth, man was not made for meate sake, but meate for mans sake. Wherefore it is les to be esteemed, then the saluation of man, which amongst al creatures is by the figure Antonomasia, that is, by dignity or excellency, called the worke of God. Or peradventure the Apostle here had not a respect to the nature of meat, but to y<sup>e</sup> vnbridled lusting after it, and to the importunate and vnoorderly defending thereof: which things for that they were the vices in those men, the Apostle would not call them either the worke of God, or edification, or saluation.

All things in deede are pure: but it is euill for the man vvhich eateth vvith offence. ] He repeateth the p<sup>r</sup>euention which he v<sup>s</sup>ed before. I knowe and am assured through Iesus Christ, that nothing is common. For euen as there he graunted, y<sup>e</sup> there is no vncleannes in meates, as touching their nature, so here also plaine<sup>ly</sup> graunteth he the same. How be it that which he graunted, he againe ioyneth with an exception of offending our brother: as before he excluded a corrupt opinion touching meates. For euen as suche an opinion defileth him that v<sup>s</sup>eth those meates, so also doth the offending of our brother. Wherefore two things only contaminate meat, which other wise of his owne nature is cleane: either error, whereby the meate is thought to be vnlawful, or els the offending of the weak conscience of our brethren.

It is good neither to eate flesh, nor to drink vvine, nor any thing vvherby thy brother may stumbe, be offended or be made vvake. ] Whereas he sayth good, any man may easely perceiue, that this is not simply or absolutely good, but only vpon this condition, if thy brother be thereby made weake. Here is not spoken of that abstinence from wine and meate, whereby we are commaunded not to be ouercome with drunkenness and surfeting. For to eschue and flie from these things, is

The saluation of men is y<sup>e</sup> worke of God.

Meate is not the worke of the deuill.

Two things onely make meate vncleane.

of it selfe & absolutely good. Neither speaketh Paul of that abstinence fro things superfluous, whereby our mind is made more able & more apte to contemplate things diuine, & the flesh is bydeled from ouer licentiously resisting against the spirite. For these things are alwayes good and necessary vnto Christian men. Paul affirmeth this touching the vse of flesh, wine, and other things, so long as the vse of the is indifferent: and sheweth when it is good to abstaine from that vse, being otherwise of it self indifferent. Neither ment he any thing els by this his temperancie which he exhorteth vs vnto, but that we shold frame our selues to the weak ones: which thing he himself performed sayth Chrysostom, when he circumcised Timothe, and toke vpon him the bow. Neither was this (sayth he) hypocrisie, but an edification, and a most profitable dispensation towards the weak. Origen proueth that the vse of wine is a thing indifferent: for that although some vse it well, yet notwithstanding some abstaine from it by reason of wicked and superstitious artes, other some vse it to the worshipping of Idols, other some such as are heretikes vse it to establish theyr fonde and madde inuentions, but here arise two doubts: first, what if my brother be offended with that kinde of meat or drinke which is necessary for me to defend there withall the life of my body. For there are some which can not endure without wine. Therefore Paul admonished Timothe to vse a little wine by reason of his stomake, and often diseases: doubtles if the saluation of our neighbor depend wholly of this abstinence, we ought for a time to abstain. For we ought for our brethrens sake, to geue euen our life: as Christ gaue himselfe for vs: and this are we bound to doe euen by the law of charitie, from which no Christian is free. Now be it we must vse suche a moderation, that we must with as great dexterity as we can, and with as little offence render a reason of our doing to our weak brother: to geue him to vnderstand, that it is free for vs to vse any creature of God to the health of our body, so that we receiue it with thanks geuing vnto God. But if he at the length be so obstinate, that he wil not be content with a iust reason, then is he to be left with the Phariseis in his offense: which thing Christ hath not only in expresse wordes, but also by his example confirmed vnto vs, when the Phariseys were offended, for that the Apostles did eate meat with vnwashed handes. The second question is: what if after that we haue admonished & taught the weak one, we yet notwithstanding nothing profit: If to the sustaining of our body, we vse the lawfull creature of God, we shall seme to resist Paul, who thus wryteth to the Corinthians in the first Epistle and 8. chapter. If meate offende my brother, I will for euer eate no fleshe. I answered that the Apostle in that place amplified his speache by the figure Hyperbole, and this particle for euer is thus to be vnderstanded, if nede so require. As if he should say, so litle esteeme I mine owne commoditie, that if nede be, I will for euer abstaine from al things indifferent, rather then I will offend my brother. But if by my long abstinence be nourished the infirmity and obstinacy of my brother, then vndoubtedly ought I not to abstayne. For so not to eate, or not to drinke, were not a thing indifferent. For besides that it should nothing profit that obstinate person, it should also hurt the church of God. Therefore that place of Paul to the Corinthians is to be vnderstanded of the preparation of the minde: that is vnles any other thing let, euery one ought to be ready to abstaine from all manner of things indifferent, to the ende he should not disturb his brethren, or hurt theyr conscience.

Hast thou faith? haue it vwith thy selfe before God. He speaketh to him, sayth Origen, which knoweth & beleueth that all kindes of meates are now free through Christ. Let him vse this his sayth towards God, and geue thanks to him: and let him not by reason of his sayth compell an other man to eat with a wauering and resisting conscience: and let the same man haue his faith with himself: and let him not boast of it to the hurt of his neighbour. Neither let him with ouermuch licentiousnes vse what meates he list. Paul semeth by a certain pzeuention to answer to those, which sayd they wold liue freely, and defende the faith which they had received. Paul answereth, haue thou thy sayth before God, and kepe it to thy selfe.

Chrysostom

Note a Great doubt

In other
question.

Chrysostome thinketh that in this place is not to be vnderstanded that sayth, wherby we beleue the doctrines of sayth. For Paul before sayd; with the hart men beleue to righteousness, and with the mouth is confession made to saluation. Wherefore it is not inough to beleue rightly before God, vnles also thou profes thy faith before men. But here to make profession of faith out of ceason is ioyned to a vice, which thing pertaineth to offentacion. But I see not why this, which Paul now entreateth of, cannot be a doctrine of faith. For christia liberty is not y least of those things which we ought to beleue: which vnles it wer so, y bondage of y law of Moses, might easily retorne agayne. Neither doth Paul prohibite, but that we may into our weake by then instill the doctrine of our sayth. For our moderation, whereby we frame our selues to them, hereto only tendeth, that they might one day at the length be brought vnto our faith, and be made more strong therein. Wherefore this is the meaning of Paul haue it before God, and with thy selfe: that is, exercise not thy faith out of ceason. So he prohibiteth vnto them only the vse of meates for a tyme which they beleue to be free and not properly a true and apt declaration of their sayth. And vnto a weake brother, and to one that is not yet fully perswaded it shall for this tyme be sufficient, if he haue sayth touching the principall poynts of religiō. For it is not straight way required, that he expessedly beleue all things which are to be beleued. This sentence is no defence at all to those which contrary to the most manifest word of God winke at superstitious, and idolatrous practices, and at the prophanations, and abuses of the sacraments, for that they wil not offend the litle ones, but thinke it inough to haue faith in themselves, and before God. For here Paul speaketh only of such thinges which are meane and indifferent: and not of thinges necessary or repugnant with the word of God.

Blessed is he which condemneth not himselfe in that thing vvhich he alloweth. Least he should seeme to haue to much fauored the weake, he now to defend the stronger sozt declareth, that the greatest felicity herein consisteth, that euery one when he examineth and peyseth that which he alloweth or doth, do not condemn the same, but do assuredly see that it agreeth with the word of God. This is the greatest felicity of Christians that they neuer at any tyme be accused of theyr owne hart, as though they had allowed or committed any thing which they iudged not to be vpright. These thinges, as sayth Chrysostome are not spoken of the wicked, which delight altogether in whatsoeuer they themselves inuent; but of the faithfull which whatsoeuer they thinke, speake or do, measure the same by the rule of a sound sayth, and by the word of God. And Chrysostome thinketh that these wordes aunswere to those which were before spoken, Haft thou sayth? haue it with thy selfe, and before God. As if he should haue sayd: Let not this seeme to thee a small thing, herein art thou blessed, for that thou hast a sound iudgement of things. For this is a most ample gaine, and better then the whole world. For although al men accuse thee, yet if thy sayth & conscience accuse thee not, thou art blessed, and of this thine inwarde iudgement, thou receivest most great fruit. But the iudgement of thy conscience can not be vpright, vnles thy faith be vpright & perfecte. For otherwise many when they kill Christians and godly men, thinke that they doe God high seruice. Whereunto pertaineth that which Paul sayth in the second Epistle to y Corinthians the. i. chapter. This is our glory, the testimony of our conscience. And Iob in his. 27. chapter. For mine heart shall not reprove me so long as I liue.

But he which doubteth is condemned if he eate: for that he eateth not of faith. He which doubteth and eateth, is cōdemned, for that he is not perswaded with himselfe, that that which he doth, pleaseth God, wherfore he cā not direct it to his glory; when as he thinketh that it displeaseth him, but euery worke what so euer it be, that wanteth his ende, is sinne. Diudicare, which is turned to doubt, here chiefly pertaineth to infidelity: namely when the minde is tossed to and fro with reasons, neither is there in the minde any firme persuation. Wherefore Abraham is commended for that he without any such debatinges beleued.

For that he eateth not of faith. The cause why he is condemned, commeth

Of what faith Paul here speaketh.

Christian liberty pertaineth to the doctrine of sayth.

A great felicity of Christians.

The conscience is not vpright vnles it be established by an vpright sayth.

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

Not of the uncleannes of the meat, but for that he beleueth otherwise then he sheweth in acte. This sentence is of great force to keepe vnder the strong in sayth, not to compel the weake, & those that are not yet perswaded, to eate those things which they thinke to be prohibited.

This sentence of Paul is general.

The good works of heretikes are to them made sin.

For whatsoeuer is not of faith is sinne. This is a generall cause, whereout is gathered most excellent doctrine: namely that God regardeth not the shewe, pompe, and outward gloze of workes, but weigheth inwardly whether they proceede from a true obedience. And this is done, when by the word of God we beleue that suche things are bothe required of God, and also doe please him. Wherefore whatsoeuer springeth not out of this fountaine is sinne. Origen thinketh also that this sentence is generall. And therefore he sayth that the workes of heretikes are turned into sinnes, for that they sayth is not a true sayth, but a counterfayte and false faith, euen as some knowledge is called a false knowledge. And he citeth this sentence, Let theyr prayer be turned into sinne.

The fiftenth Chapter.

That are strong, ought to beare the infirmities of the weake, and not to please our selues. For let euery man please his neighbour, in that that is good to edification. For Christe also pleased not himselfe: But as it is written, the rebukes of them which rebuke thee, haue fallen vpon me. For whatsoeuer things are written afore time, are written for our learning, that we through patience and consolation of the scriptures might haue hope. Now the god of patience and consolation geue you, that ye bee like minded one towarde another, according to Christ Iesus. That ye with one mind, & with one mouth may praise God, euen the father of our Lord Iesus Christe, wherefore receiue ye one another, as Christ also receiued vs to the glory of God.

In argument take of the deniall of our selues.

The Apostle still persecuteth that which he tooke in hande, and exhorteth the stronger sorte, and the that were confirmed in doctrine, to beare with the weake, and that with great loue. And first he bringeth an argument taken of the ende of the giftes of God. For they are to that ende geuen vnto vs, that with them we should helpe our brethren, that our strength should serue to make others stronge, and that our knowledge should serue to instruct others. Chrysostome sayth, that here are reproued those froward, and in a maner superstitious persons, in that they are called weake: but others are called strong, which ought to beare with them. And thereto he thinketh Paul had a respect in that he counteth himselfe in the number of the stronger sorte. And this he doth not, as sayth Origen, as a boaster abrode of his owne praises: but by his example to stir them by, who though in might & strength he were not inferior vnto them, yet he made himselfe all things to all men. For this is this word, to beare lightly to be periled. For in Greke it is βασανισμῶς, that is, to beare, and after a sorte to carpe vpon a mannes shoulder. So Paule in an other place: beare ye one anothers burthen, and so shall ye fulfill the law of Christ, whereas he addeth, and not to please our selues, it is a newe profe taken of the deniall of our selues, which deniall we professe. For, not to please our selues is nothing els, as Ambrose interpreteth it, but not to seke that which may be profitable and pleasant to our selues, but that which may be commodious to our brother.

For let euery man please his neighbour, in that that is good to edification. Therefore he addeth, in that that is good, and to edification, that no man should thinke thinke if we ought to please our brethren, as touching filthy and hurtful affections. In that he before sayd, we ought, & here he useth a kinde of commaunding, he declareth that every one of vs is bound to these things: neither pertaine they to gratification, but to the bonde of the law, and of loue.

For Christ pleased not himselfe. To the ende the more vehemently to stirre vp theyr mindes, he exhorteth them thereunto by an example. For in wordes to professe Christ to be the master of our life, and in very dede to abhorre from his institutions, is both ridiculous, and also full of ignominy and shame. In this sentence this word to please, which in Greke is ἀποκρίν, signifieth to obey, to satisfy, and to be seruiceable. For otherwise that worde being vnderstanded in the common signification, should ouerthrow the sentence and meaning of Paul. For there is none of vs which ought not to please himselfe, when as he examineth his doings by a sound iudgment, and is fully persuaded, that they are through faith acceptable vnto God. Neither did Christ at any time after this maner displease himselfe in those things which he did. But how he framed himselfe to the commodities of other men, we are plainly taught by the holy scriptures. He abased himselfe, and toke vpon him the forme of a seruaunt, when as in very dede he was Lord ouer all: and being of all men the most holiest he did eate with Publicanes and sinners, and being most chaste, he prohibited not his secte to be washed with teares, and to be wiped, and anoynted of a woman noted of great infamy: finally being condemned with most wicked theues, he boughsed for our saluation to be crucified betwene them. He which did and suffred so many and so great things could he seme to haue sought to haue pleased himselfe, or rather to frame himselfe to our commodities? Wherefore the Apostle rightly setteth this example before our eyes.

These are preceptes and not counsell.

But as it is written, the rebukes of them which rebuke thee, haue fallen vpon me. This testimony is written in the 69. psalme. And Paul useth it in this sense, as though he should thus talke vnto the father: Not only the zeale of thy house hath eaten me vp, but also what so euer contumely and rebukes are done against thee, which doubtles is done through al the sinnes of al men, the same wholly lighteth vpon me, and that am I ready euen by the deathe of the crosse to beare and to make satisfaction for. The heartes of men though they were of iron, and harder then euen the most hardest stones, may yet notwithstanding by this example be softened to suffre any thing for the saluation of our brother. Doubtles in this example is much more comprehended, then Paul requireth of the Romanes. For he commaundeth them not, to beare the blames of the weake, but only to be an helpe vnto them, and to heale their infirmitie.

How the contumelies of god light vpon Christ.

For whatsoeuer things are written afore time, are written for our learning. This he addeth in the commendation sake of the holy scriptures: least he should seme not very aptly to haue alleaged that testimony of David. The things sayth he, which were in times past written by the instint of God, pertaine to vs, that we should be instructed by them. Wherefore no part of the holy scriptures is without fruit. For Paul sayth, whatsoeuer things are written, are written to our learning: in other bookes though they be excellently and exactly written, yet thou shalt finde in them somewhat which thou mayst reiect, as that which in no case pertaineth to thee. But in the holy scriptures thou shalt neuer finde any thing, which serueth not to thy instruction and saluation: so that thou weigh the thing rightly. And I would to God, that as many of vs as doe read the holy scriptures, would with this purpose and minde read them, and wold out of euery parte of them seke our owne edification. But a man shal see many, which by reading the holy scriptures, are in dede made the learner, but yet they become nothing at all the better. For they doe not at euery clause, thus question with themselves: what pertain these things to thee? What pertaine they to thy conuersation, and what belong they to thy doings? This without doubt the holy Ghost had chiefly a regarde vnto, not to teach any thing in the holy scriptures, which should be superfluous. In this thing chiefly ought the holy bookes to excel prophane bookes, that nothing can be cut away from them

No part of the holy scripture without fruit.

How the scriptures are to be read.

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

Against the Libertines

The things which are in the olde Testament. pertain to vs.

The common people
ought not to be prohibited from the reading
of the holy scriptures.
The vtili-tie of the holy scriptures.

The reading of the holy scriptures is profitable
both to the beleeues &
to the vnbeleeues.

Patience and consolation com-
meth of the scriptures.

them as ouerplus, or superfluous. If these properties be agreeable with the olde testamēt, then much more agree they with the new testamēt. For one & the same spirite was authoꝛ of them bothe. Where now therefore are the Libertines of all men the most arrogant, which brag that they are so high and celestial, that they haue no neede of the holy scriptures: for they thinke that the scriptures are geuen only to weake men, and to little ones. Merely Paul nombꝛeth himselfe amongst those which receiue profite out of the holy scriptures. For he sayth not, they are written for your learning, but for our learning. Neither is there any cause why the Anabaptists together with the Paniches, and Marcionites should bark against the olde Testamēt. For here Paul bringeth a testimony out of the Walmes in the olde Testamēt. Origen by a certaint learned induction proueth, that those things which are written in the olde Testamēt, pertains also to vs. Paul in the first Cozin. sayth, that those things happened to them in a figure, and were sealed in writings for our sakes, vpon whome the ends of the world haue come. And in the same Epistle he citeth this sentence, Thou shalt not binde the mouth of the Ox that treadeth out the corne: and this he declareth was not so spoken, as though God hadde a care ouer Oren, but for that they rather serue for vs. And to the Galathians he sayth, that Abraham had two sonnes, which in very dede shadowed vnto vs two Testaments. And to the Corinthians he sayth, that the Israelites did eate Manna in the wilderness, and drinke of the rocke, that we might knowe, that they did eat the spirituall meat, and drink of the spirituall drinke, namely, of the rocke that folowed them: and that rocke was Christ. Thus much Origen. And doubtles it would be tedious if a man should reckon vp all such kind of testimonies. By these things also let those men consider which seke to prohibite Christian men from the reading of the holy scriptures, how ill they prouide for theyꝝ commodity, whilest the labour to desir theyꝝ owne obstinacy, inueterate abuses, and superstitions.

That we thorough patience & consolation of the scriptures might haue hope. This thing Paul attributeth to the doctrine of the scriptures, that it easely bringeth men to patience, and maketh them willing wholly to committe all that they haue to the gouernaunce of God. And thereout he declareth are taken most swete consolations, and most seruient exhortacions, wherby the minds may be thoroughly stirred vp to execute the deuoties of piety, and of loue. And by that meanes being sensed with a strong and sound hope we shal neuer afterward wauer in noꝝ out, as children and reedes do. These notable and excellent giftes (sayth Origen) he attayneth not vnto out of the scriptures, which only redeth them, when yet in the meane time he beleueth them not, neither understandeth them: but he which both understandeth them and beleueth them. Although I thinke that vnto these wordes is to be added, that God of his goodnes geueth at the length vnto men that dayly rede the holy scriptures, grace both to vnderstand and to beleue: and chiefly seing that sayth commeth of hearing, & the light of sayth shaketh away the darkenes of ignorance. Wherefore the reading of the holy scriptures is most profitable both to them that that beleue and to them that do not beleue. And patience and consolation is sayd to procede of the scriptures, both for that God geueth these things vnto them which perseuer in reding of the holy scriptures, and which beleue them, and also for that in them we rede, that Christ and his members, haue for the truth, and for innocency and piety sake suffered many greauous and sharpe things, and by such examples we are moued: moreouer also for that by them we vnderstand that God hath alwayes bene present with his, so that he hath eyther vtterly deliuered them, or els he hath made them constant and valiant to suffer all thinges. And thereof we conceaue a good hope, that God wil also be the same God towarde vs, and that he will haue vs in the same place and nomber, that in times past he had them, which are commended vnto vs in the holye Scriptures. Neyther are we moued by such examples only, but also we heare God himself exhorting vs to patience and to valiantnes, and also promising vnto vs his helpe. And therby we are made couragious, and do fele sondꝝ and manifold consolations, and also we are stirred stirred to a good hope of the chiefe felicitie.

Nowv the God of patience and consolation geue you, that ye may be like minded one towards an other, according to Christ Iesus. ] That we should not thinke that the very scriptures can of themselves engender in vs patience and hope and consolation. Paul pronounceth God to be the true authoꝝ of these giftes. He vseth inbede the holy scriptures as lawfull instruments, by which he engendzeth these things in our hartes. Neyther doth Paul in vayne adde this kind of prayer. For thereby we vnderstand, that it is not inough that we teach vprightlie and saythfully, vnles God geue strength and efficacy to our doctrine. Wherefoze they which preach and teach the people, ought also with dayly and seruent prayers to helpe them whome they instruct: that they being by God made good ground, may receaue seede with fruite. He calleth God the God of patience and of consolation, soz that he can not be named other wise of vs, but of his effectes. And amongst other effectes which are attributed vnto God, Paul in this place mencioneth those chiefly, which serued most to his purpose, and which a litle befoze he had attributed to the holy scripture. He wissheth vnto the Romanes mutuall agrement, soz that at that time they somewhat disagreed amongst themselves, as it is manifest by those thinges which we haue befoze red. He wbeith he wissheth not vnto them euery kind of agrement, but y which is according to Christ. For many conspire together and well inough consent in committing of wicked actes, and that very oftentimes agaynst Christ. But we must not pray vnto God soz such an agrement, but rather must pray against it. Els by, According to Iesus Christ, he vnderstandeth, that they should be instructed according to his example.

The scriptures are not of them selues the efficient cause of these giftes.

God is named by his effectes.

What agrement is wished.

That ye with one minde and with one mouth may glorify God and the father of our Lord Iesus Christ ] It is not inough with one mouth, & with one & the selfe same words to glorifie God & Christ, vnles also be added one & the selfe same mind: which is to be vnderstanded by the coniunction of charitie: namely, that all discords be vtterly banished away. There is also required an agrement in the principall poyntes of doctrine, and in the articles that are necessary to saluation. As touching thinges probable it is not of necessity, that all men be of one & the same mind concerning them, so that charity be not by discord broken. Wherefoze I thinke we ought with most seruent prayers to pray vnto God, to geue at the length vnto his Church this most pleasant agrement. For so long as there are so many which dissent from the truth, how, can God with one minde, & with one mouth be glorified.

Touching what thinges an agrement is necessary in the church.

V Wherefoze receaue ye one an other as Christ also receaued vs to the glory of God. ] Paul in these his prayers which we haue now heard touched y end of mans life: namely, that we should all agreing in one & the selfe same mind glorifie God and the Lord Iesus Christ. Now he finisheth by the matter, and the thing which he hath entreated of he closeth by with a most profitable conclusion. For here he not only repeteth the end which he had set forth, but also thereunto addeth an example of Christ. Christ sayth he, receaued vs, when we were weake, infirme and lost. Wherefoze it is our partes also to embrace and cherish one an other, vnles we will be vnlike to so excellent a maister. And as he when he erected and holpe vs, sought nothing ells but the glozy of his father, so we in helping our byethern ought to set befoze vs & to regard nothing ells, but the glozy of God and of Christ. And so vehement is this conclusion of Paul, that there is left no place to make deniall. For if thy weake and infirme brother did neuer hurt thee, but is other wise of honest conuersation, vnderdoubtedly thou dealest vncourteously, if thou beare not with his infirmity. But if he be obious vnto thee, and haue peraduenture committed any thing, soz which he may seme to be vnwoꝝthy of thine helpe, yet oughtest thou to haue a consideratio to that example, which Christ hath set forth vnto thee, and oughtest alwayes to set befoze thyne eyes the glozy of God, which shall by thy louingnes be illustrated. Neyther wanteth it a certayne religious art and conning, that Paul in a maner with the selfe same wordes endeth this matter, with which he began it. For at the beginning he sayd, Him that is weake in faith receaue ye: And here he sayth, Receaue ye one an other.

The vehemency of Pauls conclusion.

Now

Now I say that Iesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirme the promises of the fathers. And let the Gentiles prayse God for his mercy: As it is written, For this cause will I confesse thee amongst the Gentils, and will sing vnto thy name. And agayne he sayth, Reioyce ye Gentiles with his people. And agayne, Prayse God all ye Gentiles, and laud him all people together. And agayne Esay saith, There shalbe a roote of Jesse, and he shall rise to raigne ouer the Gentiles in him shall the Gentiles trust.

In other dissent of the church
of Rome.

Nowe I say that Iesus Christ was a minister of Circumcision for the truth of God to confirme the promises of the fathers. Paul by a most soft transition, as I thinke, now goeth to take vp an other discorde, which at that time was risen not only at Rome, but also in other Churches. For those Churches, for that they consisted partly of the Iewes, and partly of the Gentiles, were long time at great dissension by reason of the differences of kinred, and of nations. For the Iewes through the pride that they conceived, bicause of the lawe that was geuen vnto them, and through the hautines and opinion of their holy stock and blood, deriued of the fathers, insolently contemned the Gentiles. But the Gentiles not able to beare that boasting and arrogancy, despised the Iewes, as men through their own default reiected of God, and in a maner excluded, for that they saw that they were now after a sort substituted into theyr place. Wherefore Paul to take away these contentions opportunely vseth this reason, wherewith he had knit vp his former talke: namely, that Christ had receiued them to the glory of God: which benefite for as much as Christ had bestowed as wel vpon the Iewes, as vpon the Gentils, it was not meete that they following theyr owne iudgement, should so much esteeme the differences of kinred and of merites, (which God in receiuing of them wayed not,) that therfore they should be disseuered one from an other. Wherefore Paul hereunto wholly bendeth himself, plainly to declare that bothe the Iewes and the Gentiles are through Christ, receiued of God into fauor. And he first maketh mention of the Iewes, for that vnto those before all other men, was preached the Gospel of Christ. And that they should not attribute this to theyr owne vertues, Paul rendreth a reason, why Christ would by himself be vnto that people a minister of saluation. This sayth he was done for the promises sake which were made vnto the fathers: least they should lye boyde and frustrate, if Christ should haue done otherwise. For that had bene a great empairing to the truth of God, which ought to be most constat. For Christ bestowed not this benefit vpon the Iewes, for y they were more worthy then other nacions, but y the truth of God should not seme to haue deceiued them. Neither could they refer to the commendation of their owne dignity, the promises that were made to theyr elders. For those promises ceased now to be due vnto them, for that they had degenerated from the faythe of theyr elders, and had thowow their perpetuall violating of the lawes, stirred vp y wrath of God against them: vnles God had had a consideration to his truth, rather then to theyr worthines. These things hath Chrysostom very wel noted in these wordes. And Christ ministred vnto Circumcision, that is, vnto the nation of the Iewes, when preaching the Gospel, he called them back to saluation and to life. This ministry consisted not in masses, belles, alters, prayers for the deade, holy water, stoles, silke vestments, choyse of meates, bowes, candles, ashes, and other rites, ceremonies, and ornaments of the Popes maiestie. Neither did he in title only carry about the dignity of the ministry, as many at this day doe, but he daily fed the sheepe committed vnto him, and with all industry and diligence preached vnto them the wordes of saluation. When others slept, he watched in prayers: in which it can not be doubted, but that he by all maner of meanes desired of God, that the ministry which he executed, might be moste frutefull to many. And as touching his

Christ was not the minister of the Iewes for their wor-
shippes sake

What maner of thing
the ministry of Christ
was.

his private life, he alwayes behaved himself holily and innocently, and adorne his ministry with a most excellent example of his whole life. For what so ever is commaunded in the law, the same he wholly so performed and accomplished, that it being after that manner fully accomplished, can not be any more a burthen to vs which are now through faith adioyned vnto Christ. For the olde ceremonies haue now ceased, whose shadowes are now at the light of the truthe taken away. And there withall also the ciuil commaundements are abrogated, where as that publike wealth is now no more of necessity vpon the earth. The righteousness also of those lawes which they call Mosaicall, although it can not perfectly be fulfilled of vs, yet partly through the holines of Christ which he communicateth vnto vs, it is performed and accomplished, and partly through the power of the holy Ghost which he distributeth to the beleuers, it is with great endeuor, according to that which is geuen vnto euery man, expressed, and that which wanteth, is through the grace of Christ not imputed. Finally he gaue his life for his, which was the last worke of his ministry. But whereas Origen noteth, that the Apostle ment here to gather an argument against the Ethnikes, if they should not despise the Jewes, although they abode still in the obseruations of the law, when as Christ himself was both the minister of the law, and obserued all these things diligently, this in my iudgement seemeth wide from the purpose. For here rather we learne, that the strength and foundation of the promises made vnto the fathers, was that saluation should be attained vnto for mankinde through Christ: although otherwise there were extant many other promises of the possession of the land of Canaan, and of the kingdom of the world. Which things forasmuche as Christ performed not, as which pertained not to his ministry, we ought to vnderstande, that they were rather things annexed, then the sinewes, and summe, and strength, and iuyce of the promises of God. And hereunto not a little serueth that which Paul wryteth in the second Epistle to the Corinthians the .i. chapter, All the promises of God are through him, yea and through him. Amen.

The last thorough Christ is not vnto
vs a bur-
then.

What is the strength
a summe of all the promises made vnto the
fathers.

And let the Gentiles praise God for his mercy. Vnto the Gentiles he attributeth mercy, and to the Jewes truthe, not that these two can be seperated the one from the other, for there is no worke of God, which hath either mercy without truth, or truth without mercy: but Paul ment to distinguish these things, euen as they were in more force, and as they were more declared in the saluation either of the Jewes or of the Gentiles. Christ as touching that conuersation which he had vpon the earth, was geuen to the Jewes, that the truthe of the promises should not be made frustrate. But if thou wilt descend to the very roote and foundation, euen those promises leane only to the mercy of God. For what thing els but euen his mere goodnes and mercy could haue moued him, to promise vnto the fathers, that Christ should come of theyr stocke: And although the Gentiles are sayd to be grafted in by mercy, yet here also truth hath place. For God knew euen from eternallie, that the Gentiles should be called to saluation. Wherefore it was true: for things false can not be knowne. And therefore it was necessary that that truth should attain to his effecte. Whereouer the scriptures kept not in silence that the Gentiles should at the length be called, as those Prophecies testifie, which are a little afterward alleaged. But the Prophecies of the holy scriptures, ought without all manner of doubt to be true. Wherefore the grafting in of the Gentiles pertayneth to truthe. But this ought not to be overhipped, that Paul when he entreated of the Jewes, spake not only of the truth, but also straight way after it made mention of the promises: as if he should haue sayd that Christ was geuen vnto the Jewes a minister of saluation, to confirme the truthe of the promises. But the calling of the Gentiles was in dede foretold, but as it should seeme it was promised to none: vnles peradventure any man will contende, that vnto Abraham were promised the Gentiles, when it was sayd vnto him, In thy seed shall all nations be blessed, but as we haue already sayd, this may seeme to be spoken rather in the way of foretelling, then in the way of promise. And if a man think this reason somewhat weak,

Mercy
and truth
are ioyned
together.

The promises of God leane
only to mercy.
In the grafting in of the Gentiles
truth had place.

Whether
the calling
in of the Gentiles
was peculiarly promised to any man.

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

be may folloio that which we befoze sayd, that the Apostle had a regarde to that which is most frequent in the holy scriptures. For in them is euery where promised, that the Messias should come of the seide of the Jewes: but not in so many places, nor so often is mention made in them of the callinge of the Gentiles. And to speake briefly, these distributions of Paul are not so to be vnderstanded, as though one part can by no meanes be ioyned with an other. And this may plainly be pproved by these two places: with the harte we belene to righteousness, and with the mouth is confession made to saluation. Againe, Christ died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification.

What to
confesse
signifieth.

As it is written, For this cause will I confesse thee amongst the gentiles, and wil sing to thy name. ] This prophesie is witten in the 18. Psalme, wherein is affirmed y the prayes of God should be celebrated amongst the Gentiles: which also is shewed by these other testimonies which are here added. And this can not be vnderstanded but of y redemption purchased vnto vs through Christ. The last testimony maketh mencion only of the hope and sayth of the Gentiles, & that the kingdō of Christ should be spred abrode euen amongst them also. In the 18. Psalme David speaketh vnder the persō of the body of Christ, that is, of the Church: I will confesse thee amongst the Gentiles. Here to confesse signifieth nothing ells, but with seruile prayers to set forth the prayes of God. And by those thinges which went a litle befoze in that Psalme is gathered, that that should be verified of the victorie gotten, and of the ouerthrow of the enemies.

A reuilla-
tion of the Hebrewes.

And agayne Reioyce ye Gentiles with his people. ] This is witten in the 32. chapter of Deut: Ye Gentiles stirre vp his people to reioysing. And the cause of this, common ioye is befoze recited, namely, for that God had set at liberty his frō their enemies and from those that hated them. Howbeit there are some which thinke rather that this testimony is taken out of the 67. Psalme, where we thus rede: Let the Gentiles be glad and reioyce: because thou indigest the people in equity, and directest the Gentiles vpon the earth. Howbeit from whence so euer this place be taken it maketh no great skill: for in ech place the sence is in a maner one and the same. I thinke rather, that it is taken out of Deutro, for that in the Psalme this particle vwith my people, or my people, wanteth. Howbeit this we ought not to be ignorant of, that the subtle Jewes to anoyd these testimonies, commonly say that the Hebrewes are in the holy scriptures oftentimes called Gentiles. And they cite that place out of the 1. chapter of Esay, Wo to that sinfull nation, a people of iniquity, in which place in the Hebrew is red Hoi goi chata. But this maketh nothing to their purpose. For in Deut: it is red, ye Gentiles stirre vp his people to reioysing. In which wordes we manifestly se that the Gentiles are distinguished from the people of God, which are sayd should be adopted of him. For they shall not only celebrate songes of thanks geuing for the victorie obteyned by Christ, but also shal prouoke the Hebrewes to do the same: which thing we se is at this day most perfectly accomplished. For at this day the Christians cease not to call backe to saluation the obstinate and stiffe necked Jewes. Neither can they deny, but that that which foloweth pertayneth to all nations vniuersally.

Prayse God all ye Gentiles and prayse him all people. (This is taken out of the 116. Psalme) For here the holy ghost vnder these wordes of vniuersality comprēhendeth not only the Jewes, but also the Gentiles.

There shall be a roote of Iesse: and he shall rise to raigne ouer the Gentiles, in him shall the Gentiles trust. ] This is witten in the 11. chapter of Esay, and amongst other testimonies concerning the Messias this without doubt is most notable. Andoubtedly the stocke of David, both in the captiuities, and especially when the Jewes were oppressed of the Romanes, seemed so barre, and in a maner dead, that there could of it be hoped for no moze fruite. And therefore the Prophet comforteth this dispayre with this prophesie. Out of this stocke (sayth he) shall bud forth a twigge, which shall be a signe to all the Gentiles, whereunto they may by heapes flye, and in whome they may put all theyr hope. Paul here semeth somewhat to decline from from the Hebrew veritie. For, that which he hath turned, shall rise (following the Seventy, which haue in the translation, dyigolpewo) is in Hebrew, He standeth. But Paul seemeth to haue added an explication, This rod shall stand, when yet the plant sowed before to haue bene utterly destroyed, and the stocke was iudged of all men barren and unfruitfull. Wherefore Paul rightly sayd, he shall arise, namely, after ward to stand more firmly. And that which the Hebrews say, Leuias, that is, for a signe, Paul hath with the 70. turned, to raigne ouer the Gentiles. For, that signe shalbe to this end erected, to be as a septer, wherewith the nations of y<sup>e</sup> world should be gouerned. Finally Paul with the 70. sayth, In him shall the Gentiles hope. When as in the Hebrew it is Alau Goum iedarcho, that is, the Gentiles shall seke after it. But this difference is not great, for no man will seke after y<sup>e</sup> thing which he is in dispayre to find. Howbeit as touching this place, hereby we vnderstand, that the Gentiles should come vnto Christe. For here is foretold that he should raigne ouer them, namely by his spirite and worde. And the nations shall hope in him. Which is not possible to be done wythout sayth: for out of it, as out of a fountayne, springeth hope.

Hope springeth out of faith, as out of his fountaine.

The God of hope fill you with all ioy, and peace in beleuing, that ye may abound in hope thorough the power of the holy ghost. And I my selfe also am perswaded of you bretherne, that ye are also full of goodnes, and filled with all knowledge, and are able to admonish one an other. Neuertheles bretherne I haue somewhat boldly after a sorte written vnto you, as one that admonisheth you, thorough the grace that is geuen me of God. That I should be the minister of Iesus Christ amongst the Gentiles, consecrating the Gospel of God that the offering vp of the Gentiles might be acceptable being sanctified by the holy ghost.

The God of hope fill you with all ioy, and peace in beleuing, that ye may abound in hope thorough the power of the holy ghost. When Paul had set forth his reason, wherby he exhorted both the Jewes & the Gentiles, to cease of fro the inward dissensions, for y<sup>e</sup> God through Christ had no les receiued y<sup>e</sup> one, the he had y<sup>e</sup> other, neither had regard ether to the kinred or merites, as he which had utterly made the equall as touching one and the selfe same saue, and the selfe same benefites, after ward he turneth him to prayers, and desireth God, that by the power of the holy ghost he would adorne them with most excellent giftes, and celestially vertues. Neither thinks I that any man is ignorant, of how great efficacy and how liuely, an exhortacion is when prayers are adioyned vnto it. For those things which we exhorde men vnto, are by no small argument confirmed and proued to be iust and honest, when we are not in doubt to aske them of the most high & most louing God. By this meanes also we declare, how much we esteeme and how earnestly we desire that which we pray for, when as we are not asered for it to weary eu<sup>r</sup> God himselfe with our prayers: we thereby also admonish those with whome we haue to do, from whence are to be hoped for strenghts to performe those things which we exhorde vnto: not of the flesh, nor of the power of man, nor of the world, but of the helpe and ayde of God only. For soasmuch as we are now wounded, and in a maner thrust through by original sinne, there is now left no whole part, by which we can eyther go aboute or thinke any thing that is sound. And hereof came this healthfull custome receaued in the Church, that with the recitall of the holy scriptures, in which men are taught the commaundements of God, should be ioyned supplications and prayers. By which yet we are taught although with silence, yet not obscurely, that it lieth not in our power, but in the mercy of God, to execute his commaundements and will. And therefore Augustine many times vsed this kind of argument agaynst the Pelagians. For they falsly affirmed, that Vnto exhortacions are for iust consideration added prayers.

An argument agaynst the Pelagians.

mans will was free as touching those things which are acceptable to God, and profitable to saluation. For, this holy Father thought it a thing vayne and superfluous, that we should with dayly prayers after a sort begge of God that thing, which of our selues we are able to performe.

Why God
is called the god of hope.

And he sayth, the God of hope: for that, as sayth Origen, he had made mention of hope in that sentence of Esay, which was the last testimony which he had alleged. But I thinke, that forasmuch as it is a matter of an incredible hardnes, to stay vp and to establish the hart with a firme and assured confidence, that we may without all manner of doubting be perswaded in our selues, that we are thorough Christ receaued of God, therefore Paul sayd, the God of hope. He (sayth he) the author of so great a gifte fill you with ioy and peace in beleuing, that is, thorough sayth. He putteth sayth first: and out of it springeth hope: and therout are deriued peace and ioy. For when we beleue and hope, we obteyne righteousnes. And after that followeth peace and ioy. And in these three things (as we haue before declared) consisteth chiefly the kingdome of God. And as before he made mention of the holy ghost, saying, Righteousnes, peace, and ioy in the holy ghost, so here also maketh he mention of him. For he addeth.

They whi
che trust
not in God are heauy.

That ye may abound in hope thorough the power of the holy ghost. Neither is this lightly to be passed ouer that he sayth, That ye may abound. For hope engendereth not peace and ioy vnles it be ample and plentiful. For those which haue but litle sayth we see when aduersities come are heauy and sore troubled. For euen as they: harte is ouer runne with feare, so they: speach yea and they: countenance is ouerwhelmed with heauines. Peace and ioy, although they may be referred vnto the mynde, for they which beleue and which are confirmed in hope do reioyce in the Lord, and haue peace both in their conscience, and also towards God, yet notwithstanding by reason of the consent and vniity, whereunto Paul exhorteth the church of Rome, I encline rather to this sentence, to vnderstand that ioy, whereby euery man reioyleth for the commodities and giftes of his brother: and likewise that peace, whereby the faithfull with an entier affect of loue embrace one an other, and are knitte together with an indissoluble bond of mutuall loue. Neither sayth Paul only, thorough the holy ghost, but also expresseth his power. For forasmuch as he wished that those giftes might be in the Romanes full, perfect, and abundant: he by the way signifieth that it is requisite to implore a great force of the spirite, that they might attayne to those giftes.

What is done in this conclu sion.
It is profit able for vs
to prayse
our bze:
when.

And I my selfe also am perswaded of you brethren that ye also are full of goodnes, and filled with all knowledge. Forasmuch as Paul hath hether to at large discoursed as touching doctrines, to teach that man is iustified without workes by faith only in Christ, and also hath as touching maners exhorted them, to be obedient to the publique power, to loue one an other, to receaue the weake, and that the weake should not iudge the stronger, and that they should agree amongst themselves: now least the Romanes should be displeased with him, as though he had attributed vnto them that they had very litle profited in the religion of Christ and had taken vpon himselfe more then was meete, by this conclusion he warily remedieyth that affect, which otherwise mought easely haue seemed to haue sprung of the fleshe. And as Ambrose noteth, whilest he prayseth them, he more seruently inflameth them to those things which he had admonished them of. For when a man perceaueth that he is praysed especially of excellent men, he commonly more diligently applieth his study and endeuor, least he might seeme to haue ben adorned with a false commendation. And by this meanes Paul bringeth himselfe out of the daunger of ill suspition, in that he sayth, that he is fully perswaded of they: excellent goodnes, and singular knowledge: but for that he was the generall minister of the Gentiles, it had not bene his parte to haue pretermitted his ducty towards them. Goodnes in this place which in Greke is ἀγαθωσύνη, as Craspius noteth, signifieth all kinde of vertues, and is opposite to κακία, which on the contrary side comprehendeth all kinde of vices. But how coulde Paul without a lye pronounce these things.

things of the Romanes: When as in that Church were many weake ones, and they were infected with greuous dissensions and brawlings amongst themselves. Is it lawfull for the minister of the word of God to lye, to beare with the wicked affects of the people, which peradventure would take it in ill parte eyther to be taught, or to be stirred by to doe well, or to be accused? Doubtles I thinke that in y<sup>e</sup> Church were many very weake members, & which were infected with those vices which haue bene reprobued of the Apostle. Wherefore the thinges which are here w<sup>r</sup>itten, nothing pertaine to those members. But it is likely, that amongst them were many most perfect and most holy men, which were abundantly adorne<sup>d</sup> of the holy Ghost both with much knowledge, and with honest maners. To these men the Apostle referreth this parte of his talke. Neither here only doth he after this maner w<sup>r</sup>ite, but also in the first to the Corinthians. For he saith, through him ye are enriched in all thinges, in all kinde of speache, and in all knowledge, so that ye are not destitute of any gift. These thinges was not Paul aske<sup>d</sup> to pronounce of the Corinthians, who yet did neede to be taught, what giftes of God were more excellent then others, and to be confirmed touching the resurrection, and to be admonished to abstaine from fornication, to excommunicate the incestuous person, to vse the supper of the Lorde rightly, not to prefer themselves before others, because of they<sup>r</sup> institutions, and a great many such like thinges: which vndoubtedly he ought not to haue w<sup>r</sup>itten, if all the members of that Church had bene by the holy ghost so adorne<sup>d</sup> with the giftes of God, and with knowledge, that they wanted nothing. And if the case were so then, what shold we now at this day loke for, that our people should in all poynts be perfect? Which yet I would not that any man should thinke I speake, as though I were of this mind that the slouthfulness and negligence of pastors is to be bozne withall. For euen as at that time they which were of the excellent sort, mought by very good right be adorne<sup>d</sup> with great praises, for that they continually labored in admonishing, teaching and instructing others, for Paul and the rest of the Apostles omitted nothing which was to be done for the common saluation, so ought these men to behaue themselves, to the ende these Apostolicall praises might iustly be applied vnto them also. Origen somewhat curiously enquireth how they are sayd to be full of all goodnes and knowledge, when as there is none in this life which is without all maner of faulte, and we now see through a glasse only in a riddle. And to contract al his sayings into a few words, he sayth, that these thinges are to be expounded according to the small measure of this life, and according to the degree and time of euery mannes conuersion. Chrysostome noteth that Paul begon this Epistle with the praises of the Romanes. For straight way at the beginning he sayd, that he gaue thanks vnto God, for that they sayth was spread abroad throughout the whole world: and that amongst them he would receiue consolation of they<sup>r</sup> mutuall faith, and now also endeth in they<sup>r</sup> praises, but yet in such praises as are of much more excellency then the first. For it is a farre greater matter to be full of all goodnes, and to be filled with all knowledge, that they are able to admonish one an other, then to haue sayth, which is euery where published, and such as of which the Apostle himself may take some consolation.

That ye are able to admonish one an other. If they were full of all knowledge what neede was there that one should admonish an other? Ambrose as though he would vndoe this knot, thus w<sup>r</sup>yteth: He sayth, to admonish, and not to teach. For of those thinges are we admonished, which otherwise we know, but in the meane time are slipp<sup>d</sup> out of the minde. But I doe not thinke that Paul in this place had that consideration. For if we speake of maners, there is none which may not sometimes be admonished. But if we speak of doctrine, this is the duety of wise men, and of those which are gouerners ouer Churches to instruct and to teach others. And least any man should take it amisse, some booke haue, ἀλλήλους, that is, others, & some haue ἀλλήλων, that is, one an other. But as I haue declared, either of these words will very well agree with Pauls purpose.

Neuertheles brethren I haue somewhat boldly after a sort written vnto you, as

Whether Paul could truly thus praise the Romanes.

Whether
any may be truly sayd
to be full of all goodnes
The apostle saith with that, that he beganne
this epistle
with the same (I say) endeth
it.

They whi
che other wise know thinges
may be ad monished touching
them.

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

What thin-
ges Paul wrote som-
what boldly.

Paul by ex-cusing him-
selfe alter-
reth not the things
which he had written.

The excuse of the author of the booke of Machabees
is not to be compared with the excuse of Paul.

The priest-hoode of Paul was to preach
the gospel.

one that admonisheth you, through the grace that is geuen me of God. That I should be the minister of Iesus Christ amongst the Gentiles. This is another part of his Apologie. He had confessed that he knew assuredly, that they by reason of theyr singular goodnes, and excellent knowledge, were apte inough to admonishe one an other. Wherefore they might say: Why then hast thou so boldly written? Because (sayth he) God would that I should be the minister of the Gentiles. But ye are nombred amongst them: wherefore to the ende I would not leaue mine office vndone, I was bolde to write these things vnto you. He sayth, that he thought not only to write, but also to write somewhat boldly and freely: for that, as Erasmus thinketh, he had at the beginning sharply repproued Idolatry, and the sonde wisdom of the Philosophers, and most filthy lusts. But this in my iudgement is not very likely. For those things pertained not to the Church of Rome, but to the Ethnikes that were straungers from Christ. For Paul ment to bpbzaide vnto the the most wicked actes, that they might vnderstande how farre wide they were from the true righteousness, in as much as they did put theyr trust in humaine strengths, and in the ayde of sciences: wherefore I thinke rather that he had a regarde to those things which he had written in the Chapters next going before. Such as are those, which Chrysostome hath noted, least by any meanes it come to passe, that he neither spare thee. Again, be not wise in your selues. Again, why dost thou iudge thy brother. And this, why dost thou despise thy brother? wherunto a man may adde these, destroy not with thy meat, him for whom Christ hath died. Again, do not for meat sake destroy the work of God. These and such like things mougt Paul seme to haue writte somewhat boldly. Howbeit in excusing himselfe he changeth nothing but only ppretendeth his vocation, that is, his Apostolicall office. This forme of excusing is farre diuers from that which the author of the booke of Machabees vsed. For he towards the end of the second booke is in doubt whether he had written well or no, and addeth, If I haue no done well, yet is it that I was able to doo. As if he should haue sayd Pardon me. But Paul who doubted not but that he had written nothing but by the instinct and impulsio of the holy ghost, only declareth this, what moued him to write so freely and so boldly: and sayth, as Chrysostome noteth, I do not excuse my selfe repproue you, but God hath commaunded me thus to do. For as his Apostleship was of the Lord, so also came his wordes from him. Howbeit he somewhat mitigateth his speach whē he sayth, As one that admonisheth you: and this we must thinke to be spoken bycause of the better and holier sorte. And what to admonish signifieth, we haue before declared out of Ambrose. He calleth the Apostleship the grace that was geuen vnto him. For he was not thorough his owne merites placed in that office. For euen at that selfe same time wherein he was called he most cruelly persecuted the members of Christ.

Consecrating the Gospel. For so Augustine turneth it, and that very aptly as Erasmus also noteth. The word is composed of τὸ ἱεὺς and ἐργον. And ἱεραργον, is to worke in holy thinges. Wherefore Chrysostome in this place very well writeth, that Paul here hath made mencion both of his λετρον and of his ἱεραργον: as if he should haue sayd. This is my priesthoode, to publish abroad the Gospel, and to preach. Wherefore though I haue somewhat boldly written these thinges vnto you, yet ought ye not to take it in ill parte. For no man imputeth it as a fault to the priest, that he do exercise holy thinges pertaining to his office. Vnto me vndoubtedly is this kind of sacrifice committed by the preaching of the Gospel, to offer by the Gentles a most acceptable sacrifice vnto God. By sword (saith Paul) as Chrysostome writeth, is the Gospel: the sacrifice whiche is killed with my right hand are the Gentles. Let our Cake consecrators go now, and boast that they are therfore priestes, for that by their inchauntments they transubstantiate bread & wine. This is that sacrifice, this I say is y priesthoode, which the Apostles executed, and which also the pastors of the church ought now to execute. Neither yet ought the ministers of the church therfore to be called sacrificers, because the Apostle so speaketh in this place. For he bleth a metaphoze, and excellently alludeth to

to

to those thinges which were done in outward sacrifices. Many at this day sayne themselves to lament our church, for that they are now without a sacrifice. But we haue hitherto much more iustly lamented, that in them hath nothing bene sacrificed thorough pure and Euangelicall sermons. And euen at this day also, after that by the benefit of God there is free course geuen to the Gospel, we bewaile that such sacrifice is so rarely done. Let them answer me now, whether of vs hath greater cause to complayne? Our cause is so much about theyrs, & theyrs so much vnder ours, how much the holy scriptures euery where commend this kind of sacrifice: but of that other they neuer so much as once make mention: and how much we here offer an humane sacrifice according to the prescript of God: but thereby the deuillish iuggling of the Pope the soules of the simple are most cruelly killed: and finally how much we by our sacrifice spread abroad the worshipping of God: but there vnder the forme of piety is retained still in the Church most horrible Idolatry.

I compare
son of the sacrifice of the Masse
with the sacrifice of the gospell.

That the offering vp of the Gentiles might be acceptable being sanctified by the holy ghost. ] He is utterly depriued of all feeling of piety, which out of these wordes receaueth not incomparable joy: when as he heareth that God is so desirous of our saluation, that he counteth the conuersion of euery one of vs, as a most acceptable sacrifice.

Our con-uersion is like a sacrifice.

I haue therefore whercof I may glory thorough Iesus Christ in those thinges which pertaine to God. For I dare not speake of any thing which Christ hath not wrought by me to make the Gentiles obedient, in woord and deede, with the power of signes and wonders, by the power of the spirite of God: so that from Ierusalem, and the regions round about euen to Iliricum I haue caused to abound the Gospell of Christ. Yea so I enforced my selfe to preach the Gospell, not wher Christ was named, lest I should haue built on an other mans foundation. But as it is written, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see him, and they that heard not shall vnderstand hym.

I haue therefore whereof I may glory thorough Iesus Christ in those thinges which pertaine to God. ] I see that some are in doubt how this part should hang together with those thinges which went before. And in my iudgement they may thus be ioyned together. Paul had before sayd, that by reason of his Apostleshippe and vocation he was moued, to instruct the Romanes also by his epistles. But peraduenture they were troubled in theyr mindes with a certayne doubt, which made them to thinke thus with themselves. But what is the cause that thou ouerhipping other nations, doost beginne with vs chiefly? It is not so sayth Paul. I haue now great occasion to reioyse, but yet thorough Christ, but yet in those thinges which pertaine to God. I haue not ouerhipped other partes of the world, but amongst them also both farre and wide. I haue spread the Gospell. But Chrysostome after an other maner ioyneth these thinges together. He had last of all (sayth he) pretended his Apostleshippe, as the cause moving hym to write these letters which he had sent to the Romanes. And in this office he had made himselfe to be after a sort a sacrificer which with the sword of the woord of God offred vp the Gentiles. Now lest any man should speake ill of this dignity and function which thing the fals Apostles did, or deride him as one which boasted himselfe to be an Apostle, and a priest, when as he was not able to proue that, to the end he would declare that he was chosen of God, & sent by God he bringeth forth those signes & tokens of his vocation & ministry, which shall streight way be spoken of. He reioyleth that he hath wherof to glory: but he addeth, thorough Christ, & in those thinges which pertaine to God. Whereby we ought to learne y we ought to glory of those benefits only which we haue obtained through Christ. For in those thinges which our own strenghts are able to performe & to bring to passe, there

Tokens of the ministe-ry of Paul

sufficient matter to glory of. Wherefore let vs not puffe by our selues, for riches sake, or for beauty, or for honours of the world, or strength of body or for other things which serue not to any vse to aduance the kingdome of God amongst men. The instruments to amplifie the kingdome of God are the signes which Paul bringeth to proue his Apostleship. And he declareth that he had them abundantly by which were a great many nations brought to the obedience of God. Chrysostome compareth, and that aptly, the tokens of the priestehood of Paul, with the long garments, little bells, miter, and cappe, wherewith the priests in the old law were consecrated: and teacheth that the ornaments of Paul, or rather his weapons, wherewith he ouercame the Gentiles, and offered them vnto God as sacrifices, were of much more excellency: as his sacrifices were much more excellent then the sacrifices of the high priests of the Iewes. But our Bishoppes, Cardinalls, and Popes seeing themselves destitute of those Apostolicall ornaments and signes of Paul, thought it good to bring in agayne those ornaments of Aaron and of the Leuits, that at the lest way they might haue somewhat wherewith to blear the eyes of the common people, but with how great fruit or rather with how great hurt vnto the Church they haue done this, God knoweth, and we haue to muche felt and had experience thereof.

For I dare not speake of any thing, vvhich Christ hath not vvrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient. ] Now he openeth that which he before sayd, he had to glory through Iesus Christ. For he sayth that he will speake nothing, neither make accompt of any thing, but of those things only which Christ had don by him: that is, that he will not glory of his owne doings, but rather will suppress them, and kepe them in silence. Whereby let vs learne that all the ornaments of ministers, all gifts, all spirituall faculties, and endowments of the minde are to this ende given of God, to bring men to the obedience of God. Wherefore let them beware, which hold those gifts with themselves without fruit, or bestowe them otherwise then they ought to doe. But here marke diligently, what are the weapons and signes which Paul teacheth to pertaine to Apostles.

In vvord and in dede. ] These two are the things wherewith Paul wrought through Christ: vvords, I say, and dedes. Under this vvord, vvords, are comprehended publique preachings, priuate communications, disputations and Epistles, which when he was absent, he wrote to sundry Churches, and to his scholars. And these things proceeded both from Christ and from the power of the holy Ghost. And vvorkes containe signes and wonders. But what difference there is betwene those two, it is not easy to expresse. Origen thinketh, that those things only are called signes, which although of themselves they are wonderfull, yet doe they also betoken some other thing to come to passe. But wonderfull things are those things which draw men only into an admiration: for that they are not done after an accustomed maner, but contrary to the force and order of nature. But this distinction he himself also confesseth, is not obserued in the holy scriptures. And not to goe from this place which we are in hande with, all the miracles what so euer Paul wrought, were signes, wherby was proued the truth of his preaching. Which self thing is to be affirmed of the wonderfull vvorkes of Christ, and of the Prophets. But the vvritings of the new Testament, which euery where make mention of the signes and wonders which Christe and the Apostles wrought, imitated the phrase of the olde Testament. For there a man shall oftentimes finde these vvords othoth and mopherim ioyned together. Neither thinke I that these things are distinguished the one from the other, but only in degree or greatnes. Although I am not ignorant, that signes or othoth may be suche things, as haue in them no admiration at all: such as are accents, letters, poynts, vvords, and suche like, which we doubt not are signes, when yet notwithstanding they procede either of arte, or of nature. But the holy scriptures to signifie that certaine vvorkes of the Prophets of Christ and of the Apostles, did not only betoken some thing els besides y which was done, but also stirred by an admiration and amasednes, therfore ioyned together

A comparison betweene priestehood of Iesus and the ministry of Paul.

The papisticall high priests haue brought in agayne the ornaments of Aaron.

Words & dedes are the instruments of the Apostleship. Signes & wonders.

gether these two wordes. This doubtles is my iudgement: which I see not, why I oughte not to holde still, vnlesse any other can shewe a better. And this thyng ment Paul, when he said, workes. How be it there are some which think, that here to are to be annered the labors, watchings and examles of innocency, which shined forth in the whole life of Paul. This peradventure is not amisse spoken: but therefore haue I not mencioned them, for that they were commen vnto Paul and to the rest of the faithfull, neither could they properly be mentioned as signes of the Apostleship. Hereby also we gather, that the only cause of miracles is, that by them might be confirmed the doctrine and truthe of God.

The cause
of miracles

So that from Ierusalem, and the regions round about euen to Illiricum, I haue caused to abound the Gospell of Christ. It is a very long iorney from Ierusalem to Illiricum, yea if a man should goe the highest way thither. But when he addeth, the regions rounde about, he comprehendeth, as Chrysostome noteth innumerable cities and prouinces. And as before in fower wordes only, namely vword, workes, signes, and *v*wonders he comprehendeth after a sorte thinges infinite, so here also with the selfe same breuity he comprehendeth most large spaces of the world. And he addeth, that he had made the Gospell of Christ to abound, to geue vs to vnderstand, that he had not lightly or slenderly preached, but had euery where left the Gospell of Christ perfect and confirmed, before that he departed. Origen compareth Paul with Moses and Aaron. For vnto them also God gaue power to work signes and wonders: by which yet they could not call backe euen Egypt alone, (when as it was but on only region,) from theyr idolatry and infidelity. That thing which Paul had somewhat couertly signified in the beginning of this Epistle when he said, That I may haue some fruit amongst you, is amongst other nation: he now more manifestly expreth. For he declareth what, and how many those nations were, and what he did amongst them.

I compare
so betwene Paul
Moses &
Aaron.

Yea so I enforced my selfe to preach the Gospell not where Christ was named. These things are therefore mencioned, that the Romaines might vnderstand that Paul was famous by the most proper marke of the Apostleship. For it was not the office of the Apostles to succede in other mennes workes. Yea rather other men succeded them. For theyr office was to spreade abroad the Gospell, to plant newe Churches, to ordaine meete ministers in the Churches which they had instituted, that the truthe of Christ might the quickly be knowne throughout the whole world. And for as much as the Apostles wer of more strength then others, it was meete that they should execute those workes which were of more difficultye. But it is a much more difficulte and pearillouser thing to preache the Gospell there, where before hath nothing bene heard of Christ, then it is to defend doctrine already receiued and established.

What was
the office of the Apostles.

Least I should haue built vpon an other mannes foundation. He calleth an other mans foundation, Churches instituted by other Apostles. Neither is this to be ascribed to ambition, but rather to the office of the Apostleship, & to the incredible zeale which he had to aduance the Gospell. He doth not rashly adde this word, I enforced. For sometimes he was of necessity compelled to goe to Ierusalem, to Antioche, to Rome, and to other places, in which the Apostles had before preached.

But as it is written, to vvhome he was not spoken of, they shall see him, and they vvhich haue not heard, shall vnderstand. This testimony is taken out of Esay the 52. Chapter, which is therefore with the more diligent consideration to be perused, for that neither the verity of the Debet any thing disagreeeth from the words of the Apostle, neither also can any man doubt, but that the prophet foretold these things of the Messias and of the preaching of the Apostles. For in that chapter are written those wordes which were before cited, How beautiful are the feete of them that bring the glad tidings of peace. The meaning of Paul is, that forasmuche as the holy Ghost admonisheth, that a care be had, that the preaching of the Gospell be with most quicke speede spread abroad amongst all nations, that they to whome before he was not spoken of might heare, and they which had not heard, might vnderstand

derstand

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

vnderstand, therefore (sayth he,) am I with so great feruentnes of minde stirred vp to preache there, where the name of Christ was not before heard of. But woe be vnto vs, which neglect to preache there, where the name of Christ is heard of, & true faith and piety towards him is miserably fallen in decay. And so farre is it of, that we will seeke other places, in which the Gospell hath not bene heard of, that we will not so much as kepe still those which are already gotten, neither will we defend the churches already planted. Undoubtedly we wil imitate him, which from Ierusalem euen to Illiricum, and in all the regions round about, caused the Gospell to abound: when as yet in the meane time we will be counted most stout defenders of the doctrine of the Gospell.

Therefore also I haue bene oft let to come vnto you. But now seeing I haue no more place in these quarters, and also haue bene desirous many yeares agoe to come vnto you: whensoever I shall take my iorney into Spayne I wyll come vnto you. For I trust to see you in my iorney, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, after that I haue bene somewhat filled with your company.

The cause why Paul went not at the beginning to Rome.

Therefore also I haue bene oft let to come vnto you. The Romans mought by these wordes haue suspected, that Paul had contemned them: when as he being appointed of God to be the minister of the Gentles, had yet notwithstanding in bestowing the benefite and office of his preaching preferred other nations before them. This was not the cause sayth Paul. But soasmuch as ye had already heard the Gospell, and your sayth was now published throughout the whole world, but in these places Christ was not yet preached, I was hitherto letted by the ministry committed vnto me, that I could not come vnto you. Paul before in the beginning of this epistle mencioned this selfe same thing. I had purposed oftentimes (sayd he) to come vnto you: but hitherto I haue bene letted. But there (saith Christostome) he spake nothing of the cause, but here he sheweth it, namely, for that he was stayed in those places, which he could not leaue, before that he had filled them with the Gospell. And what was the cause, why he went not to the Thessalonians, when yet his desire was thereto, he declared in the epistle which he wrote vnto them. For he sayth, that Satran was a let vnto him; but he alleadgeth not the planting of new Churches. And this difference of causes Origen noteth. But I see also an other cause, why the Apostles somtimes were compelled to do contrary to that which they had appointed in their mynde: the admonishment (I say) of the holy ghost. Touching which thing we read in ch. 16. of the Actes, As we passed through Phrygia, and the countrey of Galatia, we were prohibited by the holy ghost to preach the word in Asia. And again in the same place. They assayed to go into Bithynia, but the holy ghost permitted them not. But Ambrose sheweth, that there was also an other cause, why Paul so earnestly enforced himselfe to preach the Gospell there, where Christ had not ben heard of, namely, to preuent the false Apostles. For if they had gotten into those places before the, they would not haue taught Christ very sincerely: and if they had once solued pestilent errors, the Apostle succeeding them should haue had much more a doo to bring them to good ground agayne. For those nations must needs afterward not only haue learned, but also must haue taught to put away the errors, wherewith they corrupt teachers had infected them.

Why Paul made such speeche in going about country.

But now seeing I haue no more place in these quarters &c. He sayth that he had iust cause which letted him that he could not come to Rome. Now, he putteth the in hope of his comming which was next to be spoken of. For if I depart hence now (sayth he) I shall not do otherwise then my office requireth. And that shall then be, after that in these quarters there shalbe no more place, wherein I haue not built a Church. And I haue a great desire to see you. Which thing, I hope shal shortly come to passe. But here the Romanes mought say: dost thou then contemn the state of the Apostleshippe, and dost thou count it for nothing to come vnto vs to whome the Gospell is already preached, and dost thou ouerhippe those, which as yet yet haue heard nothing of Christ? Paul answereth, it shal not be so. But soasmuch as (sayth he) there is nothing as yet bestowed vpon the Spaniards, and their whole countrey lieth open for me, I thinke now to go into that countrey. And so it shal come to passe, that I will come by you, that I may a few daies solace my selfe in the Lord, and in the purenes of your sayth, and your louing confabulation, and spirituall familiarity. Here let vs note the obedience of the Apostle, which preferred the necessary condition of the Apostleship which was such, that it behoued him to go not whither he would, but whither nede required before his so great a desire to se the Romanes although the same desire were very iust and honest. Erasmus noteth that the Apostle taketh away from this word Hispania, the first sillable. For he writeth Spania, And peraduenture they so speake in Grecia. And when he wrote these letters, he was at Corinthus in Achaia. But we also at this day in Italy call that contrey no other wise then Paul doth. For we say Spagnia and Spagnuolo, utterly cutting of the first sillable.

For I trust to se you in my iorney; and to be brought on my way thitherwarde by you after that I haue bene somewhat filled with your company. The Apostle desireth not only to haue y<sup>e</sup> fruition of they<sup>r</sup> godly and swete familiarity at Rome, but also that after he had satisfied both his and they<sup>r</sup> desire, he might by them be brought into Spayne: not that he was affected to any pompe or gorgeous shewes, or that he desired, as at this day the Popes and Cardinalls doe to bee brought on his way with honour: but that euen in the iorney might by them that went with him to communicate his doctrine and exhortations to the Church of Rome and to others. For it can not be doubted, but that they which would accompanie him in his iorney would obserue and note all things, which by the way they epyther heard of him, or saw in him: that when they came home, they might declare the same, & edifie the Church moze firmly. It is likely also that Paul, soasmuch as he had occasion to trauaile into sondry countries and which were far distant, would chiefly picke out such companions as were well knownen in those places & cities, which they should trauaile thorough, that by them might be opened a moze redier entrance to preach the Gospell. For although the truth of Christ haue no nede of mans helpe, but that it can consist without it, yet notwithstanding for the moze commodious spreading of it abroad, it is lawfull for a godly man to vse familiarities frendshippes, and societies. For he knoweth that all his thinges are Gods and Christs: after that he hath once utterly gotten and consecrated himselfe vnto him. We find also in the latter epistle to the Corinthians the first chapter, that Paul when he should go to Ierusalem, desired to be brought on his way by them to whom he wrote that epistle. But whether the Apostle according to his hope went into Spayne, and by that occasion visited the Romanes, it can not by these words certainly be gathered. For the godly sometimes promise vnto themselves many thinges and that with a godly and iust desire, which yet haue not successe: for they were by coniecture led that it should be so, and that by humane reason only and not by the impulsion of the spirite. As in the epistle to the Philippians, Paul being a captiue at Rome, thought that he should be deliuered from those bonds, and that he should liue longer, and abide with them al to their commoditie, and to the ioye of they<sup>r</sup> sayth: That your glory (sayth he) may thorough Iesus Christ abound in me by my return vnto you. When yet not withstanding it came farre otherwise to passe then Paul looked for. And yet by this meanes is no derogation done to the godlines and dignity of the saints. For by reason of they<sup>r</sup> healthfull hope which springeth out of a true and naturall sayth, they promise nothing vnto themselves certainly, but y<sup>e</sup> which they haue receaued out of the word of God, or by a singular admonition, or by reuelation. But as for other thinges which are subiect to the chaunces of this life, sometimes by reason of some humane coniecture they doe hope that such thinges shall happen vnto them. Which if they happen otherwise, yet are they not frustrate of they<sup>r</sup> will. For the thinges which are not promised in the holy scriptures, or by a singular oracle of the holy ghost, they wish not to be geuen vnto the

Why
Paul desired to be brought on his way into Spaine by the Romanes.

Whether the Apostle went into Spaine.

The desires of the saints are not always fulfilled.

How the saints be haue themselves touching things geacoming by happen absolutely

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

absolutely: but they submitte all such thinges to the prouidence of God, which they know assuredly doth much better prouide for men, especially for the godly, then they themselves can prouide by any theyr owne wit or industry.

But now goe I to Ierusalem to minister to the saintes. For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia, to make a certaine communication to the poore saintes that are at Ierusalem. For it hath pleased them, and their debtors are they. For if they haue communicated theyr spiritual thinges to the Gentiles, theyr duety is also to minister vnto them in carnall thinges. When therefore I haue performed this, and haue sealed them this fruit, I wil passe by you into Spaine. For I know that when I come, I shall come to you with fulnes of the blessing of the Gospell of Christ.

Unto Paul besides the preaching of the Gospell, was committed the charge of the almes.

But now I goe to Ierusalem to minister to the Savntes. The Romaines might haue sayd: seeing that thou hast now no more place there, why dost thou not straightway take thy iorney to vs warde? Paul sheweth what letted him. For besides that he was called of God to preache the Gospell there, where Christe was not yet spoken of, he had also an other charge appointed him, as it is truly and plainly declared in the Epistle to the Galathians, namely, that as he preached Christ amongst the Gentiles, he should also haue a consideration of the poore which were at Ierusalem. Which thing he himselfe in that Epistle sayth, he had faithfully performed. For those amongst the Gentiles whome he had brought to Christ, and entrusted in the doctrine of sayth, he diligently exhorted to distribute their almes, to helpe the poore which were at Ierusalem, who were at y time most greuously afflicted. Of this thing we haue large mention made and lively examples set forth in the Epistles to the Corinthyans. This office (sayth he) now stayeth me, that I can not come vnto you. For there hath bene money gathered in Macedonia, and in Achaia: and the same must through my ministry be carryed to Ierusalem. For, that is it which he addeth.

For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia, to make a certaine communication to the poore saintes vvhich are at Ierusalem. Paule in the meane time whilst he setteth forth these thinges to the Romains, (as Chrysostom admonisheth) doth not only serue his purpose, namely to declare what was y cause which withheld him so long, but also couertly prouoketh the Romaines to the like liberality, that they also should bestowe almes vpon the saintes. And Origen addeth, that Paul dothe this modestly and cunningly. Paul was so diligent in his office, that he not only faithfully performed it, but also pretermitted no occasion at all, for the well executing of the same. This thing Peter, James, and Iohn required at his hands, and that vndoubtedly not without the motion and will of the holy ghost. Which thing Paul promised he would diligently performe. Wherefore least he might seeme to leaue voyde and vndone that charge which God had committed vnto him, and which also he himselfe had promised to performe, he thought it good to vse this policy and diligence. And that the Apostle after this peregrination, wherein he had traualled through Macedonia and Achaia, and after that he had ben at Ierusalem to distribute there the almes, whereof is here entreated, purposed to goe to Rome, the Actes of the Apostles plainly testifie. For in them in the 19. Chapter it is thus writtten: Now when these thinges were accomplished, Paule purposed in the spirite to passe through Macedonia and Achaia, and to goe to Ierusalem: saying, after I haue bene there I must also see Rome. Which thing Origen very well noted. Neither was he deceived of this purpose. For at Ierusalem he was so oppressed of the Iewes, that he was compelled to appeale to Cesar: vnto whome he was at the last brought, not in dede, to goe through Rome into Spayne, but there with glozy to suffer death for the name of Christ. Whereby also the same Origen gathereth, that this Epistle was was written after those two Epistles to the Corinthians, and that by a firme and sure reason. For seeing that in them he maketh mention of the gathering of these almes, and here he writeth that now he had gathered them, and would carry them to Jerusalem, it is manifest that this Epistle was written after them. But where as he sayth, It hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia; he commendeth the ferventnes and diligence of those nations: of which diligence Paul in the latter Epistle to the Corinthians the 9. chapter much gloryeth. Undoubtedly greate was that force of love, to helpe with money the Jewes which were so far distant from them: and especially seeing that they themselves were very poore, as it appeareth by the selfe same chapter to the Corinthians which I before cited. And doubtles we oftentimes see, that the richer men are, the more unwilling they are to geue almes, when as in the meane time, the poore and meaner sort geue largely and lovingly: which thing Christ affirmed of that widow, which offered that only mite, wherein consisted hir living for that day.

It hath pleased them, I say, and theyr debtors are they. When he sayth debtors he doth not a little stirre by the Romanes, to doe the like. For they whome he had mencioned were no more debtors, then the Romanes. And seeing y<sup>e</sup> case was as touching eche a like, the Romanes could by no meanes be exempted from that law. Moreover when they are called debtors, they might thereby know, that these things pertain not only to gratification, or free geuing. For these things pertain to liberalitie, but the other to iustice, to that iustice I say, whereby are ordained the mutuall permutacions of things. And doubtles it is meete, that he which hath received any thing, should againe repay somewhat. Now be it the Apostle is not altogether so severe, to require of them so much as they had received, which yet by extremity of iustice, might have bene required at theyr hands. They had received of the Jewes spirituall things: wherefore seeing that they repayed vnto them carnall things, they gaue muche les then they had received. This kinde of argument taken from the lesse to the greater, Paul vsed in the first to the Corinthians, to declare that vnto the ministers of the Church are stipends due. For thus he writeth: If we haue sowed vnto you spirituall things, is it a great matter if we reap your carnall things? Those almes Paul calleth a communion, to shew that they are no rashe beneuolences, or vnfruitfull gifts. We haue Christ common with them, we haue the Sacraments common, one doctrine, one redemption, one eternall life is common to vs and to them. Why then ought not the fruits of our possessions to be common betwene vs both? Verily in the articles of our faith, we professe the communion of Saintes. But a great many, when they speake this, knowe not what it meaneth. For things diuine they vse as common: but the priuate things which they possesse on earth, they wil not communicate to the needy. I doe not here with the Libertines and certaine Anabaptists, holde that things ought to be common. Let the proprieties of things abide: let possessions be certaine and definite: let not the limites of houses and lands be confounded. But let the fruit of them, not only serue our vses, but let it by a certain iust proportion so be parted, that it may profit both our selues and the poore. Christ disdained not to communicate vnto vs all his good things which are bothe eternall, and most chiefe. Now muche more ought we to repay vnto him in his members, those transitory and vnconstante things which we haue here on earth. Vnto the Saintes, sayth he: for they are two wayes commended (sayth Chrysostome,) bothe for theyr pouertye, & for theyr vertue. The selfe same thing in a manner he wrote to the Galathians by these words, but chiefly to the householde of faith.

Their duety is also to minister vnto them in carnal things. In Greke it is λειτουργία. Here we see y<sup>e</sup> almes are adozned with a noble title: for λειτουργία was before attributed vnto princes: & a litle before that vnto the ministry of y<sup>e</sup> church. For Paul by reason of the preaching of the gospel called himself λειτουργόν. Wherefore this beneuolence towards the poore, is compared both with the office of the publicke magistrate, and wth the ecclesiastical function. And doubtles in those almes is a ppm.j.

certaine

The epistle was written after the two epistles to the Corinthians.

The riches sometimes are more unwilling to geue almes, then the poore are.

Almes are called a communion.

Things are not to be made common.

The dignity of almes

Cap. 15. A Commentarie vpon the

Almes are called a sacrifice.

Whether Paulo minister vnto
tables, neglected the Gospell.

It was profitable
vnto the ministry of Paul to gather almes.

certain administratiō of iustice. For as we haue said, herein we geue not frely, but there is redyed a debt. And this kind of oblation the holy scriptures cal a sacrifice, For Paul to Phil. in the last chap. thus writeth: After that I had receaued of Epaphroditus the things which were sent of you, an odor that smelleth swete, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasant to God. But can this differring of going to Rome and to Spaine, be counted iust and lawfull? If we compare almes with the ministry of the word, doubtles they are many wayes inferiour vnto it. Shal it then be imputed as a fault in Paul that he would rather minister vnto tables, then to go to preach the Gospell? And doubtles it should so be, if he had had no expresse commaundement touching this thing. But soasmuch as he was sent, not only to preach amongst the Gentiles, but also to provide almes for the poore which dwelt at Jerusalem, in that he saythfully executeth ech office, he committeth nothing which may iustly be reprovued. And moreover this function not a litle helped to the authoritie of his preaching. For the false Apostles, which euery where sought to bring him into hatred and into contempt, vsed commonly amongst other things to lay against him, that he agreed not with the other great Apostles, with Peter (I say James and John, and that he taught the Gospell farre other wise then it was taught in the Church of Jerusalem: for in that Church were obserued the ceremonies of Moses, from which he like a runagate had fallē away. Paul being euery where charged wyth these slaunders, and in a maner condemned, was euen amongst the Gentils therfore had in no small suspicion: by which meanes it came to passe, that the fruite of his preaching was much diminished. Wherefore to the defending of the authoritie of his Apostleship, his manifest and publique consent and agreement with the Church of Jerusalem much profited. And of that consent this function was a most certayne argument. Wherefore in the meane tyme, whilest he occupieth himselfe in gathering of almes, he doth nothing which disagreeth from his office of preaching the Gospell. Now let vs declare that debt. They haue (sayth he) communicated vnto them their spirituall thinges. The summe of all this Christ comprehended, when he sayd, Saluation is of the Iewes. And Paul befoze in this selfe same epistle, Who are Israelites (sayth he) to whome pertayneth the adoption, and the glory, and the Testaments, and the geuing of the law, and the woorshipping, and the promises: of whom are the fathers: and of whome came Christ as touching the flesh. These thinges befoze pertayned to the Iewes only: but now by reason of the Gospell they are transferred vnto vs. For then was the table prepared: but we are called to the feast. But thou wilt say this came not thorough they? will or industry, but for that they refused to come when God inuited them. If thou speake this of the vnblesing Iewes, thou erreth not. But the true Iewes, such as were the holy Apostles and disciples of Christ and Euangelists, came not only themselues to the wedding, but also became ministers of this communication. This selfe same communion Paul befoze byged when he sayd, Thou art made a companion, and a partaker of the fruites of the fruitfull oliue tree, when as otherwise of thy selfe thou wast a wild oliue tree.

VWhen therefore I haue performed this, and haue sealed them this fruit. I wil returne by you into Spaine. ] Whereas he sayth, when I haue sealed, it is all one, as if he had sayd, when I shall haue restored it being now sealed. For things which are committed to a mans charge to be caried, are commonly sealed by, that it may the certainer be knowen that they are all whole and without fraude rendred to the which ought to haue the: which seales if they be vnbroken & whole, the is his selfe by brought the discharged. Wherefore Paul by this kind of speechment to signifie his innocency, & simplicitie & vpight dealing touching this money. For me are I willinger & redier to bestow they? goods vpon I poore, if they vnderstand I they shal be administrated saythfully. He here calleth almes by the name of fruite, which he befoze called a communion or communication, and that for many and iust causes. First for that after the Gospell is solued and receaued with a pure and liuely faith straight way is geuen iustification befoze God. Then is it requisite that there folow some fruite both of a pure and perfect life, and also lone towardes our neighbours

Almes is called fruite.

boos, that there may be had some assured signification of our inward righteousness. Moreover those almes are called fruite, for that such liberality was fruitefull to those nations which dealt so lovingly with the poore saynts. Last of all that communion sentred to bring to them of Ierusalem some fruite of their piety, for he which putteth his trust in Christ, and professeth him when he is in extreame troubles, although he haue a reward in heauen, yet here also oftentimes when it seemeth good to God, he reapeth such frutes. Further lest the Romanes should suspect, that the time would be very long and uncertayne before Paul would come vnto them, therefore when he speaketh these thinges, he setteth and appointeth a certayne time. So soone (sayth he) as I haue performed this which I am in hand with, I will come vnto you. Agayne he maketh mention of his iorney into Spaine which although he accomplished not, yet ought not Paul therefore to be reprobred of an vntruth. For this is sufficient to discharge his faith, that when he wrote those letters, he purposed the same thing in his mind which he wrote. For no mortall man hath the euents of thinges in his owne hand. But to the full and perfect nature of a lie, as Augustine testifieth, is required a will to deceaue. And thereof we haue a manifest testimony in the latter to the Corinthians. The same thing touching this matter writeth Gelasius in the 22. the 2. question. For (sayth he) so much as his will was then to doo, he pronounced that he would in dede performe.

It is not a lie, except it be done with a mind to deceiue.

For I know that when I come I shall come to you: with fulnes of the blessing of the Gospell of Christ. Christostome semeth at the first sight to referre this fulnes of blessing to almes: for that Paul many times caled them by that name which thing I thinke he did according to the custome of the old scripture, wherein a gift or reward is oftentimes called a blessing. For Iacob desired Esau to vouchsafe to receaue the blessing which he had sent before him. And Abigail desired Dauid to receaue the blessing which she brought. And Dauid sayd to the elders of Iuda. Receaue ye the blessing of the pray of the enemies of the Lord. And so the meaning of this place, that Paul hopeth that when he shall come to Rome, he shall find layd vp with them a great and plentifull almes for the poore: which he here calleth a blessing. This sence were apt inough, but that this word, of the Gospell, is added, which is a let thereunto. After that Christostome had peysed that word, he at the length leueth this way, to interpretate blessing for the aboundance of all vertues and good workes: and they without doubt are a most plentifull blessing of the Gospell: namely, that they which beleue, should shine most brightly with excellent workes. Christostome also is of this mind, y Paul by a certayne spiritual prudence comendeth those thinges in the Romanes, wherunto he chiefly exhorted the. And this is much vnderstanded amongst the best lerned oratores, to vse a demonstratiue kind of spech for a deliberatiue kind. But Ambrose expoundeth the aboundance of the blessing of the Gospell, to be a confirmation of the doctrine of the Gospell by miracles. Origen addeth y this pertai- neth to the gift of prophesying, as though Paul should prophesie, that he should come to Rome with most excellent gifts. This exposition disliketh me not, and especial- ly when I consider with my selfe those wordes, which were before cited out of the 19. chapter of the Actes: For Luke in that place saith, that Paule purposed in spirite to goe to Rome. And he might boldly promise vnto himself that he should bring a boundance of spirituall giftes, who knew assuredly that vnto him was graunted the grace of the Apostleship: which he doubted not, but that it shold amongst them be fruitfull. And I thinke that no man is ignozant, but that the fruit of preaching is sometime muche holpen by the piety of him that preacheth: and sometimes by the simple and pure faith of the hearers: although in very dede all whole ought to be ascribed to the power, force, and working of God.

Times are a blessing.

A demonstra- stratiue kinde of spech vsed for a delibera- tiue.

Wherof cometh the fruite of preaching.

Also brethren I beseeche you for our Lord Iesus Christes sake, & through the loue of the spirit, that ye helpe me in my busines with your prayers to God for me. That he would deliuer me from the vnbeleuers in Iury, and that this my ministry which I will doe at Ierusalem, may be acceptable to the saintes. That I may come to you with ioy by the will of God, and may together with you, be refreshed. The God of peace be with you all. Amen.
 Amen. ij. your

The spirit
of loue.

3 John 14

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

31 2000 20

We pray
for those stages
which we know shall be given
vnto vs.

Prayers
consist not of the wor-
shines of them that pray.

How we ought to pray for others.

I beseeche you brethren. &c.] The force of this obsecration of prayer is hereby made plaine, for that it is set forth not only through the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, then which there ought to be vnto vs nothing more holy, but therewithall also is mingled the loue of the spirite. And this particle, through the loue of the spirite, is all one I thinke, as if he had sayd, through the spirite of loue. For as in Esa. is mention made of the spirite of strength, of wisdome, of fear, of counsel. &c. so geue vs to vnderstande that all the excellent faculties or powers of the minde come from the spirite of God, so here is mention made of that gifte of the holy Ghost, whose helpe Paul most needed: namely that the Romains should with a seruent loue pray vnto God for him. Verely the corrupt affects of our vncleane nature doe so dyaio and plucke vs one from an other, that vnles we be holpen by the bond of the holy Ghost, we can not be ioyned together with a true and holy societie: and if that societie want, then shall there vtterly be no fruit of mutuall prayer. It may peradventure seeme straunge vnto some, as sayth Origen, that the Apostle when as in the spirite of God he knew that he should come to Rome, wold yet notwithstanding imploze those mennes prayers. This in my iudgement no man shoulde call in question. But we should rather learne, that holy men, althoughe they certainly know, that God will geue vnto them whatsoever is expedient, yet they also knowe that he will oftentimes geue it them through the prayers of his. The Lord also knew, that the father would deliuer vnto him all things: yet notwithstanding he continually prayed vnto him, and so prayed, that he sayde. Father into thine hands I commend my spirite. And as he knewe that his spirite should without all doubt be receiued of God, so doubted he not, but that the same was to be obtained by his prayers. Moreover by those wordes we gather, that the force of prayers consisteth not of our workes and merites. For Paul so greate an Apostle, desireth to be holpen by theyr prayers, who were far inferior vnto him: although Ambrose sayth, that many little ones if they be gathered together into one, make great ones. This saying I mislike not, so; Christ sayd: where so ever shall be two or three gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them: Againe, touching what thing so ever two or three shall agree together, it shall be done vnto them as they desire. And how much the prayers of the Church profited, it is plainly declared in Peter. For he was deliuered by the Angel, when as continual prayer was made for him. And seing now that publike prayers are so profitable, they ought without all doubt most often to be celebrated. Wherefore godly men so often as they are either sicke, or are in any great daunger, ought to require the publike prayers of the Church: and afterwarde when they haue obtained theyr request, they ought also to require y church publicly to geue thanks to God for theyr sakes.

That ye helpe me in my busines.] In Greke it is συνάγω νι σάδαι μοι. This doubtles is more, then to helpe a man in his busines. For that word signifieth properly, a man to take vpon him one and the selfe same labo, one and the selfe same trauail, one and the selfe same struing, and confide with him, so; whome he prayeth. And by this phrase of speache Paul doubtles instructeth vs, with what affecte we ought to pray for others: that is, to transfer vpon our selues as much as is possible the miseries, afflictions and sorowes of him, so; whome we pray.

That he vould deliuer me from the vnbeleuers in Iury.] The first thing that he desireth them to pray for him, is, that he might be deliuered from the vnbelieving Iewes, whome he knewe deadly hated him. For they, although they wished that all the Christians might vtterly be destroyed, yet they hated Paul aboue all others:

others: for that no man more vehemently then he begged, that the ceremonies of Moses should be taken away. And in this iorney as it is set forth in the 20. and 21. chapters of the Actes. Agabus and other Prophets foretold vnto him greuous chaunces which should happen vnto him at Jerusalem: wherefore both by that history, and by this prayer it is manifest that the minde of Paul was troubled with no small perplexity. Which perplexity yet God so restrained within certaine limites, that it nothing letteth him from the worke of the Lord: For the Apostolical history most plainly testifieth, that he most constantly answered vnto the Prophets and brethren, which dissuaded him from this iorney, I count not my soule and life so precious (sayd he,) that I will delay to runne my course, and to fulfil my ministry, which the Lord Iesus Christ hath deliuered vnto me. And I am redy, (sayd he) not only to be bound, but also to dye for our Lord Iesus Christes sake. Wherefore Paule was not afeard to die, but he therefore desired to be deliuered, that he might minister vnto the saintes, and that he might come to Rome, and so goe into Spaine. For it had bene muche better for Paul to haue died, then so to haue bene beryed with perpetuall contumelies, and to liue as one layd forth to all iniuries. This he himselfe signifieth to the Philippians, saying: To dye is to me a gaine. How be it to abide in the fleshe is profitable for your sakes: and I hope that I shall abide. Paule after this manner maketh request to the Romanes, not in dede for his owne commoditie, but for theirs. And doubtles if they had a desire to see Paul, it was theyr parts withal manner of prayers earnestly to contend, that according to his desire, he might be deliuered from the unbelieuing Jewes.

And that this my ministry which I haue to doe at Jerusalem, may be acceptable to the saintes. The other parte of his request is, that the saintes might gently accept his traualle and paines. The condition and state of the godly is doubtles miserable as touching this world. They take most grievous paines for the saluation of others, not only to prouide for theyr soules, but also for theyr bodies. And yet oftentimes they doubt, whether they shall be well accepted of them, whome they seeke to profit. Neither dothe Paul without cause suspect, that this might happen also as touching them which fauoured Christ. For in those first times there was in the Church of Jerusalem, a certaine great zeale to obserue the law. From which when they hearde that Paule was fallen away, they bare but small good wil towards him. Wherefore Paul feared least his duty towards them, should haue bene reiected, and least he should haue bene frustrated of that consent & agreement which he saw was nedeful for him to the preaching of the gospell. Wherefore the preachers of our time ought to comforte them selues, if they see that theyr paynes which they take in teaching are not accepted of the people. Neither ought they which faithfully handle the distribution of almes to be grieved if they can not please all men. Christ himselfe the more paynes he toke for our sakes, so much the more incurred he the displeasure of the Jewes. Wherefore it ought not to seme vnto vs any great iniury if we be compelled to suffer y<sup>e</sup>, which we see he hath suffered. Hereby also let vs vnderstand, that we ought not only to helpe the poore, but also we must haue a care, that our oblations may be acceptable and pleasant vnto the which thing they litle consider, which when they geue any thing, geue it with a frowning countenance and with bitter & opprobrious wordes. This is a paradoxe of Christian philosophy, & a doctrine intolerable vnto the fleshe, that we should wth a valiant minde tollerate iniuries, although they be vniustly inflicted vpon vs, and that we should not cease to do good vnto them, which haue our traualle and diligence in suspicion, and beare a deadly hatred against vs. But it is meruaile how Paul calleth them saintes who beare vnto him no great good fauour. But he saw that with faith and iustification is ioyned very great infirmities, and that oftentimes it happeneth, that holy men haue no vpriight iudgement touching thynges humane: either for that they are not rightly instructed, or els for y<sup>e</sup> they are fraudulently seduced by others.

That I may come with ioy vnto you by the will of God, and may together

MMm.iii.

vvith

Why Paul was about all the other Apostles obnoxious to the Jewes.

The state of the godly is miserable as touching this world

Some of the Jewes th<sup>t</sup> were Christians bare no great good affection to wardes Paul.

What is to be seene vnto, in geuyng of almes.

Paradoxes of christian philosophy

With iustification is oftentimes ioyned great infirmity.

Cap. 16.

A Commentarie vpon the

with you be refreshed. ] This is the ende why he wished to be deliuered: namely, that he might be with the Romanes and others, whome he might by his diligence and labour helpe in the aduancing of the Gospell. Herein Paul placed all his consolation. Let the ministers now go and boast of their riches, and revenues and commodities, omitting in the meane tyme the apostolicall office of doctrine, of preaching, of labours, and of troubles. For herein both Paul put his solace & rest. This also is to be noted, the lowlines and modesty which Paul bleth whē he speaketh these thinges. For he saith not, that I may teach, admonishe, instruct & correct you: but that I may comforte and refresh my selfe with you. This is it which he sayd at the beginning of this epistle: To confirme you, that is, that I might be comforted together with you, thorough that sayth which is common, both yours and mine.

The God of peace be with you all, Amen. ] He last of all wisheth vnto them peace, and that no common peace, but the peace of God, which ought truly to be called the chiefe good thing. For as Paul in an other place sayth, it passeth all vnderstanding. With peace he began his epistle, and with peace he endeth the same. And when as he himselfe could not as yet be with them, he wisheth y they might haue with them the God of peace, that is, God pacified and mercifull, for so signifieth this particle, the God of peace.

The sixteenth Chapter.

I commend vnto you Phebe our sister, which is a seruant of the Church of Cenchrea. That ye receaue her in the Lord, as it becommeth saintes, and that ye assist her in whatsoever busines she nedeth of your ayde: for she hath geuen hospitality to many, and to me also.

What manner of minister Phebe had in the church.

Phebe the woman commended.

I commend vnto you Phebe our sister. ] Men thinke that this holy woman carried this epistle of Paul to Rome. She had bene a minister in the Church of cenchrea, not indeede in teaching publikely, but in looking to the poore, which were distressed at the charges of the Church. And what manner of widowes, either as touching age, or as touching maners were required to that charge, it is at large set forth in the epistle to Timothy. By what manner of meanes she was an helpe vnto Paul we know not, But it is inough for vs out of this testimony of Paul to vnderstand, that she had oftentimes bene beneficiall both to many others, and also to Paul himself. She is here three ways commended, for that she was a sister, for that she was a minister, and for that she had geuen hospitalitie to many others, and to Paul also. Wherunto also may be added, that she was holy: for Paul streightway addeth, as it becommeth saintes. Hereby it is manifest y Christians that are strangers, ought not only therefore to be receaued, for that they are brethren, but also for that they pertayne to God, as saynts, and wholly dedicated vnto him. Cenchrea is a towne nigh vnto Corinth, and a port or haven longing to that towne. Neither is it to be meruailed at, that Paul here commendeth a woman: for he also wrote letters of commendation to Philemon for Onesimus his bondman.

Salute Prisca and Aquila my fellow helpers in Christ Jesus (which haue for my life laid downe their owne necke, vnto whom not only I geue thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentles) Likewise greete the church that is in their house. Salute my welbeloued Epenetus, whiche is the first fruite of Achaia in Christ. Salute Mary which bestowed much labour on vs. Salute Andronicus and Junia my cosins and fellow prisoners, which are notable amongst the Apostles, and were in Christ before me. Salute Amplias Amplias my beloued in the Lorde. Salute Urbanus our fellow helper in Christ, and Stachis my beloued. Salute Appelles approved in Christ. Salute them whiche are of Aristobulus house. Salute Herodian my kinsman. Salute them whiche are of the frendes of Narcissus which are in the Lord. Salute Triphena & Triphosa, which women labour in the Lord. Salute the beloued Persis, which woman hath laboured much in the Lorde. Salute Rufus chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine. Greete Asyncritus, Plegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Mercurius, and the brethren which are with them. Salute Philologus and Julius, Nereas and his sister, and Olimpas, and al the saints which are with the. Salute one an other with an holy kisse. All the Churches of Christ Salute you.

Salute Prisca and Aquila. This woman Prisca the wife of Aquila is called of Luke in the 18. chapiter of the Actes Priscilla. Her husband Aquila was borne in Pontus, but as touching his stocke he was a Jew, and he was of the same art or science that Paul was. But why he setteth the woman befoze the man, we know not but hereby it is manifest that the loue of ech of them was notable, when as for Pauls sake they did put theyr life in danger. Wherefoze the Apostle cōfesseth, that not only he himsef is much in the debt but also all the churches of the Gentils: for it was euident that they had done a great benefit to them all, in that they had preserved Paul theyr teacher and maister. Neyther is this to be passed ouer with silence, that he calleth the man and the wife his helpers, and συνεργους, which commonly they cal, fellow workers. And not without a cause. For they instructed in the way of the lord Apollo a Jew & one that had very great knowledge in the law: as it is wryten in the 18 chap. of the Actes. All these which are there named Paul hath adozned with most excellent titles: Which if a man diligently consider, conteyne nothing that is earthly or worldly: but conteyne most excellent gifts and vertues which God had geuen vnto them: that we might vnderstand, what are the things that ought to moue vs to loue men. If there be any which loue them that are rich, beawtifull, mighty, and in honour, they ought to know, that this is not the Apostolicall loue. Riches indeede, and beawty, and honour are the giftes of God: but yet not such, that we ought with a singular loue to embrace them.

What thing
g. s ought to moue
christians to loue one another.

And the Church that is in theyr house. Paul writeth the selfe same thing of these persons in the first to the Corinthians the last chap: either bycause that theyr samely was so godly instructed that it mought seme to be a Church, or els for that the saythfull gathered together into theyr house to celebrate holy assemblies. And this interpretacion I thinke to be the likelier, although Chrysostome, Origen, and Ambrose follow the first.

The first fruites of Achaia. They which befoze all others come to profess religion plainly declare, that they litle regard men and the iudgements of the flesh, but only follow the impulsio of the holy gost. Origen in stede of Achaia retheth Asia: whome he that will follow let him vnderstand Asia the lesse wherein is Ephesus. I meruayle at Ambrose, which referreth first fruites to present dignity, as though he were placed in some magistrateship or principality which semeth not vnto me very likely, and especially for that this word, in Christ, is added.

My kinsmen and fellow prisoners. Kyned alone could not haue moued him: but he the gladlier mencioneth them, for that they had suffered together with hym. They came to Christ befoze Paul, they are called notable amongst the Apostles: not that they were of the number of the 12. Apostles, but for that as it is most likely they had sowed abrode the Gospell in many places, and had built many Churches. Origen thinketh that it is possible that they were of the number of the

72. disciples. Which I thinke can not be: for they fell away from Christ. But how attributeth he this vnto his wife: as though the office of the Apostleship could agree also with her: Paradiuenture they are called notable amongst the Apostles, for that they were well known vnto them, and were of no small reputation in the Church of Christ. This sence I dislike not so that the very wordes be not repugnant thereunto.

Narcissus made a free man by Claudius
Cesar.

Them which are of Aristobulus house. He biddeth not them to salute Aristobulus himselfe: peraduenture for that he beleued not in Christ. Yet he had of his household that were Christians. Which self thing is also thought of those whome he addeth, the friends of Narcissus. This man was made a free man by Claudius Cesar, and was a man of great might, but other wise wicked, an extortioner, and one euill spoken of: howbeit Ambrose thinketh that he was an elder.

In the Lord. For all the family of Narcissus beleued not the gospel. Vnto these men he ascribeth no titles: peraduenture for that they were weake, and did not so boldly profess the Gospel.

Apollo. Origen thinketh that Apollo was that Apollo borne at Alexandria: but I know not how I should be of his minde touching that. For so great a man without doubt, should haue bene adorned with some most notable title.

He therefore peraduenture sayth that these women Tryphona, Tryphosa, Persis, & Maria laboured, for that they had such a ministry as before we sayde Phebe had.

The booke of Hermas is not in the Canon.

His mother and mine. He calleth this woman mother, because of her affection towards him, and not that she was so by nature. So before he called Phebe his sister.

Hermas. Origen thinketh that this man was the author of the booke called the booke of the Pastor: which scripture he sayth seemeth to him holy, and inspired by God, which is a plain argument, that that booke is not to be receiued as Canonically.

Vith an holy kisse. This amongst the Hebrewes was a token of peace and of brotherly amitie.

All the churches of Christ salute you. Here are ment those churches through which Paul had passed, or which were nigh to those places.

Now brethren I beseech you marke them diligently, which cause diuision and offences, contrary to the doctrine which you haue learned, and auoide them. For they that are such, serue not the lord Jesus Christ but their owne bellies, and with faire speche and flattering, deceiue the hartes of the simple. For your obedience is come abroad amongst al. I am glad therefore of you, but yet I wold haue you arise vnto that which is good, and simple concerning euill. The God of peace shall treade sathan vnto your fete shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.

I beseeche you brethren, marke them diligently which cause diuision and offences. He had willed them before to salute the godly. Now he admonisheth them to beware of the wicked. He willet them diligently to marke and to consider them: for that as it oftentimes happeneth, they can not easely be found out, but after long time, and after that they haue done some great mischief. In these wordes are noted the false Apostles, and as Chrysostome sayth, diuers of the Iewes, which by reason of the ceremonies of the lawe did cause diuision and dissension in the Churches. These men serued theyr voluptuous pleasures and their bealy, and not God: such as they were also, whome the Lord sayd deuoured the houses of widowes. Suche men Paule to Timothe calleth intractable, vaine speakers, deceiuers of mennes mindes, and which were of the circumcision. They overthrow sayth he, houses: they teach those things which are not meete, for filthy gaine sake: whose mouth ought to be stopped.

stopped. A certaine Prophet of theyrs sayd. That the men of Crete haue alwayes bene li-ers. euill doers, and stouishfull bellies. And in the latter Epistle to Timothee, which crepe into the houses of widowers, and lead captiue women laden with sinnes, alwayes learning, and neuer comming to the knowledge of the truth. They vse fayre speech (sayth he) but by theyr flattering they seke nothing else but to deceiue you. These are two marks to know false Apostles by. They serue theyr bealy, and speake sayre or flattering-ly. Such men sayth Origen ment Christ, when he said, They come vnto you in shepes clothing, but within they are rauening wolues, sherpes clothing are sayre wordes, the gredines of the belly signifieth the rauening of wolues. And Origen addeth, See in how great dainger they are, which exercise not them selues in the holy scriptures, by which only these men are discerned. These wordes are diligently to be noted, that true doctrine is discerned from fals, by the holy scriptures only. We make not discordes in the church, as the bondslaves of the Pope falsly slander vs, but we as muche as lieth in vs, and as our bounden duety is, resist theyr conspiracye which they haue made against the truthe, and with which they haue so long time oppressed it.

Two
marks to know false Apostles
by.
One by the word of God false doctrine is discerned
from true.

And auoyde them. The Church hath no other sword but excommunication.
This sword the Apostle admonisheth them to vse against these men.

Your obedience. This he therfore addeth, least by reason of this admonition, he might seeme to haue no good opinion of them. And this in dede is the common interpretation. But I like very wel, that which Origen sayth, that here is conert-ly repproued the ouermuch easenes and redines of the Romanes to beleue. For y redynes putteth liers and false Prophets in hope to deceiue them. Wherefore he exhorteth them, not so easely to suffer them selues to be deceiued. Which exposition yet, if any man shall thinke not to agree with this that foloweth, (I am glad therfore of you) we ought to vnderstand, that it is better to offend on that behalf.
For if they should haue true doctrine taught them, and sound teachers, there shold follow very great fruit. Wherefore he exhorteth them, and stirreth them by to prudence, namely to heare with iudgement, and to try & examine those things which are spoken, befoze that they beleue them. I would haue you, (sayth he,) wise to that which is good, and simple concerning euill: as if he should say. Be ye without guile and fraude: and be not crafty and subtil to deceiue, and to doe iniuries. Paule requyreth at theyr hands simplicity, but yet ioynd with prudence: he requireth also prudence, but yet a simple prudence. So Christ sayde, Be ye prudent as serpentes, and simple as doves. Wherefore let no man boast of the ignorance of the scriptures, or of the want of knowledge in doctrine, or of vnskilfulnes in doing of thinges: as though this should be counted vnto him a praise. For God will haue vs vnskilful to committe things vniust, but prudent, wary, circumspect & industrious to finde out, to iudge, and to perfoyme those things which are good.

And the God of peace shall tread Sathan vnder your fete shortly. Out of this notable promise the Romanes in times past mought, and we at this day may receiue most swete consolation, and confirme our selues valiantly to fighte, seeing that we are assured of the victoery. He promiseteth that the troubles, dissensions and offences wherewith the Church of Rome was troubled, shoulde be diminished and broken: and there withall also sheweth that all our temptations are to be overcome by the strength and helpe of God. There is no small emphasis in this word Conterere, that is, to treade vnder. For it is vled in those things, which are so broken that they can by no meanes be restozed againe. But this perfect, full, and absolute victoery we haue not in this life. For here the deuill still renueth warre against the seruants of God. Therefore some thought that this saying of Paul is to be referred to the comming of Christ, which for that Paul beleued to be euen at the doores, therfore he addeth shortly. But Ambrose thinketh that this is to be vnderstanded of Pauls comming to Rome. For by it they shoulde so be confirmed, that all impediments of saluation shoulde vterly be expelled. But I thinke neyther of those expositions to be of necessity. For we may simply vnderstand that Sathan shall be overcome, and so overcome, that he shal no moze be able to do any thing to hinder our

We are made sure of the victoery.

our saluation. And Paul by this kinde of speche, setteth elegantly to allume to that which is written in Genesis: that the serpent in deede should haue the heale: but his head should be broken in pieces by the seede of the woman. Which thing so; as much as Christ hath perfozmed, he hath also geuen power to his members to be able to doe the same. In Luke the 10. chapter the disciples sayd vnto Christ: Even Lord, the devils also are through thy name subiecte vnto vs. Vnto whome Christ answered, I saw Sathan like lightning fall downe from heauen. Behold I geue vnto you power to treade vpon Serpents and Scorpions, and ouer all the power of the enemy. And yet is not this victoꝝ to be taken in this sense, as though hencefoꝝth we shal no more be assaulted with temptations: so; oftentimes temptations are profitable so; vs. And euen when we are in to much security, and haue all things quiet and in tranquillity, God himself stirreth vp vnto vs an aduersary, that our strength being at conflict with him, should not ware heavy in slouthfulness, but should with a godly exercise be stirred vp.

Temptations are profitable for vs, lest we should growe out of our selues to idleness.

The grace of our Lord Iesus Christ be with you. Under the name of grace he comprehendeth both the fauor of God towards his, and also the effectes thereof, that is, sundꝝ giftes and faculty and endowmentes: All which vnder one word he wisheth vnto the Romanes. Towardes the end of the chapter going before he wished vnto them peace, saying, The God of peace be with you all, Here he wisheth vnto them grace: that so;asmuch as he had begonne this epistle with these wordes, Grace vnto you, and peace, so also he mought wyth the selfe same wordes end it.

Timotheus my fellow worker, and Lucius, and Iason, and Sosipater my kinsmen salute you. Tertius which wrote this epistle salute you in the Lord. Gaius myne host and the host of the whole Church saluteth you. Erastus the receauer of the City saluteth you, and so doth Quartus a brother. The grace of our Lord Iesus Christ be with you all Amen.

Timotheus my fellow worker saluteth you. Before with great diligence he reckoned vp those whome he would haue at Rome to be saluted in his name: now also he reckoneth vp those which send salutations vnto them. And before that we come to the reherfall of the, this is not to be passed ouer, that amongst those which dwelled at Rome and were saluted of Paul, no mencion at all is made of Peter: who if he had then ben at Rome it is not likely that Paul would haue overhipped him. For these so diligently whome he sendeth salutations were much inferior to him. Of Timothe I will speake nothing. For his name is famous both in the Epistles of Paul and in the Actes of the Apostles. And this semeth to be sufficient to the commendacion of him, that Paul oftentimes calleth him his sonne, and his naturall sonne. And in this place he calleth him fellow worker.

Mencion is made of Peter.

Lucius per adventure is Luke.

Lucius. This man Origen supposeth to be Luke whose name is drawen of Paul to the forme of the names of the Romanes.

Iason. Of this man is large and manifest mention made in the Actes of the Apostles the 17. chapter. The Jewes that were at Thessalonica were troublesome vnto him, and accused him vnto the Magistrate, so; that he had geue lodging and harbꝝough to Paul and Silas.

Sosipater. This man peradventure, as Origen thinketh, is that Sosipater the son of Pirrus of Berea, of whome also Luke maketh mencion in the Actes.

Tertius which wrote this epistle salute you in the Lord. Tertius sayth Ambrose not in nomber, but in name. No man is ignorant but that the Romanes were called, Terti, Quarti, Quinti, Sexi &c. Neyther executed this man any small office in that he was the scribe or secretary of Paul.

Gaius mine host and the host of the whole Church saluteth you. It must nedes be that this was a god and godly man. For the Lord commaunded his disciples that when they came into any citie, they should first of all loke, whome they they thought to be a mete man with whome they might be, & might abide. Wherfore seeing y Paul was most diligent in obseruing the commaundements of the lord he would not vndoubtedly leue this vndone. Whereout may we gather the worthines of Gaius. This Gaius, Ambrose thinketh to be that man to whome Iohn the Apostle wrote, reioysing of his loue and deuoties which he shewed towards the faithfull. And vndoubtedly it was a great token of religion and piety to bestow hospitality not only vpon Paul, but also vpon the whole church. This is he (sayth Origen) of whome Paul sayth to the Corinthyans, I geue thanks to God that I baptised none of you but Crispus and Gaius: and he addeth, that it was an old tradition, that this man was afterwarde Bishop of Thessalonica.

Erastus the receauer of the citie saluteth you. ] Although the magistratships and dignities of this world encrease not the faith of Christ, yet forasmuch as Paul knew that they are certayne ornaments of piety he would not reiect them. So to the Philippians, They which are of the house of Cesar salute you.

The grace of our Lord Iesus Christ be with you all Amen. ] He agayne wisheth vnto the selfe same thing that he before wished: not that y repetition thereof is vayne: but to declare that it is a thing moste necessary and most oftentimes to be prayed for.

To him now that is of power to establishe you according to my Gospell and preaching of Iesus Christ by the reuelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is opened and published among all nations according to the scriptures of the prophets, according to the ordinance of God for the obedience of faith, to him I say only wise be prayse thorough Iesus Christ for euer Amen.

To him that is of power to confirme you. ] This part wanteth in some books and in some is put at the end of the 14. chapter streight way after these wordes, Whatsoeuer is not of faith is sinne. But now it is red in the last place of this epistle: neyther will we alter that order. Marcion, as Origen telleth vtterly reiected certayne epistles of Paul: and other some of them he so allowed, that yet he would not admitte them, but only mayned and gelded. So he vtterly reiected the two last chapters of this epistle. Wherefore in the bookes that he corrupted this part vtterly wanted. But we together with other sound and catholike interpreters wholly allow these wordes which he hath cut of: & therfore wil we interpret the Paul is with a great zeale of piety moued to the end his epistle with the prayses & glory of God. To him (sayth he) which is only wise be prayse thorough Iesus Christ for euer. We can not render prayse and glory vnto God but thorough Christ. For as thorough hym are deriued all giftes vnto vs, so on the other side thorough the selfe same are referred prayses and thanks geuing from vs to God. Wherefore they which beleue not in Iesus Christ, do neither vnderstand nor set forth the true God from whome all good thinges come. He is onely wise: For he is not, as sayth Origen, wise by wisdom: as men commonly are: but therefore he is wise for that he begetteth wisdom: not only, in that he hath brought forth his only sonne, but also for that by his breathing and spirit he maketh vs wise.

VVhich is able to confirme you. ] Forasmuch as we are weake and infirme, we haue perpetually nede of confirmation. Wherefore Paul sheweth vnto vs the fountayne, from whence we ought to seke it. And he prudently inculcateth thys and especially to the Romanes, for that as we haue sayd, they were troubled with sondry discordes amongst themselves.

According to my Gospell and preaching of Iesus Christ ] Hereby it is manifest that God confirmeth his not by humaine inuentions or tradicions, or by the law but by the Gospel, which vndoubtedly is nothing ells but the preaching of Christ.

According to the reuelatio of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began Marcion reiecteth the two last chapters of this epistle. We can not render glory vnto God, but thorough Christ.

How God is wise.

God confirmeth his by the gospell.

Cap. 16. A Commentarie vpon the

The gospell
is no new doctrine.

began: but now is reuealed. ] By this pzeuention he answereth to theyr cogitaci-ons, which suspected the Gospell to be a new doctrine. It is not so (sayth he). For it was before the world began, but it was hidden in silence & kept secret a long time.
But why God euen frō the beginning reuealed vnto some of the fathers although indeede to a very few so great a secret, namely that all mankind should by so won-derfull a meanes be reuewed, and saued by Chzist, and why he opened this vnto the people of the Jewes only, and that no otherwise then in shadowes and prophecies, we can not by our coniectures and vnderstandings attayne vnto. For God according to his most high liberty and wisdom shewed this secret, both when, and to whome, and in what sort he himselfe would.

According to the vvrtinges of the prophets. ] This he addeth, lest any man should suspect and count weake the new reueling of this mystery. It hath the testimony of the Prophets.

According the ordinance of God. ] That which we now sayd, namely, that this mystery was not reuealed by mans inuention or wisdom, but only by the hidden will of God, he now in these wordes confirmeth.

For the obedience of fayth ] Last of all he putteth the end why the Gospell was reueled, namely, that men should beleue it, and by that meanes be saued.

Amongst all nations. ] As touching this preaching of the Gospell there was no atception of persons. Chziste sent his Apostles to preach thoroughout the whole world.

The ende of the Commentarie of D. Peter Martir vpon S. Paules Epistle to the Romaines.

Faithfully perused by M. Dauid Whitehead.

A diligent Index or table, of the most notable things, matters, and wordes, contayned in this whole worke.

A

A Saccke the prophete is expounded.	16, 17
Abraham is iustified. 71. 72. 75. is the heyre of the worlde. 88. is like vnto God.	91.
Barons ornaments brought in againe by the Papists.	448
Decademans error.	20
Ichab solde him selfe to the deuill.	171
Deception of persons.	255
Actuall sinners are the frutes of original sin.	151
Adam was not deceived.	110
Douerities profiteth. he godly.	224
Afections grafted in man when hee was created.	29
Afection of the flesh.	196
Affects are diuers.	176
Afflictions are not euill.	99
Afflictions are to be extenuated.	211
Times called a Communion.	451
Times are called a sacrifice.	451
Times are a blessing.	452
Times geating, what is to be sene vnto there in.	453
Altars ought not to be vsed in this time.	335
Allegories what they are.	83. 327. 345
Amen, what it signifieth.	245
Anathema, what it is.	237. 238. 239. 240. 241
Angels may not be prayed vnto.	231
Angels, some are good and some are euill.	235
Angels are subject to vanitie.	213
Angels gouerne diuers regions.	359
Anelme, his saying vpon free will.	28
Antithesis.	74
Antiquitie of papistlicall churches.	244
Apostles and Bishops, are not of like authoritie.	3
Argumente of the deuinity of Christ.	5
Arme of God, what it is.	325
Arrogancy is a pestilence vnto brotherly loue.	474
Artes of speaking are not to be condemned.	232
Augustine vpon free will.	26
Augustine vpon predestination.	26
Augustine against Iulianus.	27
Antient fathers how they shold be read.	76
Articular confession is swiched.	381

B

B Bal, what it signifieth.	334. 337
Baptisme what it is.	52. 86. 143. 145. 146. 147. 148
Beasts were worshipped.	25
Beleuing, what it is.	38
Blasphemy, what it is.	46. 47
Blessednes, what it is.	75
Blindenes of the heart is sinne.	115
Blindenes of the minde.	345
Bontface a proud and arrogant Pope.	432
Brethren, to praise them is profitable for vs.	446

C

C Cules why Christ offered him selfe vnto death.	210
Cerimonies, what they are.	69. 70. 71. 152
Circumcision, what it is.	47. 48. 85. 86. 87.
Charitie distinguisheth true faith from false.	225
Change of things in the ende of the worlde.	216. 217
Children of wrath, who they are.	278
Christ excelleth philosophers.	10
Christ to dwell in vs, how it is to be vnderstand.	199
Christ, howe we receiue him, and are toynd vnto him.	200
Christ is still the minister of oure saluation.	230. 231
Christ is the ende of the law.	90
Christ is the heyre of all the worlde.	88
Christ, why he is called Lord.	6
Christ had a true body.	4
Christ is the head of the promises of God.	18
Christe had not his soule from the virgine Mary.	110
Christes church shal neuer pearish.	235
Christes diuinitie.	246
Christes flehe eaten in the sacrament, is not the cause of oure resurrection.	201. 202
Christes death, why it was acceptable to his father.	107
Christians, what things ought to moue the to loue one an other.	454
Chrysostome is expounded.	16
Chrysostome and Ambrose sail in memory.	17
Churches ought to be shut when there is no congregation.	31
Church, what it is.	236. 237.
Commandements of God expounded.	46
Concupiscence is not lawfull.	32. 33. 150
Constantine the great.	16
Contention, what it is.	40
Cornelius iustified.	181
Creatures, why they are said to mourne.	214
Creatures are signes that set forth God.	215. 216
Crosses are aduerities.	209

D

D Death is not naturall vnto man.	112
Death hath no right wher sin is not.	121
Deathe is improperly called a rewarde.	157
Degrees to saluation.	356
Deuell is a prince of this worlde.	337
Differences betwene wytyng and painting.	30
Difference betwene Dulia and Latria.	162
Difference betwene the law and the gospel.	61
Dignity of almes.	451
Discord in the church of Rome.	415
Disobedience what it is.	113
Distinctions.	346
Diuorcement vsed among the Jewes.	150
Dumme Bishops.	13

The Index or table.

E

Effects of honour and of contempt.	219
Egyptians Idolaters.	25
Election, what it is?	229.335
Election is the cause of salvation.	246.247.
248.249.250.251.252.
Election of grace, what it is.	253
Election and reiection depend on the will of God	257
Election and reprobation, how they differ?	258.274.275
Enemy, what he is.	196
Epistle to the Romans, when it was written.	451
Epistles error.	10
Error of the Pelagians.	197.173
Error of the Pelagians.	197
Eternal life is called a reward.	157
Ethnickes vphayd the gospel.	14
Ethnickes excel in sharpnes of indgement.	36
Exhortations.	345

F

Faith chiefly glorifyeth God.	23
Faith and the gospel may not be taken from Philosophy.	19
Faith defined.	20.40
Faith may not be separated frō the gospel.	19
Faith is oures, and also Gods.	18
Faith, what it is to line by it.	18. we are instructed by it.
Faith compared with philosophy.	98
Faith only iustifieth.	63.64.75.87
Faith hath a double signification.	16 Faith what it is, wherof is a large discourse from the 61. lease vnto the 98.
Faith & hope are distinguished.	220.221.222.
Faith is called obedience.	325. and is also called law.
Faith excelleth feare.	355
Faith must goe before the receiuing of the Sacraments.	361
Fire that shall consume the world in the last day.	217
Figures are necessary in scriptures	198
Feare is defined.	207.208
Felicite and blessednes, what it is.	15.150
Freewill, what it is.	26.171.172.176.177. 178.254.255.361.
Friendship is a necessary thing.	343
Frustrate, what the nature of that worde is	23
Fruit of almes.	451
Fruit of preaching, wherof it cometh.	452

G

Generation, what is the nature thereof.	271
Gentiles converted to Christ, are Israelites.	282
Gifts of the holy ghost.	223
Glozy and glorifying of God, what it is.	23. 63.211.212
Glotomy, what it is.	434
God is the searcher of our heartes, and why it is so sayd.	214
God of Sabaoth what it signifieth	283
Gods glozy consisteth in all things.	24
God suffereth long.	37
God sozbd, what it signifieth.	53

God needeth no aduocates.	14
God tempteth not to euill.	28
God willet that is good.	256.257
God doth things contrary to his lawes.	251
God of contrary things worketh like effects.	232
God is called a Lion, a Bear and a fire.	274
God tempered the fathers.	169
God seeth all men.	55
God ought not to be expressed by images.	30
God, how he deceiveth.	268
God hath not commaunded things impossible.	194
God worketh in men.	151
God worketh not by chaunce.	228
God is faithful in his promises.	106
God, why he is called the God of hope.	446
God is wise.	456
God confirmeth his by the gospel.	456
God is witnessed to be God by any thing in the world, how vile so euer the same be.	22
Gods reuengement for Idolatry.	25
Gods gifts vnto men.	13
Gods knowledge is attributed to the vngodly.	22
Gods knowledge is specially knowne in two things.	22
God is iudged of men.	58
God in dede loveth, and in dede hateth.	252
God is not the author of sinne.	28
God forsaketh the Ethnickes.	19
Gods word is the foundation of faith.	326
Good workes are not to be selected.	18.90. 158.159.
Gospel per accidens, is the instrumente of death.	192
Gospel, what it is.	3.43.61.62
Gospel is no new doctrine.	456
Gospel, who are they that are ashamed thereof.	14
Gospel is preferred to al men indifferently.	16
Gospel is not new, and when it began.	4 Gospel is more common then Philosophy.	13
Grace, what it is.	115.116.117.140.141
Grace is not common vnto all men.	335.336
Grace and life cleaue together.	139
Grace is not bound to the Sacraments.	83
Grafting in of Gentils, truth had place	449
Gracious vnto God, what it is.	37
Grief, what it is.	237
Grounds of the church, what they are.	236

H

Hating of God, what it is.	158
Happye is he that followeth the calling of God.	13
Heauen and earth shal passe, and after what manner?	217
Heretikes vphayd the gospel.	14
Holines, what it is.	5
Holy dayes.	436
Honor, what it signifieth.	219
Hope maketh glad, and maketh soz.	420
Hope springeth out of faith.	446
Hope and faith haue one property.	100.101. 102.103.104.
Hospitality is a worke of noble men.	422
How we ought to pray for others.	452
How we are made sure of the victorie.	455

I

Iacob, why he was called Israel.	242
Iacob wrestleth with God.	92
Jewes are preferred before Gentiles.	16
Jewes

The Index or table.

Jewes were Idolaters.	25.44.45.50
Idols and Idolatry.	24.25.29
Idleness is an image of death.	412
Image of God, what it is.	124.188
Image of Christ made of copper.	30.31.32
Images how they began.	24.25.30
Images of God, sprang of infidelity.	30
Images out of Temples are not to be con- tempned, so they be not worshipped.	30.32
Images taken two manner of waies.	82
Imaginations of men.	23
Immortality is the mere gift of God	219 Incredulity bursteth out of originall sinne.
Infants receive not the Eucharist.	202
Inheritance, what it is.	209.210
Instruction for preachers.	155
Invocation of Saints.	98
Isaac borne of the promises.	247
It is not counted a lye except it be don with a munde to deccieve.	452
Justification, what it is.	15.58.64.65.68. 71.75.96.107.181.185.191.193.
And it is spectially and at large treated vpon from the.367. lease vnto the.410. lease.
Justice is ioyned with the will of God.	174
Judges maye iudge the crimes of other, thoughe they them selues be guilty in the same crimes.	36
Judgement at the last day.	38

K

K Eyes of the church are the word and faith.	361
Knowledge is of two kindes.	36
Knowledge of our sinne is profitable.	109

L

L Law, what it is.	58.65.70.90.114.191. 192.135.136.137.138.151.155.
Laws are of diuers sortes.	175
Law through Christ is no burden vnto vs.	445
Law & grace differ.	153.163.164.165.166
Law and gospel differ.	15
Law of nature is the law of God.	34.35
Law abused.	143
Letter killeth is expounded.	163
Liberty of speche is necessary.	330
Liberty is obtained but one way.	174
Liberty hath thye kindes.	179
Libertines.	176.321.443
Life what it is.	196
Life is a thing excellent.	39
Life is of two sortes.	111
Love, what it is.	106.158
Love is the cause of grief.	237
Love of God, and love of men, differ.	5
Love, election, and predestination, what they are.	158.159.260.261.262.263
Lusts are of two sortes.	29.165.166.201

M

Mannes nature chiefly resemblith the diuinity of God.	21
Man endued with grace, may sin.	28
Maniches opinion in fre will.	28
Maniches confuted.	250
Marcion reiecteth the two last Chapters of this Epistle.	456
Magistrate, what he is.	217.228.426
Martiridome, what is requisite therunto.	233

Matrimony, what it is.	161
Meates of themselves, are not vncleane.	438.441
Mercy of it selfe is not good.	185
Mercy with iustice.	38
Mercy and truche are ioyned together.	445
Mercy, what it is.	159
Members of our body, what they are.	150
Meat, what it is.	157.158
Messias is come.	82
Methodes used by S. Paule, that we can not be without some God.	23
Millenarij.	88
Ministers ought not to forsake their vocati- on.	334.349.350
Miracles.	323
Miracles, the cause.	449
Mystery, what it is.	358.359
Miserable is the state of the godlye, in this world.	453
Mortifying, what it is.	203
Mortification is of two kindes.	211
Mortification of faith.	271

N

Naturall copulation betwene man and wife is good.	33
Nature teacheth vs not all those things that appertaine to God.	20
Necessity is of three kindes.	270
Nobility, wherein it chiefly consisteth	143.244
Nobility, what it is.	351
Notes by the which wickednes is knowne.	34

O

Obedience of faith.	3
Obedience what it is.	118
Obedience to Magistrates.	427
Objections made in the defence of images.	30
Objections made by Iulianus to proue free will.	27
Obsecrations or prayers.	410.411
Occasion is to be obserued.	420
Office of deacones.	418
Office of the Apostles.	449
Olde testament and the new is all one.	353
Originall sinne in infants.	229
Originall sinne passeth not away. 110. but is proper to euery man. 118. 119. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131.
Origene confuted.	250

P

Patience, what it is.	40.160
Patience in temptations.	273
Papists vphayd the gospel.	14
Papists ascribe trouble to the gospel.	15
Papists what they are.	36
Parable of the seeds.	267
Paule and the Pope agre not.	3
Paule the teacher of the Gentiles.	366
Paule, whether he coulde truly praise the Romaines.	447
Paule wrote boldly.	447
Paule in excusing him selfe, altereth not his wryting.	447
Paules priesthode was to preache the gos- pell.	447
Paules ministry and the Jewes compared together.	448

The Index or table.

Paul why he made such haste to goe about the countrey.	449
Paul why he went not to Rome at the beginning.	449
Paul, Moses, and Aaron compared together.	449
Pauls ministering vnto tables, whether it neglected the gospel.	451
Paul to the Romans, his salutation.	1.6
Paul accuseth the Ethnicks.	23
Paul about all the other Apostles, why he was odious to the Jewes.	453
Peace, what it signified with the Hebrewes.	96.97
Peace passeth all sense.	6
Pelagians error, 32. confuted.	250
Pena talionis.	26
Persons free from causes.	42
Piggys opinion of originall sinne.	120
Pharao, why God stirred him vp.	263.264.265.266.279.
Philosophers filthy life.	21
Phinees work, how it was imputed.	73
Phoebe, what manner of minister in the church she had.	453
Pythagoras opinion touching God.	31
Plinie wrote to Traiane the Emperoure of the innocent life of the Christians.	16
Popes and bishops, ought to haue no sword.	419
Popish priests.	96
Punishment of God, what it is.	36.37.38
Poorer more willing to geue then the richer.	451
Poor are to be holpen.	421.422
Prayers, what it is.	212
Prayers consist not of the worthines of the that pray.	452
Preaching and almes alwayes was committed in charge to Paul.	450
Preachers, how they ought to vse themselves.	237.313
Predestination what it is. 3.37.42. But it is specially intreated of, and defined from the 285. lease, vnto the. 366. lease.	243
Promises are of diuers sortes.	210
Promises of the law, and promises of the gospel differ.	210 Purpose of God, what it is.	253.259

R

Reasons, why god will indge men.	36
Reasons to proue that we are loued of God.	234
Regeneration is not to be attributed vnto the water.	247
Regeneration, what it is.	149.154
Reioysing, what it is.	108
Repentance preached.	19
Repentance of God, and repentance of men.	363
Resurrection is the only signe of the diuine nature of Christ.	4
Resurrection of the dead. 68. 78. 101. 102. 118	37
Riches, how it is vled.	16.117.136
Righteousnes, what it is.	316.317.318.440.
Righteousnes is of two sortes.	60.185
Righteousnes is of God.	56
Righteousnes cometh without the law.	243
Rites and ceremonies of the Gentiles, were not constant.	5
Romaines, why they were called holpe	199
Roche, which was Christ.	29 Rules to amend lustes.

S

Sabbath day.	436
Sacraments, what they are.	47.49.77.79.80.81.82.83.85.86.145.
Sacrifice, what it is.	411.412
Sacrifice of the Masse, compared with the sacrifice of the gospel.	448
Sacrifices.	195
Sacrilege, what it is.	46
Saluation by the gospel.	15
Sanctification, what it is.	156
Sanctification cometh not of the nature of the parents.	143
Sathan being bound, what it meaneth.	218
Saintes desires are not alwayes fulfilled.	450
Seditious persons are to be abhoyred.	43
Seruice of God, what it is.	1
Seruants and free men differ.	1
Seruants, why they are so called.	15
Sending of the Apostles, what it is.	2
Scripture hath not his authozity of the church.	93
Scripture bringeth patience and consolation.	443
Scripture may not be prohibited from lay men.	199
Shame, what it is.	156.175
Signes, what they are.	79
Simmachus Oracion.	25
Sinne of the first parents.	31
Sinne comprehendeth action and defect.	27
Sinne and the effectes therof is at large described from the. 54. lease, vnto the. 194. lease.
Sinnes are the tormenters of God.	34
Sinne is punished by sinne.	31
Sinnes veniall and mortall.	150
Sinne and death knit together.	111
Sinne in infants.	168.169.170
Sleeping, what it is.	433
Schoolmasters are the instrumets of god.	21
Soule of man what it is.	41
Soules of saintes, although they be blessed, desire many things.	213
Spirit of Christ, what it is.	199
Spirit of feare, and spirit of adoption.	203.204.205.206.207.208.242.
Stoikes, without affections.	29
Strange tongues may not be vled in the church.	207
Stretching out of the hand, what it is.	331
Succession, what it is.	244
Supper of the Lord, what is the righte vse therof.	24
Sword being bozne before a Prince, what it signifieth.	431

T

Table of the Eucharist.	343
Temptation is of two kinds.	28
Testament new and old. 43.44.50. and why it is so called.	363
Things are not to be made common.	451
The spirit of lone.	452
Through Christ we geue god glory.	456
To confesse what it is signifieth.	445
Transubstantiation.	198
Truthe convinceth errors.	20
Tribute, why it is payd.	431
Truthe made captiue, and by whom.	20
Truthe cometh all of God.	21
True doctrine must be ministered, though the people

The Index or table.

people allow it not.	22	Word of God edespeth.	318 Truthe had place in the grafting in of the gentiles.	445	World, what it signifieth.	413
Two marks to know false Apostles by.	455	Workes, what they are.	39.40.43
V		Workes of the law.	57.68.73
Uccles of wrath.	177	Workes of preparation.	31.173
Uncleane things, what they are.	29	Workes rejected.	148.185
Ungodlines what it is.	75	Workes of supererogation.	56
Utication of efficacy is an effecte of predesti-	190	Workes iustify not.	57.68.69.87.103
nation.		Workes and carnal propagation, are not cau-VV		ses of saluation.	246
Weking, what it is.	433	Workes of darkness what they are.	434
Wedding garment, what it is.	434	Wrath of God, what it is.	1938.278
Words and deedes are the instruments		Worshipping of God, what is the truthe of the Apostleship.	448	thereof.	23 Z Zachary slaine betweene the temple and the altare.	96

Faultes escaped, desiring thee Reader, to marke them in thy booke, according to the Table here following.

Folio.	Line.	Faultes.	Corrected.	Folio.	Line.	Faultes.	Corrected.
10	121	Unto this senses	Unto his senses	133	25	we are notably	we notably 30	148	By loues and colours by lines and colours		238	131	dissension	destruction
34	115	an Image of the	another image of the	239	149	desired to be slain	desired not to be slain
33	15	not to vnderstand	not to be vnderstand	245	135	they wyll	they wyll not 37	211	said, whe word (was said (when word was		264	26	to persift God	to resist God
cod. 2	21	or that he wold	for that he wold	272	150	thought he	neither thought he 40	238	and lying waytes	and lying wonders	278	146	persecution	perfection
42	139	out of other men	for other men	299	137	secreey	of the secreey 59	237	false	fallies	308	228	afflytted (therfore affyxed (vnto it 61	19	his appointed	his lawes appointed	310	137	was he drine vnto it	therfore was he drine 68	217	pertained vnto him	pertained not vnto	cod. 2	42	is that it	is that which 69	149	the accidences	if the accidences	317	14	tended to other	tended to no other 78	231	that so	that it is so	319	25	as the simple	as by the simple 89	216	triflingly	triflingly	326	221	a very similitude	a very apt similitude
97	237	he leaueth vs	he leueth vs	341	135	he vnderstand of	he vnderstandeth
102	140	them selues	for themselves	344	141	Iesus the priest of	Iesus the priest 105	255	a much greater lone	that he bare a muche	cod. 43		into	not into 108	01	place	placed i so firm a place	355	137	member	number 112	131	created with some	created with sinne	cod. 2	51	and abode the	and abode
123	147	haue bene they	bene saued if they	356	127	fallen into seueritye	fallen seuerity
124	113	are called	which are called	359	213	Israelites clane first	Israelites clane fast 139	119	as haue	as we haue	cod. 16		entisements	by entisements
cod. 23		proposition	proportion	361	129	who not	who differ not 140	228	were not true	were true	363	152	that that maner	that after that maner
142	255	the mansions	the inuasions	cod. 53		for the amplifying	if for the amplifying 150	116	before when he	before vfed when he	364	240	stayned from al	discerned from all 157	27	soldiers	soldiers wet on arfar	365	151	Omnis	Omnes 159	16	in a merite	in it a merite	368	26	to be the	put to be the
cod. 2	25	holtiis promeretur	holtiis promeretur	369	26	not in thy name	we not in thy name 166	151	with as it is his first	with this first	380	247	was by these facts	was not by these facts
173	129	and the effect	and the defect	381	246	he formaketh what	the fire maketh hat
183	141	rites	cit yes	385	245	after such for	after such sort 184	218	the worse they	the worse thyng	386	11	uen freely	men, it is geuen frely, 185	141	now condemnation	now no condemnation	387	149	strengths	strengths of nature 189	219	these	forasmuch as these	393	146	one calleth	one he calleth
cod. 14		should moue	should meane	cod. 2	24	if I all sayth	if I haue all sayth 190	125	so that these	so are these	405	210	of righteousness is	righteousnes is of 195	238	effects	effects	406	137	but not by	but not by faith
196	254	can not disagree	can not agree	407	211	thou hast receyued	thou hast not receiued
200	110	world tooke	word tooke	418	243	trifling effectes	trifling offices 211	151	eternall wright	eternall weight	428	117	Iohn	Iehu 221	120	wife appointed	wyse men appoynted	429	22	Onely if God	Only of God
cod. 2	8	newly that he	namely that he	430	219	as our feare	without feare 123	218	so that he	so that ye	436	132	be which auengerth	which he auengerth.

Imprinted at London by Iohn Daye, dwelling ouer Aldersgate beneath S. Martins. Anno Domini. 1568. the 31. day of August.

Cum Gratia & Priuilegio Regiæ Maiestatis per Decennium.

